PREFACE

TO THE READER.

IT was a ſaying of the famous Dr. South, that "Popery is not only the worſt religion, but the greateſt Evil that can poſſibly come into any country." The contents of the following ſheets furniſh us with ample proof of this. They are part of a much larger work, namely, THE ACTS AND MONUMENTS OF THE CHRISTIAN MARTYRS, written by JOHN FOX, a man of rare and excellent endowments, both natural and acquired: as he lived at the time when the bloody ſcenes herein related were exhibited; and his integrity, learning and piety, equalled by few, by none exceeded; the credibility of his teſtimony can be called in queſtion only by thoſe, whoſe intereſt or principles lead them to eſpouſe and promote the cauſe of Popery.

Should any endeavour to perſuade thee, Reader, That Popery now is different from what it was in the reign of queen Mary, thou mayſt anſwer, Yes, there is the ſame difference as between a lion chained up, and a lion let looſe. Popery does not burn Proteſtants to death in Smithfield now, becauſe it hath not power; but it does burn them in Spain and Portugal, becauſe it hath. Be aſſured that Popery is always the ſame, and ſo will continue, until it ſhall ceaſe out of the earth.

This being the caſe, How expedient is it for us to be always on our guard, and to contribute all in our power to keep it from ever prevailing again in this happy, this free, this Proteſtant land! For this purpoſe were the following ſheets publiſhed again, and in ſuch a manner as to enable the poorer ſort of our fellow-ſubjects to purchaſe them, that they might be made thoroughly acquainted with the principles of popiſh government, and learn from what has happened, what muſt happen, if ever Popery ſhould get the aſcendant again amongſt us.

'Twas doubtleſs with this view that our wiſe forefathers ordered Mr. Fox's three books to be chained to a deſk in ſome conſpicuous part of the pariſh-churches in this land, that all the pariſhioners might have recourſe to them, and read therein: and I can't help thinking, that it would do honour to thoſe in power, if a law was made to re-publiſh the whole, at the public expence, and fix them as heretofore for public peruſal. However this may be, the reception which the publication of this part of the work has met with, has encouraged the publiſher to ſend forth the other two books, as time will permit, in the ſame manner he has done this; and 'tis to be hoped this further undertaking will be uſeful in its degree, tho' not ſo extenſively as could be wiſhed, for want of that general acceſs, which, in the caſe of a Parliamentary publication, would be afforded to all.

As for perſecution, I believe it to come from the bottomleſs pit, and that, in all its ſhapes; and I would no more harbour it in my breaſt againſt the perſons of the papiſts, than I would have them exerciſe it againſt the proteſtants; but ſtill be it our care, to ſecure, by all lawful and prudent means, our country, ourſelves, our families, from the contagion of Popery; not only as it regards our lives and properties, but above all as it regards our better part: GOD forbid that I ſhould ſay of the papiſts as they do of us, that they muſt be damned, becauſe they do not think as we do; but ſtill the hazard and danger of ſetting up a religion of man's invention, in ſo many inſtances contradictory to the religion of JESUS CHRIST, muſt be very great; how great, can only be determined by the Judge of all, in that day, when he ſhall appear in the clouds of heaven, to put an everlaſting difference between thoſe who worſhip him "in ſpirit and in truth," and thoſe who, "through the traditions of men, make void the law of God*."

Bleſs God, O reader, for his loving kindneſs to this proteſtant nation, and "call upon all that is within thee to praiſe his holy name," for that bulwark of the proteſtant religion, the preſent Illuſtrious Royal Family; that He hath ſet upon the throne of theſe kingdoms a Prince, who has laid the ſtrong baſis of his government on the fear of God, and the love of his ſubjects, that hence it is, we view him ſeated on the throne of his anceſtors, and ruling in the united and affectionate hearts of a free and happy people.

When I conſider theſe things, I cannot help calling to mind, thoſe memorable words of the Lord, Iſa. v. 4. "What could I have done more for my vineyard that I have not done in it?" But, alas, what return do we make to God for all this? though we are delivered out of the darkneſs of Popery into the light of Proteſtantiſm, what is the return we make? what fruit doth this highly-favoured vineyard bring forth? have we not reaſon to fear, that the Lord may utter againſt us the words which follow the tender remonſtrance above-mentioned:—Wherefore, "when I looked that it ſhould bring forth grapes, brought it forth wild grapes?"

As for enumerating the outward, flagrant wickedneſſes daily committed in the face of the ſun, were I to attempt it, I ſhould ſoon get beyond the compaſs of a preface, and perhaps exceed the bulk of the book itſelf. But the cauſe of it all is, the general contempt for inward, vital religion, ſpread over the land, owing partly to the love of pleaſure, luxury and eaſe, that reigns amongſt ſome, partly to the ſcandalous lives and converſations of others, who profeſs better things, and partly to the deriding thoſe who are examples of real godlineſs.

Another cauſe of irreligion amongſt us, is, the diviſion that reigns amongſt proteſtants of different perſuaſions; would to God they might once ſee themſelves, what I ſincerely wiſh them to be, ſo many different corps ſerving under one captain, making together one army, and fighting under the banner of Christ againſt the common enemies of his kingdom, ſin, the world, and the devil. Inſtead of this, we are doing the papiſts work, and too plainly ſhew, that bigotry, the child of pride and ſuperſtition, has too great a ſhare in the hearts of even thoſe who profeſs themſelves to be proteſtants; numbers there are, of every denomination, who are for meaſuring the privileges of God's children by the ſcanty limits of their own narrow hearts, and are for excluding all from ſalvation, who do not come within the pale of ſomething they call the Church.—Which ſaid ſomething is juſt what each party pleaſes to make it. But God's word clearly defines the church to be a company or congregation of holy regenerate ſouls, who are "the children of God by faith in Chriſt Jeſus, where there is no difference or reſpect of perſons, where circumciſion availeth nothing, nor uncircumciſion; where there is neither male nor female, Barbarian, Scythian, bond nor free, but Chriſt— is all and in all," Matt. xix. 28. Tit. iii. 5. Gal. iii. 26. Col. iii. 11. It eaſily appears then, who are out of the pale of the church, namely, thoſe that are out of Christ, none elſe. Thoſe who are united to Christ by faith, are Christ's, "members of his body, of his fleſh, and of his bones," Epheſ. v. 30. But the ungodly, the hypocrite, the covetous, the lover of filthy lucre, the profane, the unbeliever, the wilful ſinner of every kind, ſtand excommunicate from Christ; and all the outward forms and ceremonies upon earth, however rigorouſly obſerved, or ſtrenuouſly defended, however neceſſary to the well-being and due government of religious ſociety, do but leave ſuch perſons what they found them, children of the devil: and ſo they will remain, until they receive the truth in the love of it, and are made partakers of the divine nature, by the power of God within their hearts. Think on this, my proteſtant brethren, and remember the words of your common Lord, "By this ſhall all men know that ye are my diſciples, if ye have love one to another."

Strive not for the maſtery over each other, but "ſtrive to enter" yourſelves, and to bring others "into the kingdom of God."—Let not your contention be for outward things, which the word of God hath left indifferent, but for "the faith once delivered to the ſaints."—Let your lives and converſations be examples of faith, humility, meekneſs and benevolence; ſuch as may win over others to your profeſſion.—Endeavour to ſtrengthen the hands of all who preach, and to comfort the hearts of all that love the Lord Jesus Christ in ſincerity. "Let all bitterneſs, and wrath, and anger, and clamour, and evil-ſpeaking, be put away from you, with all malice," Epheſ. iv. 13. and beg of God to unite your hearts in love, "which is the very bond of perfectneſs, to him, and to each other; then your great, but holy ambition will be, who ſhall do moſt for God, who ſhall moſt adorn the goſpel, and who ſhall moſt excel in all the "mind that was in Chriſt Jeſus."—Thus ſhall ye ſtand as an impregnable fortreſs, againſt Rome, and every antichriſtian power; "be lovely in your lives, and in your deaths not divided," 2 Sam. i. 23.

Reader, May this be the happy ſituation of religion amongſt us; and mayſt thou, and may I, be conſtantly uſing all our endeavours to promote it, both in public and private, that we may ſhare in the peace of our Jerusalem on earth, and after death, through the alone righteouſneſs of JESUS the Lord, unite in the common praiſes of God and the Lamb for ever and ever! Amen, and Amen.

So prayeth thine hearty well-wiſher in the Lord,

Jan. 15. 1761.

PREFACE

TO A FORMER

EDITION.

THIS valuable Book of ENGLISH Martyrs being grown ſo very ſcarce, as to be rarely found but in the Cloſets of the Learned or Curious, it is hoped that the Method taken to reſtore it to the Public will meet with general Approbation and Encouragement; as it ſeems to be the moſt proper Way for promoting the univerſal Good intended: For the Purchaſe of ſo voluminous Work cannot be reached by every one's Purſe at once; and therefore this Expedient was reſolved on, of publiſhing a certain Number of Sheets weekly, by Subſcription, that the common People might be alſo enabled, by degrees, to procure it.

MAY God give a Bleſſing to the Undertaking; and grant that theſe dreadful Accounts of Popiſh Tyranny may not only prove a Means of preſerving our Church from ever falling into ſuch groſs Errors and Enormities; but alſo teach us, and all Chriſtians, to ſet a greater Value upon that Religion, which, by the Bleſſing of God, is eſtabliſhed in this Kingdom; whoſe Doctrine and Conſtitution is ſo exactly agreeable to that of the Primitive Chriſtians, and firſt Propagators of the Goſpel, and alſo incline us more ſtedfaſtly to adhere to the Faith and Profeſſion of it.

IT would be needleſs to tire the reader with an Account of the Particulars contained in the following Hiſtory, ſince every Matter therein is too fully expreſſed to need any Comment: and it was for this Reaſon that Mr. Fox's original Preface is omitted, it being thought too long, giving an Account only of the Riſe, Progreſs, Gatherings and Abſurdity of the Maſs, with the Canon and all its Appurtenance; which, he ſays, like Æſop's Crow plumed with the Feathers of various Birds, was longer in patching together, than the Temple of Solomon was building. Whence he proves, that none of the Apoſtles founded it; and yet this Popiſh Maſs was one of the principal Cauſes for which ſuch an Army of godly Men became Martyrs, ſuffering Death in ſo many cruel Shapes; ſome conſumed by Fire, ſome pined away with Hunger, ſome hanged, ſome ſlain, ſome wracked, ſome tormented one Way, ſome another, as will hereafter at large appear.

May the bleſſed Spirit of God bring into the Way of Truth all ſuch as have erred and are deceived: May it pleaſe him to ſtrengthen ſuch as do ſtand, to comfort and help the weak-hearted, to raiſe up them that fall, and finally to beat down Satan under our Feet.

AN ACCOUNT OF THE SUFFERINGS AND DEATH OF THE PROTESTANTS IN THE REIGN OF QUEEN MARY THE FIRST.

BOOK I.

Of Queen MARY's Accession to the Throne, and the ſeveral Troubles and Alterations that happened in her Reign both in Church and State.

DURING the time that king Edward VI. was afflicted by a long illneſs, there was a marriage provided, concluded, and ſolemnized, in the month of May, between the lord Guildford, ſon to the duke of Northumberland, and the lady Jane, the duke of Suffolk's daughter; whoſe mother, being then alive, was daughter to Mary, king Henry's ſecond ſiſter, who was firſt married to the French king, and afterwards to Charles duke of Suffolk. The marriage being conſummated, and the king every day growing worſe, and there being no hopes of his recovery, it was brought to paſs by the conſent both of the nobility and chief lawyers of the realm, that the king by his laſt will and teſtament did ſet aſide his two ſiſters Mary and Elizabeth, and left the crown to the aforeſaid lady Jane, the duke of Suffolk's daughter.

To this order ſubſcribed all the king's council, and chief of the nobility, the lord mayor and city of London, and almoſt all the judges and principal lawyers of the realm, except juſtice Hales of Kent, who was remarkable for his being as true a proteſtant, and as upright a judge as any in the realm, and who firſt giving his conſent to the lady Mary's being queen, would upon no account therefore ſubſcribe to the lady Jane. But of this man more hereafter. The objections againſt the lady Mary's reigning were, becauſe it was feared ſhe would marry with a ſtranger, and ſo entangle the crown, and likewiſe that ſhe would bring in the pope, and quite alter the religion uſed both in her father king Henry, and her brother king Edward's days, which by the ſequel of this ſtory you will find afterwards came to paſs.

What moſtly occaſioned this conjecture of theirs, was the great ſtubbornneſs ſhe ſhewed and declared in her brother's days, as appears from letters that paſſed between her and king Edward, and the council. The matter however being thus concluded and confirmed by the ſubſcribing of every man's hand, not long after, through the violence of his illneſs, that moſt hopeful prince king Edward departed this life, when he was ſixteen years of age, and with whom decayed, in a great meaſure, the flouriſhing eſtate and honour of the Engliſh nation.

After king Edward was dead, the lady Jane was by the nobles conſent proclaimed queen in London and other populous cities, and as ſuch was there ſo taken and called. There was but little difference in age between this young lady and king Edward, but as to learning and knowledge of the languages ſhe was not only equal, but ſuperior to him, as having had the advantage of a man of moſt excellent learning for her tutor and inſtructor; and had her fortune been equal to her education and fineneſs of wit, no doubt but ſhe would have been comparable not only to the houſe of Veſpaſians, Sempronians, and mother of the Gracchi's, yea to any other woman beſides, but even to men of the univerſity that had taken ſeveral degrees there in the ſchools.

But while theſe things were working, and upon the anvil at London, the lady Mary, knowing her brother's death, wrote to the lords of the council in the following manner:

The Lady Mary's Letter to the Lords of the Council, claiming the Crown upon her Brother's Deceaſe.

"MY lords, we greet you well, and have received "ſure advertiſement, that our deareſt brother "the king, our late ſovereign lord, is departed to God's "mercy, which news how woful they be unto our "heart, he only knoweth, to whoſe will and pleaſure "we muſt and do humbly ſubmit us and our wills. But "in this ſo lamentable a caſe, that is to wit, now after "his majeſty's departure and death, concerning the "crown and governance of this realm of England, with "the title of France, and all things thereto belonging, "what hath been provided by act of parliament, and the "teſtament and laſt will of our deareſt father, beſides "other circumſtances advancing our right, you know, "the realm, and the whole world knoweth, the rolls "and records appear by the authority of the king our "ſaid father, and the king our ſaid brother, and the "ſubjects of this realm; ſo that we verily truſt, that "there is no good true ſubject that is, can, or would "pretend to be ignorant thereof: and of our part we "have of ourſelves cauſed, and, as God ſhall aid and "ſtrengthen us, ſhall cauſe our right and title in this "behalf to be publiſhed and proclaimed accordingly. "And albeit this ſo weighty a matter ſeemeth ſtrange, "that our ſaid brother dying upon Thurſday at night "laſt paſt, we hitherto had no knowledge from you "thereof, yet we conſider your wiſdoms and prudence "to be ſuch, that having eftſoons [quickly] amongſt "you debated, pondered, and well weighed this preſent "caſe with our eſtate, with your own eſtate, the com-"monwealth and all our honours, we ſhall and may "conceive great hope and truſt, with much aſſurance "in your loyalty and ſervice, and therefore for the time "interpret and take things not to the worſt; and that "ye will, like noblemen, work the beſt. Nevertheleſs, "we are not ignorant of your conſultations, to undo "the proviſions made for our preferment, nor of the "great bands and proviſions forcible, wherewith ye be "aſſembled and prepared, by whom, and to what end, "God and you know, and nature cannot but fear ſome "evil. But be it that ſome conſideration politic, or "whatſoever thing elſe hath moved you thereto, yet "doubt you not, my lords, but we can take all theſe "your doings in gracious part, being alſo right ready "to remit and fully pardon the ſame, and that freely to "eſchew bloodſhed and vengeance, againſt all thoſe that "can or will intend the ſame, truſting alſo aſſuredly you "will take and accept this grace and virtue in good part "as appertaineth, and that we ſhall not be inforced to "uſe the ſervice of other our true ſubjects and friends, "which in this our juſt and right cauſe, God, in whom "our whole affiance is, ſhall ſend us. Wherefore, my "lords, we require you, and charge you, and every of "you, that of your allegiance which you owe to God "and us, and to none other, for our honour and the "ſurety of our perſon only employ yourſelves, and "forthwith upon receipt hereof, cauſe our right and "title to the crown and government of this realm to be "proclaimed in our city of London and other places, "as to your wiſdom ſhall ſeem good, and as to this "caſe appertaineth, not failing hereof, as our very truſt "is in you. And this our letter, ſigned with our hand, "ſhall be your ſufficient warrant on this behalf.

To this letter of the lady Mary, the lords of the council returned the following anſwer:

The Lords Anſwer to the lady Mary's Letter.

"MADAM, we have received your letters, the "ninth of this inſtant, declaring your ſuppoſed "title, which you judge yourſelf to have to the imperial "crown of this realm, and all the dominions thereunto "belonging. For anſwer whereof, this is to advertiſe "you, that foraſmuch as our ſovereign lady queen Jane "is, after the death of our ſovereign lord king Edward "VI. a prince of moſt noble memory, inveſted and "poſſeſſed with the juſt and right title in the imperial "crown of this realm, not only by good order of antient "laws of this realm, but alſo by our late ſovereign lord's "letters patent ſigned with his own hand, and ſealed with "the great ſeal of England, in preſence of the moſt part "of the nobles, counſellors, judges, with divers other "grave and ſage perſonages, aſſenting and ſubſcribing to "the ſame: We muſt therefore, as of moſt bound duty "and allegiance, aſſent unto her ſaid grace, and to none "other, except we ſhould (which faithful ſubjects can-"not) fall into grievous and unſpeakable enormities. "Wherefore we can no leſs do, but for the quiet both of "the realm and you alſo, to advertiſe you, that foraſ-"much as the divorce made between the king of famous "memory, king Henry VIII. and the lady Katherine "your mother, was neceſſary to be had both by the "everlaſting laws of God, and alſo by the eccleſiaſtical "laws, and by the moſt part of the noble and learned "univerſities of Chriſtendom, and confirmed alſo by the "ſundry acts of parliaments remaining yet in their force, "and thereby you juſtly made illegitimate, and unherit-"able to the crown imperial of this realm, and the "rules, and dominions, and poſſeſſions of the ſame, you "will upon juſt conſideration hereof, and of divers "other cauſes lawful to be alledged for the ſame, and "for the juſt inheritance of the right line, and godly "order taken by the late king our ſovereign lord king "Edward VI. and agreed upon by the nobles and "great perſonages aforeſaid, ſurceaſe by any pretence to "vex and moleſt any of our ſovereign lady queen Jane "her ſubjects, from their true faith and allegiance due "unto her grace: Aſſuring you, that if you will for "reſpect ſhew yourſelf quiet and obedient (as you "ought) you ſhall find us all and ſeveral ready to do "you any ſervice that we with duty may, and glad with "your quietneſs to preſerve the common ſtate of this "realm, wherein you may be otherwiſe grievous unto "us, to yourſelf, and to them. And thus we bid you "moſt heartily well to fare.

"From the Tower of London, in this ninth of July 1553.

All theſe perſons aforeſaid, except the duke of Northumberland and Sir John Gates, were afterwards by ſpecial favor, or ſpecial or general pardon, diſcharged.

Upon receiving this anſwer, and thereby perceiving the lords minds, the lady Mary makes haſte away privately far out of London, relying chiefly upon the good will of the commons, but yet not altogether deſtitute of the ſecret advertiſements of ſome of the nobles. When the council heard of her ſudden departure, and perceived her ſtoutneſs, and that things went not as they expected, they ſpeedily gathered a body of men together, and pitched on the duke of Suffolk for their leader or general. But afterwards changing their minds, they thought it beſt to let the duke of Suffolk keep the Tower where the lord Guildford and the lady Jane then lodged, and to ſend the duke of Northumberland, with ſeveral other lords and gentlemen. In which expedition, notwithſtanding the guards were very unwilling to march at firſt, yet through the perſuaſion and importunity of the lord treaſurer, maſter Chomley, and others, they were at length induced and prevailed on to aſſiſt the duke, and to ſet forward with him.

Theſe things thus agreed on, and the duke being now ſet forward out of London after the beſt manner, both with his times and journey preſcribed him by the council, that he might not do any thing but upon warrant; the lady Mary in the mean while fatigued with travelling up and down, and conſidering where to fix moſt for her advantage, withdrew herſelf at length into the quarters of Norfolk and Suffolk, where for ſubduing the rebels in her brother king Edward's days, ſhe underſtood the duke's name was very much hated, and procuring to her aid and aſſiſtance as many of the commons as ſhe could, ſhe kept herſelf cloſe at Fremingham caſtle. And here reſorted firſt to her the Suffolk men, who being always very forward in promoting the proceedings of the goſpel, promiſed her their aid and help, in caſe ſhe would not attempt the alteration of the religion which by laws and orders publicly enacted was before eſtabliſhed in her brother king Edward's days, and which was generally received by the conſent of the whole realm.

In ſhort, with this condition ſhe readily complied, promiſing them faithfully that no innovation ſhould be made in religion, ſo that no man at that time miſtruſted her. Which promiſe, if ſhe had as conſtantly kept, as they did willingly preſerve her with their bodies and weapons, ſhe had acted worthy her blood, and made her reign more ſtable to herſelf through future tranquillity; for let a man be never ſo powerful, yet breach of promiſe is an ill ſupporter of quietneſs, fear worſe, but cruelty worſt of all.

But however, the lady Mary being guarded and aſſiſted with the power of the Goſpellers, vanquiſhed the duke, and all thoſe who came along with him. In conſideration whereof upon the Suffolk men's afterwards ſupplicating her grace, and reminding her of performing her promiſe, methinks the following anſwer ſhe returned was very ſevere and ungrateful: "Foraſmuch (ſaith ſhe) as you "being but members deſire to rule your head, you ſhall "one day well perceive, that members muſt obey their "head, and not look to bear rule over the ſame." And not only ſo, but to ſtrike a greater terror into others, a certain gentleman near Windham ſide, namely, one Mr. Dobbe, for the ſame cauſe, that is, by advertiſing her by humble requeſt of her promiſe, was puniſhed with ſtanding three times in the pillory, to be a common gazing ſtock to all men. Divers others likewiſe delivered her books and ſupplications collected out of the ſcripture, to exhort her to continue in the true religion then eſtabliſhed, and for their good will were impriſoned. But ſuch is the ſtate and condition of human nature (as may here be plainly ſeen) that generally ſpeaking, we are always more ready to ſeek friendſhip when we ſtand in need of help, than to requite a benefit that is once paſt and received. However, this may be a matter of great comfort to all miſerable creatures, that equity and fidelity are ever perfect with the Lord above, though the ſame be ſhut out of doors in this world, and not to be found among men.

But my deſign being to write a ſtory, and not to treat of office, I ſhall chuſe to paſs by the Suffolk men for a while, and proceed to conſider the contrary ſide, the duke of Northumberland; who having his warrant under the broad ſeal, with all his furniture in readineſs, as he proceeded on his march, what ado there was, what ſtirring on every ſide, what ſending, riding, and poſting, what letters, meſſages, and inſtructions paſſed to and fro, what talking among the ſoldiers, and heart-burnings among the people, what fair pretences outwardly, and what privy practices inwardly, what diſpatching of ordnance from the Tower, and what coming down of ſoldiers from all quarters, a world it was to ſee, and a proceſs to declare, enough to make a whole Ilias. But what made moſt for the lady Mary, were the duke's ſhort journeys aſſigned him by commiſſion, which I took notice of before; for the longer the duke lingered in his journey, the lady Mary's increaſed, the hearts of the people being much inclined to her. Which when the council at London perceived, and underſtood how the common people began to withdraw from them to her, and likewiſe that certain noblemen began ſo to do, they forthwith changed their note, and proclaimed for queen the lady Mary, eldeſt daughter to king Henry VIII. and appointed by parliament to ſucceed king Edward, dying without iſſue.

And ſo the duke of Northumberland, ſent againſt her by advice of the council, was left deſtitute and forſaken at Cambridge, with only ſome of his ſons, and a few others, as the earl of Huntington for one, who were all arreſted and brought to the Tower of London, as traitors to the crown.

Thus have ye the lady Mary made queen, and the ſword of authority put into her hand, which how ſhe afterwards uſed may be plainly ſeen in the ſequel of this book. For when ſhe had been thus advanced by means of the Goſpellers, and by conquering her enemies, and ſending the duke captive to the Tower, July the twenty-fifth, ſaw all things quiet, ſhe followed not long after, being brought up to London the third of Auguſt, with the rejoicing of ſome, the fear of many, but probably with the flattery of a far greater number.

When ſhe came to London, ſhe firſt lodged at the Tower, where a little before her coming the lady Jane, and her huſband the lord Guildford were impriſoned, where they remained almoſt five months waiting her pleaſure. But the duke, within a month after his coming to the Tower, was adjudged to death, and brought to the ſcaffold, and beheaded, notwithſtanding the promiſe made him of his life (yea, though his head were upon the block), if he would but renounce his religion and hear maſs, which he accordingly did, and denied in words that true religion, which in the days of Henry VIII. and Edward VI. he had frequently declared himſelf willing both to favor and further; alſo exhorting the people to return to the catholic faith, as he termed it: Whoſe recantation the papiſts forthwith publiſhed and ſpread abroad, rejoicing not a little at his converſion, or rather ſubverſion.

Thus the duke of Northumberland, with Sir John Gates, and Sir Thomas Palmer, being put to death, which laſt confeſſed his faith that he had learned in the goſpel, and lamented that he had not lived more conformably thereunto. In the mean time queen Mary beginning her reign with the blood of theſe men, and with hearing maſs herſelf in the Tower, but more eſpecially with releaſing from thence Stephen Gardiner, gave plain indication that (as the people in general ſurmiſed) ſhe would not perform what ſhe promiſed the Suffolk men, concerning the not ſubverting or altering the ſtate of religion.

Beſides the premiſes, there were other things that followed, which every day more and more diſcomforted the people, and which declared the queen to bear no good will to the preſent ſtate of religion; as not only the releaſing of Gardiner, and making him lord chancellor of England, and biſhop of Wincheſter, turning out Dr. Poynet; the making Bonner biſhop of London, and diſplacing Dr. Ridley; alſo the promoting Dr. Day to the biſhoprick of Chicheſter, putting out J. Scory; Dr. Tonſtal to the biſhoprick of Durham; Dr. Heath to the biſhoprick of Worceſter, and committing J. Hooper to the Fleet; Dr. Veſie made biſhop of Exeter, and Miles Coverdale put out. All which things being marked and perceived, there aroſe great heavineſs and diſcomfort to all good men, but, on the contrary, as great rejoicing to the wicked. In which diſcord of minds and diverſity of affections, there was now to be ſeen a miſerable ſtate of things throughout the whole realm: for they that could diſſemble cared not how matters went; but ſuch as were men of conſcience, and had any regard for the truth, perceived coals to be already kindled, and which ſhould afterwards be the deſtruction of many a true chriſtian, as indeed it came to paſs. In the mean while queen Mary, after theſe beginnings, removed to Hampton-court, and againſt the tenth of October next enſuing cauſed a parliament to be be ſummoned, of which more ſhall be ſpoken hereafter.

Thus have ye heard how divers biſhops were removed, and others placed in their room; amongſt whom was Dr. Ridley biſhop of London, a worthy man, pious and learned, who in the time of queen Jane, by order of the council, preached a ſermon at Paul's croſs, declaring therein his opinion concerning the lady Mary, and diſſuading them by alledging the inconveniencies that might ariſe by admitting her to the crown, propheſying, as it were, before, that which afterwards came to paſs, namely, that ſhe would bring in a foreign power to reign over them, and ſubvert the chriſtian religion then happily eſtabliſhed; ſhewing, moreover, that the lady Mary, being in his dioceſe, he, according to his duty, as being then her ordinary, had done his endeavour to reduce her to this religion, and notwithſtanding in all other points of civility ſhe ſhewed herſelf gentle and tractable, yet in matters that concerned true faith and doctrine, ſhe appeared perverſe and obſtinate; that he could conceive no other hopes of her, but that ſhe would diſturb and overturn all that had been planted and confirmed with ſo much induſtry in the reign of her brother king Edward. Soon after this ſermon was preached, the lady Mary was proclaimed queen, whereupon Dr. Ridley, forthwith repaired to ſalute her at Fremingham Caſtle, where he met with cold entertainment, and being deprived of all his dignity, was ſent back upon a lame halting horſe to the Tower.

The Sunday following Mr. Rogers preached, diſcourſing very learnedly on the goſpel for the day: Whereupon queen Mary perceiving things not to go forward according to her mind, ſhe forthwith deviſed and conſulted with her council how to bring about by other means what by open law ſhe could not well accompliſh; and accordingly directed forth an inhibition by proclamation, that no man ſhould preach or read openly the word of God in churches, and ſeveral other things inhibited in the ſame proclamation, the copy whereof here followeth.

An Inhibition of the Queen for preaching, printing, &c.

" THE Queen's Highneſs, well remembering what " great inconveniencies and dangers have grown " to this her Highneſs's realm in times paſt, through the " diverſity of opinions in queſtion of religion, and hearing alſo that now of late, ſince the beginning of her " moſt gracious reign, the ſame contentions be again " much revived, through certain falſe and untrue reports and rumours ſpread by ſome light and evil diſpoſed perſons; hath thought good to do to underſtand, " all her Highneſs's moſt loving ſubjects, her moſt " gracious pleaſure in manner following:

" And yet ſhe doth ſignify unto all her Majeſty's loving " ſubjects, that of her moſt gracious diſpoſition and " clemency, her Highneſs mindeth not to compel any " her ſaid ſubjects thereunto, until ſuch time as further " order by common aſſent may be taken therein: forbidding nevertheleſs all her ſubjects of all degrees, at " their perils, to move ſeditions, or ſtir unquietneſs in " her people, by interpreting the laws of this realm after their brains and fantaſies, but quietly to continue " for the time till (as before is ſaid) further order may " be taken, and therefore willeth and ſtraitly chargeth " and commandeth all her ſaid good loving ſubjects, to " live together in quiet ſort, and chriſtian charity, " leaving thoſe new found deviliſh terms of Papiſt or " Heretic, and ſuch like, and applying their whole " care, ſtudy, and travel, to live in the fear of God, " exerciſing their converſations in ſuch charitable and " godly doing, as their lives may indeed expreſs that " great hunger and thirſt of God's glory and holy " word, which by raſh talk and words many have pretended: and in ſo doing they ſhall beſt pleaſe God, " and live without danger of the laws, and maintain " the tranquillity of the realm. Whereof as her Highneſs ſhall be moſt glad, ſo if any man ſhall raſhly " preſume to make any aſſemblies of people, or at any " public aſſemblies, or otherwiſe, ſhall go about to ſtir " the people to diſorder or diſquiet, ſhe mindeth, according to her duty, to ſee the ſame moſt ſeverely reformed and puniſhed according to her Highneſs's laws.

" of Auguſt in the firſt year of our moſt proſperous
" reign."

About this time, or not long before, one Mr. Bourn, a canon of Paul's, who was afterwards made biſhop of Bath, was appointed by Bonner, then biſhop of London, to preach at Paul's Croſs; and he taking occaſion from the goſpel of the day, largely to juſtify Bonner then preſent; by ſaying, that day four years Bonner had preached upon the ſame text, and in the ſame place, and was thereupon moſt cruelly and unjuſtly caſt into the moſt vile dungeon of the Marſhalſea, and there kept during king Edward's reign; his words had ſuch an ill effect upon his auditors, that they could not keep ſilence, but began to murmur and ſtir in ſuch ſort, that the mayor and aldermen, with other eſtates then preſent, were much afraid of an uproar: Nay, one hurled a dagger at the preacher, but who it was could not be proved then, although it was afterwards known.

In ſhort, the ſtir was ſo great, that the preacher plucked in his head, and durſt no more appear in that place; for the matter of his ſermon tended much to the diſpraiſe of king Edward, which the people could in no wiſe endure. Then Mr. Bradford, at the requeſt of the preacher's brother, and others, then being in the pulpit, ſtood forth, and ſpoke ſo mildly, chriſtianly and effectually, that with a few words he pacified and appeaſed all. And afterwards he and Mr. Rogers conducted the preacher from the pulpit to the grammar-ſchool door, where they left him ſafe, as will further appear in the ſtory of Mr. Bradford. But not long after they were both rewarded with long impriſonment, and at laſt with fire in Smithfield.

By reaſon of this tumult at Paul's Croſs, there was an order forthwith diſpatched from the lords of the council to the mayor and aldermen of London, that they ſhould call a common council the next day, and thereby charge every houſholder, to cauſe their children, apprentices, and other ſervants, to keep their own pariſh churches upon holy-days, and not to ſuffer their attempting in the leaſt to violate or diſturb the common peace; willing them likewiſe to ſignify to the ſaid aſſembly the queen's determination uttered unto them Auguſt 12. by her Highneſs in the Tower; which was this, that notwithſtanding her majeſty's conſcience was ſatisfied as to matters of religion, yet ſhe graciouſly meant not to compel or force the conſciences of others, only hoping God, through opening his word to them by godly, virtuous, and learned preachers, would ſo guide and direct them, as to bring them to be of the like religion with herſelf.

Alſo it was then ordered, that every alderman in his ward would forthwith ſend for the curates of every pariſh within their liberties, and warn them not only to forbear preaching themſelves, but likewiſe not to ſuffer any other to preach, or make any open or ſolemn reading of ſcripture in their churches, unleſs the ſaid preachers were ſeverally licenſed by the queen.

Moreover after the ſermon at Paul's Croſs aforeſaid, the next day after it was ſo ordered, that the queen's guard came to the Croſs to attend the preacher. And when men withdrew themſelves from the ſermon, order was taken by the mayor, that the ancients of all companies ſhould be preſent, leſt the preacher ſhould be diſcouraged by his ſmall auditory.

August, 1553.

Auguſt 5. 1553. one William Rutler was committed to the Marſhalſea by the council, for ſpeaking certain words againſt Mr. Bourn, for his ſermon at Paul's Croſs the Sunday before.

Aug. 16. Humphry Paulden was committed to the Compter, for words againſt the ſaid Bourn's ſermon at Paul's Croſs.

A letter was ſent to the ſheriffs of Buckingham and Bedford, for apprehending one Fiſher, parſon of Amerſham.

Another letter to the biſhop of Norwich, not to ſuffer any preacher or other, to preach or expound the ſcripture publicly, without ſpecial licence from the queen.

The ſame day Mr. Bradford, Vernon, and Beacon, preachers, were committed to the charge of the lieutenant of the Tower.

The ſame day likewiſe Mr. John Rogers was commanded to keep himſelf priſoner in his own houſe, without converſing with any other but thoſe of his own houſhold.

Aug. 22. two letters were directed to Mr. Coverdale biſhop of Exeter, and Mr. Hooper biſhop of Glouceſter, for them to repair forthwith to the court, and there to attend the council's pleaſure.

The ſame day parſon Fiſher of Amerſham appeared before the council, according to their letter of Aug. 16. and was ordered to bring a copy of his ſermon the next day.

Aug. 24. one John Melvin a preacher, and a Scotchman, was ſent to Newgate in London by the council.

Aug. 28. there was a letter ſent to the mayor of Coventry and his brethren, for the apprehending of one Symonds, vicar of St. Michael's in Coventry, and for ſending him up to the council, with his examinations, and other matters they could charge him with, with a commiſſion likewiſe to puniſh all ſuch, as by means of his preaching had at any time talked againſt the queen's proceedings.

Aug. 29. Mr. Hooper biſhop of Glouceſter appeared before the council.

Aug. 31. Mr. Coverdale biſhop of Exeter appeared before the council, according to their letters of the 22d.

September, 1553.

Sept. 1. Mr. Hooper and Mr. Coverdale appeared again before the council, from whence Mr. Hooper was committed to the Fleet, and Mr. Coverdale ordered to attend the lords pleaſure.

Sept. 2. Mr. Hugh Symonds, vicar of St. Michael's in Coventry, was before the council for a ſermon, and commanded to appear again the Monday following.

Sept. 4. A letter was directed from the council to Mr. Hugh Latimer, for his appearing before them.

The ſame year, about the 5th day of September, Peter Martyr came to London from Oxford, where for a time he had been commanded to keep his houſe, and found there the archbiſhop of Canterbury, who offered to defend the Book of Common Prayer, both by the ſcriptures and the fathers, aſſiſted by Peter Martyr and others, as will hereafter appear. But whilſt they were in hopes of coming to a diſputation, the archbiſhop and the others were impriſoned, and Peter Martyr permitted to return whence he came,

The ſame day a letter was ſent to the mayor of Coventry, with orders to ſet Hugh Symonds at liberty, if he would recant his ſermon, otherwiſe to detain him, and give notice thereof to the council.

Sept. 13. Mr. Hugh Latimer appeared before the council, according to their letter of the 4th, and was committed cloſe priſoner to the Tower, attended by his ſervant Auſtin.

The ſame day the archbiſhop of Canterbury appeared before the council, and was ordered to attend them the next day in the afternoon in the Star-chamber.

Sept. 14. the archbiſhop of Canterbury accordingly made his appearance before the lords in the Star-chamber; where being charged with treaſon, and with diſtributing ſeditious bills to the diſturbance of the ſtate, he was immediately committed to the Tower of London, there to remain till further juſtice and order, at the queen's pleaſure.

Sept. 15. a letter was ſent to Mr. Horn dean of Durham, commanding him to appear before them; and October 7, another was ſent to haſten his appearance.

Sept. 16. letters were ſent to the mayors of Dover and Rie, to permit all French proteſtants to paſs out of this realm, except thoſe whoſe names ſhall be ſignified to them by the French ambaſſador.

October, 1553.

October 1. Queen Mary was crowned at Weſtminſter, and the 10th day of the ſame month the parliament began with a ſolemn maſs of the Holy Ghoſt, in the popiſh manner, celebrated with great pomp in the palace of Weſtminſter, where, according to cuſtom, the lords the biſhops, that remained yet undepoſed, were to be preſent, amongſt the other lords; which were the archbiſhop of York, Dr. Taylor biſhop of Lincoln, and John Harley biſhop of Hereford; but when the biſhops, Dr. Taylor and Mr. Harley, preſented themſelves according to their duty, and had taken their places amongſt the lords, upon ſeeing maſs begin they immediately withdrew from the company, as not enduring the ſight thereof: for which cauſe the biſhop of Lincoln being examined, and proteſting his faith, was commanded to attend; not long after which he died at Ankerwike; and Mr. Harley, for being married, was excluded both from the parliament and his biſhoprick.

Maſs being ended, the queen, accompanied with the eſtates of the realm, was brought into the parliament houſe, there, according to cuſtom, to enter upon, and begin a conſultation, at which conſultation all ſtatutes were repealed that were made in the reign of king Henry VIII. for reformation, and ſtatutes made in Edward VI. time for adminiſtering the Common Prayer and Sacrament in the Engliſh tongue: and further, the attainder of the duke of Northumberland was by this parliament confirmed.

In the mean while ſeveral were very forward in erecting altars and maſſes in churches; and ſuch as were for adhering to the laws made in the time of king Edward, till others ſhould be eſtabliſhed, were either marked, or preſently apprehended, among whom was Sir James Hales, knight, of Kent, and juſtice of the common pleas; one, that notwithſtanding he had ventured his life in queen Mary's cauſe, by not ſubſcribing to the diſinheriting her by the king's will, yet becauſe, at a quarter-ſeſſions, he gave a charge upon the ſtatutes made in the reigns of king Henry VIII. and Edward VI. for the ſupremacy and religion, he was therefore impriſoned in the Marſhalſea, Compter, and Fleet, and ſo cruelly handled and terrified by the talk that the warden of the Fleet uſed to have in his hearing, of the torments as were preparing for heretics (or for what other cauſe God only knows) that he intended to diſpatch himſelf with a knife; and afterwards was willing to ſay what they deſired him; whereupon he was diſcharged, but never afterwards reſted till he drowned himſelf in a river, about half a mile from his own houſe in Kent. Of whom more will be ſeen hereafter.

During the time of this parliament, the clergy likewiſe after their uſual manner had a convocation, with a diſputation alſo, appointed by the queen's command to be held at Paul's church in London, about the 18th of October. In this convocation Mr. John Harpsfield, bachelor of divinity, made a ſermon AD CLERUM. After ſermon, it was aſſigned by the biſhops, that they of the clergy-houſe, for avoiding confuſion of words, ſhould chuſe them a prolocutor. To which office Dr. Weſton, dean of Weſtminſter, was choſe by common aſſent, and preſented to the biſhops with an oration of Mr. Pie dean of Chicheſter, and alſo of Mr. Wimbiſley archdeacon of London. Dr. Weſton being choſe, and brought to the biſhops, made his gratulatory oration to the houſe, and was anſwered with another by biſhop Bonner.

They proceeded next to the diſputation, appointed as is aboveſaid by the queen's commandment, about the matter of the ſacrament; which diſputation continued ſix days, wherein Dr. Weſton was chief on the pope's part, who behaved himſelf outrageouſly in taunting and checking. In fine, ſuch as diſputed on the contrary part were driven, ſome to flee, ſome to deny, ſome to die, though to moſt men's judgments that heard the diſputation they had the upper hand, as may here appear by the report of the ſaid diſputation, the copy whereof we thought fit here to annex as followeth.

The true Report of the Diſputation had and begun in the Convocation Houſe at London, Octob. 18, 1553.

WHereas divers and uncertain rumours be ſpread abroad of the diſputation had in the convocation houſe; to the intent that all men may know the certainty of all things therein done and ſaid, as much as the memory of him that was preſent thereat can bear away, he hath thought good, at requeſt, thoroughly to deſcribe what was ſaid therein on both parties, of the matters argued and had in queſtion, and of the entrance thereof.

The

The First Day's Act.

Upon Wednesday October 18. in the afternoon, Dr. Weſton the prolocutor firſt certified the houſe, that it was the queen's pleaſure, that the company of the ſame houſe being learned men aſſembled ſhould debate matters of religion, and for that end conſtitute laws, which her Grace and the parliament would ratify. And becauſe (ſaid he) there was a book lately publiſhed called the Catechiſm, which he ſhewed forth, bearing the name of this honourable ſynod, and yet put forth without your conſents, as I have learned, being a book very peſtiferous, and full of hereſies; and likewiſe an abominable book of common prayer (as he pleaſed to call it) I thought it beſt therefore firſt to begin with the articles of the catechiſm, concerning the ſacrament of the altar, for confirming the natural preſence of Chriſt in the ſame, and alſo tranſubſtantiation. Wherefore (ſaid he) it ſhall be lawful on Friday next enſuing for all men freely to ſpeak their conſcience in theſe matters, that all doubts may be removed, and they fully ſatisfied therein.

The Second Day's Act.

The Friday coming, being October 20. when it was expected they ſhould have entered into diſputation of the queſtions propoſed, the prolocutor exhibiting two bills to the houſe, the one for the natural preſence of Chriſt in the ſacrament of the altar, and the other concerning the catechiſm, that it was not publiſhed by the conſent of that houſe, and that they did not agree thereunto, requiring all them to ſubſcribe to the ſame as he himſelf had done. Whereunto the whole houſe accordingly aſſented, except ſix, viz. the dean of Rocheſter, the dean of Exeter, the archdeacon of Wincheſter, archdeacon of Hereford, archdeacon of Stow, and one more. And whilſt the reſt were about ſubſcribing to theſe two articles, John Philpot ſtood up and ſpoke firſt concerning the articles of the catechiſm, that he thought they were deceived in the title of the catechiſm, for that it bore the title of the ſynod before this, although as to publiſhing thereof ſeveral of them then preſent were not made privy thereunto; and that becauſe this houſe had granted authority to certain perſons appointed by the king's majeſty to make eccleſiaſtical laws; and whatſoever eccleſiaſtical laws were thereupon publiſhed by the authority of them or the major part of them, according to a ſtatute in that behalf made and provided, it might well be ſaid to be done by the conſent of the ſynod of London, notwithſtanding ſuch as were members of this houſe now had no notice thereof before the promulgation. And therefore in this point he thought the publiſher thereof had not in the leaſt ſlandered the houſe, as they by their ſubſcriptions were endeavouring to perſuade the world, ſince they had one ſynodal authority for impowering them to make ſuch ſpiritual law, as they thought convenient and neceſſary.

And moreover he ſaid, that as to the article of the natural preſence in the ſacrament, it was both contrary to reaſon and learning, and likewiſe very prejudicial to truth, for men to be moved to ſubſcribe before the matter was thoroughly examined and diſcuſſed. But when he ſaw his allegations were to no purpoſe, being like a man aſtoniſhed at ſo many ancient learned men being purpoſely aſſembled to maintain old traditions preferable to the truth of God's holy word, he made it his requeſt to the prolocutor, that whereas on that ſide there were preſent ſo many learned men, as the like were not to be found again in the whole realm, and that on the other ſide, of thoſe that had not ſubſcribed there were not above five or ſix, and they far inferior to them both in age and learning; in order therefore that there might be an equality of perſons concerned in this diſputation, he deſired that the prolocutor would intercede with the lords, that ſome of thoſe men that were learned, and occaſioned the publiſhing of the catechiſm aforeſaid, might be admitted into the houſe to ſhew their learning that moved them to ſet forth the ſame, and that Dr. Ridley and Mr. Rogers, with two or three more, might have the liberty of being preſent at this diſputation, and aſſociating with them.

This requeſt was thought reaſonable, and was therefore propoſed to the biſhops, who returned this anſwer; That it was out of their power to call ſuch perſons to the houſe, ſince ſome of them were priſoners; but they ſaid, they would petition the council in this behalf, and in caſe any of them were abſent that ought to be of the houſe, they were for their being admitted as they deſired. After this, they minding to have entered into diſputation, there came a gentleman with a meſſage from the lord great maſter, ſignifying unto the prolocutor, that the lord great maſter and the earl of Devonſhire would be preſent at the diſputations, and therefore he deferred the ſame till Monday, at one of the clock in the afternoon.

The Third Day's Act.

Upon Monday Octob. 23. at the time appointed, in preſence of many earls, lords, knights, gentlemen, and ſeveral others, both of the court and city, the prolocutor made a proteſtation, that the members of that houſe had appointed this diſputation, not to call in queſtion the truth, whereunto they had all ſubſcribed already except five or ſix, but that thoſe gainſayers might be reſolved of their arguments in which they ſtood, not doubting but they will alſo come over to us.

Then he demanded of Mr. Haddon, whether he would reaſon againſt the queſtions propoſed, or not; to whom he anſwered, that he had certified him before in writing that he would not, ſince they could not have ſuch men for their aſſiſtants as they deſired. Mr. Elmar likewiſe was aſked the ſame queſtion, who returned the ſame anſwer to the prolocutor; adding moreover, that they had done too much prejudice already to the truth, to ſubſcribe before the matter was diſcuſſed; and it would ſignify little or nothing to reaſon for the truth, ſince they were now determined to the contrary. After this he demanded of Mr. Cheyney, who, the prolocutor ſaid, allowed the preſence with them (but upon certain authorities whereon he ſtandeth, and in which he deſires to be reſolved, as you ſhall hear, denied tranſubſtantiation), whether he would propoſe his doubts concerning tranſubſtantiation. To which he replied, yea, I ſhould be glad my doubts were reſolved, that move me to diſbelieve tranſubſtantiation.

The firſt is out of St. Paul to the Corinthians, who ſpeaking of the ſacrament of Chriſt's body and blood, frequently calls it bread after conſecration.

The ſecond is out of Origen, who ſpeaking of this ſacrament, ſaith, that the material part thereof goeth down to the excrements.

The third is out of Theodoretus, who ſpeaking of the ſacramental bread and wine after conſecration, ſaith, that they go not out of their former ſubſtance, form and ſhape. Theſe, among ſeveral others, are the doubts I require to be anſwered.

Then the prolocutor aſſigned Dr. Moreman to anſwer him, who, to St. Paul, anſwered him thus; That the ſacrament is called by him bread indeed; but it is thus to be underſtood, that it is the ſacrament of bread, that is, the form of bread.

Then Mr. Cheyney inferred and alledged, that Heſychius called the ſacrament both bread and fleſh.

Yea, replied Moreman, Heſychius calleth it bread, becauſe it was bread, not becauſe it is ſo. And paſſing over Origen, he came to Theodoretus, and ſaid, that men miſtook his authority, by interpreting a general into a ſpecial, as Peter Martyr hath done in the place of Theodoret, taking the Greek word that ſignifies ſubſtance in its ſpecial ſignification, whereas in the general it may be applied to Accidents as well as Subſtance: and therefore I anſwer Theodoret thus, That the ſacramental bread and wine do not go out of their former ſubſtance, form and ſhape, that is, not out of their accidental ſubſtance and ſhape.

After this Mr. Cheyney ſat down, and Mr. Elmar (a man that could not endure to hear ſo weak and childiſh an anſwer to ſo grave an authority) ſtood up, and diſputed upon the authority before alledged by Mr. Cheyney, and declared, that Moreman's anſwer to Theodoret was no juſt or ſufficient anſwer, but an illuſion or ſubtle evaſion, contrary to Theodoret's meaning. For if the Greek word that ſignifies Subſtance, ſaid he, ſhould, in the place alledged, be taken for Accident, as it is anſwered by Moreman, then were it a word ſuperfluous in Theodoret there, where there are two other Greek words which ſufficiently expound the accidents of the bread, and in Engliſh ſignify Shape and Form; and ſo he proved out of the ſame author, by divers allegations, that the Greek word that ſignified Subſtance in Theodoret, could not be ſo generally taken in that place, as Moreman, for a ſhift, would have it. But Moreman, as a man having no other ſalve for that ſore, affirmeth ſtill, that the Greek word which ſignified Subſtance, muſt needs ſignify Accidental Subſtance properly. To whoſe importunity, ſince he could have no better anſwer, Elmar, wearied with his obſtinacy, gave place.

Then John Philpot ſtood up, and ſaid, that he could prove from the matter Theodoret handled in the place before alledged, and the ſimilitude which he makes uſe of for proving his purpoſe, Moreman's interpretation of the Greek word that there ſignified Subſtance, was by no means to be taken for an Accidental Subſtance, as for a ſhift he would interpret it to be. For the matter Theodoret diſcourſeth of in that place, is againſt the heretic Eutyches, who denied two natures of ſubſtance to remain in Chriſt, being but one perſon, and that his humanity after the accompliſhment of the myſtery of our ſalvation, aſcending into heaven, and being joined to the Divinity, was abſorpt or ſwallowed up of the ſame; ſo that, according to his opinion, Chriſt was no more but of one divine ſubſtance only: Againſt which opinion Theodoret writeth, and by the ſimilitude of the ſacrament proveth the contrary againſt this heretic: That like as in the ſacrament of the body of Chriſt after the conſecration, there is the ſubſtance of Chriſt's humanity, with the ſubſtance of bread remaining as it was before, not being abſorpt by the humanity of Chriſt, but by divine operation joined thereunto; even ſo in the perſon of Chriſt, being now in heaven, of whom this ſacrament is a repreſentation, there being two ſeveral ſubſtances, that is, his humanity and divinity united in one hypoſtaſy or perſon, which is Chriſt, the humanity not being abſorbed by the conjunction of the divinity, but remaining in its former ſubſtance.

And this ſimilitude, ſaith Philpot, brought by Theodoret to confound Eutyches, would prove nothing at all, if the very ſubſtance of the ſacramental bread remained not as it did before. But if Dr. Moreman's interpretation might take place for tranſubſtantiation, then by Theodoret's authority ſo taken, would the heretic have a ſtrong argument to maintain his hereſy, and to prove himſelf an orthodox chriſtian, and might well ſay to Theodoret thus: Like as thou, Theodoret, if thou wert of Dr. Moreman's mind, doſt ſay, that after the conſecration in the ſacrament, the ſubſtance of the bread is abſorpt or tranſubſtantiated into the human body of Chriſt coming thereunto, ſo that in the ſacrament there is but one ſubſtance of the humanity alone, and not the ſubſtance of bread as it was before; even ſo likewiſe may I affirm, and conclude by thine own ſimilitude, that the humanity aſcending up by the power of God into heaven, and adjoined unto the Deity, was by the might thereof abſorpt and turned into one ſubſtance with the Deity; ſo that now there remaineth but one divine ſubſtance in Chriſt, no more than in the ſacramental ſigns of the Lord's ſupper, after the conſecration, doth remain any more than one ſubſtance, according to your belief and conſtruction.

In anſwering to this Dr. Moreman ſtaggered, which Philpot well perceiving, ſpake on this wiſe; Well, maſter Moreman, if you have no anſwer at this preſent ready, I pray you conſider of one, if you can conveniently, againſt our next meeting here again.

With that his ſaying the prolocutor was grievouſly offended, telling him that he ſhould not brag there, but that he ſhould be fully anſwered. Then ſaid Philpot, It is the thing that I only deſire, to be anſwered directly in this behalf; and I deſire of you, and of all the houſe here preſent, that I may be ſufficiently anſwered, which I am ſure you are not able to do, taking Theodoret's authority and ſimilitude as he ought to be taken. Whereupon, without any further anſwer to Philpot's reaſoning, he was commanded to be ſilent.

Then the dean of Rocheſter ſtood up, offering himſelf to diſpute againſt the natural preſence, wiſhing that the ſcripture, and the ancient doctors, might be weighed, believed and followed in this point. And againſt this natural preſence, he thought that ſaying of Chriſt in St. Matthew was a ſufficient argument, if men would credit and follow ſcripture; where ſpeaking of himſelf, he ſays, That the poor we ſhould have always with us, but him we ſhould not have always: which, quoth he, was ſpoken concerning the natural preſence of Chriſt's body, and therefore we ought to believe as he hath taught us, That Chriſt is not naturally preſent on earth in the ſacrament of the altar.

To this he was anſwered by the prolocutor, That we ſhould not have Chriſt preſent always to exerciſe almsdeeds upon him, but upon the poor.

But the dean proſecuted his argument, and ſhewed it out of St. Auguſtin further, that the ſame interpretation of the ſcripture alledged was no ſufficient anſwer, who in the 50th treatiſe of St. John ſpeaketh thus on the ſame ſentence: "When as he ſaid (ſaith St. Auguſtin), Me ye "ſhall not have always with you, he ſpake of the pre- "ſence of his body. For by his majeſty, by his provi- "dence, by his unſpeakable and inviſible grace, that is "fulfilled which is ſaid of him, Behold I am with you "until the conſummation of the world. But in the fleſh "which the Word took upon him, in that which was "born of the virgin, in that which was apprehended by "the Jews, which was crucified on the croſs, which was "let down from the croſs, which was wrapped in clouts, "which was hid in the ſepulchre, which was manifeſted "in the reſurrection, you ſhall not have me always with "you. And why? For after a bodily preſence he was "converſant with his diſciples forty days, and they ac- "companying him, ſeeing and not following him, he "aſcended and is not here; for there he ſitteth at the "right hand of the Father; and yet here he is, becauſe "he is not departed in the preſence of his Majeſty. "After another manner we have Chriſt always by the "preſence of his Majeſty, but after the preſence of his "fleſh it is rightly ſaid, You ſhall not verily have me "always with you. For the church had him in the pre- "ſence of his fleſh a few days, and now by faith it ap- "prehendeth him, and ſeeth him not with eyes."

To this authority Dr. Watſon anſwered, and ſaid, he would anſwer St. Auguſtin by St. Auguſtin, and having a certain book in his hand of notes, he alledged out of the 70th treatiſe of St. John, that after that mortal condition and manner we have not now Chriſt on earth, as he was heretofore before his paſſion.

To this anſwer John Philpot replied, and ſaid, That Mr. Watſon had not fully anſwered St. Auguſtin by St. Auguſtin, as he promiſed to do, for that in the place abovementioned by the dean of Rocheſter, he doth not only teach the mortal ſtate of Chriſt's body before his paſſion, but alſo the immortal condition of the ſame after his reſurrection: in which mortal body St. Auguſtin ſeemeth plainly to affirm, That Chriſt is not preſent upon the earth, neither in form viſibly, neither in corporal ſubſtance inviſibly, as in a few lines after the place above alledged, St. Auguſtine doth more plainly declare by theſe words, ſaying, "Now theſe two manners of Chriſt's "preſence declared, which is by his majeſty, providence "and grace now preſent in the world, which before his "aſcenſion was preſent in the fleſh; and which being "now placed at the right hand of the Father, is abſent "from the world, I think there remains no further diſ-"pute about the matter."

Now, ſaid Philpot, if St. Auguſtin allowed no other preſence of Chriſt here on earth but only his divine preſence, and touching his humanity to be in heaven, we ought to confeſs and believe the ſame. But if we put a third preſence of Chriſt, that is corporally to be preſent always in the ſacrament of the altar inviſibly according to your ſuppoſitions, whereof St. Auguſtin maketh no mention in all his works, you ſeem to judge that which St. Auguſtin did never comprehend.

Why, ſaid Watſon, does not St. Auguſtin, in the place I alledged, make mention how St. Stephen, being in this world, ſaw Chriſt after his aſcenſion.

It is true, ſaid Philpot, but he ſaw Chriſt, as the ſcripture ſaith, in the heavens, being open, ſtanding at the right hand of God the Father: at which Watſon was ſilent.

Then the prolocutor went about to anſwer St. Auguſtin, ſaying, Then he is not now in the world after the manner of bodily preſence, but yet preſent for all that in his body.

To whom Philpot anſwered, that the prolocutor dwelt much upon the word [Secundum] in St. Auguſtin, that ſignified after a manner, or in form, but that he made no anſwer to [Id quod] that which ſignified that thing or ſubſtance of Chriſt in which Chriſt ſuffered, aroſe, and aſcended into heaven, in which thing or ſubſtance he is in heaven, and not in earth, as St. Auguſtin in the place before ſpecified doth moſt clearly make appear.

Nothing further being anſwered to this, the dean of Rocheſter proceeded in the maintenance of his argument, and read out of a book of annotations ſundry authorities for the confirmation thereof. To which Moreman, who was appointed to anſwer him, made no direct anſwer, but bade him frame an argument, ſaying, that the dean had recited many doctors words, but had not made one argument.

Then ſaid the dean, the authorities of the doctors I have quoted, are arguments ſufficient to prove my intent, and to which I deſire you will anſwer. But Moreman ſtill cried, Make an argument; to ſhift off the authority which he could not anſwer to. Whereupon the dean made the following argument from the inſtitution of the ſacrament; Do this in remembrance of me; and thus ye ſhall ſhew forth the Lord's death until he come.

The ſacrament is the remembrance of Chriſt: therefore, the ſacrament is not very Chriſt; for as yet he is not come, For theſe words, Until he come, do plainly ſignify the abſence of Chriſt's body. Then the prolocutor went about to ſhew, that theſe words, Until he come, did not import any abſence of Chriſt on the earth, by other places of ſcripture, where the word, Until, was made uſe of: but directly to the purpoſe he anſwered nothing. In fine, the dean fell to aſking Moreman, whether Chriſt did eat the paſchal lamb with his diſciples, or not? He anſwered, Yea. He further demanded, whether upon inſtituting the ſacrament, he did likewiſe eat the ſacrament with them? Moreman anſwered, Yea. Then he aſked what he did eat, and whether he did eat his own natural body, as they imagined it to be, or not? Which when Moreman had affirmed, then ſaid the dean, It is a great abſurdity by you granted; and ſo he ſat down.

Againſt this abſurdity Philpot ſtood up and argued, ſaying, he could prove it by good reaſon deduced out of the ſcripture, that Chriſt eat not his own natural body at the inſtitution of the ſacrament; and gave the following reaſon:

No. I.

Receiving of Chriſt's body hath a promiſe of remiſſion of ſins with it annexed.

Chriſt eating the ſacrament, had no promiſe of remiſſion of ſin.

Therefore, Chriſt in the ſacrament did not eat his own body.

Moreman anſwered this reaſon by denying the former part of the argument, that the ſacrament had a promiſe of remiſſion of ſins annexed unto it.

Then Philpot ſhewed this to be the promiſe in the ſacrament; Which is given for you, which is ſhed for you, for the remiſſion of ſins. But Moreman would not allow that to be any promiſe, and ſo forced Philpot to the ſixth of St. John, to make good his ſaying with theſe words; The bread which I will give is my fleſh, which I will give for the life of the world.

Moreman anſwering nothing directly to this argument, Harpsfield ſtarted up to ſupply what was wanting in Moreman; and thinking to have anſwered Philpot, confirmed more ſtrongly his argument, by ſaying, Ye miſtake the promiſe which is annexed to the body of Chriſt in the ſacrament; for it pertained not to Chriſt, but to his diſciples, to whom Chriſt ſaid, This is my body which is given for you; and not for Chriſt himſelf.

You have well ſaid, quoth Philpot, for that is my argument; the promiſe of the body of Chriſt took no effect in Chriſt; therefore Chriſt ate not his own body.

Then the prolocutor, to ſhoulder out the matter, ſaid, the argument was naught. For by the like argument he might go about to prove, that Chriſt was not baptized, becauſe the remiſſion of ſin, which is annexed unto baptiſm, had no effect in Chriſt. To which Philpot replied, that like as Chriſt was baptized, ſo he ate the ſacrament; but he took on him baptiſm, not that he had any need thereof, or that it took any effect in him, but as our maſter, to give the church an example to follow him in the miniſtration of the ſacrament, and thereby to exhibit unto us himſelf, and not to give himſelf to himſelf.

No more was ſaid on this. But afterward the prolocutor demanded of Philpot, whether he would argue againſt the natural preſence, or not? to whom he anſwered, Yea, if he would hear his argument without interruption, and aſſign one to anſwer him, and not many, which is a confuſion to the opponent, and eſpecially for him that had but an ill memory. By this time the night was come on; wherefore the prolocutor brake up the diſputation for that time, and appointed Philpot to be the firſt that ſhould begin the diſputation the next day, concerning the preſence of Chriſt in the ſacrament.

The Fourth Day's Act.

On Wedneſday October 25. John Philpot, as it was before appointed, was ready to have entered the diſputation, minding firſt to have made an oration and declaration in Latin of the matter of Chriſt's preſence which was then in queſtion. Which the prolocutor perceiving, ſoon after forbad Philpot to make any declaration or oration of any matter, commanding him alſo that he ſhould make no argument in Latin, but to conclude his argument in Engliſh.

Then, ſaid Philpot, this is contrary to your order at the beginning of this diſputation; for then you appointed that all the arguments ſhould be made in Latin, and thereupon I have drawn and deviſed all mine arguments in Latin: and becauſe you, Mr. Prolocutor, have ſaid heretofore openly in this houſe that I had no learning, I intended to ſhew ſuch learning as I have, in a brief oration, and ſhort declaration of the queſtions now in controverſy, thinking it ſo moſt convenient alſo, that in caſe I ſhould ſpeak otherwiſe in my declaration than ſhould ſtand with learning, or than I were able to warrant, and juſtify by God's word, it might the better be reformed by ſuch as were learned of the houſe, ſo that the unlearned being preſent, might take the leſs offence thereat. But this prevailed nothing with the prolocutor, who ſtill inſiſted upon his forming an argument in Engliſh, or elſe to hold his peace.

Then, ſaid Philpot, you have ſore diſappointed me, thus ſuddenly to go from your former order: but I will accompliſh your commandment, leaving mine oration apart, and I will come to my arguments, which, as well as ſo ſudden a warning will ſerve, I will make in Engliſh. But before I bring forth any argument, I will in one word declare what manner of preſence I diſallow in the ſacrament, to the intent the hearers may the better underſtand to what end and effect mine arguments ſhall tend; not to deny utterly the preſence of Chriſt in his ſacrament, truly miniſtered according to his inſtitution, but only to deny that groſs and carnal preſence, which you of this houſe have already ſubſcribed unto, to be in the ſacrament of the altar, contrary to the true and manifeſt meaning of the ſcriptures: that by tranſubſtantiation of the ſacramental bread and wine, Chriſt's natural body ſhould, by virtue of the words pronounced by the prieſt, be contained and included under the forms or accidents of bread and wine. This kind of preſence imagined by men, I do deny, quoth Philpot, and againſt this I will reaſon. But before he could make an end of what he was about, he was interrupted by the prolocutor, and commanded to deſcend to his argument: at whoſe unjuſt importunity Philpot being offended, and hoping to find remedy, fell down upon his knees before the earls and lords which were there preſent, being a great number, whereof ſome were of the queen's council, beſeeching them that he might have liberty to proſecute his arguments, without interruption, which was readily granted by the lords. But the prolocutor making uſe of a point of the practice of prelates, would not condeſcend to it, but ſtill cried, Hold your peace, or elſe make a ſhort argument. I am about it, ſaid Philpot, if you will let me alone: but firſt I muſt aſk a queſtion of my reſpondent (who was Dr. Chedſey) concerning a word or two of your ſuppoſition, that is, of the ſacrament of the altar, what he meaneth thereby, and whether he taketh it, as ſome of the ancient writers do, terming the Lord's ſupper the ſacrament of the altar; partly becauſe it is a ſacrament of that lively ſacrifice which Chriſt offered for our ſins upon the altar of the croſs, and partly becauſe that Chriſt's body, crucified for us, was that bloody ſacrifice, which the blood-ſhedding of all the beaſts offered upon the altar in the old law did prefigurate and ſignify unto us; in ſignification whereof the old writers ſometime do call the ſacrament of the body and blood of Chriſt, among other names which they aſcribe thereunto, the ſacrament of the altar: or whether you take it otherwiſe; as for the ſacrament of the altar, which is made of lime and ſtone, over which the ſacrament hangeth, and to be all one with the ſacrament of the maſs, as it is at preſent in many places. This done, I will direct my arguments according as your anſwer ſhall give me occaſion.

Then Dr. Chedſey made this anſwer, That in their ſuppoſition they took the ſacrament of the altar, and the ſacrament of the maſs, to be all one.

Then, ſaid Philpot, by Mr. Prolocutor's leave, I will ſpeak plain Engliſh, and make a ſhort reſolution thereof; that the ſacrament of the altar, which ye reckon to be all one with the maſs, once juſtly aboliſhed, and now put in full uſe again, is no ſacrament at all, neither is Chriſt in any wiſe preſent in it; and this he offered to prove before the whole houſe, if they required it: he would likewiſe vouch the ſame before the queen and her honourable council, before the face of ſix of the moſt learned men of the houſe of the contrary opinion, and refuſed none: And if I ſhall not be able by God's word to maintain what I have ſaid, and confound thoſe ſix which ſhall take upon them to withſtand me in this point, let me be burdened with as many faggots as can be found in London, before the court gates. This he ſpake with the utmoſt zeal and courage.

At this the prolocutor, with many others, were very much offended, demanding of him whether he knew what he ſaid: Yea, quoth Philpot, I know very well what I ſay, and I deſire that no man may be offended at it, for I ſpeak no more than by the word of God I am able to prove; and praiſed be God that the queen's grace hath granted to us of this houſe (as our prolocutor hath informed us) the free liberty of uttering our conſciences in theſe matters of controverſy in religion; and therefore I will here freely ſpeak my conſcience, grounded upon God's holy word, for the truth, although ſome of you here preſent do not like it.

Then the prolocutor, with ſeveral others of the houſe, taunted and reproved him for ſpeaking ſo indecently againſt the ſacrament of the maſs. The prolocutor told him he was mad, and threatened to ſend him to priſon, if he would not ceaſe ſpeaking.

Philpot ſeeing himſelf thus abuſed, and not permitted the free liberty of declaring his mind, fell into an exclamation, caſting his eyes towards heaven, and ſaid, O Lord, what a world is this, that the truth of thy holy word cannot be ſpoken and endured! and for great ſorrow and trouble the tears were ſeen to trickle down from his eyes.

The prolocutor being moved by ſome that were about him, conſented that he ſhould make an argument, provided it were a ſhort one. I will be as brief, ſaid Philpot, as I can conveniently in uttering all that I have to ſay. And firſt I will begin to ground my arguments upon the authority of ſcripture, whereon all the building of our faith ought to be grounded; and then I ſhall confirm the ſame by the ancient fathers of the church. I take the occaſion of the firſt argument out of the 28th chapter of St. Matthew's goſpel, of what was ſaid by the angel to the three Mary's, ſeeking Chriſt at the ſepulchre, ſaying, He is riſen, he is not here; and in St. Luke, chap. 23. the angel aſketh them, why they ſought him that liveth, among the dead. The ſcripture teſtifieth, that Chriſt is riſen, aſcended into heaven, and ſitteth on the right hand of the Father: all which is ſpoken of his natural body: Ergo, It is not on earth included in the ſacrament.

I will confirm this yet more effectually, by the ſaying of Chriſt in the 16th of St. John; I came (ſaith Chriſt) from my Father into the world, and now I leave the world and go away to my Father. Which coming and going he meant of his natural body: therefore we may conſequently affirm, that it is not found in the world.

But (ſaith he) I expect here to be anſwered with a blind diſtinction of viſibly and inviſibly, that he is viſibly departed in his humanity, but remaineth inviſibly in the ſacrament. But that I may with more expedition paſs on to the pith of my arguments (whereof I have a dozen to propoſe), I will prevent that anſwer; and that no ſuch diſtinction ought to take away the force of that argument, will prove from the anſwer which Chriſt's diſciples gave unto him, ſaying, Now thou ſpeakeſt plainly, and uttereth forth no proverb. Which words St. Cyril interpreting, ſaith, That Chriſt ſpake without any manner of ambiguity or obſcure ſpeech. And therefore I do from thence conclude, that if Chriſt ſpake plainly, and without parable, ſaying, I leave the world now and go away to my Father; then that obſcure, dark and imperceptible preſence of Chriſt's natural body remaining in the ſacrament inviſibly upon earth, contrary to the plain words of Chriſt, ought not to be allowed: for nothing can be more uncertain, parabolical, and abſurd, than ſo to ſay. I will now give attention to your anſwer, and then deſcend to confirm what I have ſaid by ancient writers.

Then Dr. Chedſey reciting his argument in ſuch ſort as it was made, took upon him to anſwer every part thereof ſeverally on this wiſe. Firſt, to the ſaying of the the angel, That Chriſt is not here: and, Why ſeek ye the living among the dead? he anſwered, that theſe ſayings pertained nothing to the preſence of Chriſt's natural body in the ſacrament, but that they were ſpoke of Chriſt's body being in the ſepulchre, when the three Mary's thought him to have been in the grave ſtill. And therefore the angel ſaid, Why do ye ſeek him that liveth, among the dead? And to the authority of St. John, where Chriſt ſaith, Now I leave the world and go to my Father; he meant that of his aſcenſion. And ſo likewiſe did Cyril, interpreting the ſaying of the diſciples, that knew plainly that Chriſt would viſibly aſcend into heaven, but that doth not exclude the inviſible preſence of his natural body in the ſacrament. For St. Chryſoſtom writing to the people of Antioch, doth affirm the ſame, comparing Elias and Chriſt together, and Elias's cloak and Chriſt's fleſh. "When Elias (ſaith he) was taken up "in the fiery chariot, he left his cloak behind him unto "his diſciple Eliſæus. But Chriſt aſcending into heaven "took his fleſh with him, and left alſo his fleſh behind "him." From whence we may juſtly conclude, that Chriſt's fleſh is viſibly aſcended into heaven, and abideth ſtill inviſibly in the ſacrament of the altar.

To this Philpot replied, and ſaid, You have not directly anſwered to the ſaying of the angel, Chriſt is riſen, and is not here, becauſe you have omitted that which was the chief point of all. For, ſaid he, I proceed further, as thus, He is riſen, aſcended, and ſitteth at the right hand of God the Father: therefore, he is not remaining on the earth. Neither is your anſwer to Cyril, by me alledged, ſufficient. But I will preſently return to your interpretation of Cyril, and plainly declare it, after I have refelled the authority of Chryſoſtom, which is one of the chief principles that you alledged to make for your groſs carnal preſence in the ſacrament; which being well weighed and underſtood, pertaineth nothing thereunto.

At that the prolocutor ſtartled, that one of the chief pillars in this point ſhould be overthrown; and therefore he recited the ſaid authority firſt in Latin, and afterwards he turned it into Engliſh, and deſired all that were preſent to remark that ſaying of Chryſoſtom, which he thought invincible on their own ſide. But I will make it appear (ſaid Philpot) by and by, that it doth make little for your purpoſe. And as he was declaring his mind in that behalf, the prolocutor interrupted him, as he frequently did. With which Philpot being diſpleaſed, ſaid, Mr. Prolocutor thinketh that he is in a ſophiſtry-ſchool, where he well knoweth the manner is, that when the reſpondent perceiveth that he is like to be inforced with an argument which he is not able to anſwer, thus he doth what he can by cavillation and interruption to drive him from the ſame. This ſaying of Philpot was ill taken by the prolocutor and his adherents; and the prolocutor ſaid, that Philpot could bring nothing to avoid that authority but his own vain imagination. Hear, quoth Philpot, and afterwards judge; for I will do in this, as in all other authorities, wherewith you ſhall take upon you to refel any of my arguments that I have to proſecute, anſwering the ſame either by ſufficient authorities of ſcripture, or elſe by ſome other teſtimony of like authority with yours, and not of my own imagination; which if I do, I deſire it to be of no credit. And as to the ſaying of Chryſoſtom, I have two ways to beat him from your purpoſe, one out of ſcripture, and the other out of the very place of Chryſoſtom himſelf here by you alledged.

Firſt, where he ſeemeth to ſay, that Chriſt aſcending took his fleſh with him, and left alſo his fleſh behind him; it is truth: for we all do confeſs and believe, that Chriſt took on him our human nature in the virgin Mary's womb, and through his paſſion in the ſame hath united us to his fleſh, and thereby we are become one fleſh with him; ſo that Chryſoſtom might therefore well ſay, that Chriſt aſcending took his fleſh which he received of the virgin Mary away with him; and alſo left his fleſh behind him, which are we that be his elect in this world, which are the members of Chriſt, and fleſh of his fleſh; as St. Paul doth aptly teſtify, Epheſ. v. ſaying, We are fleſh of his fleſh, and bone of his bones. And if any man will reply, that he there treateth of the ſacrament, and that this interpretation cannot ſo aptly be applied unto him in that place, then will I yet interpret Chryſoſtom another way by himſelf. For in that place, a few lines before thoſe words which were here now read, are theſe words; That Chriſt, after he aſcended into heaven, left unto us, indued with his ſacraments, his fleſh in myſteries, that is, ſacramentally: and that myſtical fleſh Chriſt leaveth as well to his church in the ſacrament of baptiſm, as in the ſacramental bread and wine. And this St. Paul doth juſtly witneſs, ſaying, As many of us as are baptized in Chriſt, have put upon us Chriſt. And thus you may perceive that St. Chryſoſtom maketh nothing for your groſs and carnal preſence in the ſacrament, as you wrongly take him.

Now in the mean while the prolocutor was moved by Mr. Pie, whiſpering him in the ear, to put Philpot to ſilence, and to appoint ſome other, fearing if he held on long, he would at length ſhake their carnal preſence, ſeeing he had already given one of their chief foundations ſuch a pluck. Then the prolocutor ſaid to Philpot, that he had reaſoned enough, and that ſome other ſhould ſupply his room. At which Philpot was diſpleaſed, ſaying, Why, Sir, I have a dozen arguments to propoſe concerning this matter, and I have as yet ſcarce gone over the firſt; for being hitherto hindered through your frequent interrupting me, I have not for confirmation thereof quoted any antient writer, as I could a great many.

Well, ſaid the prolocutor, you ſhall ſpeak no more now, and I command you to hold your peace. You perceive, ſaid Philpot, that I have ſtuff enough for you, and am able to withſtand your falſe ſuppoſition, and therefore you command me to be ſilent. If you will not give place, ſaid the prolocutor, I will ſend you to priſon. This is not, ſaith Philpot, according to your promiſe made in this houſe, nor yet to your brags made at Paul's Croſs, that men ſhould be anſwered in this diſputation to whatſoever they can ſay, ſince of a dozen arguments you will not ſuffer me to proſecute one.

Then Mr. Pie took upon him to promiſe that he ſhould be anſwered another day. But Philpot ſeeing he could not proceed as he deſigned, was juſtly offended thereat, and made an end by ſaying thus: A ſort of you here, which hitherto have lurked in corners, and diſſembled with God and the world, are now gathered together to ſuppreſs the ſincere truth of God's holy word, and to ſet forth every falſe device, which by the catholic doctrine of the ſcripture ye are not able to maintain.

Then ſtepped forth Mr. Elmar, chaplain to the duke of Suffolk, whom Mr. Moreman took upon him to anſwer: againſt whom, for confirming the argument he took in hand the day before, Mr. Elmar objected ſeveral authorities to prove that the Greek word in Theodoret, which Mr. Cheyney ſaid ſignified Subſtance, muſt needs ſignify Subſtance, and not Accidents. But his reaſons and proofs being all grounded upon and deduced from the Greek, I ſhall paſs them over, as knowing they want their grace in Engliſh, and likewiſe their proper underſtanding. But his allegations ſo incumbered Moreman, that he deſired a day to overlook them, for at that inſtant he was without a convenient anſwer.

Then the prolocutor called Mr. Haddon dean of Exeter, and chaplain to the duke of Suffolk, who proſecuted Theodoret's authority in confirming Mr. Elmar's argument. Doctor Watſon took upon him to anſwer him, who, after long talk, was ſo confounded, that he was not able to anſwer to the word MYSTERIUM [Myſtery.] But foraſmuch as he ſeemed to doubt therein, Mr. Haddon took out of his boſom a Latin author to confirm his ſaying, and ſhewed the ſame to Dr. Watſon, aſking him whether he thought that tranſlation to be true, or that the printer were in any fault? To which Watſon replied, There may be a fault in the printer, for I am not remembered of this word. Then Mr. Haddon took out of his boſom a Greek book, wherein he ſhewed with his finger the ſame word, which Mr. Watſon could not deny. What further arguments were made uſe of, I ſhall chuſe to omit declaring at large, becauſe they were moſtly in Greek.

Then Mr. Perne ſtood up, and argued againſt tranſubſtantiation, confirming the authorities alledged by Mr. Elmar and Mr Haddon. To whom the prolocutor ſaid, I wonder, Mr. Perne, at your ſpeaking thus, for no longer than laſt Friday you ſubſcribed to the contrary: Which ſaying Mr. Elmar diſapproved, and blamed the prolocutor, telling him, that he ought not to reprehend any man, becauſe, ſaid he, this houſe is a houſe of free liberty for every man to ſpeak his conſcience, and that yeſterday he promiſed, that any man, notwithſtanding he had ſubſcribed, ſhould have free liberty to ſpeak his mind And for that the night did approach, and the time being ſpent, the prolocutor praiſing them for their learning, did ſtill notwithſtanding conclude, that all reaſoning ſet apart, the order of the holy church muſt be received, and all things muſt be ordered thereby.

The Fifth Day's Act.

On Friday the 27th of October, the prolocutor firſt propounded the matter, ſhewing that the convocation had ſpent two days already in diſputing about one father, which was Theodoret, and about one Greek word, which was οὐσία; and now they were come the third day to anſwer all things that could be objected, ſo that they would ſhortly put their arguments. Mr. Haddon dean of Exeter deſired leave to oppoſe Mr. Watſon, which with two more, that is, Morgan and Harpsfield, were appointed to anſwer. Mr. Haddon demanded of him, whether any ſubſtance of bread or wine remained after conſecration; then Mr. Watſon aſked him, whether he thought there to be a real preſence of Chriſt's body, or not: Mr. Haddon ſaid it was not right according to order, that one who was appointed to be reſpondent ſhould be opponent: nor he whoſe buſineſs it was to object, to anſwer. Mr. Watſon a long time would not agree to anſwer, but that thing firſt being granted him, at laſt an order was ſet, and Mr. Haddon was permitted to go on with his argument.

Then he proved by the words of Theodoret, that the ſubſtance of bread and wine remained: For theſe are his words, "The ſame they were before the ſanctifica-"tion, which they are after." Mr. Watſon ſaid, that Theodoret meant not the ſame ſubſtance, but the ſame eſſence. Whereupon they were driven again to the diſcuſſing of the Greek word abovementioned: and Mr. Haddon proved it to mean a ſubſtance, both by the etymology of the word, and by the words of Theodoret. For ſaid he, οὐσία cometh to the particle ὤν, which deſcendeth to the verb εἰμὶ, and ſo cometh the noun οὐσία, which ſignifieth Subſtance.

Then ſaid Mr. Watſon, It hath not that ſignification only: But Mr Haddon proved that in that place it could not ſignify otherwiſe. Then he aſked Watſon, when the bread and wine became ſymbols? To whom Watſon anſwered, After conſecration, and not before. Then Mr. Haddon gathered the following reaſon out of his author.

> The ſame thing, ſaith Theodoret, that the bread and wine were before they were ſymbols, the ſame they remain ſtill in nature and ſubſtance, after they are ſymbols.
> Bread and wine they were before.
> Therefore bread and wine they are after.

Then Mr. Watſon denied the author, and ſaid he was a Neſtorian; deſiring to anſwer Mr. Cheyney, who ſtood by, that he was more fit to diſpute in the matter, becauſe he had granted and ſubſcribed to the real preſence. Mr. Cheyney deſired patience of the honourable men to hear him, hoping ſo to open the matter, that the truth ſhould appear; proteſting, that he was no obſtinate nor ſtubborn man, but would be conformable to all reaſon; and if they by their learning, which he acknowledged to be much more than his, could anſwer his reaſons, then he would be ruled by them, and ſay as they ſaid; for he would be no author of ſchiſm, nor hold any thing contrary to the holy mother the church, which is the ſpouſe of Chriſt. Dr. Weſton liked this very well, and commended him highly, telling him, that he was a very learned and ſober man, and well experienced in all good learning, and in the Doctors; and finally, a man, for his knowledge, fit to diſpute in that place; I pray you hear him, quoth he. Then Mr. Cheyney deſired thoſe that were preſent to pray to God with him in two words, and to ſay, Vincat Veritas, Let the truth take place, and have the victory; and all that were preſent, cried with a loud voice, Vincat Veritas, Vincat Veritas.

Dr. Weſton told him that it was hypocritical, and that they had better ſay Vicit Veritas, Truth hath gotten the victory. Mr. Cheyney ſaid again, If you will give me leave, I will bring it to that point, that you may truly ſay ſo.

He then began with Mr Watſon after this manner: You ſaid that Mr. Haddon was not fit to diſpute, becauſe he had not granted the natural and real preſence; but I ſay you are much leſs fit to anſwer, becauſe you take away the ſubſtance of the ſacrament.

Watſon told him, that he had ſubſcribed to the real preſence, and ſhould not go away from that: ſo ſaid the prolocutor and the other prieſts; ſo that for a long time he could not have leave to proceed, till the lords deſired that he ſhould be heard.

He then told them what he meant by ſubſcribing to the real preſence, far otherwiſe than they ſuppoſed. He then went on, and proſecuted Haddon's argument, proving that the Greek word before diſcuſſed was a ſubſtance, uſing the ſame reaſon that Haddon did; and when he had received the ſame anſwer that was made to Haddon, he told them it was but a lewd refuge, when they could not anſwer, to deny the author, and proved the author to be a catholic doctor; that being proved, he further confirmed what was ſaid of the nature and ſubſtance. The ſimilitude of Theodoret is this, ſaid he, As the tokens of Chriſt's body and blood, after the invocation of the prieſt, do change their names, and yet continue the ſame ſubſtance; ſo the body of Chriſt after his aſcenſion, changed his name, and was called immortal, yet it had his former faſhion, figure, and circumſcription, and to ſpeak in one word, the ſame ſubſtance of his body. Therefore, ſaid Cheyney, if in the former part of the ſimilitude you deny the ſame ſubſtance to continue, then in the latter part of the ſimilitude, which agreeth with it, I will deny the body of Chriſt, after his aſcenſion, to have the former nature and ſubſtance: But that were a great hereſy; therefore it is alſo a great hereſy to take away the ſubſtance of bread and wine after conſecration.

Watſon was then obliged to ſay, that the ſubſtance of the body, in the former part of the ſimilitude brought in by him, did ſignify quantity, and other accidents of the ſacramental tokens which be ſeen, and not the very ſubſtance of the ſame; and therefore Theodoret ſaith, Thoſe things which be ſeen. For according to philoſophy, the accidents of things be ſeen, and not the ſubſtances.

Cheyney then appealed to the nobility, and deſired that they would give no credit to them in ſo ſaying: For if they think as they teach, after your lordſhips have ridden forty miles on horſeback (as your buſineſs ſometimes may require) you ſhall not be able to ſay at night that you ſaw your horſes all the day, but only the colour of them: and by this reaſon Chriſt muſt go to ſchool, and learn of Ariſtotle how to ſpeak. For when he ſaw Nathaniel under the fig-tree, if Ariſtotle had ſtood by, he would have ſaid, No, Chriſt, thou didſt not ſee him, but the colour of him. Then ſaid Watſon, Suppoſe it were granted, that that Theodoret was on the other ſide, whereas where there were one of that opinion, there were an hundred on the other.

Then the prolocutor called Morgan to help him out, who ſaid, that Theodoret did no more than what he might lawfully do. For firſt he granted the truth, and then, for fear of ſuch as were not fully inſtructed in the faith, he ſpake myſtically, and that was lawful for him to do: for firſt he granted the truth, and called them the body and blood of Chriſt. Then afterwards he ſeems to give ſomewhat to the ſenſes and to reaſon: but that Theodoret is of the ſame mind that they were of, the words following, quoth he, do declare. For that which followeth is a cauſe of that which went before; and therefore he ſaith, The immortality, &c. whereby it doth appear, that he meant the divine nature, and not the human. Morgan was then detected in miſalledging the text: for the book had not this word [for], for the Greek word did rather ſignify [truly] and not [for], ſo that it might manifeſtly appear that it was the beginning of a new matter, and not a ſentence rendering a cauſe of that he had ſaid before.

Watſon again ſaid, Suppoſe Theodoret be with you, which is one we never heard of printed, but two or three years ago; yet he is but one, and what is one againſt the conſent of the whole church? Cheyney then inferred, that not only Theodoret was of that mind, that the ſubſtance of bread and wine do remain, but many others alſo, eſpecially Irenæus, who making mention of this ſacrament, ſaith thus, "When the cup which is mingled "with wine, and the bread that is broken, do receive the "word of God, it is made the Euchariſt of the body and "blood of Chriſt, by the which the ſubſtance of our fleſh "is nouriſhed, and doth conſiſt." If the thankſgiving do nouriſh our body, then there is ſome ſubſtance beſides Chriſt's body.

Both Watſon and Morgan anſwered, that [By the which] in the ſentence of Irenæus, was referred to the next antecedent, that is, to the body and blood of Chriſt; and not to the wine which is in the cup, and the bread which is broken.

Mr. Cheyney replied, that it was not the body of Chriſt which nouriſhed our bodies. And let it be that Chriſt's fleſh nouriſheth to immortality, yet it doth not anſwer to that argument, although it be true; no more than that anſwer which was made to my allegation out of St. Paul, The bread which we break, &c. with divers others; whereunto you anſwered, that bread was not taken there in its proper ſignification, that is, not for that it was bread, but for that it had been ſo; any more than the rod of Aaron was taken for a ſerpent, becauſe it had been a ſerpent. After this Mr. Cheyney quoted Heſychius, and uſed the ſame reaſon that he did concerning the burning of ſymbols; and aſked them, what was burnt? Mr. Watſon ſaid, We muſt not inquire nor aſk; but if there was any fault, impute it to Chriſt. Then ſaid Mr. Cheyney, Whence came thoſe aſhes? not from ſubſtance; or can any ſubſtance ariſe from accidents.

Then was Mr. Harpsfield called in to ſee what he could ſay in the matter. Who told a fair tale about the omnipotency of God, and the in becillity and weakneſs of man's reaſon as to the attainment of godly things. And likewiſe ſaid, that whatſoever we ſaw, felt or taſted, it was not convenient for us to truſt our ſenſes. And he told alſo a tale out of St. Cyprian, how a woman ſaw the ſacrament burning in her coffer, and that which burned thus, ſaid Harpsfield, burneth here, and becometh aſhes, but what that was that burnt he could not tell. But Mr. Cheyney continued ſtill, and forced them with this queſtion, What was it that was burnt? it was either, ſaid he, the ſubſtance of bread, or elſe the ſubſtance of the body of Chriſt; which was too great an abſurdity to grant. And therefore at length they anſwered, it was a miracle; at which Mr. Cheyney ſmiled, and ſaid, that he could then ſay no more.

Then Dr. Weſton aſked the company, whether theſe men were ſufficiently anſwered, or not? At which certain prieſts ſaid, Yea; but for the great multitude that cried, No, no, they were not heard; the cry was ſo great, as it was heard and noiſed almoſt to the end of Paul's. Whereat Dr. Weſton being much moved, anſwered bitterly, that he aſked not the judgment of the rude multitude, and unlearned people, but of ſuch as were members of the houſe. Then he aſked Mr. Haddon and his fellows, whether they would anſwer them other three days? Mr. Haddon, Cheyney, and Elmar anſwered, No. But the archdeacon of Wincheſter ſtood up and ſaid, that they ſhould not ſay but they ſhould be anſwered; and though all others refuſed to anſwer, yet he would not, but offered to anſwer them all one after another: with whoſe offer the prolocutor being diſſatisfied, railed at him, and ſaid, that he ſhould go to Bedlam; to whom the archdeacon ſoberly returned this anſwer, That he was more worthy to be ſent thither, who behaved him ſo furiouſly in the diſputation, without any indifferent equality.

Then Dr. Weſton roſe up, and ſaid, All the company have ſubſcribed to our article, except only theſe men which you ſee. What their reaſons are, you have heard. We have anſwered them three days, upon promiſe (as it pleaſed him falſly to deſcant, for no ſuch promiſe was made) that they ſhould anſwer us again as long as the order of diſputation doth require, and if they be able to defend their doctrine, let them do ſo.

Then ſtood up Mr. Elmar, and proved how vain a man Weſton was: for he affirmed that they never promiſed to diſpute, but only to declare and teſtify to the world their conſciences. For when they were required to ſubſcribe, they refuſed, and ſaid, that they would ſhew good reaſons which moved them, that they could not with their conſciences ſubſcribe, as they had partly done already, and were able to do more ſufficiently: therefore, ſaid he, it hath been ill called a diſputation, and they are much to blame that called it ſo. For we meant not to diſpute, nor now intend to anſwer, before our arguments, ſaid he, which we have to propound, be ſolved, according as it was appointed. For by anſwering we ſhould but incumber ourſelves and profit nothing, ſince the matter is already decreed on and determined, whatſoever we ſhall prove or diſpute to the contrary.

The Sixth Day's Act.

On Monday following, October 30. the prolocutor demanded of John Philpot, archdeacon of Wincheſter, whether in the queſtions before propounded, he would anſwer their objections or not? To whom he made this anſwer, that he would willingly do ſo, if according to their former determination and promiſe, they would firſt anſwer ſufficiently ſome of his arguments, of which he had a dozen, not half of the firſt being decided. And if they would anſwer fully and ſufficiently but one of his arguments, he promiſed he would anſwer all the objections they ſhould bring.

Then the prolocutor bid him propound his argument, and it ſhould be reſolutely anſwered by one of them; whereunto Morgan was appointed. On Wedneſday laſt, ſaid Philpot, I was forced to ſilence before I had proſecuted half my argument, the ſum of which (as was gathered by the juſt context of the ſcripture) was this, that the human body of Chriſt was aſcended into heaven, and placed at the right hand of God the Father: wherefore, after the imagination of man, it could not be ſituate upon earth inviſibly in the ſacrament of the altar. The argument was denied by Morgan; but for proof hereof, Philpot ſaid, that this was what he had to confirm his firſt argument with, if they would have ſuffered him the other day, as he hoped they now would.

One ſelf and ſame nature, ſaid he, receiveth not in itſelf any thing that is contrary to itſelf.

But the body of Chriſt is an human nature, diſtinct from the Deity, and is a proper nature of itſelf.

Ergo, It cannot receive any thing that is contrary to that nature, and that varieth from itſelf.

But bodily to be preſent, and bodily to be abſent, to be on earth, and to be in heaven, and all at one preſent time, be things contrary to the nature of an human body. Ergo, It cannot be ſaid of the human body of Chriſt, that the ſelf ſame body is both in heaven, and alſo in earth at one inſtant, either viſibly or inviſibly.

Morgan denied the firſt part of the argument, which Philpot vouched out of an ancient writer, Vigilius. But Morgan cavilled thereat, and ſaid, that it was no ſcripture, and bade him prove the ſame from ſcripture.

Philpot replied, That he could likewiſe do, and very well deduce the ſame from St. Paul, who ſaith, that Chriſt is like unto us in all points, except ſin: and therefore, like as one of our bodies cannot receive in itſelf any thing contrary to the nature of a body, as to be in Paul's church and at Weſtminſter in one inſtant, or to be at London viſibly, and at Lincoln inviſibly at one time; for that is contrary to the nature of a body, and of all creatures (as Didymus and Baſilius affirm) that an inviſible creature, as an angel, cannot be at one time in different places. Wherefore he concluded, that the body of Chriſt could not be in more places than one, which is in heaven, and ſo conſequently was not included or contained in the ſacrament of the altar.

The prolocutor took upon him to anſwer to this, ſaying, that it was not true that Chriſt was like unto us in all points, except ſin. For that Chriſt was not conceived by the ſeed of man, as we be.

Whereunto Philpot again replied, that Chriſt's conception was propheſied before by the angel to be ſupernatural, but after he had received our nature by the operation of the Holy Ghoſt in the Virgin's womb, he became in all points like unto us, except ſin.

Then Morgan inferred that this ſaying of Paul did not plainly prove his purpoſe. Well, ſaid Philpot, I perceive that you anſwer but by cavilling, yet am I not deſtitute of other ſcriptures to confirm my firſt argument, though you refuſe the probation of ſo ancient and catholic a doctor as Vigilius is. For St Peter making mention of Chriſt in the ſermon that he made in the third of the Acts, ſaith thus, Whom heaven muſt receive, until the conſummation of all things, &c. which words are ſpoken of his humanity. And if heaven muſt hold Chriſt, then can he not be here on earth, in the ſacrament, as is pretended.

Morgan laughing at this, and giving no direct anſwer at all, Harpsfield ſtood up, being one of the biſhop of London's chaplains, and took upon him to anſwer to the ſaying of St. Peter, and demanded of Philpot, Whether he would of neceſſity force Chriſt to any place, or not?

Philpot ſaid, that he would no otherwiſe force Chriſt of neceſſity to any place, than he is taught by the words of the Holy Ghoſt, that ſound thus; That Chriſt's human body muſt abide in heaven until the day of judgment, as I rehearſed out of the chapter abovementioned, Harpsfield replied, Do ye not know that God is a God omnipotent? Yes, ſaid Philpot, I know that right well, neither do I queſtion his omnipotency at all. But as to Chriſt's omnipotency, what he may do is not our queſtion, but rather what he doth. I know he may make a ſtone in the wall a man, if he pleaſe, and alſo that he may make more worlds, but doth he therefore ſo? It were no good conſequent ſo to conclude, he may do this or that, therefore he doth it.

Only ſo much is to be believed of God's omnipotency, as in the word expreſſed.

That Chriſt's body is both in heaven, and here alſo really in the ſacrament, is not expreſſed in the word.

Ergo, It is not to be believed, that the body of Chriſt, being in heaven, is here alſo really in the ſacrament.

Why, ſaid the prolocutor, then you will put Chriſt in priſon in heaven. To which Philpot anſwered, Do you reckon heaven to be a priſon? God grant us all to come to that priſon.

After this, Harpsfield inferred, that this word Oportet in St. Peter, which in Engliſh ſignifieth Muſt, did not import ſo much as I would infer, of neceſſity, as by other places of ſcripture it may appear, as in the firſt to Timothy, where St. Paul ſaith, A biſhop muſt be the huſband of one wife. Here, quoth he, the aforeſaid Latin word Oportet, that ſignifies Muſt, doth not import ſuch a neceſſity, but that he that never was married, may be a biſhop.

To which Philpot again replied, that the places which he went about to compare were not alike, and that in comparing the ſcriptures we muſt not conſider the bare words, but rather the meaning of the ſcriptures, and becauſe in the place by him alledged, St. Paul declares of what quality a biſhop ought to be: but as to the other place, St Peter teaches us the place where Chriſt muſt neceſſarily be until the end of the world: which we ought to believe to be true. And this compariſon of the Latin word Oportet, which in Engliſh ſignifies Muſt, is no more an anſwer to my argument, than if I was to ſay of you now being here, You muſt needs be here, which importeth ſuch a neceſſity for the time, that you can no otherwiſe be but here, and yet you would go about in words to avoid this neceſſity with another Oportet in another ſenſe; as for inſtance, You muſt be a good man, where Muſt doth not verily conclude any ſuch neceſſity, but that you may be an evil man. Thus you may ſee that your anſwer is not ſufficient, and, as it were, no anſwer to my argument.

Then the prolocutor, to help the matter out, if poſſible, brought in another Oportet, ſaying, What ſay you to this, Oportet hæreſes eſſe; muſt hereſies needs be therefore, becauſe of this word Oportet?

Yea, truly, quoth Philpot, it cannot otherwiſe be, if you will add that which followeth immediately upon theſe words of St. Paul, that is, Ut qui electi ſunt manifeſtentur; that is, That ſuch as be the elect of God may be manifeſted and known.

Why, quoth the Prolocutor, the time hath been that no hereſies were. I know no ſuch time, ſaid Philpot: for ſince the time of Abel and Cain hereſies have been, and then began they. Then ſaid the prolocutor, Will you now anſwer Morgan an argument or two? I will, ſaid Philpot, if I may have my arguments firſt anſwered any thing according to truth and learning. What, quoth the prolocutor, you will never be anſwered. How I am anſwered, ſaid Philpot, let all men here preſent judge, and eſpecially ſuch as are learned, and with what cavilling you have dallied with me.

Firſt, to the ancient authority of Vigilius you have anſwered nothing at all, but only denying what he ſaith to be ſcripture. Secondly, To the ſaying of St. Peter in the Acts, ye have anſwered thus, demanding of me, whether I would keep Chriſt in priſon or not? Let men now judge if this be a ſufficient anſwer, or not?

Then Morgan ſtood up again, and aſked Philpot, whether he would be ruled by the univerſal church, or not?

Yes, ſaid Philpot, if it be the true catholic church. And ſince you ſpeak ſo much of the church, I would fain have you declare what the church is.

The church, ſaid Morgan, is diffuſed and diſperſed throughout the whole world. That is a diffuſe definition, ſaid Philpot, for I am yet as uncertain as I was before, what you mean by the church: but I acknowledge no church but that which is grounded and founded on God's word, as St. Paul ſaith, upon the foundation of the apoſtles and prophets, and upon the ſcriptures of God.

What, quoth Moreman, was the ſcripture before the church? Yea, ſaid Philpot. But I will prove nay, ſaid Moreman, and I will begin at Chriſt's time. The church of Chriſt was before any ſcripture written. For Matthew was the firſt that wrote the goſpel, about a dozen years after Chriſt. Ergo, The church was before the ſcripture.

To whom Philpot anſwering, denied his argument. Which when Moreman could not prove, Philpot ſhewed his argument to be a fallacy, or a deceivable argument: for he took the ſcripture to be only that which was written by men in letters, whereas in truth, all prophecy uttered by the Spirit of God, was counted to be ſcripture before it was written in paper and ink, for that it was written in the hearts, and graven in the minds, yea, and inſpired in the mouths of good men, and of Chriſt's apoſtles, by the Spirit of Chriſt: as the ſalutation of the angel was the ſcripture of Chriſt, and the word of God, before it was written. At that Moreman cried, Fie, fie, wondering that the ſcripture of God ſhould be counted ſcripture before it was written, and affirmed, that he had no knowledge that ſaid ſo.

To whom Philpot replied, That as to knowledge in this matter, for the trial of the truth about the queſtions in controverſy, he would wiſh himſelf no worſe matched than with Moreman.

At which ſaying the prolocutor was grievouſly offended, ſaying, that it was arrogantly ſpoken of him, to compare himſelf with ſuch a worſhipful learned man as Moreman was, being himſelf a man unlearned, yea, a madman, fitter to be ſent to Bedlam, than to be among ſuch a ſort of learned and grave men as were there, and a man that never would be anſwered, and one that troubled the whole houſe, and therefore he commanded him to come no more into the houſe; and thereupon demanded of the houſe, whether they would agree thereunto, or not. To whom a great company anſwered, Yea. Upon which Philpot replied again, that he might think himſelf happy that was out of their company.

Then Morgan roſe up and whiſpered the prolocutor in the ear; and the prolocutor ſpoke to Philpot again, and ſaid, Leſt thou ſhouldſt ſlander the houſe, and ſay that we will not ſuffer you to declare your mind, we are content you ſhall come into the houſe as you have done before, ſo that you be apparelled with a long gown and a tippet, as we be, and that you ſhall not ſpeak but when I command you. Then, ſaid Philpot, I had rather be abſent altogether.

Thus they reaſoned to and fro, till at length about the 13th of December, queen Mary, to take up the matter, ſendeth to Bonner biſhop of London, commanding him to diſſolve and break up the convocation. The copy of which command here followeth.

The Queen's Precept to Bonner, Biſhop of London, for diſſolving the aforeſaid Convocation.

"MARY, &c. To the Reverend Father in God, "Edmund Lord Biſhop of London, ſendeth "greeting. Whereas there is now held at Paul's, London, the Convocation of the Clergy belonging to the "Province of Canterbury; We, by and with the Advice "and Conſent of Our Council, and for divers other "Cauſes and Conſiderations particularly moving Us "thereunto, have hereby thought fit the ſaid Convocation ſhould be diſſolved. And therefore We ſtrictly "charge and command you, forthwith to diſſolve or cauſe "to be diſſolved the ſaid Convocation, as ſhall ſeem to "you moſt fit and convenient: ſignifying withal on Our "part to all and ſeveral the Biſhops, Archdeacons, "Deans, and all other ſpiritual perſons, that they and "every of them do obey and comply with this Our "Command as becometh them ſo to do.

"Witneſs Ourſelf at Weſtminſter, the 13th Day of "December, in the Firſt Year of our Reign."

During the time of this diſputation, November 20, the mayor of Coventry ſent up unto the lords of the council Baldwin Clarke, J. Careleſs, Thomas Wilcocks, and Richard Eſtelin, for their behaviour upon Allhallows-day before. Whereupon Careleſs and Wilcocks were committed to the Gatehouſe, and the other two to the Marſhalſea.

The ſame day there was a letter directed to Sir Chriſtopher Heydon and Sir William Farmer, knights, for the apprehending of John Huntingdon, preacher, for making a rhime againſt Dr. Stokes and the ſacrament; who appearing before the council the third of December then following, was, upon his humble ſubmiſſion and promiſe to amend, as well in doctrine as in living, again ſuffered to depart.

In the days of king Henry, and king Edward his ſucceſſor, divers noblemen and others were committed to the Tower, ſome charged with treaſon, as lord Courtney, and the duke of Norfolk (whoſe ſon lord Henry, earl of Surry, a worthy and ingenious gentleman, had been at the ſame time beheaded, but for what cauſe, or by whom, I ſhall not ſtand here inquiring: this is certain, that not many years after, followed the beheading of both the lord Seymours, and likewiſe of the duke of Northumberland) ſome for the pope's ſupremacy, and ſuſpicious letters tending to ſedition, as Tonſtal biſhop of Durham, and others for other things, who were all continued priſoners there till queen Mary's coming in: unto whom the ſaid queen forthwith granted their pardon, and reſtored them to their former dignities. Amongſt whom was Gardiner biſhop of Wincheſter, who ſhe not only freed out of captivity, but alſo advanced to be high chancellor of England. Moreover, to the lord Courtney ſhe ſhewed ſuch favour, that ſhe made him earl of Devonſhire, inſomuch that there was a ſuſpicion among many that ſhe would marry him, but that proved otherwiſe.

At the ſame time likewiſe the queen releaſed Bonner from his confinement in the Marſhalſea, and reſtored him to the biſhoprick of London, diſplacing Dr. Ridley, with divers other good biſhops, as is mentioned before; as Cranmer from Canterbury, the archbiſhop of York likewiſe, Poynet from Wincheſter, John Hooper from Gloceſter, Barlow from Bath, Harley from Hereford, Taylor from Lincoln, Ferrar from St. David's, Coverdale from Exeter, Scory from Chicheſter, &c. with a great number of archdeacons, deans, and briefly all ſuch beneficed men, who were either married, or would conſtantly adhere to their profeſſion, were removed from their livings, and others of the contrary ſect put in the ſame, as cardinal Pool (who was then ſent for) Gardiner, Heath, White, Day, Troubleſield, &c.

And as touching Cranmer, of whom mention was made before, foraſmuch as a tthe ſame time there was a rumour ſpread abroad of him in London, that he had recanted, and cauſed maſs to be ſaid at Canterbury; in order therefore to clear himſelf, he publiſhed abroad a declaration of his truth and conſtancy in that behalf, proteſting that he neither had done ſo, nor minded ſo to do: adding moreover, that if the queen pleaſed, he, with Peter Martyr, and certain others whom he would chuſe, would in open diſputation vindicate the doctrine taught and ſet forth in the time of King Edward, againſt all perſons whomſoever. But while he was in expectation to have this diſputation obtained, he with other biſhops, were laid faſt in the Tower, but Peter Martyr was permitted to depart the realm, and ſo he went to Argentine.

In the month of November, archbiſhop Cranmer, notwithſtanding he had earneſtly refuſed to ſubſcribe to the king's will in diſinheriting his ſiſter Mary, alledging many grave and pithy reaſons for her legitimation, was in Guildhall of London arraigned and attainted of treaſon, with the lady Jane, and three of the duke of Northumberland's ſons, who were remanded back to the Tower, at the intreaty of certain perſons, and there kept for a time. But Cranmer being acquitted of treaſon, ſtood only in the action and caſe of doctrine which they called hereſy, of which he was very glad and joyful.

This being done in November, the people, and eſpecially the churchmen, perceiving the queen ſo eagerly ſet on on her old religion, they likewiſe for their parts, to ſhew themſelves no leſs forward to comply with the queen's humour (as the cuſtom is of the multitude commonly to frame themſelves after the humour of the prince and time preſent), began in their quires to ſet up the pageant of St. Katherine, and of St. Nicholas, and of their proceſſions in Latin, after their old ſolemnity with their gay Gar-deviance, and gray amices or veſtments.

And when the month of December was come, the parliament broke up, repealing firſt all ſuch ſtatutes as were either made of premunire, or concerned any alteration of religion and adminiſtration of ſacraments in the days of king Edward. In which parliament alſo communication was moved of the queen's marriage with king Philip the emperor's ſon.

In the mean while cardinal Pool being ſent for by queen Mary, was by the emperor requeſted to ſtay with him, to the intent (as ſome think) that his preſence in England ſhould not be a let to the marriage between his ſon Philip and queen Mary. For the accompliſhing of which, he ſent a moſt ample embaſſy, with full power to make up the marriage between them; which had ſuch good ſucceſs, as that after a few days communing about matters, they knit up the knot.

January 13, 1554, Dr. Crome was committed to the Fleet, for preaching on Chriſtmas day without licenſe.

January 21, Thomas Wooton, Eſq; was committed cloſe priſoner to the Fleet for matters of religion.

The mention of this marriage was about the beginning of January, and was ill taken both of the common people, and ſeveral of the nobility, who for this, and for religion, conſpiring among themſelves, raiſed a rebellion, whereof Sir Thomas Wyat, knight, was one of the chief beginners; who being in Kent, ſaid (as ſeveral others well perceived), that the queen and council would by her marriage with a foreigner, bring upon this realm moſt miſerable ſervitude, and eſtabliſh the popiſh religion. About the 25th of January, news came to London of this ſtir in Kent, and ſhortly after of the duke of Suffolk, who was fled into Warwickſhire and Leiceſterſhire, there to gather to him a power. The queen therefore cauſed them both, with the Carews of Devonſhire, to be proclaimed traitors; and ſent into Kent againſt Wyat, Thomas duke of Norfolk, who being about Rocheſter bridge forſaken of them that went with him, returned ſafe to London without any further harm, and without bloodſhed on either party.

Furthermore, to apprehend the duke of Suffolk, being fled into Warwickſhire, the earl of Huntingdon was ſent poſt, who entering the city of Coventry before the duke, diſappointed him of his purpoſe. Wherefore the duke in great diſtreſs committed himſelf to the keeping of a ſervant of his, named Underwood, in Aſtley park, who like a falſe traitor betrayed him: and ſo he was brought up to the Tower of London.

In the mean while Sir Peter Carew hearing of what was done, fled into France, but the others were taken, and Wyat came towards London in the beginning of February. The queen hearing of Wyat's coming, came into the city to the Guildhall, where ſhe made a vehement oration againſt Wyat; the contents, or at leaſt the effect whereof here followeth, as near as out of her own mouth could be penned.

Queen Mary's Oration in Guildhall.

"I Am come unto you in mine own perſon, to tell you that which already you ſee and know, that is, how traiterouſly and rebelliouſly a number of Kentiſhmen have aſſembled themſelves againſt both us and you. Their pretence (as they ſaid at the firſt) was for a marriage determined for us: to which, and to all the articles thereof, ye have been made privy. But ſince we have cauſed certain of our privy council to go again unto them, and to demand the cauſe of this their rebellion, and it appeared then unto our ſaid council, that the matter of the marriage ſeemed to be but a Spaniſh cloak to cover their pretended purpoſe againſt our religion, for that they arrogantly and traiterouſly demanded to have the governance of our perſon, the keeping of the Tower, and the placing of our counſellors.

"Now, loving ſubjects, what I am ye right well know. I am your queen, to whom at my coronation, when I was wedded to the realm, and laws of the ſame (the ſpouſal ring whereof I have on my finger, which never hitherto was, nor hereafter ſhall be left off) you promiſed your allegiance and obedience unto me. And that I am the right and true inheritor of the crown of this realm of England, I take all Chriſtendom to witneſs. My father, as ye all know, poſſeſſed the ſame regal ſtate, which now rightly is deſcended unto me: and to him always ye ſhewed yourſelves moſt faithful and loving ſubjects, and therefore I doubt not but ye will ſhew yourſelves likewiſe to me, and that ye will not ſuffer a vile traitor to have the order and governance of our perſon, and to occupy our eſtate, eſpecially being ſo vile a traitor as Wyat is: who moſt certainly, as he hath abuſed mine ignorant ſubjects which be on his ſide, ſo doth he intend and purpoſe the deſtruction of you, and ſpoil of your goods. And I ſay to you in the word of a prince, I cannot tell how naturally the mother loveth the child, for I was never the mother of any, but certainly, if a prince and governor may as naturally and earneſtly love her ſubjects, as the mother doth love the child, then aſſure yourſelves, that I, being your lady and miſtreſs, do as earneſtly and tenderly love and favour you. And I thus loving you, cannot but think that ye as heartily and faithfully love me, and then I doubt not but we ſhall give theſe rebels a ſhort and ſpeedy overthrow.

"As concerning the marriage, ye ſhall underſtand, that I enterprized not the doing thereof without advice, and that by the advice of all our privy council, who ſo conſidered and weighed the great commodities that might enſue thereof, that they not only thought it very honourable, but alſo expedient, both for the wealth of the realm, and alſo of you our ſubjects. And as touching myſelf, I aſſure you, I am not ſo bent to my will, neither ſo preciſe nor affectionate, that either for mine own pleaſure I would chuſe where I luſt, or that I am ſo deſirous, as needs I would have one. For God, I thank him, to whom be the praiſe therefore, I have hitherto lived a virgin, and doubt nothing, but with God's grace, I am able ſo to live ſtill. But if, as my progenitors have done before, it may pleaſe God that I might leave ſome fruit of my body behind me, to be your governor, I truſt, you would not only rejoice thereat, but alſo, I know, it would be to your great comfort. And certainly, if I either did think or know that this marriage were to the hurt of any of you my commons, or to the impeachment of any part or parcel of the royal ſtate of this realm of England, I would never conſent thereunto, neither would I ever marry while I lived. And in the word of a queen, I promiſe you, that if it ſhall not probably appear to all the nobility and commons in the high court of parliament, that this marriage ſhall be for the high benefit and commodity of the whole realm, then will I abſtain from marriage while I live.

"And now, good ſubjects, pluck up your hearts, and, like true men, ſtand faſt againſt theſe rebels, both our enemies and yours, and fear them not; for I aſſure you, I fear them nothing at all. And I will leave with you my lord Howard, and my lord treaſurer, who ſhall be aſſiſtants with the mayor for your defence."

Here it is to be obſerved, that at the coming of queen Mary to Guildhall, it being before reported, that ſhe was coming with harneſſed men, ſo affrighted the Londoners, leſt they ſhould be there entrapped and put to death, that great numbers of them made out at the gate before ſhe entered in. It is likewiſe to be noted, that when ſhe had ended her oration (which ſhe ſeemed to have perfectly conned without book), Wincheſter ſtanding by her when the oration was done, with great admiration cried to the people, O how happy are we, to whom God hath given ſuch a wiſe and learned prince! &c.

Two days after, the third of February, the lord Cobham was committed to the Tower, and Mr. Wyat entered into Southwark: who, finding that he could not enter that way into London, returned with his army by Kingſton, and came up through the ſtreets to Ludgate, and returning thence, he was reſiſted at Temple-Bar, and there ſurrendered himſelf to Sir Clement Parſon, who brought him to the court; and with him the reſt of his army (for Sir George Harper and almoſt half of his men had run away from him at Kingſton bridge) were alſo taken, and about a hundred killed, and they that were taken were ſent to priſon, and a great many of them hanged, and he himſelf afterwards was executed on Tower-hill, and then quartered; whoſe head being ſet up upon Hay-Hill, was thence ſtolen away, and great ſearch made for the ſame: of which (God willing) you ſhall hear more hereafter.

The 12th day of February the lady Jane was beheaded; two days before her death Mr. Fecknam, alias Howman, was ſent to her from the queen to converſe with her, and endeavour to reduce her from the doctrine of Chriſt to queen Mary's religion. The effect of which communication here followeth.

Fecknam. Madam, I lament your heavy caſe, and yet I doubt not, but that you bear out this ſorrow of yours with a conſtant and patient mind.

Jane. You are welcome unto me, Sir, if your coming be to give Chriſtian exhortation. And as for my heavy caſe (I thank God); I do ſo little lament it, that rather I account the ſame for a more manifeſt declaration of God's favour towards me, than ever he ſhewed me at any time before. And therefore there is no cauſe why either you, or others which bear me good will, ſhould lament or be grieved with this my caſe, being a thing ſo profitable for my ſoul's health.

Feck. I am here come to you at this preſent, ſent from the queen and her council, to inſtruct you in the true doctrine of the right faith: although I have ſo great confidence in you, that I ſhall have, I truſt, little need to travail with you much therein.

Jane. Forſooth I heartily thank the queen's highneſs, which is not unmindful of her humble ſubject: and I hope likewiſe that you no leſs will do your duty therein both truly and faithfully, according to that you were ſent for.

Feck. What is then required of a chriſtian man?

Jane. That he ſhould believe in God the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghoſt, three perſons and one God.

Feck. What, is there nothing elſe to be required or looked for in a chriſtian, but to believe in him?

Jane. Yes, we muſt love him with all our heart, with all our ſoul, and with all our mind, and our neighbour as ourſelf.

Feck. Why, then faith juſtifieth not, nor ſaveth not.

Jane. Yes verily, faith (as Paul ſaith) only juſtifieth.

Feck. Why, St. Paul ſaith, If I have all faith without love, it is nothing.

Jane. True it is; for how can I love him whom I truſt not? Or how can I truſt him whom I love not? Faith and love go both together, and yet love is comprehended in faith.

Feck. How ſhall we love our neighbour?

Jane. To love our neighbour is to feed the hungry, to cloath the naked, and give drink to the thirſty, and to do to him as we would do to ourſelves.

Feck. Why, then it is neceſſary unto ſalvation to do good works alſo, and it is not ſufficient only to believe.

Jane. I deny that, and I affirm that faith only ſaveth: but it is meet for a chriſtian, in token that he followeth his maſter Chriſt, to do good works, yet may we not ſay that they profit to our ſalvation. For when we have done all, yet we be unprofitable ſervants, and faith only in Chriſt's blood ſaveth us.

Feck. How many ſacraments are there?

Jane. Two. The one the ſacrament of baptiſm, and the other the ſacrament of the Lord's ſupper.

Feck. No, there are ſeven.

Jane. By what ſcripture find you that?

Feck. Well, we will talk of that hereafter. But what is ſignified by your two ſacraments?

Jane. By the ſacrament of baptiſm I am waſhed with water and regenerated by the Spirit, and that waſhing is a token to me that I am the child of God. The ſacrament of the Lord's ſupper offered unto me, is a ſure ſeal and teſtimony that I am, by the blood of Chriſt which he ſhed for me on the croſs, made partaker of the everlaſting kingdom.

Feck. Why, what do you receive in that ſacrament? Do you not receive the very body and blood of Chriſt?

Jane. No ſurely, I do not ſo believe. I think that at the ſupper I neither receive fleſh nor blood, but bread and wine: which bread when it is broken, and the wine when it is drunken, putteth me in remembrance how that for my ſins the body of Chriſt was broken, and his blood ſhed on the croſs, and with that bread and wine I receive the benefits that come by the breaking of his body, and ſhedding of his blood for our ſins on the croſs.

Feck. Why, doth not Chriſt ſpeak theſe words, Take, eat, this is my body? Require you any plainer words? Doth he not ſay it is his body?

Jane. I grant he ſaith ſo; and ſo he ſaith, I am the vine, I am the door, but he is never the more the door nor the vine. Doth not St. Paul ſay, He calleth things that are not as though they were? God forbid that I ſhould ſay, that I eat the very natural body and blood of Chriſt: for then either I ſhould pluck away my redemption, or elſe there were two bodies, or two Chriſts. One body was tormented on the croſs; and if they did eat another body, then had he two bodies: or if his body were eaten, then was it not broken upon the croſs; or if it were broken upon the croſs, it was not eaten of his diſciples.

Feck. Why? Is it not as poſſible that Chriſt by his power could make his body both to be eaten and broken, as to be born of a woman without ſeed of man, and to walk upon the ſea, having a body, and other ſuch like miracles as he wrought by his power only?

Jane. Yes verily, if God would have done at his ſupper any miracle, he might have done ſo: but I ſay, that then he minded no work nor miracle, but only to break his body, and ſhed his blood on the croſs for our ſins. But I pray you to anſwer me to this one queſtion: Where was Chriſt, when he ſaid, Take, eat, this is my body? Was he not at the table when he ſaid ſo? He was at that time alive, and ſuffered not till the next day. What took he, but bread? what brake he, but bread? and what gave he, but bread? Look, what he took, he brake: and look, what he brake, he gave: and look, what he gave, they did eat: and yet all this while he himſelf was alive, and at ſupper before his diſciples, or elſe they were deceived.

Feck. You ground your faith upon ſuch authors as ſay and unſay both in a breath, and not upon the church, to whom ye ought to give credit.

Jane. No, I ground my faith on God's word, and not upon the church; for if the church be a good church, the faith of the church muſt be tried by God's word, and not God's word by the church, nor yet my faith. Shall I believe the church becauſe of antiquity? or ſhall I give credit to the church that taketh away from me the half part of the Lord's ſupper, and will not let any man receive it in both kinds? which things if they deny to us, then deny they to us part of our ſalvation. And I ſay, that it is an evil church, and not the ſpouſe of Chriſt, but the ſpouſe of the devil, that altereth the Lord's ſupper, and both taketh from it, and addeth to it. To that church (ſay I) God will add plagues, and from that church will he take their part out of the book of life: Do they learn that of St. Paul when he miniſtered to the Corinthians in both kinds? Shall I believe this church? God forbid.

Feck. That was done for a good intent of the church, to avoid an hereſy that ſprang on it.

Jane. Why? ſhall the church alter God's will and ordinance for good intent? how did king Saul? The Lord God defend.

With theſe and ſuch like perſuaſions he endeavoured, but to no purpoſe, to turn her to the popiſh religion. They reaſoned about many other things, but theſe were the chief.

Then Fecknam took his leave, ſaying, that he was ſorry for her: for I am ſure, quoth he, that we two ſhall never meet.

Jane. True it is, ſaid ſhe, that we ſhall never meet, except God turn your heart. For I am aſſured, unleſs you repent and turn to God, you are in an evil caſe: and I pray God, in the bowels of his mercy, to ſend you his Holy Spirit: For he hath given you his great gift of utterance, if it pleaſed him alſo to open the eyes of your heart.

The Lady Jane's Letter to her Father.

FATHER, although it hath pleaſed God to haſten my death by you, by whom my life ſhould rather have been lengthened: yet can I ſo patiently take it, as I yield God more hearty thanks for ſhortening my woful days, than if all the world had been given unto my poſſeſſions with life lengthened at my own will. And albeit I am well aſſured of your impatient dolors, redoubled manifold ways, both in bewailing your own woe, and eſpecially (as I hear) my unfortunate ſtate, yet my dear father (if I may without offence rejoice in my own miſhaps) meſeems in this I may account myſelf bleſſed, that waſhing my hands with the innocency of my fact, my guiltleſs blood may cry before the Lord, Mercy to the innocent. And yet, though I muſt needs acknowledge, that being conſtrained, and as you wot well enough, continually aſſayed, in taking upon me I ſeemed to conſent, and therein grievouſly offended the queen and her laws: yet do I aſſuredly truſt, that this my offence toward God is ſo much the leſs, in that being in ſo royal eſtate as I was, mine inforced honour blended never with mine innocent heart: and thus, good father, I have opened unto you the ſtate wherein I at preſent ſtand. Whoſe death at hand, although to you perhaps it may ſeem right woful, to me there is nothing that can be more welcome, than from this vale of miſery to aſpire to that heavenly throne of all joy and pleaſure with Chriſt our Saviour. In whoſe ſtedfaſt faith (if it may be lawful for the daughter ſo to write to the father) the Lord that hitherto hath ſtrengthened you, ſo continue you, that at the laſt we may meet in heaven with the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghoſt.

When her father, in king Edward's time, flouriſhed in freedom and proſperity, he had belonging to him a certain learned man, a ſtudent and graduate of the univerſity of Oxford, who then being his chaplain, and appearing to be a ſincere preacher of the goſpel, according to the doctrine of that time ſet forth and received, but ſhortly after, when the ſtate of religion began to be altered by queen Mary, he altered his profeſſion according to the time, and of a proteſtant, became a friend and defender of the pope's proceedings. This pious and chriſtian lady ſeeing ſuch a change in a perſon whom ſhe thought ſo ſincere, was much grieved, and moſt of all lamented the dangerous ſtate of his ſoul, in ſo cowardly ſliding away from the truth, and writeth her mind to him in a ſharp and vehement letter: which (as it appeared to proceed from an earneſt and zealous heart, ſo) ſhe prayed that God might make it effectual in reducing him to repentance, and engage him to take better hold of that whereon depended the eternal welfare of his own ſoul. The copy of the letter is as follows.

Another Letter of the Lady Jane, to Mr. Harding, late Chaplain to the Duke of Suffolk, her Father, and then fallen from the Truth of God's Holy Word.

SO oft as I call to mind the dreadful and fearful ſaying of God, "That he which layeth hold upon the "plough and looketh back, is not meet for the kingdom "of heaven:" And, on the other ſide, the comfortable words of our Saviour Chriſt to all thoſe that forſaking themſelves, do follow him: I cannot but marvel at thee, and lament thy caſe, which ſeemed ſometime to be the lively member of Chriſt, but now the deformed imp of the devil; ſometime the beautiful temple of God, but now the ſtinking and filthy kennel of Satan: ſometime the unſpotted ſpouſe of Chriſt, but now the unſhamefaced paramour of Antichriſt; ſometime my faithful brother, but now a ſtranger and apoſtate; ſometime a ſtout chriſtian ſoldier, but now a cowardly run-away. Yea when I conſider theſe things, I cannot but ſpeak to thee, and cry out upon thee, Thou ſeed of Satan, and not of Judah, whom the devil hath deceived, the world hath beguiled, and the deſire of life ſubverted, and made thee of a chriſtian an infidel. Wherefore haſt thou taken the teſtament of the Lord in thy mouth? Wherefore haſt thou preached the law and the will of God to others? Wherefore haſt thou inſtructed others to be ſtrong in Chriſt, when thou thyſelf doeſt now ſo ſhamefully ſhrink, and ſo horribly abuſe the teſtament and law of the Lord? When thou thyſelf preacheſt not to ſteal, yet moſt abominably ſtealeſt, not from men, but from God, and committing moſt heinous ſacrilege, robbeſt Chriſt thy Lord of his right members, thy body and ſoul, and chuſeſt rather to live miſerably with ſhame in the world, than to die, and glorioufly with honour reign with Chriſt, in whom even in death is life? Why doſt thou now ſhew thyſelf moſt weak, when indeed thou oughteſt to be moſt ſtrong? The ſtrength of a fort is unknown before the aſſault, but thou yieldeſt thy hold before any battery be made. O wretched and unhappy man, what art thou but duſt and aſhes? And wilt thou reſiſt thy Maker that faſhioned thee and framed thee? Wilt thou now forſake him that called thee from the cuſtom gathering among the Romiſh antichriſtians, to be an ambaſſador and meſſenger of his eternal Word? He that firſt framed thee, and ſince thy firſt creation and birth preſerved thee, nouriſhed and kept thee, yea, and inſpired thee with the ſpirit of knowledge (I cannot ſay of grace) ſhall he not now poſſeſs thee? Dareſt thou deliver up thyſelf to another, being not thine own, but his? How canſt thou, having knowledge, or how dareſt thou neglect the law of the Lord, and follow the vain traditions of men: and whereas thou haſt been a public profeſſor of his name, become now a defacer of his glory? Wilt thou refuſe the true God, and worſhip the invention of man, the golden calf, the whore of Babylon, the Romiſh religion, the abominable idol, the moſt wicked maſs? Wilt thou torment again, rent, and tear the moſt precious body of our Saviour Chriſt, with thy bodily and fleſhly teeth? Wilt thou take upon thee to offer up any ſacrifice unto God for our ſins, conſidering that Chriſt offered up himſelf (as Paul ſaith) upon the croſs a lively ſacrifice once for all? Can neither the puniſhment of the Iſraelites, (which for their idolatry they ſo oft received) nor the terrible threatenings of the prophets, nor the curſes of God's own mouth, fear thee to honour any other God than him? Doſt thou ſo regard him that ſpared not his dear and only Son for thee, ſo diminiſhing, yea, utterly extinguiſhing his glory, that thou wilt attribute the praiſe and honour due unto him to the idols, which have mouths and ſpeak not, eyes and ſee not, ears and hear not; which ſhall periſh with them that made them?

What ſaith the prophet Baruch, where he recited the epiſtle of Jeremy written to the captive Jews? Did he not forewarn them, that in Babylon they ſhould ſee gods of gold, ſilver, wood and ſtone, borne upon mens ſhoulders, to caſt a fear before the heathen? "But be ye not afraid "of them (ſaith Jeremy) nor do as others do. But "when you ſee others worſhip them, ſay you in your "hearts, It is thou, O Lord, that oughteſt only to be "worſhipped: for as for thoſe gods, the carpenter "framed them and poliſhed them, yea, gilded be they, "and laid over with ſilver and vain things, and cannot "ſpeak." He ſheweth moreover the abuſe of their dealings, how the prieſts took off their ornaments, and apparelled their women withal: how one holdeth a ſceptre, another a ſword in his hand, and yet can they judge in no matter, nor defend themſelves, much leſs any other, from either battle or murder, nor yet from gnawing of worms, nor any other evil thing, Theſe and ſuch like words ſpeaketh Jeremy unto them, whereby he proveth them to be but vain things, and no gods. And at laſt he concludeth thus, "Confounded be all they that worſhip "them." They were warned by Jeremy, and thou as Jeremy haſt warned other, and art warned thyſelf by many ſcriptures in many places. God ſaith, he is a jealous God, which will have all honour, glory and worſhip given to him only. And Chriſt ſaith in the fourth of Matthew, to Satan which tempted him, even to the ſame Belzebub, the ſame devil which hath prevailed againſt thee: "It is written (ſaith he) thou ſhalt honour the Lord thy "God, and him only ſhalt thou ſerve."

Theſe and ſuch like do prohibit thee and all chriſtians to worſhip any other God than which was before all worlds, and laid the foundations both of heaven and earth: and wilt thou honour a deteſtable idol, invented by Romiſh popes, and the abominable college of crafty cardinals? Chriſt offered himſelf up once for all, and wilt thou offer him up again daily at thy pleaſure? But thou wilt ſay, thou doeſt it for a good intent. Oh ſink of ſin! Oh child of perdition! Doſt thou dream therein of a good intent, where thy conſcience beareth thee witneſs of God's threatened wrath againſt thee? How did Saul? who for that he diſobeyed the word of the Lord for a good intent, was thrown from his worldly and temporal kingdom. Shalt thou then that doſt deface God's honour, and rob him of his right, inherit the eternal and heavenly kingdom? Wilt thou for a good intent diſhonour God, offend thy brother, and danger thy ſoul, wherefore Chriſt hath ſhed his moſt precious blood? Wilt thou for a good intent pluck Chriſt out of heaven, and make his death void, and deface the triumph of his croſs by offering him up daily? Wilt thou either for fear of death or hope of life, deny and refuſe thy God, who enriched thy poverty, healed thy infirmity, and yielded to thee his victory, if thou couldeſt have kept it? Doſt thou not conſider that the thread of thy life hangeth upon him that made thee, who can (as his will is) either twine it harder to laſt the longer, or untwine it again to break the ſooner? Doſt thou not then remember the ſaying of David, a notable king, to teach thee a miſerable wretch, in his 104th Pſalm, where he ſaith thus: "When thou takeſt away thy ſpirit (O Lord) "from men, they die and are turned again to their duſt: "but when thou letteſt thy breath go forth, they ſhall be "made, and thou ſhalt renew the face of the earth." Remember the ſaying of Chriſt in his goſpel: "Whoſo-"ever ſeeketh to ſave his life, ſhall loſe it: but whoſoever "will loſe his life for my ſake, ſhall find it." And in the ſame place, "Whoſoever loveth father or mother above "me, is not meet for me. He that will follow me, let "him forſake himſelf, and take up his croſs, and follow "me." What croſs? the croſs of infamy and ſhame, of miſery and poverty, of affliction and perſecution for his name's ſake. Let the oft falling of thoſe heavenly ſhowers pierce thy ſtony heart. Let the two edged-ſword of God's holy word ſheer aſunder the ſinews of worldly reſpects, even to the very marrow of thy carnal heart, that thou mayeſt once again forſake thyſelf and embrace Chriſt. And like as good ſubjects will not refuſe to hazard all in the defence of their earthly and temporal governor, ſo fly not like a white-livered milkſop from the ſtanding wherein thy chief captain Chriſt hath ſet thee in array of this life. Fight manfully, come life, come death: thy quarrel is God's, and undoubtedly the victory is ours.

But thou wilt ſay; I will not break unity. What, not the unity of Satan and his members? Not the unity of darkneſs, the agreement of Antichriſt and his adherents? Nay, thou deceiveſt thyſelf with a fond imagination of ſuch an unity as is among the enemies of Chriſt. Were not the falſe prophets in an unity? Were not Joſeph's brethren and Jacob's ſons in an unity? Were not the heathen, as the Amalekites, the Perizzites and Jebuſites in an unity? Were not the ſcribes and phariſees in an unity? Doth not king David teſtify, "They have caſt their heads "together, and are confederate againſt the Lord?" Yea, thieves, murderers, conſpirators have their unity. But what unity? Tully ſaith of amity, There is no amity but with the good. But mark, my friend, yea, friend, if thou be not God's enemy: there is no unity but where Chriſt knitteth the knot among ſuch as be his. Yea, be well aſſured, that where his truth is not reſident, there it is verified that he himſelf ſaith: "I came not to ſend "peace on earth, but a ſword," &c. but to ſet one againſt another, the ſon againſt the father, and the daughter againſt the mother-in-law. Deceive not thyſelf therefore with the glittering and glorious name of unity; for Antichriſt hath his unity, yet not in deed but in name. The agreement of ill men is not an unity, but a conſpiracy. Thou haſt heard ſome threatenings, ſome curſings, and ſome admonitions out of the ſcripture to thoſe that love themſelves above Chriſt. Thou haſt heard alſo the ſharp and biting words to thoſe that deny him for love of life: Saith he not, "He that denieth me before men, I will "deny him before my Father in heaven?" And to the ſame effect writeth Paul, "It is impoſſible (ſaith he) that "they which were once lightened, and have taſted of the "heavenly gift, and were partakers of the Holy Ghoſt, "and have taſted of the good word of God, if they fall "and ſlide away, crucifying to themſelves the ſon of God "afreſh, and making of him a mocking ſtock, ſhould "be renewed again by repentance." And again, ſaith he, "If we ſhall willingly ſin after we have received the "knowledge of his truth, there is no oblation left for "ſin, but the terrible expectation of judgment, and fire "which ſhall devour the adverſaries." Thus St. Paul writeth, and this thou readeſt, and doſt thou not quake and tremble?

Well, if theſe terrible and thundering threatenings cannot ſtir thee to cleave unto Chriſt, and forſake the world, yet let the ſweet conſolations and promiſes of the ſcriptures, let the example of Chriſt and his apoſtles, holy martyrs and confeſſors, encourage thee to take faſter hold of Chriſt. Hearken what he ſaith; "Bleſſed are you when "men revile you, and perſecute you for my ſake: rejoice "and be glad, for great is your reward in heaven; for ſo "perſecuted they the prophets that were before you." Hear what the prophet Iſaiah ſaith: "Fear not the curſe "of men, be not afraid of their blaſphemies, for worms "and moths ſhall eat them up like cloth and wool, but "my righteouſneſs ſhall endure for ever, and my ſaving "health from generation to generation. What art thou "then (ſaid he) that feareſt a mortal man, the child of

" man, which fadeth away like the flower, and forget-
" teſt the Lord that made thee, that ſpread out the hea-
" vens, and laid the foundation of the earth? I am the " Lord thy God, that makes the ſea to rage and be ſtill,
" whoſe name is the Lord of hoſts: I ſhall put my word
" in thy mouth, and defend thee with the turning of an
" hand." And our Saviour Chriſt ſaith to his diſciples:
" They ſhall accuſe you, and bring you before princes
" and rulers for my name's ſake, and ſome of you they " ſhall perſecute and kill; but fear you not (ſaith he) nor " care you what you ſhall ſay: for it is the Spirit of your " Father that ſpeaketh within you, Even the very hairs
" of your head are all numbered. Lay up treaſure for " yourſelves (ſaith he) where no thief cometh, nor moth
" corrupteth. Fear not them that kill the body, but " are not able to kill the ſoul; but fear him that hath " power to deſtroy both ſoul and body. If ye were of the " world, the world would love his own: but becauſe ye
" are not of the world, but I have choſen you out of the " world, therefore the world hateth you."

Let theſe and ſuch like conſolations, taken out of the ſcriptures, ſtrengthen you to Godward; let not the examples of holy men and women go out of your mind, as Daniel and the reſt of the prophets, of the three children, of Eleazarus that conſtant father, of the ſeven of the Maccabees children, of Peter, Paul, Stephen, and other apoſtles and holy martyrs in the beginning of the church. As of good Simeon archbiſhop of Soloma, and Zetrophone, with infinite other under Sapores the king of the Perſians and Indians, who contemned all torments deviſed by the tyrants for their Saviour's ſake. Return, return again unto Chriſt's war, and, as becometh a faithful warrior, put on that armour that St. Paul teacheth to be moſt neceſſary for a chriſtian man. And above all things take to you the ſhield of faith, and be you provoked by Chriſt's own example to withſtand the devil, to forſake the world, and to become a true and faithful member of his myſtical body, who ſpared not his own body for our ſins.

Throw down yourſelf with the fear of his threatened vengeance for this ſo great and heinous an offence of apoſtacy: and comfort yourſelf on the other part with the mercy, blood, and promiſe of him that is ready to turn unto you whenſoever you turn unto him. Diſdain not to to come again with the loſt ſon, ſeeing you have ſo wandered with him. Be not aſhamed to turn again with him from the ſwill of ſtrangers, to the delicates of your moſt benign and loving Father, acknowledging that you have ſinned againſt heaven and earth: againſt heaven, by ſtaining the glorious name of God, and cauſing his moſt ſincere and pure word to be evil ſpoken of through you. Againſt earth, by offending ſo many of your weak brethren, to whom you have been a ſtumbling-block through your ſudden ſliding. Be not abaſhed to come home again with Mary, and weep bitterly with Peter, not only with ſhedding the tears of your bodily eyes, but alſo pouring out the ſtreams of your heart, to waſh away out of the ſight of God the filth and mire of your offenſive fall. Be not abaſhed to ſay with the publican, Lord, be merciful unto me a ſinner! Remember the horrible hiſtory of Julian of old, and the lamentable caſe of Spira of late, whoſe caſe (methinks) ſhould be yet ſo green in your remembrance, that being a thing of our time, you ſhould fear the like inconvenience, ſeeing you are fallen into the like offence.

Laſt of all, let the lively remembrance of the laſt day be always before your eyes, remembering the terror that ſuch ſhall be in at that time, with the runagates and fugitives from Chriſt, which ſetting more by the world than by heaven more by their life than by him that gave them life, did ſhrink, yea, did clean fall away from him that forſook not them: and contrariwiſe, the ineſtimable joys prepared for them that, fearing no peril, nor dreading death, have manfully fought, and victoriouſly triumphed over all power of darkneſs, over hell, death, and damnation, through their moſt redoubted captain Chriſt, who now ſtretcheth out his arms to receive you, ready to fall upon your neck and kiſs you, and laſt of all to feaſt you with the dainties and delicacies of his precious blood: which undoubtedly, if it might ſtand with his determinate purpoſe, he would not let to ſhed again, rather than you ſhould be loſt. To whom with the Father and the Holy Ghoſt, be all honour, praiſe, and glory everlaſting. Amen.

Be conſtant, be conſtant, fear not for any pain,
Chriſt hath redeemed thee, and heaven is thy gain.

A Letter written by the Lady Jane at the end of the New Teſtament in Greek, which ſhe ſent to her ſiſter the Lady Katherine, the night before ſhe ſuffered.

I Have here ſent you (good ſiſter Katherine) a book, which although it be not outwardly trimmed with gold, yet inwardly it is more worth than precious ſtones. It is the book (dear ſiſter) of the law of the Lord. It is his teſtament and laſt will which he bequeathed unto us wretches: which ſhall lead you to the path of eternal joy, and if you with a good mind read it, and with an earneſt mind do purpoſe to follow it, it ſhall bring you to an immortal and everlaſting life. It ſhall teach you to live, and learn to die. It ſhall win you more than you ſhould have gained by the poſſeſſion of your woful father's lands. For as, if God had proſpered him, you ſhould have inherited his lands; ſo if you apply diligently this book, ſeeking to direct your life after it, you ſhall be an inheritor of ſuch riches, as neither the covetous ſhall withdraw from you, neither thief ſhall ſteal, neither yet the moths corrupt. Deſire with David, good ſiſter, to underſtand the law of the Lord God.

Live ſtill to die, that you by death may purchaſe eternal life. And truſt not that the tenderneſs of your age ſhall lengthen your life; for as ſoon (if God call) goeth the young as the old, and labour always to learn to die. Defy the world, deny the devil, and deſpiſe the fleſh, and delight yourſelf only in the Lord. Be penitent for your ſins, and yet deſpair not: be ſtrong in faith, and yet preſume not: and deſire with St. Paul to be diſſolved and to be with Chriſt, with whom even death there is life. Be like the good ſervant, and even at midnight be waking, leſt when death cometh and ſtealeth upon you as a thief in the night, you be, with the evil ſervant found ſleeping; and leſt for lack of oil, you be found like the five fooliſh women, and like him that had not on the wedding garment, and then ye be caſt out from the marriage. Rejoice in Chriſt as I do. Follow the ſteps of your Maſter Chriſt, and take up your croſs: lay your ſins on his back, and always embrace him. And as touching my death, rejoice as I do (good ſiſter), that I ſhall be delivered of this corruption, and put on incorruption. For I am aſſured, that I ſhall for loſing of a mortal life, win an immortal life, the which I pray God grant you, and ſend you of his grace to live in his fear, and to die in the true chriſtian faith, from the which (in God's name) I exhort you, that you never ſwerve, neither for hope of life, nor for fear of death. For if you will deny his truth for to lengthen out your life, God will deny you, and yet ſhorten your days. And if you will cleave unto him, he will prolong your days to your comfort and his glory: to which glory God bring me now, and you hereafter, when it pleaſeth him to call you. Fare you well, good ſiſter, and put your only truſt in God, who only muſt help you.

A Prayer made by the Lady Jane in the Time of her Trouble.

O Lord, thou God and Father of my life, hear me poor and deſolate woman, which flieth unto thee only in all troubles and miſeries. Thou, O Lord, art the the only defender and deliverer of thoſe that put their truſt in thee; and therefore I being defiled with ſin, incumbered with affliction, unquieted with troubles, wrapped in cares, overwhelmed with miſeries, vexed with temptations, and grievouſly tormented with the long impriſonment of this vile maſs of clay my ſinful body, do come unto thee, O merciful Saviour, craving thy mercy and help, without the which ſo little help of deliverance is left, that I may utterly deſpair of any liberty. Albeit it is expedient, that ſeeing our life ſtandeth upon trying, we ſhould be viſited ſometime with ſome adverſity, whereby we might both be tried whether we be of thy flock or no, and alſo know thee and ourſelves the better: yet thou that ſaidſt thou wouldſt not ſuffer us to be tempted above our power, be merciful unto me now a miſerable wretch, I beſeech thee: which, with Solomon, do cry unto thee, humbly deſiring thee, that I may neither be too much puffed up with proſperity, neither too much preſſed down with adverſity, leſt I being too full, ſhould deny thee, my God, or being too low brought, ſhould deſpair and blaſpheme thee, my Lord and Saviour. O merciful God, conſider my miſery, beſt known unto thee; and be thou now unto me a ſtrong tower of defence, I humbly require thee. Suffer me not to be tempted above my power, but either be thou a deliverer unto me out of this great miſery, or elſe give me grace patiently to bear thy heavy hand and ſharp correction. It was thy right hand that delivered the people of Iſrael out of the hands of Pharaoh, which for the ſpace of four hundred years did oppreſs, and keep them in bondage. Let it therefore likewiſe ſeem good to thy fatherly goodneſs, to deliver me ſorrowful wretch (for whom thy ſon Chriſt ſhed his precious blood on the croſs) out of this miſerable captivity and bondage wherein I am now. How long wilt thou be abſent, for ever? O Lord, haſt thou forgotten to be gracious, and haſt thou ſhut up thy loving kindneſs in diſpleaſure? Wilt thou be no more intreated? Is thy mercy clean gone for ever, and thy promiſe come utterly to an end for evermore? Why doſt thou make ſo long tarrying? Shall I deſpair of thy mercy, O God? far be that from me. I am thy workmanſhip created in Chriſt Jeſus; give me grace therefore to tarry thy leiſure, and patiently to bear thy works, aſſuredly knowing, that as thou canſt, ſo thou wilt deliver me, when it ſhall pleaſe thee, nothing doubting or miſtruſting thy goodneſs towards me; for thou knoweſt better what is good for me than I do; therefore do with me in all things what thou wilt, and plague me what way thou wilt: only in the mean time arm me, I beſeech thee, with thy armour, that I may ſtand faſt, my loins being girded about with verity, having on the breaſt-plate of righteouſneſs, and ſhod with the ſhoes prepared by the goſpel of peace; above all things taking to me the ſhield of faith, wherewith I may be able to quench all the fiery darts of the wicked, and taking the helmet of ſalvation, and the ſword of the Spirit, which is thy moſt holy word, praying always with all manner of prayer and ſupplication, that I may refer myſelf wholly to thy will, abiding thy pleaſure, and comforting myſelf in thoſe troubles that it ſhall pleaſe thee to ſend me: ſeeing ſuch troubles be profitable for me, and ſeeing I am aſſuredly perſuaded that it cannot be but well all that thou doeſt. Hear me, O merciful Father, for his ſake, whom thou wouldeſt ſhould be a ſacrifice for my ſins: To whom with Thee and the Holy Ghoſt, be all honour and glory. Amen.

The Words and Behaviour of the Lady Jane upon the Scaffold.

WHEN ſhe firſt mounted the ſcaffold, ſhe ſpake to the ſpectators in this manner: Good people, I am come hither to die, and by a law I am condemned to the ſame. The fact againſt the queen's highneſs was unlawful, and the conſenting thereunto by me: but touching the procurement and deſire thereof by me or on my behalf, I do waſh my hands thereof in innocency before God, and the face of you, good chriſtian people, this day: and therewith ſhe wrung her hands wherein ſhe had her book. Then, ſaid ſhe, I pray you all good chriſtian people to bear me witneſs that I die a true chriſtian woman, and that I do look to be ſaved by no other mean, but only by the mercy of God in the blood of his only Son Jeſus Chriſt: and I confeſs, that when I did know the word of God I neglected the ſame, loved myſelf and the world, and therefore this plague and puniſhment is happily and worthily happened unto me for my ſins: and yet I thank God that of his goodneſs he hath thus given me a time and a reſpite to repent: and now, good people, while I am alive, I pray you aſſiſt me with your prayers. And then kneeling down, ſhe turned to Fecknam, ſaying, Shall I ſay this Pſalm? and he ſaid, Yea. Then ſhe ſaid the Pſalm of Miſerere mei Deus, in Engliſh, in a moſt devout manner throughout to the end; and then ſhe ſtood up, and gave her maid, Mrs. Ellen, her gloves and handkerchief, and her book to Mr. Bruges; and then ſhe untied her gown, and the executioner preſſed upon her to help her off with it, but ſhe deſiring him to let her alone, turned towards her two gentlewomen, who helped her off therewith, and alſo with her frowes, paaft, and neckerchief, giving to her a fair handkerchief to put about her eyes.

Then the executioner kneeled down and aſked her forgiveneſs, whom ſhe forgave moſt willingly. Then he deſired her to ſtand upon the ſtraw; which doing, ſhe ſaw the block. Then ſhe ſaid, I pray you diſpatch me quickly. Then ſhe kneeled down, ſaying, Will you take it off before I lay me down? And the executioner ſaid, No, Madam. Then ſhe tied the handkerchief about her eyes, and feeling for the block, ſhe ſaid: What ſhall I do? Where is it? Where is it? One of the ſtanders by guiding her thereunto, ſhe laid her head down upon the block, and then ſtretched forth her body, and ſaid, Lord, into thy hands I commend my ſpirit; and ſo finiſhed her life, in the year of our Lord 1554, the 12th day of February, about the 17th year of her age.

Thus died the lady Jane, and on the ſame day the lord Guildford her huſband, one of the duke of Northumberland's ſons, was likewiſe beheaded, two innocents in compariſon of them that ſat upon them. For they were both very young, and ignorantly accepted that which others had contrived, and by open proclamation conſented to take from others, and give to them.

Touching the condemnation of this pious lady, it is to be noted, that judge Morgan, who gave ſentence againſt her, ſoon after he had condemned her, fell mad, and in his raving cried out continually to have the lady Jane taken away from him, and ſo he ended his life.

On the 21ſt day of the ſame month, Henry duke of Suffolk was beheaded on Tower-hill, the fourth day after his condemnation: about which time many gentlemen and yeomen were condemned, whereof ſome were executed at London, and ſome in the country. In the number of whom was the lord Thomas Gray, brother to the ſaid duke, being apprehended not long after in North Wales, and executed for the ſame. Sir Nicholas Throgmorton very narrowly eſcaped, as ye ſhall hear (God willing) in another place.

On the 24th day of February, in the ſame year, Bonner biſhop of London ſent a commiſſion, directed to all the paſtors and curates of his dioceſe, for the taking of the names of all ſuch as ſhould refuſe to come to auricular confeſſion the Lent following, and to the receiving at Eaſter. The copy of which here followeth.

The Monition of Bonner Biſhop of London, ſent to all and ſingular Curates of his Dioceſe.

EDMUND, by the permiſſion of God, biſhop of London, to all parſons, vicars, curates, and miniſters of the church within the city and dioceſe of London, don, ſendeth grace, peace, and mercy in our Lord everlaſting. Foraſmuch as by the order of the eccleſiaſtical laws and conſtitutions of this realm, and the laudable uſage and cuſtom of the whole catholic church, by many hundred years agone, duly and devoutly obſerved and kept, all faithful people being of lawful age and diſcretion, are bound once in the year at leaſt (except reaſonable cauſe excuſe them) to be confeſſed to their own proper curate, and to receive the ſacrament of the altar, with due preparation and devotion: and foraſmuch alſo as we be credibly informed, that ſundry evil-diſpoſed and undevout perſons, given to ſenſual pleaſures, and carnal appetites, following the luſts of their body, and neglecting utterly the health of their ſouls, do forbear to come to confeſſion according to the ſaid uſage, and to receive the ſacrament of the altar accordingly, giving thereby pernicious and evil example to the younger ſort, to neglect and contemn the ſame: We minding the reformation thereof for our own diſcharge, and deſirous of good order to be kept, and good example to be given; do will and command you by virtue hereof, that immediately upon the receipt of this our commandment, ye and every each of you within your cure and charge, do uſe all your diligence and dexterity to declare the ſame, ſtraitly charging and commanding all your pariſhioners, being of lawful age and diſcretion, to come before Eaſter next coming, to confeſſion, according to the ſaid ordinance and uſage, with due preparation and devotion to receive the ſaid ſacrament of the altar, and that ye do note the names of all ſuch as be not confeſſed unto you, and do not receive of you the ſaid ſacrament, certifying us, or our chancellor or commiſſary thereof, before the ſixth day of April next enſuing the date hereof; that ſo we, knowing thereby who did not come to confeſſion, and receiving the ſacrament accordingly, may proceed againſt them, as being perſons culpable, and tranſgreſſors of the ſaid eccleſiaſtical law and uſage. Further alſo certifying us, our ſaid chancellor or commiſſary, before the day aforeſaid, whether you have your altars ſet up, chalice-book, veſtments, and all things neceſſary for maſs, and the adminiſtration of ſacraments and ſacramentals, with proceſſion, and all other divine ſervice prepared and in readineſs, according to the order of the catholic church, and the virtuous and godly example of the queen's majeſty. And if ye ſo have not, ye then with the churchwardens cauſe the ſame to be provided for, ſignifying by whoſe fault and negligence the ſame want or fault hath proceeded, and generally of the not coming of your pariſhioners to church, undue walking, talking, or uſing of themſelves there unreverently in the time of divine ſervice, and of all other open faults and miſdemeanors, not omitting thus to do, and certify as before, as you will anſwer upon your peril for the contrary.

Given at London the 23d day of February, in the year of our Lord, 1554.

On the fourth of March following the queen ſent a letter to Bonner biſhop of London, with certain articles annexed thereunto, to be put in ſpeedy execution, containing as follows:

Queen Mary's Letter to Bonner Biſhop of London.

"RIGHT reverend father in God, right truſty and well-beloved, we greet you well. And whereas heretofore in the time of the late reign of our moſt deareſt brother king Edward the ſixth, whoſe ſoul God pardon, divers notable crimes, exceſſes and faults, with ſundry kinds of hereſies, ſimony, adultery, and other enormities have been committed within this our realm, and other our dominions, the ſame continuing yet hitherto in like diſorder ſince the beginning of our reign, without any correction or reformation at all, and the people both of the laity and alſo of the clergy, and chiefly of the clergy, have been given to much inſolency and ungodly rule, greatly to the diſpleaſure of Almighty God, and very much to our regret and evil contentation, and to no little ſlander of other chriſtian realms, and in a manner to the ſubverſion and clean defacing of this our realm; and remembering our duty to almighty God, to be to foreſee (as much as in us may be) that all virtue and godly living ſhall be embraced, flouriſh and increaſe; and therewith alſo that all vice and ungodly behaviour ſhould be baniſhed and put away, or at the leaſtwiſe (ſo nigh as might be) ſo bridled and kept under, that godlineſs and honeſty might have the upper hand; underſtanding by very credible report and public fame, to our no ſmall heavineſs and diſcomfort, that within your dioceſe, as well in not exempted as exempted places, the like diſorder and evil behaviour hath been done and uſed, like alſo to continue and increaſe, unleſs due proviſion be had and made to reform the ſame; which earneſtly in very deed we do mind and intend to the uttermoſt all the ways we can poſſible, truſting of God's furtherance and help in that behalf. For theſe cauſes and other moſt juſt conſiderations us moving, we ſend unto you certain articles of ſuch ſpecial matters, as among other things be moſt neceſſary now to be put in execution by you and your officers, extending to the end by us deſired, and the reformation aforeſaid: wherein ye ſhall be charged with our ſpecial commandment, by theſe our letters, to the intent you and your officers may the more earneſtly and boldly proceed thereunto, without fear of any preſumption to be noted in your part, or danger to be incurred of any ſuch our laws, as by our doing of that is in the ſaid articles contained, might any wiſe grieve you, whatſoever be threatened in any ſuch caſe. And therefore we ſtraitly charge and command you, and your ſaid officers, to proceed to the execution of the ſaid articles, without all tract and delay, as ye will anſwer to the contrary.

"Given under our ſignet, at our palace of Weſtminſter, the third day of March, the firſt year of our reign."

Articles ſent from the Queen unto the Ordinary, commanding both him and his Officers to ſee them put in Execution throughout the whole Dioceſe.

FIRST, That every biſhop and his officers, with all other having eccleſiaſtical juriſdiction, ſhall with all ſpeed and diligence, and all manner of ways to them poſſible, put in execution all ſuch canons and eccleſiaſtical laws, heretofore in the time of king Henry the eighth uſed within this realm of England, and the dominions of the ſame, not being directly and expreſly contrary to the laws and ſtatutes of this realm.

Item, That no biſhop, or any of his officers, or other perſon aforeſaid, hereafter in any eccleſiaſtical writing, in proceſs or other extrajudicial acts, do uſe to put in this clauſe or ſentence, [Supported by royal authority.]

Item, That no biſhop, or any of his officers, or other perſon aforeſaid, do hereafter exact or demand in the admiſſion of any perſon to any eccleſiaſtical promotion, order, or office, any oath touching the primacy or ſucceſſion, as of late in few years paſſed hath been accuſtomed and uſed.

Item, That every biſhop and his officers, with all other perſons aforeſaid, have a vigilant eye, and uſe ſpecial diligence and foreſight, that no perſon be admitted or received to any eccleſiaſtical function, benefice, or office, being a ſacramentary, infected or defamed with any notable kind of hereſy, or other great crime; and that the ſaid biſhop do ſtay, and cauſe to be ſtayed, as much as lieth in him, that benefices and eccleſiaſtical promotions do not notably decay, or take hindrance by paſſing or confirming of unreaſonable leaſes.

Item,

Item, That every biſhop, and all other perſons aforeſaid, do diligently travail for the repreſſing of hereſies, and notable crimes, eſpecially in the clergy, duly correcting and puniſhing the ſame.

Item, That every biſhop, and all other perſons aforeſaid, do likewiſe travail for the condemning and repreſſing of corrupt and naughty opinions, unlawful books, ballads, and other pernicious and hurtful devices, engendering hatred amongſt the people, and diſcord among the ſame. And that ſchoolmaſters, preachers and teachers do exerciſe and uſe their offices and duties without teaching, preaching, and ſetting forth any evil and corrupt doctrine, and that doing the contrary, they may be by the biſhop and his ſaid officers puniſhed and removed.

Item, That every biſhop, and all other perſons aforeſaid, proceeding ſummarily, and with all celerity and ſpeed, may and ſhall deprive or declare deprived, and amove, according to their learning and diſcretion, all ſuch perſons from their benefices and eccleſiaſtical promotions, who contrary to the ſtate of their order, and the laudable cuſtom of the church, have married and uſed women as their wives, or otherwiſe notably and ſlanderouſly diſordered or abuſed themſelves: ſequeſtering alſo, during the ſaid proceſs, the fruits and profits of the ſaid benefices and eccleſiaſtical promotions.

Item, That the ſaid biſhop, and all other perſons aforeſaid, do uſe more lenity and clemency with ſuch as have married, whoſe wives be dead, than with other whoſe women do yet remain alive. And likewiſe ſuch prieſts, as with the conſent of their wives or women openly in the preſence of the biſhop do profeſs to abſtain, to be uſed more favourably. In which caſe, after the penance effectually done, the biſhop, according to his diſcretion and wiſdom, may upon juſt conſideration receive and admit them again to their former adminiſtration, ſo it be not in the ſame place, appointing them ſuch a portion to live upon, to be paid out of their benefice whereof they be deprived, by diſcretion of the ſaid biſhop or his officer, as he ſhall think may be ſpared of the ſaid benefice.

Item, That every biſhop, and all other perſons aforeſaid, do foreſee that they ſuffer not any religious man, having ſolemnly profeſſed chaſtity, to continue with his woman or wife; but that all ſuch perſons after deprivation of their benefice or eccleſiaſtical promotion, be alſo divorced every one from his ſaid woman, and due puniſhment otherwiſe taken for the offence therein.

Item, That every biſhop, and all other perſons aforeſaid, do take order and direction with the pariſhioners of every benefice, where prieſts are wanting, to repair to the next pariſh for divine ſervice, or to appoint for a convenient time, till other better proviſion may be made, one curate to ſerve in their ſtead, in divers pariſhes, and to allot to the curate for his labour ſome portion of the benefice that he ſo ſerveth.

Item, That all and all manner of proceſſions of the church be uſed and frequented, and continued after the old order of the church in the Latin tongue.

Item, That all ſuch holy days and faſting days be obſerved and kept, as were obſerved and kept in the latter time of king Henry the eighth.

Item, That the laudable and honeſt ceremonies which were wont to be uſed, frequented, and obſerved in the church, be alſo hereafter frequented, uſed, and obſerved.

Item, That children be chriſtened by the prieſt, and confirmed by the biſhop, as heretofore hath been accuſtomed and uſed.

Item, Touching ſuch perſons as were heretofore promoted to any orders, after the new ſort and faſhion of orders: conſidering they were not ordered in very deed, the biſhop of the dioceſe finding otherwiſe ſufficiency and ability in thoſe men, may ſupply that thing which wanted in them before, and then according to his diſcretion admit them to miniſter.

Item, That by the biſhop of the dioceſe an uniform doctrine be ſet forth by homilies, or otherwiſe, for the good inſtruction and teaching of all people: and that the ſaid biſhop and other perſons aforeſaid, do compel the pariſhioners to come to their ſeveral churches, and there devoutly to hear divine ſervice, as of reaſon they ought.

Item, That they examine all ſchoolmaſters and teachers of children, and finding them ſuſpect in any wiſe to remove them, and place catholic men in their rooms, with a ſpecial commandment to inſtruct their children, ſo as they may be able to anſwer the prieſt at the maſs, as hath been accuſtomed.

Item, That the ſaid biſhop, and all other the perſons aforeſaid, have ſuch regard, reſpect and conſideration of the ſetting forth of the premiſſes, with all kind of virtue, godly living, and good example, with repreſſing alſo and keeping under vice and unthriftineſs, as they and every of them may be ſeen to favour the reſtitution of true religion; and alſo to make an honeſt account and reckoning of their office and cure, to the honour of God, our good contentation, and profit of this our realm, and the dominions of the ſame.

A like preſcript alſo with articles, was ſent from the Queen to the Lord Mayor of London, the fourth day of March in the ſame year, who upon receiving the ſame, directed his commandment to the aldermen, every one ſeverally in his ward, as followeth:

By the Lord Mayor.

ON the queen our moſt gracious and moſt benign ſovereign lady's behalf, we moſt ſtraitly charge and command you, that ye the ſaid aldermen fail not perſonally to call before your own perſon, in ſuch place within your ſaid ward as to you ſhall ſeem moſt convenient and meet, upon Wedneſday next coming, which ſhall be the ſeventh day of this preſent month, at ſeven of the clock in the morning of the ſame day, all and every the houſholders both poor and rich of your ſaid ward, and then and there openly and plainly for your own diſcharge, and for the eſchewing the perils that to you might otherwiſe be juſtly imputed and laid, do not only ſtraitly admoniſh, charge, and command, in the queen our ſaid ſovereign lady's name and behalf, all and every the ſaid houſholders, that both in their own perſons, and alſo their wives, children and ſervants, being of the age of twelve years and upwards, and every of them, do at all and every time and times from henceforth, and namely at the holy time of Eaſter now approaching, honeſtly, quietly, obediently, and catholicly, uſe and behave themſelves like good and faithful chriſtian people, in all and every thing and things touching and concerning the true faith, profeſſion, and religion of his catholic church, both according to the laws and precepts of Almighty God, and alſo their bounden duty of obedience towards our ſovereign lady the queen, her laws and ſtatutes, and her highneſs' moſt good example and gracious proceeding according to the ſame, and according alſo to the right, wholſome, charitable and godly admonition, charge and exhortation, late ſet forth and given by the reverend father in God, the biſhop of London, our dioceſan and ordinary, to all the parſons, vicars, and curates, within his dioceſe: but alſo that they and every of them do truly, without delay, advertiſe you of the names and ſurnames of all and every perſon and perſons, that they or any of them can or may at any time hereafter know, perceive or underſtand to tranſgreſs or offend in any point or article concerning the premiſſes, at their utmoſt perils. That ye immediately after ſuch notice thereof to you given, do forthwith advertiſe us thereof. Fail ye not thus to do with all circumſpection and diligence, as ye will anſwer to our ſaid moſt dread ſovereign lady the queen for the contrary at your like peril. Given at the Guildhall of the city of London,

London, the fifth day of March, in the firſt year of the reign of our ſaid ſovereign lady and queen.

Blackwell.

And likewiſe do you give to every of the ſaid houſholders ſtraitly in commandment, that they or their wives depart not out of their ſaid city until this holy time of Eaſter be paſt.

About the ſame year and time that doctor Bonner publiſhed his preſcript or monitory, there came from the Queen another proclamation commanding all foreigners and ſtrangers to deſert this realm. The copy of which proclamation, becauſe it related chiefly to religion and doctrine, and the true profeſſors thereof, I have thought fit here to annex as followeth.

"THE Queen our ſovereign lady, underſtanding "that a multitude of evil diſpoſed perſons, being "born out of her highneſs's dominions in other ſundry "nations, flying from the obeyſance of the princes and "rulers under whom they be born (ſome for hereſy, "ſome for murder, treaſon, robbery, and ſome for other "horrible crimes), be reſorted into this her majeſty's "realm, and here have made their demurrer, and yet be "commorant and lingering, partly to eſchew ſuch con"dign puniſhment as their ſaid horrible crimes de"ſerve, and partly to dilate, plant, and ſow the ſeeds of "their malicious doctrine and lewd converſation among "the good ſubjects of this her ſaid realm, on purpoſe to "infect her good ſubjects with the like, inſomuch as be"ſides innumerable hereſies, which divers of the ſame "being heretics, have preached and taught within her "highneſs's ſaid realm, it is aſſuredly known unto her "majeſty, that not only their ſecret practices have not "failed to ſtir, comfort and aid divers her highneſs's ſub"jects to this moſt unnatural rebellion againſt God and "her grace, but alſo ſome other of them deſiſt not ſtill "to practice with her people forthwith to rebel: her "majeſty therefore having (as afore is ſaid) knowledge "and intelligence hereof, hath for remedy herein deter"mined, and moſt ſtraitly chargeth and commandeth, "that all and every ſuch perſon and perſons born out of "her highneſs's dominions, now commorant or reſident "within this realm, of whatſoever nation or country, "being either preacher, printer, bookſeller, or other "artificer, or of whatſoever calling elſe, not being deni"zen or merchant known uſing the trade of merchan"dize, or ſervant to ſuch embaſſadors as be liegers here "from the princes and ſtates joined in league with her "grace, ſhall within twenty-four days of this procla"mation, avoid the realm upon pain of moſt grievous "puniſhment by impriſonment, and forfeiture and con"fiſcation of all their goods and moveables, and alſo "to be delivered unto their natural princes or rulers, "againſt whoſe perſons, or laws they have offended. "Giving to all mayors, ſheriffs, bayliffs, conſtables, "and all other her miniſters, officers, and good ſubjects "ſtraitly alſo in charge, if they know any ſuch perſon, "not born in the queen's highneſs's dominions (except "before excepted) that ſhall, after the time and day li"mited in the proclamation, tarry within this realm, "that they ſhall apprehend the ſame perſon or perſons, "and commit him or them to ward, there to remain with"out bail or main-prize, till her grace's pleaſure or her "council's be ſignified unto them for the further order"ing of the ſaid perſon or perſons. And that if any of "her ſaid officers, after the ſaid twenty-four days, ap"prehend, take, or know of any ſuch, they ſhall with "all diligence immediately certify her ſaid council there"of, to the intent order may be forthwith given for their "puniſhment accordingly."

In the mean while, upon the proclamation abovementioned, not only the ſtrangers received into the realm for religion in king Edward's time, among whom was Peter Martyr, and John Alaſco the king of Poland's uncle, but many Engliſhmen fled, ſome to Friezland, ſome to Cleveland, ſome to High Germany, where they were diverſly ſcattered into different companies and congregations, at Weſel, Frankfort, Baſil, Zurich, Geneva, and other places; where by the providence of God near 800 perſons, reckoning ſtudents and others, were all ſuſtained, and entertained with much greater kindneſs among ſtrangers abroad, than they could be in their own country at home.

In the ſaid month of March likewiſe the lord Courtney earl of Devonſhire, whom the queen at her firſt entrance releaſed out of the Tower, and the lady Elizabeth the queen's ſiſter, were both ſuſpected to have been conſenting to Wyat's conſpiracy, and therefore this very March were apprehended for the ſame, and committed to the Tower.

But as to the impriſonment of the lady Elizabeth and the lord Courtney, I could wiſh thee for thy learning, good reader, to take notice of a politic point of practice in Stephen Gardiner biſhop of Wincheſter, not unworthy to be conſidered. For this Gardiner being always a capital enemy to the lady Elizabeth, and thinking from Mr. Wyat's rebellion to gather ſomething whereby to accuſe the lord Courtney, and ſo in the end to entangle the lady Elizabeth, deviſed for their conveyance thither a moſt peſtilent practice, as from the following ſtory may plainly appear.

The ſtory is this: The ſame day Sir Thomas Wyat was executed, he deſired the lieutenant to bring him to the preſence of the lord Courtney; where, before the lieutenant and the ſheriffs, kneeling down upon his knees he beſought the lord Courtney to forgive him, for that he had falſly accuſed both him and the lady Elizabeth: and when brought from thence to the ſcaffold, publickly to ſuffer in the face of all the people, he cleared the lady Elizabeth and the lord Courtney, ſo as to be entirely innocent and free from all ſuſpicion of that commotion. At which confeſſion, Dr. Weſton, ſtanding by, cried to the people, ſaying, Believe him not, good people, for he confeſſed otherwiſe before the council.

After the execution of Sir Thomas Wyat, which was April 11, word was immediately brought to the lord mayor, Sir Thomas White, a little before dinner, how Maſter Wyat had cleared the lady Elizabeth and the lord Courtney, and what Dr. Weſton likewiſe ſaid to the people; whereunto the lord mayor anſwering, ſaid, Is this true? Said Weſton ſo? In ſooth, I never took him otherwiſe but for a knave. But upon the lord mayor's ſitting down to dinner that day at the Bridge-houſe, there cometh in Sir Martin Bowes with the recorder, newly come from the parliament-houſe, and hearing from the mayor and ſheriffs this report of Wyat's confeſſion, both upon the ſcaffold and alſo in the Tower, marvelled thereat, declaring how there was a contrary tale told the ſame day in the parliament-houſe, which was, that Sir Thomas Wyat ſhould deſire the Lord Courtney to confeſs the truth ſo as he had done before.

It was not long after this, that a certain apprentice living in St. Laurence-lane, named Cut, as he was drinking with one Denham a plaiſterer, being one of queen Mary's ſervants, happened amongſt other things to mention how Sir Thomas Wyat had cleared the lady Elizabeth and the lord Courtney, to be no conſenters to his riſing. Which words being brought to Gardiner (by what means I know not) Sir Andrew Judd was immediately ſent by the ſaid biſhop unto the lord mayor, commanding him to bring the ſaid apprentice to the ſtar-chamber, who was accuſed for ſaying, That Wyat was conſtrained by the council to accuſe the lady Elizabeth and the lord Courtney. And when this fellow was come to the ſtar-chamber, the aforeſaid Gardiner, letting paſs all other matters that were were in hand, began to declare to the whole multitude, how miraculouſly Almighty God had brought the queen's majeſty to the crown, the whole realm being in a manner againſt her, and that he had brought this to paſs for this ſingular intent and purpoſe, that this realm being overſpread with hereſies, ſhe might reduce the ſame again to the true catholic faith: and how ſhe took the lady Elizabeth into favour, and loved her tenderly, and alſo the lord Courtney, who had been long detained in priſon, and by her was ſet at liberty, and received great benefits at her hands, and notwithſtanding all this they had both moſt unnaturally and traiterouſly conſpired againſt her, with that heinous traitor Wyat, as by the confeſſion of Wyat (ſaid he) and the letters ſent to and fro may plainly appear: yet there were ſome in the city of London who reported that Wyat was conſtrained by the council to accuſe the lady Elizabeth and the lord Courtney; and yet you, my lord mayor, quoth he, have not ſeen the ſame puniſhed.

The party is here, ſaid the lord mayor. Take him with you, ſaid Gardiner, and puniſh him according to his deſert; and ſaid further, My lord, take heed to your charge, the city of London is a whirlpool and ſink of all evil rumours, where they be bred, and from thence ſpread into all parts of the realm.

There ſtood by at the ſame time the lord Shandois, then lieutenant of the Tower, and hearing the biſhop thus ſpeak, to flatter him in his tale, came in with theſe words as follows: My lords (ſaid he) this is a truth that I ſhall tell you, being lieutenant of the Tower when Wyat ſuffered, he deſired me to bring him to the lord Courtney; which when I had done, he fell down on his knees before him in my preſence, and deſired him to confeſs the truth of himſelf, as he had done before, and ſubmit himſelf unto the queen's majeſty's mercy.

And thus much I thought fit to declare of this matter, to the intent that the reader perceiving the biſhop's proceedings in the premiſſes, and comparing the ſame with the teſtimony of Wyat himſelf, and with the teſtimony of the ſheriffs that were then preſent, when Sir Thomas Wyat aſked the lord Courtney forgiveneſs, may the better judge of the whole caſe and matter for which the lady Elizabeth and the lord Courtney were ſo long in trouble. Of which her grace's trouble (God willing) more ſhall be ſaid hereafter in the ſtory of her life. In the mean while to let this matter ſtay, let us now proceed in our hiſtory.

Not long after this queen Mary, partly fearing the Londoners by occaſion of Wyat's conſpiracy, and partly perceiving moſt of the city for religion ſake not greatly to favour her proceedings, to their diſpleaſure and hindrance ſummoned a parliament to be held at Oxford, as it were to gratify that city, where both the univerſity, town and country had ſhewed themſelves very obedient and forward, eſpecially in reſtoring the popiſh religion. For this purpoſe great proviſion was made, as well by the queen's officers, as by the townſmen and inhabitants of Oxford, and the country round about.

But the queen's mind ſoon changed, and the April following the ſame parliament was held at Weſtminſter; where the queen, among other things, propoſed her marriage with king Philip, which was agreed upon; and reſtoring of the pope's ſupremacy, which could not then be obtained.

At the ſame time when this parliament was ſummoned, the queen ſummoned likewiſe a convocation of biſhops, and of the clergy, writing unto Bonner (whom ſhe had made vicegerent in the room of Cranmer, being then in the Tower) in a ſtyle different from the old ſtyle of king Henry and king Edward, as followeth.

Queen Mary writing to Biſhop Bonner for ſummoning a Convocation, altereth her Style or Title.

"MARY, by the grace of God, of England, France "and Ireland, Queen, Defender of the Faith: to the "Reverend Father in God Edmund Lord Biſhop of "London, ſendeth greeting, &c."

Here the reader is deſired to take notice, that the queen's title is altered, and the latter part left out; to wit, "Of the churches of England and Ireland, ſu-"preme," becauſe in this parliament the ſupremacy was taken from the crown of England, and given to the pope: and biſhop Bonner, giving his certificate upon the ſame, leaves out Autoritate, &c. "By the authority of our "moſt illuſtrious queen impowered;" which part of the biſhop's title in the ſame parliament was likewiſe repealed and taken away.

The Dignity of Prieſts extolled by Biſhop Bonner.

In this aforeſaid convocation, Bonner biſhop of London being vicegerent and preſident, as is ſaid, made a certain exhortation or oration to the clergy (which was in this convocation, or much about the ſaid time), wherein he ſeemeth to ſhew a great piece of profound and deep learning, in ſetting forth the moſt incomparable and ſuper-angelical order of prieſthood, as may appear by this parcel or fragment of his aforeſaid oration, being collected and gathered by ſome that ſtood by: which as it came to our hands, ſo I thought to impart it to the reader, both for that the author of ſo worthy a book ſhould not paſs unknown, and partly alſo, for that the eſtimation of this bleſſed order ſhould loſe nothing of its preheminence, but might be known in moſt ample perfection, ſo as it ſtandeth above angels and kings, if it be true what biſhop Bonner ſaith.

Biſhop Bonner's Oration in Praiſe of Prieſthood.

WHEREFORE it is to be known, that prieſts and elders be worthy of all men to be worſhipped for the dignity ſake which they have of God, as in Matthew xvi. "Whatſoever ye ſhall looſe upon earth, "&c. And Whatſoever ye ſhall bind, &c." For a prieſt by ſome means is like Mary the virgin, and is ſhewed by three points: As the bleſſed virgin by five words did conceive Chriſt, as it is ſaid: Luke 1. "Be it unto me ac-"cording to thy word:" ſo the prieſt by five words doth make the very body of Chriſt. Even as immediately after the conſent of Mary, Chriſt was all whole in her womb; ſo immediately after the ſpeaking of the words of conſecration, the bread is ſubſtantiated into the very body of Chriſt. Secondly, As the virgin carried Chriſt in her arms, and laid him in an ox-ſtall after his birth; even ſo the prieſt, after the conſecration, doth lift up the body of Chriſt, and placeth it, and carrieth it, and handleth it with his hands. Thirdly, As the bleſſed virgin was ſanctified before ſhe had conceived, ſo the prieſt being ordained and anointed before he doth conſecrate, becauſe without orders he could conſecrate nothing; therefore the lay-man cannot do that thing, although he be never ſo holy, and do ſpeak the ſelf-ſame words of conſecration. Therefore here is to be known, that the dignity of prieſts by ſome means paſſeth the dignity of angels, becauſe there is no power given to any of the angels to make the body of Chriſt. Whereby the leaſt prieſt may do in earth, that which the greateſt and higheſt angel in heaven cannot do, as St. Bernard ſaith, O worſhipful dignity of prieſts, in whoſe hands the Son of God is, as in the womb of the virgin he was incarnate. St. Auguſtin ſaith, That angels in the conſecration of the ſacred hoſt do ſerve him, and the Lord of heaven deſcendeth to him. Whereupon St. Ambroſe upon St. Luke ſays, Doubt thou not the angels to be where Chriſt is preſent upon the altar. Wherefore prieſts are to be honoured before all kings of the earth, princes, and nobles. For a prieſt is higher than a king, happier than an angel, maker of his Creator. Wherefore, &c.

It was declared a little before, how Dr. Ridley was had from Fremingham to the Tower; where being in cuſtody, and invited to the lieutenant's table, he had certain talk or conference with ſecretary Bourne, maſter Fecknam, and others, concerning the controverſies in religion: the ſum whereof, as it was penned with his own hand, hereafter enſueth:

Communication between Dr. Ridley and Secretary Bourne.

MASTER Thomas Bridges ſaid at his brother maſter lieutenant's board, I pray you maſter doctors, for my learning, tell me what an heretic is. Maſter ſecretary Bourne ſaid, I will tell you who is an heretic; whoſo ſtubbornly and ſtiffly maintaineth an untruth, he is an heretic. You mean, Sir, ſaid I, an untruth in matters of religion, and concerning our faith. Yea, that is true, ſaid he; and in this we are ſoon agreed. Then ſaid Maſter Fecknam, whom they called maſter dean of Paul's, ſitting at the upper end of the table, I will tell you by St. Auguſtine who is an heretic; "He "that either for the ſake of princes, or for the ſake of "filthy lucre, ſets on foot or propagates wrong notions, "he is an heretic." Sir, ſaid I, I ween St. Auguſtine addeth the third number, which is, "Or for the ſake of "vain glory." You ſay even true, maſter Doctor, ſaid he, and thus far we did agree all three.

Maſter Fecknam began again to ſay, Whoſo doth not believe what the ſcripture affirmeth, but will obſtinately maintain the contrary, he is an heretic: as in the ſacrament of the altar, Matthew doth affirm there to be Chriſt's body, Mark doth affirm it, Luke affirmeth it, Paul affirmeth it, and none denieth it: therefore to hold the contrary is hereſy. It is the ſame body and fleſh that was born of the virgin; and this is confirmed by unity, antiquity, and univerſality. For none before Berengarius did ever doubt of this, and he was an heretic, as maſter doctor there knoweth full well; I do take to witneſs his own conſcience, ſaid he.

Marry, Sir, ſaid maſter ſecretary, maſter Fecknam hath ſpoken well. Theſe be great matters, unity, antiquity, and univerſality. Do you not think ſo, maſter doctor? ſaid he to me.

Here, while I ſtrained courteſy, and pretended no willingneſs to talk, ſaid one of the commiſſioners, Peradventure maſter Ridley doth agree with maſter Fecknam, and then there needs not much debating of the matter.

Sir, ſaid I, in ſome things I do, and ſhall agree with him, and in ſome things which he has ſpoken, to be plain, I no not agree with him at all. Maſters, ſaid I, ye be (as I underſtand) the queen's commiſſioners here, and if ye have commiſſion to examine me in theſe matters, I ſhall declare unto you plainly my faith; if ye have not, then I ſhall pray you either to give me leave to ſpeak my mind freely, or elſe to hold my peace.

There is none here, ſaid maſter ſecretary, that doth not favour you: and then every man ſhewed what favour they bare towards me, and how glad they would be of an agreement.

But as I ſtrained to have licence of them in plain words to ſpeak my mind, ſome thought they granted me it for Vix or Ægre. Well, at the laſt I was content to take it for licenſed, and ſo began to talk.

To maſter Fecknam's arguments of the manifold affirmation where no denial was, I anſwered; Where is a multitude of affirmations in ſcripture, and where is one affirmation, all is one concerning the truth of the matter; for that which any one of the evangeliſts ſpake, inſpired by the Holy Ghoſt, was as true as that which is ſpoken of them all. It is as true that John ſaith of Chriſt, "I am the door of the ſheep," as if all had ſaid it. For it is not in ſcripture as in witneſs of men, where the number is credited more than one, becauſe it is uncertain with what ſpirit he doth ſpeak. And where maſter Fecknam ſpake of ſo many, affirming, without any negation, &c. Sir, ſaid I, all they do affirm the thing which they meant. Now if ye take their words, to leave their meaning, then do they affirm what ye take, but not what they meant. Sir, ſaid I, if in talk with you, I ſhould ſo utter my mind in words, that ye by the ſame do and may plainly perceive my meaning, and could, if you would be captious, cavil at my words, and writhe them to another ſenſe, I would think ye were no gentle companions to talk with, except ye would take my words as ye did perceive I did mean.

Marry, quoth maſter ſecretary, we ſhould elſe do you plain injury and wrong.

Maſter Fecknam perceiving whereunto my talk went, Why, quoth he, what circumſtances can ye ſhew me that ſhall move to think of any other ſenſe than as the words plainly ſay, "This is my body which ſhall be "betrayed for you?"

Sir, ſaid I, even the next ſentence that followeth, viz. "Do this in my remembrance." And alſo by what reaſon ye ſay the bread is turned into Chriſt's carnal body, by the ſame I may ſay, that it is turned into his myſtical body. For as that ſaith of it, "This is my body which ſhall be betrayed for you;" ſo Paul, which ſpake by Chriſt's Spirit, ſaith, "We being many, are all "but one bread and one body, inaſmuch as we are par-"takers of one bread."

Here he calleth one bread, one loaf, ſaid maſter ſecretary.

Yea, ſaid I, one loaf, one bread, all is one with me.

But what ſay ye, quoth maſter ſecretary, of the univerſality, antiquity and unity, that Maſter Fecknam did ſpeak of?

I enſure you, ſaid I, I think them matters weighty, and to be conſidered well. As for unity, the truth is before God, I do believe it, and embrace it, ſo it be with verity, and joined to our head Chriſt, and ſuch an one as Paul ſpeaketh of, ſaying; "One faith, one God, one "baptiſm." And for antiquity, I am alſo perſuaded that to be true which Irenæus ſaith, That which is firſt is true. In our religion, Chriſt's faith was firſt truly taught by Chriſt himſelf, by his apoſtles, and by many good men, that from the beginning did ſucceed next unto them; and for this controverſy of the ſacrament, I am perſuaded that thoſe old writers, which wrote before the controverſy and the uſurping of the ſee of Rome, do all agree, if they be well underſtood in this truth.

I am glad to hear, ſaid Mr. Secretary, that you do ſo well eſteem the doctors of the church.

Now as for univerſality, it may have two meanings; one to underſtand that to be univerſal, which from the beginning in all ages hath been allowed; another to underſtand univerſality for the multitude of our age, or of any other ſingular age.

No, no, ſaith Mr. Secretary, theſe three do always agree, and where there is one, there is all the reſt. And here he and I changed many words. And finally, to be ſhort in this matter, we did not agree.

There was none, quoth Mr. Fecknam, before Berengarius, Wickliffe and Hus, and now in our days Carolo-ſtadius and Oecolampadius. Caroloſtadius ſaith, Chriſt pointed to his own body, and not to the ſacrament, and ſaid, This is my body. And Melancthon writeth to one Miconius (Miconius, ſaid I) theſe or the like words; I can find no grounded reaſon to cauſe me to diſſent from the belief of our fore-elders.

Thus when he had ſpoken, at length, with many other words more; Sir, ſaid I, it is certain that other before theſe have written of this matter: not by the way only, and Obiter, as do for the moſt all the old writers, but even Ex profeſſo; and their whole books intreat of it alone, as Bertram.

Bertram, ſaid the ſecretary, what man was he? and who was he? and how do ye know, &c. with many queſtions.

Sir, quoth I, I have read his book; he propoundeth the ſame which is now in controverſy, and anſwereth ſo directly, that no man may doubt but that he affirmeth, that the ſubſtance of bread remaineth ſtill in the ſacrament; and he wrote unto Carolus Magnus.

Marry, quoth he, mark, for there is a matter. He wrote, quoth he, ad Henricum, and not ad Carolum; for no author maketh any ſuch mention of Bertram.

Yes, quoth I, Trithemius in Catalogo illuſtrium ſcriptorum, ſpeaketh of him. Trithemius was but of late time; but he ſpeaketh, quoth I, of them that were of antiquity. Here after much talk of Bertram, What authors have ye, quoth Mr. Secretary, to make of the ſacrament a figure?

Sir, quoth I, ye know (I think) that Tertullian in plain words ſpeaketh thus; This is my body, that is to ſay, a figure of my body. And Gelaſius ſaith plainly, That the ſubſtance of bread remaineth. And Origen ſaith likewiſe, That which is ſanctified, as touching the matter or ſubſtance, paſſeth away into the draught. Upon this maſter Secretary ſaid to me, You know very well as any man, &c. And here, if I would I might have been ſet in a fooliſh paradiſe of his commendation of my learning, and a man of much reading. But this I would not take at his hand. He ſet me not up ſo high, but I brought myſelf as low again; and here was much ado.

As for Melancthon (quoth I) whom Mr. Fecknam ſpake of, I marvel that ye will alledge him, for we are more nigh an agreement here in England, than the opinion of Melancthon is to you: for in this point we all agree here, that there is in the ſacrament but one material ſubſtance; and Melancthon, as I ween, ſaith, there are two.

Ye ſay truth, quoth Mr. Secretary; Melancthon's opinion is ſo. But I pray you, ye have heard that the ſacrament was in old time ſo reverenced, that many were then forbidden to be preſent at the miniſtration thereof; Catechumeni, quoth he, and many more.

Truth, Sir, quoth I, there were ſome called Audientes, ſome Pœnitentes, ſome Catechumeni, and ſome Energumeni, which were commanded to depart.

Now, quoth he, then; and how can ye then make but a figure or a ſign of the ſacrament, as that book doth which is ſet forth in my lord of Canterbury's name? I wiſs, ye can tell who made it, did not ye make it? And here was much murmuring of the reſt, as tho' they would have given me the glory of the writing of that book; which yet was ſaid of ſome there to contain the moſt heinous hereſy that ever was.

Maſter Secretary, quoth I, that book was made of a great learned man, and him which is able to do the like again: as for me, I enſure you (be not deceived in me) I was never able to do or write any ſuch like thing; he paſſeth me no leſs than the learned maſter his young ſcholar.

Now, here every man would have his ſaying, which I paſs over, not much material for to tell. But, Sir, quoth I, methinks it is not charitably done, to bear the people in hand that any man doth ſo lightly eſteem the ſacrament, as to make of it a figure. For that [but] maketh it a bare figure without any more profit, which that book doth often deny, as appeareth to the reader moſt plainly.

Yes, quoth he, that they do.

Sir, no, quoth I, of a truth; and as for me, I enſure you I make no leſs of the ſacrament than thus: I ſay, whoſoever receiveth the ſacrament, he receiveth therewith either life or death.

No, quoth Mr. Secretary, ſcripture ſaith not ſo.

Sir, quoth I, although not in the ſame ſound of words, yet it doth in the ſame ſenſe, and St. Auguſtine ſaith in the ſound of words alſo: For Paul ſaith, "The bread "which we break, is it not the partaking or fellowſhip "of the body of Chriſt?" And St Auguſtine, Eat life, drink life.

Then ſaid Mr Pope, what can ye make of it when ye ſay, There is not the real body of Chriſt, which I do believe, &c. and I pray God I may never believe other. How can it bring (as ye ſay) either life or death, when Chriſt's body is not there?

Sir, quoth I, when you hear God's word truly preached, if you do believe it, and abide in it, ye ſhall and do receive life withal; and if ye do not believe it, it doth bring unto you death: and yet Chriſt's body is ſtill in heaven, and not carnal in every preacher's mouth.

I pray you tell me, quoth he, how can you anſwer to this, Which ſhall be given for you? Was the figure of Chriſt's body given for us?

No Sir, quoth I, but the very body itſelf, whereof the ſacrament is a ſacramental figure.

How ſay you then, quoth he, to, Which ſhall be given for you?

Forſooth quoth I, Tertullian's expoſition maketh it plain, for he ſaith, The body is a figure of the body. Now put to, Which ſhall be given for you, and it agreeth exceeding well.

In faith, quoth he, I would give forty pounds that ye were of a good opinion. For I enſure you, I have heard you, and had an affection to you.

I thank you, Mr. Pope, for your heart and mind, and ye know, quoth I, I were a very fool if I would in this matter diſſent from you, if that in my conſcience the truth did not inforce me ſo to do. For I wiſs (as ye do perceive I trow) it is ſomewhat out of my way, if I would eſteem worldly gain.

What ſay ye, quoth he, to Cyprian? Doth he not ſay plainly, "The bread which the Lord did deliver being "changed, not according to the form, but according to "the nature thereof, by the omnipotent word is made "fleſh."

True, Sir, ſo he doth ſay, and I anſwer even the ſame which once by chance I preached at Paul's Croſs in a ſermon, for the which I have been as unjuſtly and as untruly reported of, as any poor man hath been. For there I ſpeaking of the ſacrament, and inveighing againſt them that eſteemed it no better than a piece of bread: told even the ſame thing of Pœnitentes, Audientes, Catechumeni, Energumeni, that I ſpake of before: and I bad them depart as unworthy to hear the myſtery; and then I ſaid to thoſe that be worthy, Cyprian the martyr ſhall tell you how it is that Chriſt calleth it, ſaying, Bread is the body, meat, drink, fleſh, becauſe that unto this material ſubſtance is given the property of the thing whereof it beareth the name: and this place then took I to utter as the time would then ſuffer, that the material ſubſtance of bread doth remain. Mr. Fecknam (which, as is reported to me, did bely me openly in the ſame matter at Paul's Croſs) heard all this my talk, as red as ſcarlet in his face, and herein anſwered me not a word.

You do well know, quoth Mr. Secretary, that Origen and Tertullian were not catholic, but erred.

Sir quoth I, there is none of all the doctors that are holden in all points, but are thought to have erred in ſome things. But yet I never heard that it was either laid to Origen's charge or to Tertullian, that ever they were thought to have erred in this matter of the ſacrament.

What, quoth Mr. Cholmley late chief juſtice, doth not Chriſt plainly ſay, that it is his very fleſh, and his very blood, and we muſt needs eat him, or elſe we can have no life? Sir, quoth I, if you will hear how St. Auguſtine expounded that place, you ſhall perceive that you are in a wrong box. And then I began to tell St. Auguſtine's mind in his book of the doctrine of chriſtianity. Yea, yea, quoth Mr. Secretary, that is true, St. Auguſtine doth it figuratively indeed.

Forty years ago, quoth Mr. Fecknam, all were of one opinion in this matter.

Forty

Forty years ago, quoth I, all held that the biſhop of Rome was ſupreme head of the univerſal church.

What then? ſaid Mr. Fecknam, who was beginning to ſpeak; but Mr Secretary took the tale, and ſaid that was but a poſitive law.

A poſitive law! quoth I; no Sir, he would not have it ſo: for it is in his decrees, that he challenged it by Chriſt's own word. For his decree ſaith: The church of Rome was advanced above all other churches in the world, not by any ſynodical conſtitutions, nor any councils, but by the lively voice of the Lord, according as the Lord ſaid to Peter, Thou art Peter, &c. And in another place he intreateth, Thou art Cephas, that is to ſay, the head.

Tuſh, it was not counted an article (quoth Mr. Secretary) of our faith.

Yes, ſaid I, if ye call that an article of our faith, which is believed under pain of damnation. For he ſaith, We do abſolutely determine, declare, and pronounce, that every creature is ſubject to the obedience of the ſaid biſhop of Rome upon neceſſity of ſalvation.

And here, when we ſpake of laws and decrees, Mr. Roger Cholmley thought himſelf much wronged, that he could not be ſuffered to ſpeak, the reſt were ſo ready to interrupt him; and then he up and told a long tale, what laws were of kings in England made againſt the biſhop of Rome, and was vehement to tell how they alway of the clergy did fly to him. And here, becauſe he ſeemed to ſpeak of many things beſide our purpoſe, whereof we ſpake before, he was anſwered of his own fellows, and I let them talk.

Finally, we departed in peace, and Mr. Secretary promiſed in the end, that of their talk there ſhould come to me no harm. And after I had made my moan for lack of my books, he ſaid, they were all once given him: but ſith I know (ſaid he) who hath them now, write me the names of ſuch as you would have, and I will ſpeak for you the beſt I can.

Upon the articles above mentioned, and inquiſition made upon the ſame, divers miniſters were divorced from their wives. Amongſt whom was one John Draper, and Joan Gold his wife, in the dioceſe of London, troubled and vexed for the ſame by Bonner biſhop of London, who ſent for a commiſſion with a proceſs to ſequeſter and ſeparate them, enjoining alſo penance to the poor woman.

Many others were alſo divorced the ſame time againſt their wills; and ſome were contented of their own unconſtant accord, to be ſeparated from their wives: as of Chicheſter one, (who becauſe he ſoon recovered again, ſhall be here nameleſs) another named Edmund Alſtone, another Alexander Bull, amongſt whom alſo was Dr. Standiſh, with many others; whoſe names together in the end of this ſtory of queen Mary, we may peradventure by God's grace in a general catalogue together comprehend.

March 10. A letter was ſent to the lieutenant of the Tower to deliver the bodies of Dr. Cranmer the archbiſhop of Canterbury, Dr. Ridley, and Mr. Latimer, to Sir John Williams, to be conveyed by him to Oxford.

March 26. There was a letter directed to Sir Henry Doel, and one Foſter, to attach the bodies of Dr. Taylor parſon of Hadley, and of Henry Aſkew, and to ſend them up to the council,

How Thomas Cranmer Archbiſhop, Biſhop Ridley, and Maſter Latimer were ſent down to Oxford to diſpute, with the Order and Manner, and all other Circumſtances unto the ſaid Diſputation, and alſo to their Condemnation appertaining.

ABOUT the tenth of April, Cranmer archbiſhop of Canterbury, Ridley biſhop of London, and Hugh Latimer, ſome time biſhop of Worceſter, were conveyed as priſoners from the Tower to Windſor; and from thence to the univerſity of Oxford, there to diſpute with the divines and learned men of both the univerſities, Oxford and Cambridge, about the preſence, ſubſtance, and ſacrifice of the ſacrament. The names of the univerſity doctors and graduates appointed to diſpute againſt them were theſe; of Oxford, Dr. Weſton prolocutor, Dr. Treſham, Dr. Cole, Dr. Oglethorpe, Dr. Pie, Maſter Harpsfield, Maſter Fecknam. Of Cambridge, Dr. Young vice-chancellor, Dr. Glin, Dr. Seaton, Dr. Watſon, Dr. Sedgewick, Dr. Atkinſon, &c. The articles or queſtions whereupon they ſhould diſpute were theſe:

1. Whether the natural body of Chriſt be really in the ſacrament, after the words ſpoken by the prieſt, or no?
2. Whether in the ſacrament, after the words of conſecration, any other ſubſtance do remain, than the ſubſtance of the body and blood of Chriſt?
3. Whether in the maſs be a ſacrifice propitiatory for the ſins of the quick and the dead?

Touching the order and manner of all which things there done, with the notes, arguments, and all circumſtances thereunto pertaining, to deduce the matter from the beginning, leaving out nothing (as near as we may) that ſhall ſeem neceſſary to be added: Firſt, Here is to be underſtood that upon Saturday the 7th day of April, the heads of the colleges in Cambridge being aſſembled together, letters coming down from Stephen Gardiner, lord chancellor, were read with articles therewith annexed, that ſhould be diſputed upon at Oxford: the contents of which three articles are ſufficiently expreſſed before. Whereupon in the ſaid congregation of the aforeſaid univerſity of Cambridge, there was granted firſt a grace in this form, propoſed by the ſenior proctor; "May it "pleaſe you to have an inſtrument made, that the doctrine "of theſe foreſaid articles is ſound and catholic, and "conſonant with the verity of the right meaning faith, "and that the ſame may be approved by your conſent "and voices?" Secondly, in the ſaid congregation, another grace was given and granted, that Dr. Young being vice-chancellor, Dr. Glin, Dr. Atkinſon, Dr. Scot, and Maſter Sedgewick, ſhould go to Oxford to defend the ſaid articles againſt Canterbury, London and Latimer: alſo to have letters to the Oxford men, ſealed with their common ſeal. Item, Another grace granted to Maſter Sedgewick to be actual doctor, being thereupon immediately admitted. The foreſaid letters being then drawn out, the third day after (which was the 11th day of April) were read in the foreſaid congregation-houſe, and there ſealed.

Whereupon the next day after (the 12th of the ſaid month) the foreſaid doctors, with the full grace of that univerſity, ſet forward to Oxford: and coming thither the next day after (being Friday the 13th of April) were lodged all at the Croſs-inn, with one Wakecline, being ſome time ſervant to biſhop Bonner.

Soon after their coming, Dr. Crooke preſented them with wine for their welcome; and ſhortly after two of their beadles came from the vice-chancellor of Oxford, and preſented the vice-chancellor of Cambridge with a diſh of apples and a gallon of wine: after whom Mr. Pie and Fecknam came next to welcome them. Then after conſultation concerning the delivery of their letters, and inſtrument of grace (which was in Dr. Seaton and Dr. Watſon's keeping) they all went to Lincoln College to Dr. Weſton the prolocutor, and to Dr. Treſham the vice-chancellor; and there they delivered their letters, and declared what they had done touching the articles, letters, and graces. Half an hour after eight they returned to their inn again; but firſt they concluded of a proceſſion, ſermon, and convocation to be had the morrow following, and that the doctors of Cambridge ſhould be incorporate in the univerſity of Oxford, and likewiſe that the doctors of Oxford ſhould be incorporate in the univerſity verſity of Cambridge. The ſame day the fore-named priſoners were diſſevered; Dr. Ridley to the houſe of alderman Iriſh, Mr. Latimer to another, and Dr. Cranmer remained ſtill in Bocardo [The name of a priſon in Oxford.]

On Saturday April 14, at eight of the clock, the aforeſaid vice-chancellor of Cambridge, with the other doctors of the ſame univerſity, repaired to Lincoln college again, and found the prolocutor above in a chapel, with a company of the houſe, ſinging maſs for the dead, and tarried there until the end. Then conſulting all together in the maſter's lodging, about nine of the clock they all came to the univerſity church called St. Mary's: and there, after a ſhort conſultation in a chapel, the vice-chancellor, the prolocutor, &c. of Oxford, cauſed the vice-chancellor of Cambridge, and the reſt of the doctors of that univerſity, to ſend for their ſcarlet robes brought from Cambridge, ſave that Dr. Seaton and Watſon borrowed of the Oxford men. And in this time the regents in the congregation houſe had granted all the Cambridge doctors their graces, to be incorporate there; and ſo they went up and were immediately admitted, Dr. Oglethorpe preſenting them, and the proctor reading the ſtatute, and giving them their oaths.

That done, they all came into the quire, and there held the convocation of the univerſity: they had the maſs of the Holy Ghoſt ſolemnly ſung in prick-ſong by the quiremen of Chriſt's Church; but firſt the cauſe of the convocation was opened in Engliſh, partly by the vice-chancellor, and partly by the prolocutor, declaring that they were ſent by the queen, and wherefore they were ſent, and cauſed Mr. Say the regiſter openly to read the commiſſion. That done, the vice-chancellor read the Cambridge letters openly, and then concluded, that three notaries, Mr. Say for the convocation, a beadle of Cambridge for that univerſity, and one Mr. White for Oxford, ſhould teſtify of their doing, and then ordered the ſaid notaries to provide parchment, that the whole aſſembly might ſubſcribe to the articles, except thoſe that had ſubſcribed before in the convocation houſe at London and Cambridge; and ſo the vice-chancellor began firſt, the reſt of the Oxford men after him, as many as could in the maſs time.

The maſs being done, they went in proceſſion: firſt, the quire in their ſurplices followed the croſs; then the firſt-year regents and proctors; then the doctors of law, and their beadles before them; then the doctors of divinity of both univerſities intermingled, the divinity and arts-beadles going before them; the vice-chancellor and prolocutor going together. After them bachelors of divinity, Regentes & non Regentes, in their array; and laſt of all, the bachelors of law and art; after whom followed a great company of ſcholars and ſtudents not graduate: and thus they proceeded through the ſtreet to Chriſt's Church, and there the quire ſung a pſalm, and after that a collect was read. This done, the commiſſioners, doctors, and many others, went to Lincoln college, where they dined with the mayor of the town, one alderman, four beadles, Mr. Say, and the Cambridge notary. After dinner they all went again to St. Mary's church; and there, after a ſhort conſultation in a chapel, all the commiſſioners came into the quire, and ſat all on ſeats before the altar, to the number of thirty-three perſons: and firſt they ſent to the mayor, that he ſhould bring in Dr. Cranmer, who within a while was brought to them with a number of ruſty bill-men.

Thus the reverend archbiſhop, when he was brought before the commiſſioners, reverenced them with much humility, and ſtood with his ſtaff in his hand, who notwithſtanding, having a ſtool offered him, refuſed to ſit. Then the prolocutor, ſitting in the midſt in a ſcarlet gown, began with a ſhort preface or oration in praiſe of unity, and eſpecially in the church of Chriſt; declaring withal, his bringing up, and taking degrees in Cambridge, and alſo how he was promoted by king Henry, and had been his counſellor and a catholic man, one of the ſame univerſity, and a member thereof in times paſt, but of late years did ſeparate and cut off himſelf from it, by teaching and ſetting forth of erroneous doctrine, making every year a new faith; and therefore it pleaſed the queen's grace to ſend them of the convocation and other learned men, to bring him to this unity again, if it might be. Then he ſhewed him how they of the convocation houſe had agreed upon certain articles, whereunto they deſired him to ſubſcribe.

The archbiſhop anſwered to the preface very wittily, modeſtly, and learnedly, ſhewing that he was very glad of an unity, foraſmuch as it was the preſerver of all commonwealths, as well of the heathen, as of the chriſtians; and ſo he dilated the matter with one or two ſtories of the Roman commonwealth. Which thing when he had done, he ſaid, That he was very glad to come to an unity, ſo that it were in Chriſt, and agreeable to his holy word.

When he had thus ſpoken his full mind, the prolocutor cauſed the articles to be read to him, and aſked if he would grant and ſubſcribe to them. Then the archbiſhop of Canterbury read them over three or four times, and touching the firſt article, he aſked what they meant by theſe terms, True and Natural? Do you not mean, ſaith he, A ſenſible body? Some anſwered, The ſame that was born of the virgin; and ſo confuſedly, ſome ſaid one thing, ſome another. Then the archbiſhop of Canterbury denied it utterly, and when he had looked upon the other two, he ſaid they were all falſe, and againſt God's holy word: and therefore he would not agree, he ſaid, in that unity with them. Which done, the prolocutor firſt willing him to write his mind of them that night, ſaid moreover that he ſhould diſpute in them, and cauſed a copy of the articles to be delivered him, aſſigning him to anſwer thereunto on Monday next, and ſo charged the mayor with him again, to be had to Bocardo, where he was kept before; offering moreover unto him, to name what books he would occupy, and ſhould have them brought unto him. The archbiſhop was greatly commended of every body for his modeſty; inſomuch that ſome maſters of arts were ſeen to weep for him, which in judgment were contrary to him.

Then was Dr. Ridley brought in, who hearing the articles read to him, anſwered without any delay, ſaying, They were all falſe; and ſaid further, That they ſprang out of a bitter and ſour root. His anſwers were ſharp, witty, and very earneſt. Then they laid to his charge a ſermon that he made when he was biſhop of Rocheſter, wherein (they ſaid) he ſpake for tranſubſtantiation. He denied it utterly, and aſked whether they could bring out any that heard him, which would ſay and affirm with them the ſame. They could bring no proof of it at all. After that, he was aſked of one whether he deſired not my lord chancellor that now is, to ſtick to the maſs, and other things? He ſaid, That my lord would ſay no ſuch things or words of him; for if he did, he reported not the truth of him.

Then he was aſked whether he would diſpute or no? He anſwered, That as long as God gave him life, he ſhould not only have his heart, but alſo his mouth and pen to defend his truth; but he required time and books. They ſaid, he could not; and that he ſhould diſpute on Thurſday, and till that time he ſhould have books. He ſaid, it was not reaſon that he might not have his own books, and time alſo to look for his diſputation. Then they gave him the articles, and bade him write his mind of them that night, and ſo they commanded the mayor to take him whence he came.

Laſt of all came in Mr. Latimer in like ſort, with a kerchief, and two or three caps on his head, his ſpectacles hanging by a ſtring at his breaſt, and a ſtaff in his hand, and was ſet in a chair; for ſo was he ſuffered by the prolocutor. And after his denial of the articles, when he had Wedneſday appointed for diſputation, he alledged age, ſickneſs, diſuſe, and lack of books, ſaying, That he was almoſt as meet to diſpute, as to be a captain of Calais: but he would, he ſaid, declare his mind either by writing or word, and would ſtand to all they could lay upon his back; complaining moreover, That he was permitted to have neither pen nor ink, nor yet any book but only the New Teſtament there in his hand, which he ſaid he had read over ſeven times deliberately, and yet could not find the maſs in it, neither the marrow-bones nor ſinews of the ſame. At which words the commiſſioners were not a little offended; and Dr. Weſton ſaid, That he would make him grant that it had both marrow-bones and ſinews in the New Teſtament. To whom Mr. Latimer ſaid again, That you will never do, Mr. Doctor; and ſo forthwith they put him to ſilence: ſo that where he was deſirous to tell what he meant by thoſe terms, he could not be ſuffered: there was a very great preſs and throng of people, and one of the beadles ſwooned by reaſon thereof, and was carried into the veſtry. After this bringing home the prolocutor firſt, the Cambridge men, viz. Dr. Young vice-chancellor, Seaton, Glin, Atkinſon, Scot, Watſon, and Sedgewick, went to the Croſs-inn to ſupper. And this was on Saturday being the fourteenth day of April.

On Sunday after Mr. Harpsfield preached at St. Mary's the univerſity church, at nine of the clock, where were divers of the doctors of the univerſity in their robes, and placed accordingly. After the ſermon they went all to dinner to Magdalen college, and there had a great dinner. They ſupped at Lincoln college with the prolocutor, whither Dr. Cranmer ſent anſwer of his mind upon the articles in writing.

On Monday, being the 16th of April, Mr. Say, and Mr. White, notaries, went about in the morning to the colleges, to get ſubſcriptions to the articles. And about eight of the clock the prolocutor, with all the doctors and the vice-chancellor, met together at Exeter college, and ſo they went into the ſchools, and when the vice-chancellor, the prolocutor and doctors were placed, and four appointed to be Exceptores Argumentorum, ſet at a table in the midſt, and four notaries ſitting with them, Dr. Cranmer came to the anſwerer's place, the mayor and aldermen ſitting by him, and ſo the diſputation began to be ſet on work by the prolocutor with a ſhort Præludium. Dr. Chedſey began to argue firſt, and ere he left, the prolocutor divers times, Dr. Treſham, Oglethorpe, Marſhal, the vice-chancellor, Pye, Cole, and Harpsfield, did interrupt and preſs him with their arguments, ſo that every man ſaid ſomewhat, as the prolocutor would ſuffer, diſorderly, ſometime in Latin, ſometime in Engliſh, ſo that three hours of the time was ſpent ere the vice-chancellor of Cambridge began; who alſo was interrupted as before. He began with three or four queſtions ſubtilly. Here the beadles had provided drink, and offered the anſwerer; but he refuſed with thanks. The prolocutor offered him, if he would make water, or otherwiſe eaſe himſelf, he ſhould. Thus the diſputation continued until almoſt two of the clock, with this applauſion Audientium, Vicit veritas. Then were all the arguments written by the four appointed, delivered into the hand of Mr. Say, regiſter; and as for the priſoner he was had away by the mayor; and the doctors dined together at the univerſity college.

And thus much concerning the general order and manner of theſe diſputations, with ſuch circumſtances as there happened, and things there done, as well before the diſputation, and in the preparation thereof, as alſo in the time of their diſputing. Now followeth to infer and declare the orations, arguments, and anſwers, uſed and brought forth in the ſaid diſputations on both parts.

The Arguments, Reaſons, and Allegations uſed in this Diſputation.

ON Monday, Dr. Weſton, with all the reſidue of the viſitors, cenſors, and opponents, repairing to the divinity ſchool, each one inſtalled themſelves in their places. Dr. Cranmer, with a rout of ruſty bills, was brought thither, and ſet in the anſwerer's place, with the mayor and aldermen ſitting by him; where Dr. Weſton, prolocutor, apparelled in a ſcarlet gown, after the cuſtom of the univerſity, began the diſputation with this oration:

"Ye are aſſembled hither, brethren, this day, to con-
"found the deteſtable hereſy of the verity of the bo"dy of Chriſt in the ſacrament, &c." At which words thus pronounced unawares by the prolocutor, ſeveral of the learned men there preſent, conſidering and well weighing the words by him uttered, burſt out into a great laughter, as though, even in the entrance of the diſputations, he had betrayed himſelf and his religion, that termed the opinion of the verity of Chriſt's body in the ſacrament a deteſtable hereſy. The reſt of his oration tended all to this effect, That it was not lawful by God's word to call theſe queſtions into controverſy; for ſuch as doubted of the words of Chriſt, might well be thought to doubt both of the truth and power of God. Whereunto Dr. Cranmer deſiring licenſe, anſwered in this wiſe:

"We are aſſembled (ſaid he) to diſcuſs theſe doubtful
"controverſies, and to lay them open before the eyes of "the world; whereof ye think it unlawful to diſpute.
"It is indeed no reaſon (ſaid he) that we ſhould diſpute
"of that which is determined upon before the truth be "tried. But if theſe queſtions be not called into con-
"troverſy, ſurely mine anſwer then is looked for in vain."
This was the ſum and effect of his anſwer; and this done he prepared himſelf for diſputation.

Then Chedſey the firſt opponent began in this wiſe to diſpute.

Reverend Mr. Doctor, theſe three concluſions are put forth unto us at preſent to diſpute upon:

1. In the ſacrament of the altar is the natural body of Chriſt, conceived of the virgin Mary, and alſo his blood preſent really under the forms of bread and wine, by virtue of God's word pronounced by the prieſt.
2. There remaineth no ſubſtance of bread and wine after the conſecration, nor any other ſubſtance, but the ſubſtance of God and man.
3. The lively ſacrifice of the church is in the maſs propitiatory, as well for the quick as the dead.

Theſe be the concluſions propounded, whereupon this our preſent controverſy doth reſt. Now to the end we might not doubt how you take the ſame, you have already given up unto us your opinion thereof. I term it your opinion, in that it diſagreeth from the catholic. Wherefore thus I argue.

Ched. Your opinion differeth from ſcripture.

Ergo, you are deceived.

Cran. I deny the antecedent.

Ched. Chriſt, when he inſtituted his laſt ſupper, ſpake to his diſciples, Take, eat, this is my body which ſhall be given for you.

But this true body was given for us:

Ergo, His true body is in the ſacrament.

The right form of this argument is thus to be framed.

The ſame which was given for us is in the ſacrament.

But his true body was given for us:

Ergo, His true body is in the ſacrament.

Cran. His true body is truly preſent to them that truly receive him; but ſpiritually. And ſo it is taken after a ſpiritual ſort. For when he ſaid, This is my body, it is all one as if he had ſaid, This is the breaking of my body, This is the ſhedding of my blood. As oft as you ſhall do this, it ſhall put you in remembrance of the breaking of my body, and the ſhedding of my blood; that as truly as you receive this ſacrament, ſo truly ſhall you receive the benefit promiſed by receiving the ſame worthily.

Ched. Your opinion differeth from the church, which ſaith that the true body is in the ſacrament.

Ergo, Your opinion therein is falſe.

Cran.

Cran. I ſay and agree with the church, that the body of Chriſt is in the ſacrament effectually, becauſe the paſſion of Chriſt is effectual.

Ched. Chriſt when he ſpake theſe words, This is my body, ſpake of the ſubſtance, but not of the effect.

Cran. I grant he ſpake of the ſubſtance, and not of the effect after a ſort: and yet it is moſt true that the body of Chriſt is effectually in the ſacrament. But I deny that he is there truly preſent in bread, or that under the bread is his organical body. And becauſe it ſhould be too tedious (he ſaid) to make diſcourſe of the whole, he delivered up there his opinion thereof to Dr. Weſton written at large, with anſwers to every one of their three propoſitions; which he deſired Dr. Weſton, ſitting there on high, to read openly to the people; which he promiſed to do. But it was not the firſt promiſe that ſuch papiſts have broken.

The copy of this writing, although it were not there read, yet the contents thereof we have drawn out as followeth.

An Explication of Cranmer upon the aforeſaid Concluſions.

CRANMER. In the aſſertions of the church and of religion, trifling and new-fangled novelties of words, ſo much as may be, are to be eſchewed, whereof ariſeth nothing but contention and brawling about words, and we muſt follow, ſo much as we may, the manner of ſpeaking of the ſcripture.

In the firſt concluſion, if ye underſtand by this word [really] Re ipſa, that is, in very deed and effectually; ſo Chriſt, by the grace and efficacy of his paſſion, is indeed and truly preſent to all true and holy members.

But if ye underſtand by this word [really] Corporaliter, that is, corporally; ſo that by the body of Chriſt is underſtood a natural and organical; ſo the firſt propoſition doth vary, not only from the uſual ſpeech and phraſe of ſcripture, but alſo is clean contrary to the holy word of God, and chriſtian profeſſion: when as both the ſcripture doth teſtify by theſe words, and alſo the catholic church hath profeſſed from the beginning, Chriſt to have left the world, and to ſit at the right hand of the Father till he come to judgment.

And likewiſe I anſwer to the ſecond queſtion; that is, That it ſwerveth from the accuſtomed manner and ſpeech of ſcripture.

The third concluſion, as it is intricate and wrapped in all doubtful and ambiguous words, and differing alſo much from the true ſpeech of the ſcripture, ſo as the words thereof ſeem to import no open ſenſe, is moſt contumelious againſt our only Lord and Saviour Chriſt Jeſus, and a violating of his precious blood, which upon the altar of the croſs, is the only ſacrifice and oblation for the ſins of all mankind.

Ched. By this your interpretation which you have made upon the firſt concluſion, this I underſtand, the body of Chriſt to be in the ſacrament only by the way of participation: inſomuch as we communicating thereof, do participate the grace of Chriſt, ſo that you mean hereby only the effect thereof. But our concluſion ſtandeth upon the ſubſtance, and not the efficacy only, which ſhall appear by the teſtimony both of ſcriptures, and of all the fathers a thouſand years after Chriſt.

And firſt, to begin with the ſcripture, let us conſider what is written in Matt. 26. Mark 14. Luke 22. and 1 Cor. 11. Matthew ſaith, As they ſate at ſupper, Jeſus took bread, &c. In Mark there is the ſame ſenſe, although not the ſame words, who alſo for one part of the ſacrament ſpeaketh more plainly, Jeſus taking bread, &c. After the ſame ſenſe alſo writteth Luke 22. And when Jeſus had taken bread, &c. In the mouth of two or three witneſſes, ſaith the ſcripture, ſtandeth all truth. Here we have three witneſſes together, that Chriſt ſaid that to be his body which was given for many, and that to be his blood which ſhould be ſhed for many; whereby is declared the ſubſtance, and not only the efficacy alone thereof. Ergo, It is not true that you ſay, there to be not the ſubſtance of his body, but the efficacy alone thereof.

Cran. Thus you gather upon mine anſwer, as though I did mean of the efficacy, and not of the ſubſtance of the body; but I mean of them both, as well of the efficacy as of the ſubſtance. And forſomuch as all things come not readily to memory, to a man that ſhall ſpeak extempore, therefore for the more ample and fuller anſwer in this matter, this writing here I do exhibit.

Archbiſhop Cranmer's Explication.

OUR Lord and Saviour Jeſus Chriſt, at the time of his Maundy, preparing himſelf to die for our cauſe, that he might redeem us from eternal death, to forgive us all our ſins, and to cancel out the hand-writing that was againſt us; that we through ungrateful oblivion ſhould not forget his death, therefore at the time of his holy ſupper did inſtitute a perpetual memory of this his death, to be celebrated among chriſtians in bread and wine, according as it is ſaid: "Do this in remembrance of me. "And ſo often as you eat this bread and drink this cup, "you ſhall ſhew forth the Lord's death till he come." And this remembrance or ſacrament of his holy paſſion, that is, of his body ſlain, and blood ſhed, he would all chriſtians to frequent and celebrate in bread and wine, according as he ſaid, "Take, eat, and drink ye all of this." Therefore whoſoever for man's tradition denieth the cup of Chriſt's blood to lay-men, they manifeſtly repugn againſt Chriſt, forbidding that which Chriſt commandeth to be done, and be like to thoſe Scribes and Phariſees of whom the Lord ſpake; "Ye hypocrites, ye have re- "jected the commandments of God for your traditions. "Well did Iſaiah propheſy of you, ſaying, This people "honoureth me with their lips, but their heart is far "from me. Without cauſe do they worſhip me, teach- "ing the doctrines and precepts of men." The ſacrament and myſtical bread being broken and diſtributed after the inſtitution of Chriſt, and the myſtical wine being likewiſe taken and received, be not only ſacraments of the fleſh of Chriſt wounded for us, and of his blood-ſhedding, but alſo be moſt certain ſacraments for us, and (as a man would ſay) ſeals of God's promiſes and gifts, and alſo of that holy fellowſhip which we have with Chriſt and all his members. Moreover they be to us memorials of that heavenly food and nouriſhment, wherewith we are nouriſhed unto eternal life, and the thirſt of our boiling conſcience quenched, and finally, whereby the hearts of the faithful be repleniſhed with unſpeakable joy, and be corroborated and ſtrengthened unto all works of godlineſs. "We are many (ſaith St. Paul) one bread, and one "body, all we which do participate of one bread, and "one cup." And Chriſt ſaith: "Eat ye, this is my bo- "dy." And, "Drink ye, this is my blood." And, "I am the living bread which came down from heaven. "He that eateth me, ſhall alſo live for ever. Not as "your fathers did eat Manna in the deſart, and are dead: "He that eateth me, ſhall alſo live for ever."

Thus therefore true bread and true wine remain ſtill in the euchariſt, until they be conſumed of the faithful, to be ſigns, and as ſeals unto us annexed unto God's promiſes, making us certain of God's gifts towards us. Alſo Chriſt remaineth in them, and they in Chriſt, which eat his fleſh, and drink his blood, as Chriſt himſelf hath promiſed: "They that eat my fleſh, and drink my blood, "abide in me, and I in them." Moreover he abideth alſo in them which worthily receive the outward ſacrament, neither doth he depart ſo ſoon as the ſacrament is conſumed, but continually abideth, feeding and nouriſhing us ſo long as we remain bodies of that head, and members of the ſame. I acknowledge not here the natural body of Chriſt, which is only ſpiritual, unintelligible, and inſenſible, having no diſtinction of members and parts in it: But that body only I acknowledge and worſhip, which was born of the virgin, which ſuffered for us, which is viſible, palpable, and hath all the form, and ſhape, and parts of the true natural body of man. Chriſt ſpake not theſe words of any uncertain ſubſtance, but of the certain ſubſtance of bread, which he then held in his hands, and ſhewed his diſciples when he ſaid, Eat ye, this is my body: And likewiſe of the cup, when he ſaid, Drink ye, this is my blood: meaning verily of that bread which by nature is uſual and common with us, which is taken out of the fruit of the ground, compacted by the uniting of many grains together made by man, and by man's hand brought to that viſible ſhape, being of round compaſs, and without all ſenſe or life, which nouriſheth the body, and ſtrengtheneth the heart of man: Of this ſame bread (I ſay) and not of any uncertain and wandering ſubſtance, the old fathers ſay that Chriſt ſpake theſe words, Eat ye, this is my body. And likewiſe alſo of the wine, which is the creature and fruit of the vine preſſed out of many cluſters of grapes, and maketh man's heart merry, of the very ſame wine (I ſay) Chriſt ſpake, Drink ye, this is my blood. And ſo the old doctors do call this, ſpeaking of Chriſt, tropical, figurative, anagogical, allegorical, which they do interpret after this ſort, that although the ſubſtance of bread and wine do remain, and be received of the faithful, yet notwithſtanding Chriſt changed the appellation thereof, and called the bread by the name of his fleſh, and the wine by the name of his blood, not that it is ſo in very deed, but ſignified in a myſtery. So that we ſhould conſider, not what they be in their own nature, but what they import to us and ſignify, and ſhould underſtand the ſacrament not carnally, but ſpiritually, and ſhould attend not to the viſible nature of the ſacraments, neither have reſpect only to the outward bread and cup, thinking to ſee there with our eyes no other things but only bread and wine, but that lifting up our minds we ſhould look up to the blood of Chriſt with our faith, ſhould touch him with our mind, and receive him with our inward man; and that being like eagles in this life, we ſhould fly up into heaven in our hearts, where that Lamb is reſident at the right hand of his Father, which taketh away the ſins of the world, by whoſe ſtripes we are made whole; by whoſe paſſion we are filled at his table, and whoſe blood we receiving out of his holy ſide, do live for ever, being made the gueſts of Chriſt, having him dwelling in us thro' the grace of his true nature, and thro' the virtue and efficacy of whole paſſion, being no leſs aſſured and certified, that we are fed ſpiritually unto eternal life by Chriſt's fleſh crucified, and by his bloodſhed, the true food of our minds, than that our bodies may be fed with meat and drink in this life: and hereof this ſaid myſtical wine, being adminiſtered and received after the inſtitution of Chriſt, be to us a memorial, a pledge, a token, a ſacrament, and a ſeal.

And thereof it is that Chriſt ſaith not thus; This is my body, eat ye: but after he had bidden them eat, then he ſaid, This is my body, which ſhall be given for you. Which is to mean, as though he ſhould ſay, In eating of this bread, conſider you that this bread is no common thing, but a myſtical matter; neither do you attend that which is ſet before your bodily eyes, but what feedeth you within: conſider and behold my body crucified for you, that eat and digeſt in your minds, chew you upon my paſſion, be fed with my death; this is the true meat, this is the drink that moiſteneth, wherewith you being truly fed, and inebriate, ſhall live for ever. The bread and wine which be ſet before your eyes are only declarations of me, but I myſelf am the eternal food. Wherefore whenſoever at this my table you ſhall behold the ſacraments, have not regard ſo much to them, as conſider ye what I promiſe to you by them, which is myſelf to be meat for you of eternal life.

The only oblation of Chriſt (wherewith he offered himſelf to God the Father once to death upon the altar of the croſs for our redemption) was of ſuch efficacy, that there is no more need of any ſacrifice for the redemption of the whole world, but all the ſacrifices of the old law he took away, performing that in very deed, which they did ſignify and promiſe. Whoſoever therefore ſhall fix the hope of his ſalvation in any other ſacrifice, he falleth from the grace of Chriſt, and is contumelious againſt the blood of Chriſt. For "He was wounded for our tranſ-" greſſions, and was broken for our iniquities. All we " like ſheep have wandered aſtray. Every man hath " turned after his own way, and the Lord hath laid all " our iniquities upon him. For he hath entered once " for all into the holy place by the blood, not of goats " or calves, but by his own blood, finding eternal re-" demption: And hath entered into heaven, to appear " now in the ſight of God for us, not to offer himſelf " often-times (for ſo ſhould he have ſuffered many times) " but now hath he appeared once to put away ſin, through " his own oblation. And as it is appointed to all men " once to die, ſo alſo Chriſt once was offered: who " offering up one oblation for ſins, ſitteth now for ever " on the right hand of God. For by one oblation " hath he made perfect for ever thoſe that be ſanctified. " For where is remiſſion of ſins, there is now no obla-" tion for ſin," but this only ſacrifice of Chriſt; whoſoever ſhall ſeek any other ſacrifice propitiatory for ſin, maketh the ſacrifice of Chriſt of no validity, force, or efficacy. For if it be ſufficient to remit ſins, what need is there of any other? For the neceſſity of another argueth and declareth this to be inſufficient. Almighty God grant that we may truly lean to one ſacrifice of Chriſt, and that we to him again may repay our ſacrifices of thankſgiving, of praiſe, of confeſſing his name, of true amendment, of repentance, of mercifulneſs towards our neighbours, and of all other good works of charity. For by ſuch ſacrifices we ſhall declare ourſelves neither ingrateful to God, nor altogether unworthy of this holy ſacrifice of Chriſt. And thus you have out of the teſtimonies of holy ſcripture, and of the ancient doctors of the church, the true and ſincere uſe of the Lord's holy ſupper, and the fruit of the true ſacrifice of Chriſt. Which whoſoever through captious or wreſted interpretations, or by men's traditions, ſhall go about, otherwiſe than Chriſt ordained them, to alter or tranſubſtantiate, he ſhall anſwer to Chriſt in the latter day, when he ſhall underſtand (but then too late) that he hath no participation with the body and blood of Chriſt, but that out of the ſupper of eternal life he hath eaten and drunken eternal damnation to himſelf.

Weſt. Becauſe we will not conſume and ſpend the time in waſte, this your writing, which you exhibit, hereafter ſhall be read in this place. In the mean ſeaſon let us now fall to the arguments.

Ched. The ſcriptures in many places do affirm, that Chriſt gave his natural body, Matt. 26. Mark 14. Luke 22.

Ergo, I do conclude that the natural body is in the ſacrament.

Cran. To your argument I anſwer: If you underſtand by the body natural [Organicum] that is, having ſuch proportion and members as he had living here, then I anſwer negatively.

Furthermore, concerning the evangeliſts, thus I ſay and grant, that Chriſt took bread, and called it his body.

Ched. The text of the ſcripture maketh againſt you, for the circumſtance thereto annexed doth teach us, not only there to be the body, but alſo teacheth us what manner of body it is, and ſaith, The ſame body which ſhall be given.

That thing is here contained, that is given for us.
But the ſubſtance of bread is not given for us.
Ergo, ſubſtance of bread is not here contained.

Cran.

Cran. I underſtand not yet what you mean by this word [Contained]: If ye mean Really, then I deny your Major.

Ched. The Major is the text of ſcripture. He that denieth the Major, denieth the ſcripture. For the ſcripture ſaith, This is my body which is given for you.

Cran. I grant he ſaid it was his body which ſhould be given, but he ſaid it was not his body which is here contained; but the body (ſaith he) that ſhall be given for you. As though he ſhould ſay, This bread is the breaking of my body, and this cup is the ſhedding of my blood. What will ye ſay then? Is the bread the breaking of his body, and the cup the ſhedding of his blood really? If you ſay ſo, I deny it.

Ched. If you aſk what is the thing therein contained; becauſe his apoſtles ſhould not doubt what body it was that ſhould be given, he ſaith, This is my body which ſhall be given for you, and my blood which ſhall be ſhed for many. Ergo, Here is the ſame ſubſtance of the body, which the day after was given, and the ſame blood which was ſhed. And here I urge the ſcripture, which teacheth that it was no phantaſtical, no feigned, no ſpiritual body, nor body in faith, but the ſubſtance of the body.

Cran. You muſt prove that it is contained, but Chriſt ſaid not which is contained. He gave bread, and called that his body. I ſtick not in the words of the ſcripture, but in your word, which is feigned and imagined of yourſelf.

Ched. When Chriſt took bread and brake it, what gave he?

Cran. He gave bread. The bread ſacramentally, and his body ſpiritually, and the bread there he called his body.

Ched. This anſwer is againſt the ſcripture, which ſaith, that he gave his body.

Cran. It did ſignify that which he did eat.

Ched. They did not eat the body as the Capernaites did underſtand it, but the ſelf ſame body which was given for the ſins of the world. Ergo, It was his body which ſhould be given, and his blood which ſhould be ſhed.

In ſome other copies I find this argument to be made by Chedſey.

The ſame body is in the ſacrament, which was given for us on the croſs.

But bread was not given on the croſs for us:

Ergo, Bread is not given in the ſacrament.

Cran. I deny the Major, which is, that the ſame natural body is given in the ſacrament, which was given on the croſs, except you underſtand it ſpiritually. And after he denied alſo the argument as utterly naught, as he might well do, the Major in the ſecond figure being not univerſal.

When Mr. Chedſey had put forth his argument, and proſecuted the ſame, and Dr. Cranmer anſwered as before is ſhewed, Dr. Oglethorpe, one of thoſe doctors which the prolocutor called Cenſores (belike to be arbiters to order the diſputations) ſaid on this wiſe.

Oglethorpe. You come in ſtill with one evaſion or ſtarting hole to flee to. He urgeth the ſcriptures, ſaying that Chriſt gave his very body. You ſay, that he gave his body in bread. Quomodo prædicatur corpus? Qualis eſt corpus? Qualis eſt prædicatio? Panis eſt corpus.

Cran. You ſhould ſay, Quale corpus. I anſwer to the queſtion: It is the ſame body which was born of the virgin, was crucified, aſcended; but tropically, and by a figure. And ſo I ſay, Panis eſt corpus, is a figurative ſpeech, ſpeaking ſacramentally, for it is a ſacrament of his body.

Ogle. This word [body, being Prædicatum] doth ſignify ſubſtance.

But Subſtantia is not predicated denominatively.

Ergo, It is an eſſential predication, and ſo it is his true body, and not the figure of his body.

Cran. Subſtantia may be predicated denominatively in an allegory, or in a metaphor, or in a figurative locution.

Ogle. It is not a likely thing that Chriſt hath leſs care for his ſpouſe the church, than a wiſe houſholder hath for his family in making his will or teſtament.

Cran. Your reaſon is drawn out of the affairs of men, and not taken out of the holy ſcriptures.

Ogle. But no houſholder maketh his teſtament after that ſort.

Cran. Yes, there are many that ſo do. For what matter is it, ſo it be underſtood and perceived? I ſay Chriſt did uſe figurative ſpeech in no place more than in his ſacraments, and ſpecially in this of his ſupper.

Ogle. No man of purpoſe doth uſe tropes in his teſtament, for if he do, he deceiveth them that he comprehendeth in his teſtament: therefore Chriſt uſeth none here.

Cran. Yes he may uſe them well enough. You know not what tropes are.

Ogle. The good man of the houſe hath reſpect that his heirs, after his departure, may live in quiet and without brabling.

But they cannot be in quiet if he do uſe tropes.

Therefore (I ſay) he uſeth no tropes.

Cran. I deny your Minor.

Weſt. Auguſtine, in his book intitled, De Unitate Eccleſiæ, Chap. 10. hath theſe words following:

"What a thing is this I pray you, when the laſt words "of one lying upon his death-bed are heard which is "ready to go to his grave, no man ſaith that he hath "made a lye, and he is not accounted his heir which re"gardeth not thoſe words. How ſhall we then eſcape "God's wrath, if either not believing, or not regarding, "we ſhall reject the laſt words both of the only Son of "God, and alſo of our Lord and Saviour, both aſcending "into heaven, and beholding from thence, who deſpiſeth, "who obſerveth them not, and ſo ſhall come from thence "to judge all men?"

The argument is thus formed:

Whoſoever ſaith that the teſtator lyeth, is a wicked heir.

But whoſoever ſaith that Chriſt ſpake by figures, ſaith that he did lye.

Ergo, Whoſoever ſaith that Chriſt here ſpake by figures, is a wicked heir.

Cran. I deny the Minor. As who ſay it is neceſſary, that he which uſeth to ſpeak by tropes and figures ſhould lye in ſo doing.

Ogle. Your judgment is diſagreeing with all churches.

Cran. Nay, I diſagree with the Papiſtical church.

Ogle. This you do through the ignorance of logic.

Cran. Nay, this you ſay through the ignorance of the doctors.

Weſton. I will go plainly to work by ſcriptures. What took he?

Cran. Bread.

Weſt. What gave he?

Cran. Bread.

Weſt. What brake he?

Cran. Bread.

Weſt. What did he eat?

Cran. Bread.

Weſt. He gave bread, therefore he gave not his body.

He gave not his body, therefore it is not his body verily, and in deed and in truth.

Cran. I deny the argument.

Cole. This argument holdeth, à diſparatis: It is bread. Ergo, It is not the body; and it is ſuch an argument or reaſon, as cannot be diſſolved.

Cran. The like argument may be made. He is a rock: Ergo, He is not Chriſt.

Cole. It is not alike.

Weſt. He gave not his body in deed: Ergo, It was not his body in deed.

Cran. He gave his death, his paſſion, and the ſacrament of his paſſion. And in very deed, ſetting the figure aſide, formally it is not his body.

Weſt. Why, then the ſcripture is falſe.

Cran. Nay, the ſcripture is moſt true.

Weſt. This ſaith Chryſoſtom, Homil. 61. ad pop. Antioch, "Needful it is, dear friends, to tell you what "the miracle of the myſteries is, and wherefore it is "given, and what profit there is of the thing. We are "one body, and members of his fleſh and of his bones. "We that be in the myſtery, let us follow the thing "which was ſpoken. Wherefore that we may become "this thing, not only by love, but alſo that we may "become one with that fleſh in deed, that is brought to "paſs by this food, which he gave unto us, minding to "ſhew his great good will, that he hath towards us: and "therefore he mixed himſelf with us, and united his own "body with us, that we ſhould be made all as one thing "together, as a body joined and annexed to the head, "for this is a token of moſt ardent and perfect love. "And the ſame thing Job alſo inſinuating, ſaid of his "ſervants, of whom he was deſired above meaſure, inſo- "much that they, ſhewing their great deſire toward "him, ſaid, Who ſhall give unto us to be filled with his "fleſh? Therefore alſo Chriſt did the ſame, who, to in- "duce us into a great love toward him, and to declare "his deſire towards us, did not only give himſelf to be "ſeen of them that would, but alſo to be handled and "eaten, and ſuffered us to faſten our teeth in his fleſh, "and to be united together, and ſo to fill all our deſire. "Like lions therefore, as breathing fire, let us go from "that table, being made terrible to the devil, remem- "bering our head in our mind, and his charity which "he ſhewed unto us. For parents many times give their "children to other to be fed, but I do not ſo, ſaith he, "but feed you with mine own fleſh, and ſet myſelf before "you, deſiring to make you all jolly people, and pretend- "ing to you great hope and expectation to look for "things to come, who here give myſelf to you, but much "more in the world to come. I am become your bro- "ther, I took fleſh and blood for you. Again, my fleſh "and blood, by the which I am made your kinſman, I "deliver unto you."

Thus much out of Chryſoſtom; out of which words I make this argument.

The ſame fleſh whereby Chriſt is made our brother and kinſman, is given of Chriſt to us to be eaten.

Chriſt is made our brother and kinſman, by his true, natural, and organical fleſh.

Ergo, His true, natural, and organical fleſh, is given to us to be eaten.

Cran. I grant the conſequence and the conſequent.

Weſt. Therefore we eat it with our mouth.

Cran. I deny it. We eat it through faith.

Weſt. He gave us the ſame fleſh to eat, whereby he became our brother and kinſman.

But he became our brother and kinſman by his true, natural, and organical fleſh.

Therefore he gave his true, natural, and organical fleſh to be eaten.

Cran. I grant he took and gave the ſame true, natural, and organical fleſh wherein he ſuffered, and yet he feedeth us ſpiritually, and that fleſh is received ſpiritually.

Weſt. He gave us the ſame fleſh which he took of the virgin.

But he took not the true fleſh of the virgin ſpiritually, or in a figure.

Ergo, He gave his true natural fleſh, not ſpiritually.

Cran. Chriſt gave to us his own natural fleſh, the ſame wherein he ſuffered, but feedeth us ſpiritually.

Weſt. Chryſoſtom is againſt you, who ſaith: "Let "it come into thy remembrance with what honour thou "art honoured, and what table thou ſitteſt at: for with "the ſame thing we are nouriſhed, which the angels do "behold and tremble at: neither are they able to behold "it without great fear, for the brightneſs which cometh "thereof; and we be brought and compact into one "heap or maſs with him, being together one body of "Chriſt, and one fleſh with him. Who ſhall ſpeak the "powers of the Lord, and ſhall declare forth all his "praiſes? What paſtor hath ever nouriſhed his ſheep "with his own members? Many mothers have put forth "their infants after their birth to other nurſes: which he "would not do, but feedeth us with his own body, and "conjoineth and uniteth us to himſelf."

Whereupon I gather this argument:

Like as mothers nurſe their children with milk, ſo Chriſt nouriſheth us with his body.

But mothers do not nouriſh their infants ſpiritually with their milk:

Therefore, Chriſt doth not nouriſh thoſe that be his ſpiritually with his blood.

Cran. He gave us the wine for his blood.

Weſt. If he gave the wine for his blood, as you ſay, then he gave leſs than mothers do give.

But Chryſoſtom affirmeth, that he gave more than mothers give.

Therefore he gave not the wine for his blood.

Cran. You pervert mine anſwer. He gave wine, yet the blood is conſidered therein. As for example: When he giveth baptiſm, we conſider not the water, but the Holy Ghoſt, and remiſſion of ſins. We receive with the mouth the ſacrament; but the thing and the matter of the ſacrament we receive by faith.

Weſt. When Chriſt ſaid, Eat ye, whether he meant by the mouth or by faith?

Cran. He meant that we ſhould receive the body by faith, the bread by the mouth.

Weſt. Nay, the body by the mouth.

Cran. That I deny.

Weſt. I prove it out of Chryſoſtom, writing upon the 50th Pſalm.

"She that is a mother, ſhameth ſometime to play the "nurſe. But Chriſt our nurſe doth not ſo play with us. "Therefore inſtead of meat he feedeth us with his own "fleſh, and inſtead of drink he feedeth us with his own "blood." Likewiſe upon the 26th chapter of Matthew, the 83 Homily, he ſaith: "For it ſhall not be enough "for him to become man, and in the mean while to be "whipped; but he doth bring us into one maſs or lump "with himſelf (as I may ſo call it) and maketh us his "body, not by faith alone, but alſo in very deed."

Cran. I grant, we make one nature with Chriſt. But that to be done with mouth I deny.

Weſt. Chryſoſtom, 2 Cor. chap. 13. Hom. 29. hath theſe words, "No little honour is given to our mouth, "receiving the body of the Lord."

Cran. This I ſay, that Chriſt entereth into us both by our ears, and by our eyes. With our mouth we receive the body of Chriſt, and tear it with our teeth, that is to ſay, the ſacrament of the body of Chriſt. Wherefore I ſay and affirm, that the virtue of the ſacrament is much: and therefore Chryſoſtom many times ſpeaketh of ſacraments no otherwiſe, than of Chriſt himſelf, as I could prove if I might have liberty to ſpeak, by many places of Chryſoſtom, where he ſpeaketh of the ſacrament of the body of Chriſt.

With which word of the ſacrament of the body, &c. Dr. Cole being highly offended, denied it to be the ſacrament of the body of Chriſt, ſave only of the myſtical body which is the church.

Cran. And why ſhould we doubt to call it the ſacrament of the body of Chriſt, offered upon the croſs, ſeeing both Chriſt and the ancient fathers do ſo call it?

Cole. How gather you that of Chryſoſtom?

Cran. Chryſoſtom declareth himſelf, "O miracle, O "the good will of God towards us, which ſitteth above

"at

Thus you hear Chriſt is ſeen here in earth every day, is touched, is torn with the teeth, that our tongue is red with his blood; which no man having any judgment will ſay or think to be ſpoken without trope or figure.

Weſt. What miracle is it if it be not his body, and if he ſpake only of the ſacrament, as though it were his body?

But hearken what Chryſoſtom ſaith, " I ſhew forth " that thing on the earth unto thee, which is worthy the " greateſt honour. For like as in the palace of kings, " neither the walls, nor the ſumptuous bed, but the body " of kings ſitting under the cloth of eſtate, and royal ſeat " of majeſty, is of all things elſe the moſt excellent: ſo " is in like manner the king's body in heaven, which is " now ſet before us on earth. I ſhew thee neither angels " nor archangels, nor the heaven of heavens, but the " very lord and maſter of all theſe things. Thou per- " ceiveſt after what ſort thou doeſt not only behold, but " toucheſt, and not only toucheſt, but eateſt that which " on the earth is the greateſt and chiefeſt thing of all " other, and when thou haſt received the ſame, thou " goeſt home; wherefore cleanſe thy ſoul from all un- " cleanneſs."

Upon this I conclude, that the body of Chriſt is ſhewed us upon the earth.

Cran. What? upon the earth? no man ſeeth Chriſt upon the earth: He is ſeen with the eyes of our mind, with faith and ſpirit.

Weſt. I pray you, what is it that ſeemeth worthy higheſt honour on the earth? Is it the ſacrament, or elſe the body of Chriſt?

Cran. Chryſoſtom ſpeaketh of the ſacrament, and the body of Chriſt is ſhewed forth in the ſacrament.

Weſt. Ergo, Then the ſacrament is worthy greateſt honour.

Cran. I deny the argument.

Weſt. That thing is ſhewed forth, and is now in the earth [oſtenditur] & [eſt] which is worthy higheſt honour.

But only the body of Chriſt is worthy higheſt honour.

Ergo, The body of Chriſt is now on the earth.

Cran. I anſwer, the body of Chriſt to be on the earth, but ſo as in the ſacrament, as the holy Ghoſt is in the water of baptiſm.

Weſt. Chryſoſtom ſaith, [oſtendo] I ſhew forth, which noteth a ſubſtance to be preſent.

Cran. That is to be underſtood ſacramentally.

Weſt. He ſaith [oſtendo in terra] I ſhew forth on earth, declaring alſo the place where.

Cran. That is to be underſtood figuratively.

Weſt. He is ſhewed forth, and is now on the earth, &c. as before.

Cran. Your Major and concluſion are all one.

Weſt. But the Major is true: Ergo, the concluſion alſo is true.

That thing is on the earth, which is worthy of moſt high honour.

But no figure is worthy of higheſt honour.

Ergo, That which is on the earth is no figure.

Cran. I anſwer, that is true ſacramentally.

Here Weſton crieth to him, that he ſhould anſwer to one part, bidding him repeat his words. Which when he went about to do, ſuch was the noiſe and crying out in the ſchool, that his mild voice could not be heard. For when he went about to declare to the people how the prolocutor did not well engliſh the words of Chryſoſtom, uſing for [oſtenditur in terra,] He is ſhewed forth on the earth, [eſt in terra,] He is on the earth, whereas Chryſoſtom hath not [Eſt] nor any ſuch word of being on the earth, but only of ſhewing, as the grace of the Holy Ghoſt, [in baptiſmo oſtenditur,] Is ſhewed forth in baptiſm: and oftentimes he did inculcate this word [oſtenditur.] Then the prolocutor ſtretching forth his hand, ſet on the rude people to cry out at him, filling all the ſchool with hiſſing, clapping of hands, and noiſe, calling him unlearned, unſkilful, impudent. Which impudent and reproachful words this reverend man moſt patiently and meekly did abide, as one that had been inured with the ſuffering of ſuch like reproaches. And when the prolocutor, not yet ſatisfied with rude and unſeemly demeanour, did urge and call upon him to anſwer the argument; then he bad the notary repeat his words again.

Notary. That which is worthy moſt high honour, here I ſhew forth to thee on earth.

The body of Chriſt is worthy higheſt honour.

Ergo, He ſhewed forth the body of Chriſt here in earth.

Cran. That is ſhewed forth here on the earth which may be ſeen, which may be touched, and which may be eaten, but theſe things be not true of the body.

Cole. Why ſhould not theſe things be true of the body of Chriſt?

Cran. The Major out of Chryſoſtom is true, meaning of the ſacraments. For in the ſacrament, the true body of Chriſt, and not the figurative body, is ſet forth.

Weſt. Shew me ſomewhat in earth worthy greateſt honour.

Cran. I cannot, but in the ſacrament only.

Weſt. Ergo, The ſacrament is worthy greateſt honour.

Cran. So it is.

Judges. Let it be written.

Cran. I pray you let my anſwer be written likewiſe: I affirm, that the body of Chriſt is ſhewed forth unto us. It is our faith that ſeeth Chriſt.

Weſt. Oſtendo tibi, I ſhew it to thee, ſaith Chryſoſtom, not to thy faith.

Cran. He ſpeaketh ſacramentally.

Weſt. Ergo, Chryſoſtom lyeth. For he, ſpeaking of ſhewing, ſaith: Ego Chryſoſtomus oſtendo: I Chryſoſtom do ſhew. But he can ſhew nothing ſacramentally.

Ched. By force of argument we are brought to this point, That the body of Chriſt is proved to be on earth, not only ſacramentally, but in very deed alſo, by this reaſon, that it is worthy higheſt honour. The reaſon is indiſſoluble.

Cran. I never heard a more vain argument, and it is moſt vain; alſo it hath mine anſwer unto it.

Ched. Will you affirm, that it is abſurd which Chryſoſtom ſaith, that the body of Chriſt is touched?

I touch the body of Chriſt in the ſacrament, as Thomas touched Chriſt.

Thomas touched Chriſt, and ſaid, Dominus meus, Deus meus: My Lord, My God.

Ergo, That which he touched was the Lord, the God.

This argument, as I received it out of the notary's book, is not formal; but rather he ſhould conclude in the third figure thus:

As Thomas touched the body of Chriſt, ſo we touch it in the ſacrament.

Thomas touched the body of Chriſt corporally.

Ergo, We touch the body of Chriſt corporally in the ſacrament.

Cran. I deny your argument. He touched not God, but him which was God. Neither is it ſound doctrine to affirm, that God is touched.

Ched. This is becauſe of the union; ſo that God is ſaid to be touched, when Chriſt, which is both God and man, is touched.

Tertullian ſaith, " Let us conſider as concerning the " proper form of the chriſtian man, what great preroga- " tive this vain and foul ſubſtance of ours hath with God. " Although it were ſufficient to it, that no ſoul could " ever get ſalvation, unleſs it believe while it is in the " fleſh:

" fleſh: ſo much the fleſh availeth to ſalvation; by the " which fleſh it cometh, that whereas the ſoul ſo is linked " unto God, it is the ſaid fleſh that cauſeth the ſoul to be " linked: Yet the fleſh moreover is waſhed, that the ſoul " may be cleanſed; the fleſh is anointed that the ſoul " may be conſecrated; the fleſh is ſigned, that the ſoul " may be defended; the fleſh is ſhadowed by the impo- " ſition of hands, that the ſoul may be illuminated with " the Spirit; the fleſh doth eat the body and blood of " Chriſt, that the ſoul may be fed of God." Whereupon I gather this argument.

The fleſh eateth the body of Chriſt.

Ergo, The body of Chriſt is eaten with the mouth.

Item. Phoceus 1 ad Cor. cap. 11. Whereas he ſaith, " Is guilty of the body and blood," this he declareth, " that like as Judas betrayed him, and the Jews were " fierce and ſpiteful againſt him; ſo do they diſhonour " him, which receive his holy body with their impure " hands, and as the Jews did hold him then, do now " receive him with impure mouths. And whereas he " often maketh mention of the body and blood of the " Lord, he declareth, that it is not ſimply man, that is " ſacrificed, but even the Lord himſelf, being the maker " of all things, hereby (as it were) making them afraid."

Ergo, (as it is hereby gathered) the body of Chriſt is touched with the hands.

Cran. You vouch two authors againſt me upon ſundry things. Firſt, I muſt anſwer Tertullian, and then the other.

Ched. They tend both to one meaning.

Cran. Unto Tertullian I anſwer (becauſe our diſputation is wandering and uncertain) that he calleth that the fleſh which is the ſacrament. For although God work all things in us inviſibly beyond men's reach, yet they are ſo manifeſt, that they may be ſeen, and perceived of every ſenſe. Therefore he ſetteth forth baptiſm, unction, and laſt of all the ſupper of the Lord unto us, which he gave to ſignify his operation in us. The fleſh liveth by the bread, but the ſoul is inwardly fed by Chriſt.

Weſt. Stick to thoſe words of Tertullian, The body eateth, that the ſoul may be fed.

Ched. The fleſh eateth the body of Chriſt, that the ſoul may be fed therewith.

Weſt. Here you ſee two kinds of food, of the ſoul and of the body.

Ched. He ſaith, that not only the ſoul, but the fleſh is alſo fed.

Cran. The ſoul is fed with the body of Chriſt, the body with the ſacrament.

Ched. Is the ſoul fed with the body of Chriſt, and not with the ſacrament?

Cran. Read that which followeth, and you ſhall perceive that by things external, an operation internal is underſtood. Inwardly we eat Chriſt's body, and outwardly we eat the ſacrament. So one thing is done outwardly, another inwardly. Like as in baptiſm the external element whereby the body is waſhed, is one; the internal thing, whereby the ſoul is cleanſed, is another.

Ched. The ſoul is fed by that which the body eateth.

But the ſoul is fed by the fleſh of Chriſt.

Ergo, The body eateth the fleſh of Chriſt.

Cran. We eat not one thing outwardly and inwardly. Inwardly we eat Chriſt's body: Outwardly we eat the ſacrament.

Ched. I will repeat the argument.

The fleſh eateth Chriſt's body, that the ſoul may be fed therewith.

The ſoul is not fed with the ſacrament, but with Chriſt's body.

Ergo, The fleſh eateth the body of Chriſt.

Cran. The ſacrament is one thing, the matter of the ſacrament is another. Outwardly we receive the ſacrament; inwardly we eat the body of Chriſt.

Ched. I prove, that we receive that outwardly wherewith the ſoul is fed.

The ſoul is fed with the body of Chriſt.

Ergo, We eat the body of Chriſt outwardly.

The fleſh eateth Chriſt his body.

Ergo, the ſoul is fed therewith.

Cran. The fleſh (I ſay) eateth the ſacrament: it eateth not Chriſt's body. For Tertullian ſpeaketh of the ſacrament; and the place hath not [inde] thereof, but [de Deo] of God.

Ched. What ſay you to Phoceus ſaying; " They " which receive the body with impure hands, are guilty " of the Lord's blood, as Judas was?"

Weſt. That which followeth in Tertullian doth take away your ſhift, whereas he ſaith: " They cannot be " ſeparated in reward, whom one work joineth together."

But Manducation, i. e. the work, or labour; Ergo, &c.

The form of this argument may be thus collected.

One work or labour joineth body and ſoul together.

Manducation is a work or labour.

Ergo, One Manducation joineth together both body and ſoul.

To the Major of which argument, thus it may be anſwered, expounding the ſaying of Tertullian, Una opera conjungit, ſed non idem operandi modus. Again, Opera, here in Tertullian, may be taken for temptations and afflictions.

Cran. Your authority (I ſuppoſe) is taken out of the book, De Reſurrectione Carnis: Of the Reſurrection of the fleſh: And the meaning thereof is this: Tertullian goeth about there to prove, that the fleſh ſhall riſe again, becauſe it is joined together in one work with the ſoul. Through baptiſm in this world the body is waſhed, and the ſoul is waſhed: the body outwardly, the ſoul inwardly, the work is one. In this work they are joined. And he ſpeaketh of ſigns.

Weſt. He ſpeaketh of eating in a ſign.

Ergo, The reward is in a ſign.

Cran. They are coupled in one work, namely, in the ſacrament.

Weſt. There are two works

Ergo, There are two rewards.

If the work be in a figure.

Ergo, The reward is in a figure.

Cran. He ſpeaketh not of two works. Two works are but one work. And yet he ſaith not [Quos una opera conjungit,] Whom one work joineth together, but [Opera] A work: as in baptiſm the ſoul and body are joined in underſtanding.

Weſt. The fleſh and ſoul ſhall have one and the ſelf-ſame reward, becauſe they have one work.

Cran. Becauſe they be joined together in one work.

Treſh. Foraſmuch as the reverend doctors here have impugned and overthrown your aſſertion and your anſwers ſufficiently; I will fall to another matter, not altogether impertinent to the purpoſe, and that in few words, againſt a certain ſequel of your opinion. The ſequel is this: That between us and Chriſt there is no further conjunction, whilſt we receive the Euchariſt, than a conjunction of the mind, or a ſpiritual conjunction, whereby we are united and knit unto Chriſt through faith and love. As for the preſence of Chriſt concerning the ſubſtance, that you utterly deny. Whereupon in very deed you leave but a ſpiritual union and joining together of mind. Howbeit you would ſeem to think otherwiſe by your ſubtle anſwers. But I will declare by manifeſt teſtimonies of the fathers, that this your ſequel, which you account ſo ſure, is far wide from the truth. And I will begin with St. Hilary, who is both an ancient and learned author. For diſputing againſt the Arians, Octavo de Trinitate, he ſaith, that this was their opinion: That the Father and the Son are joined only through unity of will. Whereupon Arius himſelf, when ſcripture was alledged againſt him, did (as you do now) elude the right meaning of it by his falſe interpretations. But the catholic church hath always believed and ever maintained,

That

That Chriſt is one with the Father in nature, and not by conſent of will only. The proof whereof, when the catholics vouched this teſtimony of John, Pater & Ego unum ſumus, The Father and I are one: the Arians anſwered, that [unum ſumus] was to be underſtood by the aſſent of their wills, and agreement of their minds, not by unity of their natures. Thus it happeneth now-a-days, where men do doubt of the ſacrament. But Hilary going on, and proving the natural conjunction between the Father and the Son [à fortiori,] queſtioneth with his adverſaries after this manner: "I demand of "them now which will needs have the unity of will only "between the Father and the Son, whether Chriſt be "now in us truly by nature, or only by the agreement "of wills. If (ſaith he) the Word be incarnate in very "deed, and we receive at the Lord's table the Word "made fleſh, how then is he to be thought not to dwell "in us naturally, who being born man, hath both ta-"ken the nature of our fleſh upon him that is now in-"ſeparable, and hath alſo mingled that nature of his "own fleſh, unto the nature of eternity under the ſacra-"ment of his fleſh, to be communicated unto us?" Thus much hath Hilary. Whereupon I aſk of you this queſtion, How Chriſt dwelleth now in us? according to faith, or according to nature?

Cran. I ſay that Chriſt dwelleth verily in us carnally and naturally, for that he hath taken of the virgin our fleſh upon him, and becauſe he hath communicated his nature unto us.

Treſh. Bucer contra Abrincenſem, referreth theſe words only to the Euchariſt, ſaying, "Chriſt doth exhibit all "this unto us in his holy ſupper, and according to the "holy fathers (ſaith he) Chriſt liveth thereby in us, not "only by faith and love, as abſent, but naturally, cor-"porally, and carnally. Wherefore he is not abſent, "neither are we joined to Chriſt only by a ſpiritual union "(as you ſuppoſe) but alſo by a corporal and carnal "union."

Cran. I know that Mr. Bucer was a learned man. But your faith is in good caſe which leaneth upon Bucer.

Treſh. I do not bring Bucer as a patron of our faith, but becauſe he is a man of your ſort, and yet bringeth this place of Hilary for that union which we have by the ſacrament, and confeſſeth, that by it we are carnally united to Chriſt, whereas you think we are joined by it only through faith and love.

Cran. I ſay that Chriſt was communicated unto us, not only by faith, but in very deed alſo when he was born of the virgin. We have fellowſhip with Chriſt, when we are united in the unity of the church, when we are made fleſh of his fleſh, and bones of his bones, and ſo we are united in the communion, in baptiſm, and in faith.

Treſh. I pray you what fellowſhip have we with Chriſt, in that he is made man? Are not the Turks and Jews therein joined with him? For they are men as we are, and are joined with him in man's nature, in that he was born of a woman. I ſpeak now of a more near unity. We are made one with Chriſt by the communion in a perfect unity.

Cran. We are made ſo, I grant: but we are made ſo alſo by baptiſm; and the unity in baptiſm is perfect.

Treſh. We are not made one by baptiſm in a perfect unity, as Hilary there ſpeaketh, but by the communion, by which we are carnally made one, but not likewiſe by baptiſm: wherefore you underſtand not Hilary. You ſhall hear his words, which are theſe: "He had now "declared afore the ſacrament of his perfect union, ſay-"ing, As the living Father ſent me, ſo do I alſo live "by the Father. And he that eateth my fleſh, ſhall alſo "live through me," And a little after that he writeth thus: "This truly is the cauſe of our life, that we have "Chriſt dwelling by his fleſh in us that are fleſhly, which "alſo by him ſhall live in ſuch ſort as he liveth by his "Father." Wherefore of theſe words it is manifeſt, that we obtain this perfect unity by means of the ſacrament, and that Chriſt by it is carnally united unto us.

Cran. Nay, Hilary in that ſame place doth teach, that it is done by baptiſm: and that doctrine is not to be ſuffered in the church, which teacheth, that we are not joined to Chriſt by baptiſm.

Weſt. Repeat the argument.

Cran. You muſt firſt make an argument.

Treſh. It is made already, but it ſhall be made again in this form:

As Chriſt liveth by his Father, ſo they that eat Chriſt's fleſh live by the ſame fleſh.

But Chriſt liveth by the Father, not only by faith and love, but naturally.

Ergo, We live not through the eating of Chriſt's fleſh, by faith and love only, but naturally.

Cran. We live by Chriſt, not only by faith and love, but eternally indeed.

Treſh. Nay, naturally; I prove it thus:

As Chriſt liveth by the Father, ſo live we by his fleſh eaten of us.

But Chriſt liveth not by his Father, only by faith and love, but naturally.

Therefore we do not live by eating of Chriſt's fleſh only by faith and love (as you ſuppoſe) but naturally.

Cran. The minor is not true.

Treſh. This is the opinion of Arius, That Chriſt is united to his Father by conjunction of mind, and not naturally.

Cran, I ſay not ſo yet, neither do I think ſo. But I will tell you what I like not in your minor. You ſay, That Chriſt doth not live by his Father only by faith and love; but I ſay, That Chriſt liveth not at all by his faith.

Weſt. Mark and conſider well this word (by Faith) leſt any occaſion of cavilling be given.

Treſh. Let that word (by Faith) be omitted. Neither did I mean, that Chriſt liveth by his Father through faith. Yet the ſtrength of the argument remaineth in force; for elſe Hilary doth not confute the Arians, except there be a greater conjunction between us and Chriſt, when he is eaten of us, than only a ſpiritual conjunction. You do only grant an union. As for a carnal or natural union of the ſubſtance of the fleſh, by which we are joined more than ſpiritually, you do not grant. But our Lord Jeſus give you a better mind, and ſhew you the light of his truth, that you may return into the way of righteouſneſs.

Weſt. We came hither to diſpute, and not to pray.

Treſh. Is it not lawful to pray for them that err?

Weſt. It is not lawful yet. But proceed.

Treſh. Again, I reaſon thus; As Chriſt liveth by his Father, after the ſame manner do we live by the eating of his fleſh.

But Chriſt liveth not by his Father, only in unity of will, but naturally.

Ergo, We do not live when we eat the fleſh of Chriſt, only by faith and unity of will, but naturally.

Cran. This is my faith, and it agreeth with the ſcripture, Chriſt liveth by his Father naturally, and maketh us to live by himſelf indeed naturally, and that not only in the ſacrament of the euchariſt, but alſo in baptiſm, For infants, when they are baptized, do eat the fleſh of Chriſt.

Weſt. Anſwer either to the whole argument, or to the parts thereof. For this argument is ſtrong, and cannot be diſſolved.

Cran. This is the argument.

As Chriſt liveth by his Father, after the ſame manner do we live by his fleſh, being eaten of us.

But Chriſt liveth not by his Father only in unity of will, but naturally.

Ergo,

Ergo, We eating his fleſh do not live only by faith and love, but naturally.

But the major is falſe; namely, That by the ſame manner we live by Chriſt, as he liveth by his Father.

Weſt. Hilary ſaith, After the ſame manner, upon theſe words, He that eateth my fleſh ſhall live by me. Ergo, Chriſt liveth by his Father, after the ſame manner we ſhall live by his fleſh. Here you ſee, that Hilary ſaith, After the ſame manner.

Cran. After the ſame manner, doth not ſignify alike in all things, but in deed and eternally: for ſo do we live by Chriſt, and Chriſt liveth by his Father. For in other reſpects Chriſt liveth otherwiſe by his Father, than we live by Chriſt.

Weſt. He liveth by his Father naturally and eternally.

Ergo, We live by Chriſt naturally and eternally.

Cran. We do not live naturally, but by grace, if you take naturally for the manner of nature; as Chriſt hath eternal life of his Father, ſo have we of him.

Weſt. I ſtick to this word, Naturally.

Cran. I mean it touching the truth of nature. For Chriſt liveth otherwiſe by his Father, than we live by Chriſt.

Weſt. Hilary, in his eighth book De Trinitate, denieth it, when he ſaith, He liveth therefore by his Father; and as he liveth by his Father, after the ſame manner we ſhall live by his fleſh.

Cran. We ſhall live after the ſame manner, as concerning the nature of the fleſh of Chriſt: For as he hath of his Father the nature of eternity, ſo ſhall we have of him.

Weſt. Anſwer unto the parts of the argument.

As Chriſt liveth by his Father, after the ſame manner ſhall we live by his fleſh.

But Chriſt doth not live by his Father only in unity of will, but naturally.

Ergo, We eating of his fleſh, do not live only by faith and love, but naturally.

Cran. I grant (as I ſaid) we live by Chriſt naturally: but I never heard that Chriſt liveth with his Father in unity of will only.

Weſt. Becauſe it ſeemeth a marvel unto you; hear what Hilary ſaith: "Theſe things are recited of us to "this end, becauſe the heretics, feigning an unity of "will only between the Father and the Son, did uſe "the example of our unity with God, as though we "being united to the Son, and by the Son to the Father "only by obedience and will of religion, had no pro-"priety of the natural communion by the ſacrament of "the body and blood."

But anſwer to the argument. Chriſt liveth by his Father naturally and eternally: therefore do we live by Chriſt naturally and eternally.

Cran. Cyril and Hilary do ſay, that Chriſt is united to us not only by will, but alſo by nature: he doth communicate to us his own nature, and ſo is Chriſt made one with us carnally and corporally, becauſe he took our nature of the virgin Mary. And Hilary doth not ſay only that Chriſt is naturally in us, but that we alſo are naturally in him, and in the Father; that is, that we are partakers of their nature, which is eternity, or everlaſtingneſs. For as the Word, receiving our nature, did join it in unity of perſon, and did communicate unto that our nature, the nature of his eternity; that like as he, being the everlaſting Word of the Father, had everlaſting life of the Father, even ſo he gave the ſame nature to his fleſh. Likewiſe alſo did he communicate with us the ſame nature of eternity, which he and the Father have, and that we ſhould be one with them, not only in will and love, but that we ſhould be alſo partakers of the nature of everlaſting life.

Weſt. Hilary, where he ſaith, Chriſt communicated to us his nature, meaneth that not by his nativity, but by the ſacrament.

Cran. He hath communicated to us his fleſh by his nativity.

Weſt. We have communicated to him our fleſh when he was born.

Cran. Nay, he communicated to us his fleſh, when he was born, and that I will ſhew you out of Cyril upon this place, Et homo factus eſt.

Weſt. Ergo, Chriſt being born, gave us his fleſh.

Cran. In his nativity he made us partakers of his fleſh.

Weſt. Right, Sirs.

Cran. Yea, right.

Ched. This place of Hilary is ſo dark, that you were compelled to falſify it in your book, becauſe you could not draw it to confirm your purpoſe.

"If Chriſt have taken verily the fleſh of our body, "and the man that was verily born of the virgin Mary "is Chriſt, and alſo we receive under the true myſtery "the fleſh of his body, by means whereof we ſhall be "one (for the Father is in Chriſt, and Chriſt in us) how "ſhall that be called the unity of will, when the natural "property, brought to paſs by the ſacrament, is the ſa-"crament of unity? We muſt not ſpeak in the ſenſe of "man, or of the world, in matters concerning God: "neither muſt we perverſely wreſt any ſtrange or wicked "ſenſe out of the wholeſome meaning of the holy ſcrip-"ture, thro' impudent and vile contention. Let us read "thoſe things that are written, and let us underſtand "thoſe things that we read, and then we ſhall perform "the duty of perfect faith. For as touching that natural "and true being of Chriſt in us, except we learn of him, "we ſpeak fooliſhly and ungodly that thing that we do "ſpeak. For he ſaith, My fleſh is meat indeed, and "my blood is drink indeed: He that eateth my fleſh, "and drinketh my blood, abideth in me, and I in him. "As touching the verity of his fleſh and blood, there is "left no place of doubt: for now, both by the teſti-"mony of the Lord, and alſo by our faith, it is verily "fleſh, and verily blood."

Here you have falſified Hilary, for you have ſet [vero ſub myſterio,] for [vere ſub myſterio,] we receive truly under a myſtery. Hilary thrice reporteth [vere ſub myſterio,] and you interpret it twice [vere ſub myſterio,] but the third time you have [vero] for [vere].

Cran. Aſſuredly, I am not guilty of any deceit herein. It may be that the copy which I followed had [ſub vero myſterio,] that is, under a true myſtery; although touching the ſenſe it differeth little. God I call to witneſs, I have always hated falſifying, and if you had leiſure and luſt to hear falſe citations, I could recite unto you ſix hundred.

Weſt. Here ſhall be ſhewed you two copies of Hilary, the one printed at Baſil, the other at Paris.

Cran. I ſuppoſe that Dr. Smith's book hath [vero.]

Weſt. Here is Dr. Smith; let him anſwer for himſelf.

Mr. Smith, Mr. Doctor, what ſay you for yourſelf? ſpeak, if you know it.

Here Dr. Smith, either for the truth in his book alledged, or elſe aſtoniſhed with Dr. Weſton's haſty calling, ſtaid to anſwer: for he only put off his cap, and kept ſilence.

Weſt. But your own book, printed by Wolf your own printer, hath [vero.]

Cran. That book is taken from me, which eaſily might have ended this controverſy. I am ſure, the book of decrees hath [vero.]

Cole. Now you admit the book of decrees, when it maketh for you.

Cran. Touching the ſenſe of the matter there is little difference. The change of one letter for another, is but a ſmall matter.

Weſt. No? Yes; Paſtor (as you know) ſignifieth a biſhop, and piſtor ſignifieth a baker. But Paſtor ſhall be Piſtor, a biſhop ſhall be a baker, by this your change of one letter, if Vere and Vero do nothing change the ſenſe.

Cran.

Cran. Let it be ſo, that in Piſtor and Paſtor one letter maketh ſome difference: Yet let Piſtor be either a maker or baker of bread, ye ſee here the change of a letter, and yet no great difference to be in the ſenſe.

Yong. This diſputation is taken in hand, that the truth might appear. I perceive that I muſt go another way to work than I had thought. It is a common ſaying, Againſt them that deny principles, we muſt not diſpute. Therefore that we may agree of the principles, I demand, Whether there be any other body of Chriſt than his inſtrumental body?

Cran. There is no natural body of Chriſt, but his organical body.

Yong. Again, I demand whether ſenſe and reaſon ought to give place to faith?

Cran. They ought.

Yong. Thirdly, Whether Chriſt be true in all his words?

Cran. Yea, he is moſt true, and truth itſelf.

Yong. Fourthly, Whether Chriſt at his ſupper minded to do that which he ſpake, or no?

Cran. In ſaying he ſpake, but in ſaying he made not, but made the ſacrament to his diſciples.

Yong. Anſwer according to the truth, Whether did Chriſt that as God and man which he ſpake, when he ſaid, This is my body?

Cran. This is a ſophiſtical cavillation; go plainly to work. There is ſome deceit in theſe queſtions. You ſeek ſubtilneſs, leave your crafty fetches.

Yong. I demand, Whether Chriſt by theſe words wrought any thing or no?

Cran. He did inſtitute the ſacrament.

Yong. But anſwer, whether he did work any thing?

Cran. He did work in inſtituting the ſacrament.

Yong. Now I have you; for before you ſaid, it was a figurative ſpeech.

But a figure worketh nothing.

Ergo, It is not a figurative ſpeech. A lyar ought to have a good memory.

Cran. I underſtood your ſophiſtry before. You by working underſtand converting into the body of Chriſt: but Chriſt wrought the ſacrament: not in converting, but in inſtituting.

Yong. Wo be to them that make Chriſt a deceiver. Did he work any other thing than he ſpake, or the ſelf-ſame thing?

Cran. He wrought the ſacrament, and by theſe words he ſignified the effect.

Yong. A figurative ſpeech is no working thing.

But the ſpeech of Chriſt is working.

Ergo, It is not figurative.

Cran. It worketh by inſtituting, not by converting.

Yong. The thing ſignified in the ſacrament, is it not that ſacrament?

Cran. It is. For the thing is miniſtered in a ſign. He followeth the letter that taketh the thing for a ſign. Auguſtine ſeparateth the ſacrament from the thing. The ſacrament (ſaith he) is one, and the thing of the ſacrament another.

Weſt. Stick to this argument.

It is a figurative ſpeech.

Ergo, It worketh nothing.

Yong. But the ſpeech of Chriſt is a working thing.

Ergo, It is not figurative.

Cran. Oh how many crafts are in this argument? they are [illegible] neer fallacies; I ſaid not, That the words of Chriſt do work, but Chriſt himſelf; and he worketh by a figurative ſpeech.

Weſt. If a figure work, it maketh of bread the body of Chriſt.

Cran. A figurative ſpeech worketh not.

Weſt. A figurative ſpeech, by your own confeſſion, worketh nothing.

But the ſpeech of Chriſt in the ſupper (as you grant) wrought ſomewhat.

Ergo, the ſpeech of Chriſt in the ſupper was not figurative.

Cran. I anſwer, Theſe are mere ſophiſms: The ſpeech doth not work, but Chriſt by the ſpeech doth work the ſacrament.

I look for ſcriptures at your hands, for they are the foundation of diſputations.

Yong. Are not theſe words of ſcripture, This is my body? The word of Chriſt is of ſtrength; and by the Lord's words the heavens were made. He ſaid, This is my body: Ergo, he made it.

Cran. He made the ſacrament, and I deny your argument.

Yong. If he wrought nothing, nothing is left there. He ſaid, This is my body. You ſay, contrary to the ſcriptures, it is not the body of Chriſt, and fall from the faith.

Cran. You interpret the ſcriptures contrary to all the old writers, and feign a ſtrange ſenſe.

" Yong. Ambroſe ſaith: " Thou haſt read of the " works of all the world; That he ſpake the word, and " they were made; he commanded, and they were created. Cannot the word of Chriſt, which made of nothing that which was not, change thoſe things that " are, into that they were not? For it is no leſs matter " to give new things, than to change natures. But what " uſe we arguments? let us uſe his own examples, and " let us confirm the variety of the myſtery by example " of his incarnation. Did the uſe of nature go before, " when the Lord Jeſus was born of Mary? If you ſeek " the order of nature, conception is wont to be made " by a woman joined to a man. It is manifeſt therefore, " that contrary to the order of nature, a virgin did conceive: and this body that we make, is of the virgin. " What ſeekeſt thou here the order of nature in the " body of Chriſt, when againſt the order of nature the " Lord Jeſus was conceived of a virgin? It was the true " fleſh of Chriſt which was crucified, and which was " buried; therefore it was truly the ſacrament of him. " The Lord Jeſus himſelf crieth, This is my body. " Before the bleſſing of the heavenly words, it is named " another kind: but after the conſecration the body of " Chriſt is ſignified. He calleth it his blood. Before " conſecration it is called another thing: after conſecration it is called blood; and thou ſayeſt, Amen; that " is, It is true. That the mouth ſpeaketh, let the inward mind confeſs: that the word ſoundeth, let the " heart perceive."

The ſame Ambroſe, in his fourth book of ſacraments, the fourth chapter, ſaith thus: " This bread is bread " before the words of the ſacraments; when the conſecration cometh to it, of bread it is made the fleſh of " Chriſt. Let us confirm this therefore; How can that " which is bread, by conſecration be the body of Chriſt? " By what words then is the conſecration made, and by " whoſe words? By the words of our Lord Jeſus. For " touching all other things that are ſaid, Praiſe is given " to God, prayer is made for the people, for kings, and " for the reſt: when it cometh that the reverend ſacrament muſt be made, then the prieſt uſeth not his own " words, but the words of Chriſt: Therefore the word " of Chriſt maketh this ſacrament. What word? That " word, by which all things were made: The Lord commanded, and heaven was made; the Lord commanded, " and the earth was made; the Lord commanded, and " the ſeas were made; the Lord commanded, and all " creatures were made. Doſt thou not ſee then how " ſtrong in working the word of Chriſt is? If therefore " ſo great ſtrength be in the Lord's word, that thoſe " things ſhould begin to be which were not before, how " much the rather it is of ſtrength to work, that theſe " things which were, ſhould be changed into another " thing?" Ambroſe ſaith, that the words are of ſtrength to work.

Weſton.

Weſton. You omit thoſe words which follow, which maketh the ſenſe of Ambroſe plain: Read them.

Yong. "Heaven was not, the ſea was not, the earth "was not, but hear him that ſaid; He ſpake the word, "and they were made; he commanded, and they were "created. Therefore to anſwer thee, it was not the "body of Chriſt before conſecration, but after the con-"ſecration, I ſay to thee, that now it is the body of "Chriſt."

Cran. All theſe things are common. I ſay, that God doth chiefly work in the ſacraments.

Yong. How doth he work?

Cran. By his power, as he doth in baptiſm.

Yong. Nay, by the word he changeth the bread into his body. This is the truth, acknowledge the truth, give place to the truth.

Cran. O glorious words! You are too full of words.

Yong. Nay, O glorious truth! You make no change at all.

Cran. Not ſo, but I make a great change; as in them that are baptized, is there not a great change, when the child of a bondſlave of the devil, is made the ſon of God? ſo it is alſo in the ſacrament of the ſupper, when he receiveth us into his protection and favour.

Yong. If he work in the ſacraments, he worketh in this ſacrament.

Cran. God worketh in his faithful, not in the ſacraments.

Weſt. In the ſupper the words are directed to the bread; in baptiſm to the Spirit. He ſaid not, the water is the Spirit; but of the bread he ſaid, This is my body.

Cran. He calleth the Spirit a Dove, when the Spirit deſcended in likeneſs of a Dove.

Weſt. He doth not call the Spirit a Dove; but he ſaith, that he deſcended as a Dove. He was ſeen in the likeneſs of a Dove. As in baptiſm the words are directed to him that is baptiſed, ſo in the ſupper the words are directed unto the bread.

Cran. Nay, it is written, "Upon whomſoever thou "ſhalt ſee the Spirit deſcending." He calleth that which deſcended the Holy Spirit. And Auguſtine calleth the Dove, the Spirit. Hear what Auguſtine ſaith in 1 Joh. "What meant he by the Dove, that is, by the Holy "Ghoſt? Forſooth to teach, who ſent him."

Yong. He underſtandeth of the Spirit deſcending as a Dove: The Spirit is inviſible. If you mind to have the truth heard, let us proceed. Hear what Ambroſe ſaith: "You ſee what a working power the word of Chriſt "hath. Therefore if there be ſo great power in the "Lord's word, that thoſe things which were not, begin "to be; how much more of ſtrength is it, to work, that "thoſe things that were, ſhould be changed into another "thing?"

And in the fifth chapter he ſaith: "Before it is conſe-"crated, it is bread: but when the words of Chriſt come "to it, it is the body of Chriſt."

But hear what he ſaith more; "Take ye, eat ye, this "is my body. Before the words of Chriſt, the cup is "full of wine and water; when the words of Chriſt have "wrought, there is made the blood of Chriſt which re-"deemed the people." What can be more plain?

Cran. Nay, what can be leſs to the purpoſe? The words are of ſtrength to work in this ſacrament, as they are in baptiſm.

Pye. The words of Chriſt (as Ambroſe ſaith) are of ſtrength to work. What do they work? Ambroſe ſaith, they make the blood which redeemed the people.

Ergo, The natural blood is made.

Cran. The ſacrament of his blood is made. The words make the blood to them that receive it: Not that the blood is in the cup, but in the receiver.

Pye. There is made the blood which redeemed the people.

Cran. The blood is made, that is, the ſacrament of the blood, by which he redeemed the people. [Fit] It is made, that is to ſay [Oſtenditur], It is ſhewed forth there, And Ambroſe ſaith, we receive in a ſimilitude. "As "thou haſt received the ſimilitude of his death, ſo alſo "thou drinkeſt the ſimilitude of his precious blood."

Weſt. He ſaith, in a ſimilitude, becauſe it is miniſtered under another likeneſs. And this is the argument:

There is made the blood which redeemed the people.

But the natural blood redeemed the people.

Ergo, There is the natural blood of Chriſt.

You anſwer, that words make it blood to them that receive it; not that blood is in the cup, but becauſe it is made blood to them that receive it. That all men may ſee how falſely you would avoid the fathers, hear what Ambroſe ſaith, in the ſixth book and firſt chapter.

"Peradventure thou wilt ſay, how be they true? I "which ſee the ſimilitude, do not ſee the truth of the "blood. Firſt of all I told thee of the word of Chriſt, "which ſo worketh, that it can change and turn kinds "ordained by nature. Afterward, when the diſciples "could not abide the words of Chriſt, but hearing that "he gave his fleſh to eat, and his blood to drink, they "departed. Only Peter ſaid, Thou haſt the words of "eternal life, whither ſhould I go from thee? Leſt there-"fore more ſhould ſay this thing, as though there ſhould "be a certain horror of blood, and yet the grace of re-"demption ſhould remain: therefore in a ſimilitude thou "receiveſt the ſacrament, but indeed thou obtaineſt the "grace and power of his nature."

Cran. Theſe words of themſelves are plain enough. And he read this place again, Thou receiveſt the ſacrament for a ſimilitude. But what is that he ſaith, Thou receiveſt for a ſimilitude? I think he underſtandeth the ſacrament to be the ſimilitude of his blood.

Ched. That you may underſtand that truth diſſenteth not from truth, to overthrow that which you ſay of that ſimilitude; hear what Ambroſe ſaith:

"If the heavenly Word did work in other things, doth "it not work in the heavenly ſacraments? Therefore thou "haſt learned, that of bread is made the body of Chriſt, "and that wine and water is put into that cup, but by "conſecration of the heavenly Word it is made blood. "But thou wilt ſay peradventure, that the likeneſs of "blood is not ſeen. But it hath a ſimilitude. For as "thou haſt received the ſimilitude of his death, ſo alſo "thou drinkeſt the ſimilitude of his precious blood, ſo "that there is no horror of blood, and yet it worketh "the price of redemption. Therefore thou haſt learned, "that that which thou receiveſt is the body of Chriſt."

Cran. He ſpeaketh of ſacraments ſacramentally. He calleth the ſacraments by the names of the things; for he uſeth the ſigns for the things ſignified: and therefore the bread is not called bread, but his body, for the excellency and dignity of the things ſignified by it. So doth Ambroſe interpret himſelf, when he ſaith, "For a type "or figure whereof we receive the myſtical cup of his "blood, for the ſafeguard of our bodies and ſouls."

Ched, A type! He calleth not the blood of Chriſt a type or ſign: but the blood of bulls and goats in that reſpect was a type or ſign.

Cran. This is new learning; you ſhall never read this among the fathers.

Ched. But Ambroſe ſaith ſo.

Cran. He calleth the bread and the cup a type or ſign of the blood of Chriſt, and of his benefit.

Weſt. Ambroſe underſtandeth it for a type of his benefit, that is, of redemption, not of the blood of Chriſt, but of his paſſion. The cup is the type or ſign of his death, ſeeing it is his blood.

Cran. He ſaith moſt plainly, that the cup is a type of Chriſt's blood.

Ched. As Chriſt is really and truly incarnate, ſo is he truly and really in the ſacrament.

But Chriſt is really and truly incarnate.

Ergo, The body of Chriſt is truly and really in the ſacrament.

Cran. I deny the Major.

Ched. I prove the Major out of Juſtin, in his ſecond apology, Ὃν τρόπον διὰ λόγε Θεῦ σαρκοποιηθεὶς Ἰεσῦς Χριςὸς ὁ σωτὴρ ἡμῶν, καὶ σάρκα καὶ αἷμα ὑπὸ σωτηρίας ἡμῶν ἔσχεν, ἕτω καὶ τὴν δι' ἐυχῆς λόγε τῦ παρ' αὐτε ἐυχαριςηθείσαν τροφὴν, ἐξ ἧς αἷμα καὶ σάρκες κατὰ μεταβολὴν τρέφονται ἡμῶν, ἐκείνε τῦ σαρκοποιηθέντος Ἰεσῦ καὶ σάρκα καὶ αἷμα ἐδιδάχθημεν εἶναι.

Cran. This place hath been falſified by Marcus Conſtantius. Juſtin meant nothing elſe but that the bread, which nouriſheth us, is called the body of Chriſt.

Ched. To the argument. As Chriſt is truly and naturally incarnate, &c. as above.

Cran. I deny the Major.

Ched. The words of Juſtin are thus to be interpreted word for word.

"As by the Word of God, Jeſus Chriſt our Saviour, "being made fleſh, had both fleſh and blood for our ſal- "vation: ſo we are taught, that the meat conſecrated by "the word of prayer, inſtituted of him, whereby our "blood and fleſh are nouriſhed by communion, is the "fleſh and blood of the ſame Jeſus which was made "fleſh."

Cran. You have tranſlated it well; but I deny your Major. This is the ſenſe of Juſtin; that the bread is called the body of Chriſt, and yet of that ſanctified meat our bodies are nouriſhed.

Ched. Nay, he ſaith, of that ſanctified meat both our bodies and ſouls are nouriſhed.

Cran. He ſaith not ſo; but he ſaith that it nouriſheth our fleſh and blood: and how can that nouriſh the ſoul, that nouriſheth the fleſh and blood?

Cole. It feedeth the body by the ſoul.

Cran. Speak uprightly. Can that which is received by the ſoul and ſpirit be called the meat of the body?

Weſt. Hear then what Irenæus ſaith, "This the ſame "cup which is a creature, he confirmed to be his body, "by which he increaſeth our bodies. When both the "cup mixed and the bread broken, hath joined to it the "Word of God, it is made the ſacrament of the body "and blood of Chriſt, of which the ſubſtance of our fleſh "is increaſed and conſiſteth.

The ſubſtance of our fleſh is increaſed by the body and blood of Chriſt.

Ergo, Our body is nouriſhed by the body and blood of Chriſt.

Cran. I deny your argument. He calleth it the fleſh and blood, for the ſacrament of the body and blood, as Tertullian alſo ſaith, "Our fleſh is nouriſhed with ſym- "bolical or ſacramental bread, but our ſoul is nouriſhed "with the body of Chriſt."

Weſt. Look what he ſaith more. "How do they ſay, "that the fleſh cannot receive the gift of God, that is "eternal life, which is nouriſhed with the blood and body "of Chriſt?"

Cran. The body is nouriſhed both with the ſacrament, and with the body of Chriſt: With the ſacrament to a temporal life; with the body of Chriſt to eternal life.

Ched. I cannot but be ſorry when I ſee ſuch a manifeſt lye in your writings. For where you tranſlate Juſtin on this faſhion; that the bread, water, and wine are not ſo to be taken in this ſacrament, as common meats and drinks are wont to be taken of us, but are meats choſen out particularly for this, namely, for the giving of thanks, and therefore be called of the Greeks Euchariſtia, that is, thankſgiving; they are called moreover the blood and body of Chriſt (ſo have you tranſlated it): the words of Juſtin are thus; "We are taught that the meat conſe- "crated by the word of prayer, by the which our fleſh "and blood is nouriſhed by communion, is the body and "blood of the ſame Jeſus which was made fleſh."

Cran. I did not tranſlate it word for word, but only I gave the meaning: And I go nothing from this meaning.

Harpſ. You remember touching Juſtin, to whom this apology was written, namely, to an heathen man. The heathen thought that the chriſtians came to the church to worſhip bread; Juſtin anſwereth, that we come not to common bread, but as to, &c. as is ſaid afore. Weigh the place well, it is right worthy to be noted; our fleſh is nouriſhed according to mutation.

Cran. We ought not to conſider the bare bread, but whoſoever cometh to the ſacrament eateth the true body of Chriſt.

Weſt. You have corrupted Emiſſenus; for inſtead of ſet Cibis ſatiendus, that is, To be filled with meat, you have ſet Cibis ſatiendus ſpiritualibus, that is, To be filled with ſpiritual meats.

Cran. I have not corrupted it; for it is ſo in the decrees.

Weſt. You have corrupted another place of Emiſſenus; for you have omitted theſe words: "Marvel thou when "thou comeſt up to the reverend altar to be filled with "ſpiritual meats: Look in faith to the holy body and "blood of thy God, marvel at his honour, worthily touch "him."

Cran. This book hath not that.

Weſt. Alſo you have falſified this place by evil tranſlating [Honora corpus Dei tui] Honour the body of thy God; you have tranſlated it, [Honora eum qui eſt Deus tuus] Honour him which is thy God: Whereas Emiſſenus hath not, Honour him; but, Houour the body of thy God.

Cran. I have ſo tranſlated him, and yet no leſs truly, than not without a weighty cauſe; elſe it ſhould not have been without danger, if I had tranſlated it thus; Honour the body of thy God; becauſe of certain, that, according to the error of the Anthropomorphites, dreamed that God had a body.

Weſt. Nay, you moſt of all have brought the people into that error, which ſo long have taught that he ſitteth at the right hand of God the Father; and counted me for an heretic, becauſe I preached that God had no right hand. Then I will oppoſe you in the very articles of your faith.

Chriſt ſitteth at the right hand of God the Father.

But God the Father had no right hand.

Ergo, Where is Chriſt now?

Cran. I am not ſo ignorant a novice in the articles of my faith, but that I underſtand, that to ſit at the right hand of God, doth ſignify to be equal in the glory of the Father.

Weſt. Now then take this argument.

Whereſoever God's authority is, there is Chriſt's body.

But God's authority is in every place.

Ergo, What letteth the body of Chriſt to be in every place?

Moreover you have alſo corrupted Duns.

Cran. This is a great offence, I promiſe you.

Weſt. For you have omitted Secundum apparentiam, that is, As it appeareth. Where his words are theſe, "Et ſi quæras quare voluit eccleſia eligere iſtum intel- "lectum ita difficilem hujus articuli, cum verba ſcripturæ "poſſint ſalvari ſecundum intellectum facilem & verio- "rem, ſecundum apparentiam, de hoc articulo, &c. That "is, If you demand why the church did chuſe this ſo "hard an undertaking of this article, whereas the words "of ſcripture may be ſalved after an eaſy and true under- "ſtanding [As appeareth] of this article, &c.

Cran. It is not ſo.

Weſt. Alſo you have ſet forth a catechiſm in the name of the ſynod of London, and yet there be fifty, which witneſſing that they were of the number of the convocation, never heard one word of this catechiſm.

Cran. I was ignorant of the ſetting to of that title; and as ſoon as I had knowledge thereof, I did not like it: Therefore when I complained thereof to the council, it was anſwered me by them, that the book was ſo intituled, becauſe it was ſet forth in the time of the convocation.

Weſt. Moreover you have in Duns tranſlated In Romana eccleſia, pro eccleſia catholica. In the church of Rome, for, The catholic church.

Cran. Yea, but he meant the Romiſh church.

Weſt. Moreover you have depraved S. Thomas, namely, where he hath theſe words: "In quantum vero eſt "ſacrificium, habet vim ſatisfactivam: Sed in ſatisfac-"tione attenditur magis affectio offerentis, quam quan-"titas oblationis. Unde Dominus dicit apud Lucam de "vidua quæ obtulit duo æra, quod plus omnibus miſit. "Quamvis ergo hæc oblatio ex ſui quantitate ſufficiet "ad ſatisfaciendum pro omni pœna: tamen fit ſatisfac-"toria illis pro quibus offertur, vel etiam offerentibus, "ſecundum quantitatem ſuæ devotionis, & non pro tota "pœna. That is, Inaſmuch as it is a ſacrifice, it hath "the power of ſatisfaction: But in ſatisfaction the af-"fection of the offerer is more to be weighed than the "quantity of the oblation. Wherefore the Lord ſaid "in Luke's goſpel, of the widow which offered two "mites, that ſhe caſt in more than they all. Therefore "although this oblation of the quantity of itſelf will ſuf-"fice to ſatisfy for all pain, yet it is made ſatisfactory to "them, for whom it is offered, or to the offerers, accord-"ing to the quantity of their devotion, and not for all "the pain."

You have thus turned it, "Quod ſacrificium ſacerdo-"tis habet vim ſatisfactivam, &c. That is, That the ſa-"crifice of the prieſt hath power of ſatisfaction, &c." And therefore in this place you have chopped in this word [Sacerdotis] of the prieſt, whereas in the tranſlation of all the New Teſtament you have not ſet it, but where Chriſt was put to death. And again, where S. Thomas hath [pro omni pœna] for all pain, your book omitteth many things there.

Thus you ſee, brethren, the truth ſtedfaſt and invincible: you ſee alſo the craft and deceit of heretics; the truth may be preſſed, but it cannot be oppreſſed; therefore cry altogether, Vincit Veritas, The truth overcometh.

This diſordered diſputation, ſometime in Latin, ſome time in Engliſh, continued almoſt till two of the clock. Which being finiſhed, and the arguments written and delivered to the hands of Mr. Say, the priſoner was had away by the Mayor, and the doctors dined together at the Univerſity college.

A Diſputation at Oxford between Dr. Smith, and others, with Biſhop Ridley.

THE next day, which was the twelfth of April, Dr. Ridley was brought forth to diſpute, againſt whom Dr. Smith was ſet to be principal opponent. Concerning which Dr. Smith, foraſmuch as his name is here mentioned, the reader is firſt to be advertiſed what is to be attributed to his judgement in religion, which ſo oftentimes before had turned and returned to and fro, grounded (as it ſeemeth) upon no firm conſcience of doctrine, as both by his articles by him recanted may appear, and alſo by his own letter ſent a little before in king Edward's days to the archbiſhop of Canterbury from Scotland. Which letter I thought here to exhibit as a preface before his own arguments, or rather as a teſtimony againſt himſelf, whereby the reader may underſtand how devoutly he magnified them and their doctrine a little before, againſt whom he now diſputeth ſo buſily. Read his epiſtle, I beſeech thee, and judge.

The true Copy of Doctor Richard Smith's Letter, declaring his Affection to the ſetting forth of God's ſincere Word.

Ex urbe divi Andreæ. 14 Feb.
Rich. Smitheus.

And thus much concerning Dr. Richard Smith, being ſet here (as is ſaid) to diſpute againſt biſhop Ridley, who was brought the next day after the archbiſhop, to anſwer in the divinity ſchool. Againſt whom alſo, beſides Dr. Smith, diſputed Dr. Weſton, Dr. Treſham, Dr. Oglethorp, Dr. Glin, Dr. Seaton, and Dr. Cole, Mr. Ward, Mr. Harpsfield, Dr. Watſon, Mr. Pye, Mr. Harding, Mr. Curton, Mr. Fecknam: to all of them he anſwered very learnedly. He made a preface to theſe queſtions, but they would not let him go forward, but cauſed him to make an end of the ſame, and ſaid it was blaſphemy; and ſome ſaid he drave off the time in ambiguous things, nothing to the purpoſe, not ſuffering him to ſpeak his mind. Dr. Smith could get nothing at his hand; inſomuch that others took his arguments and proſecuted them. He ſhewed himſelf to be learned, and a great clerk. They could bring nothing, but he knew it as well as they.

The Diſputation beginneth.

Dr. Weſton, Prolocutor. Good chriſtian people and brethren, we have begun this day our ſchool, by God's good ſpeed I truſt, and are entering into a controverſy, whereof no queſtion ought to be moved concerning the verity of the body of our Lord Jeſu Chriſt in the euchariſt. Chriſt is true, which ſaid the words. The words are true which he ſpake, yea, Truth itſelf that cannot fail. Let us therefore pray unto God to ſend down unto us his Holy Spirit, which is the true interpreter of his word; which may purge away errors, and give light, that verity may appear. Let us alſo aſk leave and liberty of the church to permit the truth received to be called this day in queſtion, without any prejudice to the ſame. Your parts thereof ſhall be to implore the aſſiſtance of Almighty God, to pray for the proſperity of the queen's majeſty, and to give us quiet and attentive ears. Now go to your queſtion.

Dr. Smith. This day (right learned Mr. Doctor) three queſtions are propounded, whereof no controverſy among chriſtians ought to be moved, to wit:

1. Whether the natural body of Chriſt our Saviour, conceived of the virgin Mary, and offered for man's redemption upon the croſs, is verily and really in the ſacrament by virtue of God's word ſpoken by the prieſts, &c.
2. Whether in the ſacrament, after the words of conſecration, be any other ſubſtance, &c.
3. Whether in the maſs be a ſacrifice propitiatory, &c.

Touching

Touching which queſtions, although you have publicly and partly profeſſed your judgment and opinion on Saturday laſt, yet being not ſatisfied with that your anſwer, I will aſſay again to demand your ſentence in the firſt queſtion; Whether the true body of Chriſt, after the words pronounced, be really in the Euchariſt, or elſe only the figure. In which matter I ſtand here now to hear your anſwer.

Dr. Ridley's Preface or Proteſtation, before his Diſputation.

I Received of you the other day, right worſhipful Mr. Prolocutor, and ye my reverend maſters, commiſſioners from the queen's majeſty and her honourable council, three propoſitions; whereunto ye commanded me to prepare againſt this day, what I thought good to anſwer concerning the ſame.

Now whilſt I weighed with myſelf how great a charge of the Lord's flock was of late committed unto me, for which I am certain I muſt once render an account to my Lord God (and that how ſoon he knoweth), and that moreover, by the commandment of the apoſtle Peter, I ought to be ready always to give a reaſon of the hope that is in me with meekneſs and reverence, unto every one that will demand the ſame: beſides this, conſidering my duty to the church of Chriſt, and to your worſhips, being commiſſioners by public authority: I determined with myſelf to obey your commandment, and ſo openly to declare unto you my mind touching the aforeſaid propoſitions. And albeit, plainly to confeſs unto you the truth in theſe things which ye now demand of me, I have thought otherwiſe in times paſt than now I do, yet (God I call to record unto my ſoul, I lye not) I have not altered my judgment, as now it is, either by conſtraint of any man, or laws, either for the dread of any dangers of this world, either for any hope of commodity, but only for the love of the truth revealed unto me by the grace of God (as I am undoubtedly perſuaded) in his holy word, and in the reading of ancient fathers.

Theſe things I do rather recite at this preſent, becauſe it may happen to ſome of you hereafter, as in times paſt it hath done to me: I mean, if ye think otherwiſe of the matters propounded in theſe propoſitions than I now do, God may open them unto you in time to come.

But howſoever it ſhall be, I will in few words do that which I think ye all look I ſhould do; that is, as plainly as I can, I will declare my judgment herein. Howbeit, of this, I would ye were not ignorant, that I will not indeed wittingly and willingly ſpeak in any point againſt God's word, or diſſent in any one jot from the ſame, or from the rules of faith, or chriſtian religion: which rules that ſame moſt ſacred word of God preſcribeth to the church of Chriſt, whereunto I now and for ever ſubmit myſelf and all my doings. And becauſe the matter I have now taken in hand is weighty, and ye all well know how unready I am to handle it accordingly, as well for lack of time, as alſo lack of books: therefore here I proteſt, that I will publicly this day require of you, that it may be lawful for me concerning all mine anſwers, explications, and confirmations, to add or diminiſh whatſoever ſhall ſeem hereafter more convenient and meet for the purpoſe, through more ſound judgment, better deliberation, and more exact trial of every particular thing. Having now, by the way of preface and proteſtation, ſpoken theſe few words, I will come to the anſwer of the propoſitions propounded unto me, and ſo to the moſt brief explication and confirmation of mine anſwers.

Weſton. Reverend Mr. Doctor, concerning the lack of books, there is no cauſe why you ſhould complain. What books ſoever you will name, you ſhall have them: and as concerning the judgment of your anſwers to be had of yourſelf with farther deliberation; it ſhall (I ſay) be lawful for you until Sunday next to add unto them what you ſhall think good yourſelf. My mind is, that we ſhould uſe ſhort arguments, leſt we ſhould make an infinite proceſs of the thing.

Rid. There is another thing beſides, which I would gladly obtain at your hands. I perceive that you have writers and notaries here preſent. By all likelihood our diſputations ſhall be publiſhed, I beſeech you for God's ſake let me have liberty to ſpeak my mind freely, and without interruption, not becauſe I have determined to protract the time with a ſolemn preface, but leſt it may appear that ſome be not ſatisfied. God wot I am no orator, nor have I learned rhetoric to ſet colours on the matter.

Weſt. Among this whole company it ſhall be permitted you to take two for your part.

Rid. I will chuſe two, if there were any here with whom I were acquainted.

Weſt. Here are two which Mr. Cranmer had yeſterday. Take them, if it pleaſe you.

Rid. I am content with them; I truſt they are honeſt men.

The firſt Propoſition.

In the ſacrament of the altar, by the virtue of God's word ſpoken of the prieſt, the natural body of Chriſt born of the virgin Mary, and his natural blood, is really preſent under the forms of bread and wine.

The Anſwer of N. Ridley.

In matters appertaining to God we may not ſpeak according to the ſenſe of man, nor of the world: therefore this propoſition or concluſion is framed after another manner of phraſe or kind of ſpeech than the ſcripture uſeth. Again, it is very obſcure and dark, by means of ſundry words of doubtful ſignification. And being taken in the ſenſe which ſchoolmen teach, and at this time the church of Rome doth defend, it is falſe and erroneous, and plain contrary to the doctrine which is according to godlineſs.

The Explication.

How far the diverſity and newneſs of the phraſe in all this firſt propoſition is from the phraſe of the holy ſcripture, and that in every part almoſt, it is ſo plain and evident to any that is but meanly exerciſed in holy writ, that I need not now (eſpecially in this company of learned men) to ſpend any time therein, except the ſame ſhall be required of me hereafter.

Firſt, there is a double ſenſe in theſe words [by virtue of God's word], for it is doubtful what word of God this is; whether it be that which is read in the evangeliſts, or in Paul, or any other. And if it be that which is in the evangeliſts, or in St. Paul, what that is. If it be in none of them, then how it may be known to be God's word, and of ſuch virtue that it ſhould be able to work ſo great a matter.

Again, there is a doubt of theſe words [of the prieſt] whether no man may be called a prieſt, but he which hath authority to make a propitiatory ſacrifice for the quick and the dead; and how it may be proved that this authority was committed of God to any man, but to Chriſt alone.

It is likewiſe doubted, after what order the ſacrificing prieſt ſhall be, whether after the order of Aaron, or elſe after the order of Melchiſedech. For as far as I know, the holy ſcripture doth allow no more.

Weſt. Let this be ſufficient.

Rid. If we lack time at this preſent, there is time enough hereafter.

Weſt. Theſe are but evaſions or ſtarting holes; you conſume the time in vain.

Rid. I cannot ſtart from you, I am captive and bound.

Weſt. Fall to it, my maſters.

Smith. That which you have ſpoken may ſuffice at this preſent.

Rid. Let me alone, I pray you, for I have not much to ſay behind.

Weſt. Go forward.

Rid. Moreover, there is ambiguity in this word [really], whether it be taken as the logicians term it, [tranſcendenter]; i. e. Moſt generally: and ſo it may ſignify any manner of thing which belongeth to the body of Chriſt, by any means: after which ſort we alſo grant Chriſt's body to be really in the ſacrament of the Lord's ſupper (as in diſputation, if occaſion be given, ſhall be declared), or whether it be taken to ſignify the very ſame thing, having body, life, and ſoul, which was aſſumed and taken of the word of God, into the unity of perſon. In which ſenſe, ſith the body of Chriſt is really in heaven, becauſe of the true manner of his body, it may not be ſaid to be here in the earth. There is yet a further doubtfulneſs in theſe words [under the forms of bread and wine], whether the forms be there taken to ſignify the only accidental and outward ſhews of bread and wine; or therewithal the ſubſtantial natures thereof, which are to be ſeen by their qualities, and perceived by exterior ſenſes.

Now the error and falſeneſs of the propoſition after the ſenſe of the Roman church and ſchoolmen, may hereby appear, in that they affirm the bread to be tranſubſtantiated and changed to the fleſh aſſumed of the Word of God, and that (as they ſay) by virtue of the word, which they have deviſed by a certain number of words, and cannot be found in any of the evangeliſts, or in Paul, and ſo they gather that Chriſt's body is really contained in the ſacrament of the altar. Which poſition is grounded upon the foundation of the tranſubſtantiation; which foundation is monſtrous, againſt reaſon, and deſtroyeth the analogy or proportion of the ſacraments: and therefore this propoſition alſo, which is builded upon this rotten foundation, is falſe, erroneous, and to be counted as a deteſtable hereſy of the ſacramentaries.

Weſt. We loſe time.

Rid. You ſhall have time enough.

Weſt. Fall to reaſoning. You ſhall have ſome other day for this matter.

Rid. I have no more to ſay concerning my explication. If you will give me leave and let me alone, I will but ſpeak a word or two for my confirmation.

Weſt. Go to; ſay on.

The Confirmation of the aforeſaid Anſwer.

There ought no doctrine to be eſtabliſhed in the church of God, which diſſenteth from the word of God, from the rule of faith, and draweth with it many abſurdities that cannot be avoided.

But this doctrine of the firſt propoſition is ſuch.

Ergo, It ought not to be eſtabliſhed and maintained in the church of God.

The Major or firſt part of my argument is plain, and the Minor or ſecond part is proved thus.

The doctrine maintaineth a real, corporal, and carnal preſence of Chriſt's fleſh, aſſumed and taken of the Word, to be in the ſacrament of the Lord's ſupper, and that not by virtue and grace only, but alſo by the whole eſſence and ſubſtance of the body and fleſh of Chriſt.

But ſuch a preſence diſagreeth from God's word, from the rule of faith, and cannot but draw with it many abſurdities.

Ergo, The ſecond part is true.

The firſt part of this argument is manifeſt, and the ſecond may yet farther be confirmed thus.

Weſt. Thus you conſume time, which might be better beſtowed on other matters. Maſter Opponent, I pray you to your arguments.

Smith. I will here reaſon with you upon tranſubſtantiation, which you ſay is contrary to the rule and analogy of faith. The contrary whereof I prove by the ſcriptures and the doctors. But before I enter argumentation with you, I demand firſt, whether in the ſixth chapter of John, there be any mention made of the ſacrament, or of the real preſence of Chriſt in the ſacrament?

Rid. It is againſt reaſon that I ſhould be impeached to proſecute that which I have to ſpeak in this aſſembly, being not ſo long, but that it may be comprehended in few words.

Weſt. Let him read on.

Rid. Firſt of all, this preſence is contrary to many places of the holy ſcripture.

Secondly, It varieth from the articles of the faith.

Thirdly, It deſtroyeth and taketh away the inſtitution of the Lord's ſupper.

Fourthly, It maketh precious things common to profane and ungodly perſons; for it caſteth that which is holy unto dogs, and pearls unto ſwine.

Fifthly, It forceth men to maintain many monſtrous miracles, without neceſſity and authority of God's word.

Sixthly, It giveth occaſion to the heretics which erred concerning the two natures in Chriſt, to defend their hereſies thereby.

Seventhly, It falſifieth the ſayings of the godly fathers; it falſifieth alſo the catholic faith of the church, which the apoſtles taught, the martyrs confirmed, and the faithful (as one of the fathers ſaith) do retain and keep until this day. Wherefore the ſecond part of mine argument is true.

The probation of the antecedent or former part of this argument by the parts thereof.

This carnal preſence is contrary to the word of God, as appeareth, John 16. "I tell you the truth. It is "profitable to you that I go away, for if I go not away, "the Comforter ſhall not come unto you." Acts 3. "Whom the heavens muſt receive until the time of re-"ſtoring all things which God hath ſpoken." Matt. 9. "The children of the bridegroom ſhall not mourn ſo "long as the bridegroom is with them: but now is the "time of mourning." John 16. But I will ſee you again, "and your hearts ſhall rejoice." John 14. I will come "again and take you to myſelf." Matt. 24. If they ſhall "ſay unto you, Behold here is Chriſt, or there is Chriſt, "believe them not: for whereſoever the dead carcaſe is, "thither the eagles will reſort."

It varieth from the articles of the faith; he aſcended into heaven, and ſitteth at the right hand of God the Father, from whence (and not from any other place, ſaith Auguſtine) he ſhall come to judge both the quick and the dead.

It deſtroyeth and taketh away the inſtitution of the Lord's ſupper, which was commanded only to be uſed and continued until the Lord himſelf ſhould come. If therefore he be really preſent in the body of his fleſh, then muſt the ſupper ceaſe: for a remembrance is not of a thing preſent, but of a thing paſt and abſent. And there is a difference between remembrance and preſence, and (as one of the fathers ſaith) a figure is in vain where the thing figured is preſent.

It maketh precious things common to profane and ungodly perſons, and conſtraineth men to confeſs many abſurdities. For it affirmeth, that whoremongers and murderers, yea, and (as ſome of them hold opinion) the wicked and faithleſs mice, rats, and dogs, alſo may receive the very real and corporal body of the Lord, wherein the fulneſs of the Spirit of light and grace dwelleth; contrary to the manifeſt words of Chriſt in ſix places and ſentences of the ſixth chapter of St. John.

It confirmeth alſo and maintaineth that beaſtly kind of cruelty of the Anthropophagi, that is, the devourers of man's fleſh: for it is a more cruel thing to devour a quick man, than to ſlay him.

Pye. He requireth time to ſpeak blaſphemies. Leave your blaſphemies.

Rid. I little thought to have had ſuch reproachful words at your hands.

Weſt. All is quiet. Go to your arguments, Mr. Doctor.

Rid. I have not many things more to ſay.

Weſt. You utter blaſphemies with a moſt impudent face: leave off, I ſay, and get you to the argument.

Rid. It forceth men to maintain many monſtrous miracles, without any neceſſity and authority of God's word. For at the coming of this preſence of the body and fleſh of Chriſt, they thruſt away the ſubſtance of bread, and affirm that the accidents remain without any ſubject, and inſtead thereof they place Chriſt's body without his qualities and the true manner of a body. And if the ſacrament be reſerved ſo long until it mould, and worms breed, ſome ſay that the ſubſtance of bread miraculouſly returneth again, and ſome deny it. Other ſome affirm, the real body of Chriſt goeth down into the ſtomach of the receivers, and doth there abide ſo long only as they ſhall continue to be good: but another ſort hold, that the body of Chriſt is carried into heaven, ſo ſoon as the forms of bread be bruiſed with the teeth. O works of miracles!

Truly, and moſt truly I ſee that fulfilled in theſe men, whereof St. Paul propheſied, 2 Theſſ. 2. "Becauſe they "have not received the love of the truth, that they might "be ſaved, God ſhall ſend them ſtrong deluſions, that "they ſhould believe lyes, and be all damned which have "not believed the truth." This groſs preſence hath brought forth that fond phantaſy of concomitance, whereby is broken at this day and abrogated the commandment of the Lord for diſtributing the Lord's cup to the laity.

It giveth occaſion to heretics to maintain and defend their errors; as to Marcion, which ſaid that Chriſt had but a fantaſtical body; and to Eutyches, which wickedly confounded the two natures in Chriſt.

Finally, It falſifieth the ſayings of the godly fathers, and the catholic faith of the church, which, Vigilius a martyr and grave writer ſaith, was taught of the apoſtles, confirmed with the blood of martyrs, and was continually maintained by the faithful, until his time. By the ſayings of the fathers, I mean of Juſtin, Irene, Tertullian, Origen, Euſebius, Emiſene, Athanaſius, Cyril, Epiphanius, Jerom, Chryſoſtom, Auguſtine, Vigilius, Fulgentius, Bertram, and other moſt ancient fathers. All thoſe places, as I am ſure, I have read making for my purpoſe, ſo am I well aſſured that I could ſhew the ſame, if I might have the uſe of mine own books, which I will take to me to do, even upon the peril of my life, and loſs of all that I may loſe in this world.

But now (my brethren) think not becauſe I diſallow that preſence which the firſt propoſition maintaineth (as a preſence which I take to be forged, fantaſtical, and beſides the authority of God's word, perniciouſly brought into the church by the Romaniſts) that I therefore go about to take away the true preſence of Chriſt's body in his ſupper rightly and duly miniſtered, which is grounded upon the word of God, and made more plain by the commentaries of the faithful fathers. They that think ſo of me, the Lord knoweth how far they are deceived. And to make the ſame evident unto you, I will in few words declare what true preſence of Chriſt's body in the ſacrament of the Lord's ſupper I hold and affirm, with the word of God and the ancient fathers.

I ſay and confeſs with the evangeliſt Luke, and with the apoſtle Paul, that the bread on the which thanks are given, is the body of Chriſt in the remembrance of him and his death, to be ſet forth perpetually of the faithful until his coming.

I ſay and confeſs the bread which he brake to be the communion and partaking of Chriſt's body, with the ancient and the faithful fathers.

I ſay and believe that there is not only a ſignification of Chriſt's body ſet forth by the ſacrament, but alſo that therewith is given to the godly and faithful the grace of Chriſt's body, that is, the food of life and immortality. And this I hold with Cyprian.

I ſay alſo with St. Auguſtine, that we eat life, and we drink life; with Emiſene, that we feel the Lord to be preſent in grace; with Athanaſius, that we receive celeſtial food which cometh from above; the propriety of natural communion, with Hilary; the nature of fleſh and benediction which giveth life in bread and wine, with Cyril; and with the ſame Cyril, the virtue of the very fleſh of Chriſt, life and grace of his body, the property of the only begotten, that is to ſay, life, as he himſelf in plain words expoundeth it.

I confeſs alſo with Baſil, that we receive the myſtical advent and coming of Chriſt, grace and virtue of his very nature; the ſacrament of his very fleſh, with Ambroſe; the body by grace, with Epiphanius; ſpiritual fleſh, but not that which was crucified, with Jerom; grace flowing into a ſacrifice, and the grace of the Spirit, with Chryſoſtom; grace and inviſible verity, grace and ſociety of the members of Chriſt's body, with St. Auguſtine.

Finally, with Bertram (which was the laſt of all theſe) I confeſs that Chriſt's body is in the ſacrament in this reſpect: namely (as he writeth) becauſe there is in it the Spirit of Chriſt, that is, the power of the word of God, which not only feedeth the ſoul, but alſo cleanſeth it. But of theſe I ſuppoſe it may clearly appear unto all men, how far we are from that opinion, whereof ſome go about falſly to ſlander us to the world, ſaying, we teach that the godly and faithful ſhould receive nothing elſe at the Lord's table, but a figure of the body of Chriſt.

The ſecond Propoſition.

After the conſecration there remaineth no ſubſtance of bread and wine, neither any other ſubſtance than the ſubſtance of God and Man.

The Anſwer.

The ſecond concluſion is manifeſtly falſe, directly againſt the word of God, the nature of the ſacrament, and the moſt evident teſtimonies of the godly fathers; and it is the rotten foundation of the other two concluſions propounded by you, both of the firſt, and alſo of the third. I will not therefore now tarry upon any further explication of this anſwer, being contented with that which is already added afore to the anſwer of the firſt propoſition.

The firſt argument for the confirmation of this anſwer.

It is very plain by the word of God, that Chriſt did give bread unto his diſciples, and called it his body.
But the ſubſtance of bread is another manner of ſubſtance, than is the ſubſtance of Chriſt's body, God and Man.
Therefore the concluſion is falſe.

The ſecond part of mine argument is plain, and the firſt is proved thus:

The ſecond argument.

That which Chriſt did take, on the which he gave thanks, and the which he brake, he gave to his diſciples, and called it his body.
But he took bread, gave thanks on bread, and brake bread.
Ergo, The firſt part is true. And it is confirmed with the authorities of the fathers, Irene, Tertullian, Origen, Cyprian, Epiphanius, Jerom, Auguſtine, Theodoret, Cyril, Rabanus, and Bede. Whoſe places I will take upon me to ſhew moſt manifeſt in this behalf, if I may be ſuffered to have my books, as my requeſt is.

Bread is the body of Chriſt.

Ergo, It is bread.

A tertio adjacente ad ſecundum adjacens cum verbi ſubſtantivi pura copula.

The third argument.

As the bread of the Lord's table is Chriſt's natural body, ſo is his myſtical body.

But it is not Chriſt's myſtical body by tranſubſtantiation.

Ergo, It is not his natural body by tranſubſtantiation.

The ſecond part of my argument is plain, and the firſt is proved thus: As Chriſt who is the verity, ſpake of the bread, This is my body which ſhall be betrayed for you, ſpeaking there of his natural body: even ſo Paul, moved with the ſame Spirit of truth, ſaid, We though we be many, yet are we all one bread, and one body, which be partakers of one bread.

The fourth argument.

We may no more believe bread to be tranſubſtantiate into the body of Chriſt, than the wine into his blood.

But the wine is not tranſubſtantiate into his blood.

Ergo, Neither is that bread therefore tranſubſtantiate into his body.

The firſt part of this argument is manifeſt, and the ſecond part is proved out of the authority of God's word in Matthew and Mark, I will not drink of the fruit of the vine, &c. Now the fruit of the vine was wine, which Chriſt drank, and gave to his diſciples to drink. With this ſentence agreeth plainly the place of Chryſoſtom on the 20th chapter of Matthew. As Cyprian doth alſo, affirming that there is no blood, if wine be not in the cup.

The fifth argument.

The words of Chriſt, ſpoken upon the cup and upon the bread, have like effect and working.

But the words ſpoken upon the cup have not virtue to tranſubſtantiate:

Ergo, It followeth, that the words ſpoken upon the bread have no ſuch virtue.

The ſecond part of the argument is proved, becauſe they would then tranſubſtantiate the cup, or that which is in the cup in the New Teſtament. But neither of theſe things can be done, and very abſurd it is to confeſs the ſame.

The ſixth argument.

The circumſtances of the ſcripture, the analogy and proportion of the ſacraments, and the teſtimony of the faithful fathers, ought to rule us in taking the meaning of the holy ſcripture touching the ſacrament.

But the words of the Lord's ſupper, the circumſtances of the ſcripture, the analogy of the ſacraments, and the ſayings of the fathers, do moſt effectually and plainly prove a figurative ſpeech in the words of the Lord's ſupper.

Ergo, A figurative ſenſe and meaning is ſpecially to be received in theſe words, This is my body.

The circumſtances of the ſcripture, "Do this in remembrance of me. As oft as ye ſhall eat of this bread, and drink of this cup, ye ſhall ſhew forth the Lord's death. Let a man prove himſelf, and ſo eat of this bread, and drink of this cup. They came together to break bread; and they continued in breaking of bread. The bread which we break, &c. For we being many, are all one bread and one body, &c."

The analogy of the ſacraments is neceſſary: for if the ſacraments had not ſome ſimilitude or likeneſs of the things whereof they be ſacraments, they could in no wiſe be ſacraments. And this ſimilitude in the ſacrament of the Lord's ſupper is taken three manner of ways.

1. The firſt conſiſteth in nouriſhing, as ye ſhall read in Rabana, Cyprian, Auguſtine, Irene, and moſt plainly in Iſidore out of Bertram.

2. The ſecond in the uniting and joining of many into one, as Cyprian teacheth.

3. The third is a ſimilitude of unlike things: where like as the bread is turned into one body, ſo we, by the right uſe of this ſacrament, are turned through faith into the body of Chriſt.

The ſayings of the fathers declare it to be a figurative ſpeech, as it appeareth in Origen, Tertullian, Chryſoſtom in opere imperfecto, Auguſtine, Ambroſe, Baſil, Gregory Nazianzen, Hilary, and moſt plainly of all in Bertram. Moreover, the ſayings and places of all the fathers, whoſe names I have before recited againſt the aſſertion of the firſt propoſition, do quite overthrow tranſubſtantiation. But of all moſt evidently and plainly, Irene, Origen, Cyprian, Chryſoſtom to Ceſarius the monk, Auguſtine againſt Adamantus, Gelaſius, Cyril, Epiphanius, Chryſoſtom again on the 20th of Matthew, Rabana, Damaſcene and Bertram.

Here, right worſhipful Mr. Prolocutor, and ye the reſt of the commiſſioners, it may pleaſe you to underſtand, that I do not lean to theſe things only, which I have written in my former anſwers and confirmations, but that I have alſo for the proof of that I have ſpoken, whatſoever Bertram, a man learned, of ſound and upright judgment, and ever counted a catholic for theſe ſeven hundred years until this our age, hath written. His treatiſe, whoſoever ſhall read and weigh, conſidering the time of the writer, his learning, godlineſs of life, the allegations of the ancient fathers, and his manifold and moſt grounded arguments, I cannot, (doubtleſs) but much marvel, if he have any fear of God at all, how he can with good conſcience ſpeak againſt him in this matter of the ſacrament. This Bertram was the firſt that pulled me by the ear, and that firſt brought me from the common error of the Romiſh church, and cauſed me to ſearch more diligently and exactly both the ſcriptures and the writings of the old eccleſiaſtical fathers in this matter. And this I proteſt before the face of God, who knoweth I lye not in the things I now ſpeak.

The third Propoſition.

In the maſs is the lively ſacrifice of the church, propitiable and available for the ſins as well of quick as of the dead.

The anſwer to this propoſition.

I anſwer to this third propoſition as I did to the firſt. And moreover I ſay, that being taken in ſuch ſenſe as the words ſeem to import, it is not only erroneous, but withal ſo much to the derogation and defacing of the death and paſſion of Chriſt, that I judge it may and ought moſt worthily to be counted wicked and blaſphemous againſt the moſt precious blood of our Saviour Chriſt.

The Explication.

Concerning the Romiſh maſs which is uſed at this day, or the lively ſacrifice thereof, propitiatory and available for the ſins of the quick and the dead, the holy ſcripture hath not ſo much as one ſyllable.

There is ambiguity alſo in the name of maſs: what it ſignifieth and whether at this day there be any ſuch indeed as the ancient fathers uſed: ſeeing that now there be neither Catechiſts nor Pœnitentes to be ſent away.

Again, touching theſe words [The lively ſacrifice of the church] there is no doubt whether they are to be underſtood figuratively and ſacramentally, for the ſacrament of the lively ſacrifice (after which ſort we deny it not to be in the Lord's ſupper), or properly and without any figure: of the which manner there was but one only ſacrifice, and that once offered, namely upon the altar of the croſs.

Moreover, in theſe words [As well as] it may be doubted whether they be ſpoken in mockage, as men are wont to ſay in ſport, of a fooliſh and ignorant perſon, that he is apt as well in conditions as in knowledge; being apt indeed in neither of them both.

There is alſo a doubt in the word [Propitiable] whether it ſignify here that which taketh away ſin, or that which may be made available for the taking away of ſin; that is to ſay, whether it is to be taken in the active or in the paſſive ſignification.

Now the falſeneſs of the propoſition, after the meaning of the ſchoolmen and the Romiſh church, and impiety in that ſenſe which the words ſeem to import, is this: that they leaning to the foundation of their fond tranſubſtantiation would make the quick and lively body of Chriſt's fleſh (united and knit to the divinity) to lie hid under the accidents, and outward ſhews of bread and wine. Which is very falſe, as I have ſaid afore: and they, building upon this foundation, do hold that the ſame body is offered unto God by the prieſt in his daily maſſings to put away the ſins of the quick and the dead; whereas by the apoſtle to the Hebrews it is evident, that there is but one oblation, and one true and lively ſacrifice of the church offered upon the altar of the croſs, which was, is, and ſhall be for ever the propitiation for the ſins of the whole world: and where there is remiſſion of the ſame, there is (ſaith the apoſtle) no more offering for ſin.

Arguments confirming his anſwer.

No ſacrifice ought to be done, but where the prieſt is meet to offer the ſame.
All other prieſts be unmeet to offer ſacrifice propitiatory for ſin, ſave only Chriſt.
Ergo, No other prieſts ought to ſacrifice for ſin, but Chriſt alone.
The ſecond part of my argument is thus proved.
No honour in God's church ought to be taken where a man is not called, as Aaron.
It is a great honour in God's church to ſacrifice for ſin:
Ergo, No man ought to ſacrifice for ſin, but only they which are called.
But only Chriſt is called to that honour.
Ergo, No other prieſt but Chriſt ought to ſacrifice for ſin.

That no man is called to this degree of honour but Chriſt alone, it is evident. For there are but two only orders of prieſthood allowed in the word of God: namely, the order of Aaron, and the order of Melchiſedech. But now the order of Aaron is come to an end, by reaſon that it was unprofitable, and weak; and of the order of Melchiſedech there is but one prieſt alone, even Chriſt the Lord, which hath a prieſthood that cannot paſs to any other.

An Argument.

That thing is in vain, and to no effect, where no neceſſity is wherefore it is done.
To offer up any more ſacrifice propitiatory for the quick and the dead there is no neceſſity, for Chriſt our Saviour did that fully and perfectly once for all.
Ergo, To do the ſame in the maſs, it is in vain.

Another Argument.

After that eternal redemption is found and obtained, there needeth no more daily offering for the ſame.
But Chriſt coming an high biſhop, &c. found and obtained for us eternal redemption.
Ergo, There needeth now no more daily oblation for the ſins of the quick and the dead.

Another Argument.

All remiſſion of ſins cometh only by ſhedding of blood.
In the maſs there is no ſhedding of blood.
Ergo, In the maſs there is no remiſſion of ſins: and ſo it followeth alſo that there is no propitiatory ſacrifice.

Another Argument.

In the maſs the paſſion of Chriſt is not in verity, but in a myſtery repreſenting the ſame: yea, even there where the Lord's ſupper is duly miniſtered.

But where Chriſt ſuffereth not, there is he not offered in verity: For the apoſtle ſaith, "Not that he might "offer up himſelf oftentimes (for then muſt he have ſuf-"fered oftentimes ſince the beginning of the world,") now where Chriſt is not offered, there is no propitiatory ſacrifice:

Ergo, In the maſs there is no propitiatory ſacrifice: "For Chriſt appeared once in the latter end of the world, "to put ſin to flight by the offering up of himſelf. And "as it is appointed to all men that they ſhall once die, "and then cometh the judgment: even ſo Chriſt was "once offered to take away the ſins of many. And unto "them that look for him ſhall he appear again without "ſin unto ſalvation."

Another Argument.

Where there is any ſacrifice that can make the comers thereunto perfect, there ought men to ceaſe from offering any more expiatory and propitiatory ſacrifices.
But in the New Teſtament there is one only ſacrifice now already long ſince offered, which is able to make the comers thereto perfect for ever.
Ergo, In the New Teſtament they ought to ceaſe from offering any more propitiatory ſacrifices.

Sentences of the ſcripture tending to the ſame end and purpoſe, out of which alſo may be gathered other manifeſt arguments for more confirmation thereof.

"By the which will (ſaith the apoſtle) we are ſanc-"tified, by the offering up of the body of Jeſus Chriſt "once for all." And in the ſame place, "But this "man, after that he had offered one ſacrifice for ſin, "ſitteth for ever at the right hand of God, &c. For "with one offering hath he made perfect for ever them "that are ſanctified, and by himſelf hath he purged our "ſins." I beſeech you to mark theſe words [by himſelf] the which well weighed, will without doubt ceaſe all controverſy.

The apoſtle plainly denieth any other ſacrifice to remain for him that treadeth under his feet the blood of the Teſtament, by the which he was made holy. Chriſt will not be crucified again, he will not his death to be had in deriſion.

"He hath reconciled us in the body of his fleſh." Mark, I beſeech you, he ſaith not, in the myſtery of his body; but in the body of his fleſh.

"If any man ſin, we have an advocate with the Fa-"ther, Jeſus Chriſt the righteous, and he is the propitia-"tion for our ſins, not for ours only, but for the ſins of "the whole world."

I know that all theſe places of the ſcripture are avoided by two manner of ſubtil ſhifts: the one is by the diſtinction of the bloody and unbloody ſacrifice, as though our unbloody ſacrifice of the church were any other than the ſacrifice of praiſe and thankſgiving, than a commemoration, ration, a ſhewing forth, and a ſacramental repreſentation of that one only bloody ſacrifice, offered up once for all.

The other is by depraving and wreſting the ſayings of the ancient fathers unto ſuch a ſtrange kind of ſenſe, as the fathers themſelves indeed never meant. For what the meaning of the fathers was, is evident by that which St. Auguſtine writeth in his epiſtle to Boniface, and in the 83d chapter of his ninth book againſt Fauſtus the Manichee, beſides many other places; likewiſe by Euſebius, Emiſene, Cyprian, Chryſoſtom, Fulgentius, Bertram, and others, which do wholly concord and agree together in this unity in the Lord, that the redemption, once made in verity for the ſalvation of man, continueth in full effect for ever, and worketh without ceaſing, unto the end of the world, that the ſacrifice once offered cannot be conſumed; that the Lord's death and paſſion is as effectual, the virtue of that blood once ſhed as freſh at this day, for the waſhing away of ſins, as it was even the ſame day that it flowed out of the bleſſed ſide of our Saviour: And finally, That the whole ſubſtance of our ſacrifice, which is frequented of the church in the Lord's ſupper, conſiſteth in prayers, praiſe, and giving of thanks, and in remembering and ſhewing forth of that ſacrifice once offered upon the altar of the croſs: that the ſame might continually be had in reverence by myſtery, which once only, and no more, was offered for the price of our redemption.

Theſe are the things (right worſhipful Mr. Prolocutor, and ye the reſt of the commiſſioners) which I could preſently prepare to the anſwering of your three foreſaid propoſitions, being deſtitute of all help in this ſhortneſs of time, ſudden warning, and want of books. Wherefore I appeal to my firſt proteſtation, moſt humbly deſiring the help of the ſame (as much as may be) to be granted unto me. And becauſe ye have lately given moſt unjuſt and cruel ſentence againſt me, I do here appeal (ſo far forth as I may) to a more indifferent and juſt cenſure and judgment of ſome other ſuperior, competent, and lawful judge, and that according to the approved ſtate of the church of England. Howbeit, I confeſs, that I am ignorant what that is at this preſent, through the trouble and alteration of the ſtate of the realm. But if this appeal may not be granted to me upon earth, then do I fly (even as to my only refuge and alone haven of health) to the ſentence of the eternal judge, that is, of the Almighty God, to whoſe moſt merciful juſtice towards us, and moſt juſt mercifulneſs, I do wholly commit myſelf and all my cauſe, nothing at all deſpairing of the defence of mine advocate and alone Saviour Jeſus Chriſt, to whom, with the everlaſting Father, and the Holy Spirit, the Sanctifier of us all, be now and for ever all honour and glory. Amen.

Albeit this learned biſhop was not ſuffered to read all that is above prefixed before the diſputations, yet becauſe he had it then ready, and offered it up to the prolocutor after the diſputations and ſentence pronounced; I thought here the place not unmeet to annex the ſame, together with the reſt. Now let us hear the arguments and anſwers between Dr. Smith and him.

Dr. Smith beginneth to oppoſe.

Smith. You have occaſioned me to go otherwiſe to work with you, than I had thought to have done. Meſeemed you did in your ſuppoſition abuſe the teſtimonies of ſcripture concerning the aſcenſion of Chriſt, to take away his preſence in the ſacrament, as though this were a ſtrong argument to enforce your matter withal.

Chriſt did aſcend into heaven:

Ergo, He is not in the ſacrament.

Now therefore I will go about to diſprove this reaſon of yours.

Chriſt's aſcenſion is no lett to his real preſence in the ſacrament.

Ergo, You are deceived, whereas you do ground yourſelf upon thoſe places.

Rid. You import as though I had made a ſtrange argument by Chriſt's going up into heaven. But howſoever mine argument is made, you collect it not rightly. For it doth not only ſtay upon his aſcenſion, but upon his aſcenſion and his abiding there alſo.

Smith. Chriſt's going up to heaven, and his abiding there, hinder not his real preſence in the ſacrament.

Ergo, You are deceived.

Rid. Of Chriſt's real preſence there may be a double underſtanding: if you take the real preſence of Chriſt according to the real and corporal ſubſtance, which he took of the virgin, that preſence being in heaven, cannot be on the earth alſo. But if you mean a real preſence, according to ſome thing that appertaineth to Chriſt's body, certes [certainly] the aſcenſion and abiding in heaven are no lett at all to that preſence. Wherefore Chriſt's body after that ſort is here preſent to us in the Lord's ſupper; by grace I ſay, as Epiphanius ſpeaketh it.

Weſt. I will cut off from henceforth all equivocation and doubt. For whenſoever we ſpeak of Chriſt's body, we mean that which he took of the virgin.

Rid. Chriſt's aſcenſion and abiding in heaven cannot ſtand with his preſence.

Smith. Chriſt appeared corporally and really on the earth, for all his aſcenſion and continual abode in heaven unto the day of doom.

Ergo, His aſcenſion and abiding in heaven is no lett to his real preſence in the ſacrament.

Rid. Mr. Doctor, this argument is nothing worth. I do not ſtraightly tie Chriſt up in heaven, that he may not to come into the earth at his pleaſure. For when he will, he may come down from heaven, and be on the earth, as it liketh himſelf. Howbeit, I do affirm, That it is not poſſible for him to be both in heaven and earth at one time.

Smith. Mark, I pray you, my maſters that be here, diligently, what he anſwereth. Firſt he ſaith, That the ſitting of Chriſt at the right hand of his Father, is a lett to the real preſence of his body in the ſacrament, and then afterward he flieth from it again.

Rid. I would not have you think that I do imagine or dream upon any ſuch manner of ſitting, as theſe men here ſit in the ſchool.

Smith. Ergo, It is lawful for Chriſt then to be here preſent on the earth, when he will himſelf.

Rid. Yea, when he will, it is lawful indeed.

Smith. Ergo, He aſcending into heaven, doth not reſtrain his real preſence in the ſacrament.

Rid. I do not gainſay, but that it is lawful for him to appear on the earth when he will; but prove you that he will.

Smith. Then your anſwer dependeth upon the will of Chriſt, I perceive: therefore I will join again with you in that ſhort argument.

Chriſt, albeit he doth alway abide in heaven after his aſcenſion, was ſeen really and corporally on earth.

Ergo, Notwithſtanding his aſcenſion and continual ſitting at the right hand of his Father, he may be really and corporally in the ſacrament.

Rid. If the notaries ſhould ſo record your argument, as you have framed it, you peradventure would be aſhamed of it hereafter.

Smith. Chriſt, after his aſcenſion, was ſeen really and corporally upon the earth.

Ergo, Notwithſtanding his aſcenſion and abiding with his Father, he may be corporally in the ſacrament.

Rid. I grant the antecedent, but I deny the conſequence.

Smith. Do you grant the antecedent?

Rid. Yea, I grant the antecedent. I am content to let you have ſo much. Becauſe I know that there be certain ancient fathers of that opinion. I am well content

tent to let you uſe that propoſition as true. And I will frame the argument for you.

He was ſeen on earth after his aſcenſion: Ergo, &c.

Smith. Nay, nay, I will frame it myſelf.

Chriſt after his aſcenſion was ſeen really and corporally on earth, albeit he do abide in heaven continually.

Ergo, Notwithſtanding his aſcenſion and continual abiding at the right hand of the Father, he may be really and corporally on the earth.

Rid. Let us firſt agree about the continual ſitting at the right hand of the Father.

Smith. Doth he ſo ſit at the right hand of his Father, that he doth never forſake the ſame?

Rid. Nay, I do not bind Chriſt in heaven ſo ſtraightly. I ſee you go about to beguile me with your equivocations. Such equivocations are to be diſtinguiſhed. If you mean by his ſitting in heaven, to reign with his Father, he may be both in heaven and alſo in earth. But if ye underſtand his ſitting to be after a corporal manner of ſitting, ſo is he always permanent in heaven. For Chriſt to be corporal here on earth, when corporally he is reſident in heaven, is clean contrary to the holy ſcriptures, as Auſtin ſaith, "The body of Chriſt is in heaven, but his truth is "diſperſed in every place."

Now if continually he abide in heaven after the manner of his corporal preſence, then his perpetual abiding there ſtoppeth or letteth that the ſame corporal preſence of him cannot be in the ſacrament.

Smith. Acts 3. we read that Chriſt ſhall ſit perpetually at the right hand of God, unto the conſumption of the world.

Weſt. I perceive you are come here to this iſſue, whether the body of Chriſt may be together both in earth and in heaven. I will tell you, that Chriſt in very deed is both in earth and in heaven together, and at one time, both one and the ſame natural Chriſt, after the verity and ſubſtance of his very body: Ergo, &c.

Rid. I deny the antecedent.

Weſt. I prove it by two witneſſes. Firſt by Chryſoſtom: "Do we not offer every day? we do ſo indeed, "but doing it for the remembrance of his death. And "this offering is one, and not many. And how is it one, "and not many, which was offered in the holy place: "This ſacrifice is a pattern of that: the ſelf-ſame we al-"ways offer; not now as offering one lamb to-day, and "another to-morrow, but always one and the ſame lamb. "Wherefore here is but one ſacrifice; for elſe by this "means, ſeeing there be many ſacrifices in many places, "be there many Chriſts? Not ſo, but one Chriſt in all "places, both perfect here and perfect there, one only "body." Now thus I argue.

We offer one thing at all times.

There is one Chriſt in all places, both here compleat and there compleat.

Ergo, By Chryſoſtom there is one body both in heaven and earth.

Rid. I remember the place well. Theſe things make nothing againſt me.

Weſt. One Chriſt is in all places, here full and there full.

Rid. One Chriſt is in all places; but not one body in all places.

Weſt. One body, ſaith Chryſoſtom.

Rid. But not after the manner of bodily ſubſtance he is in all places, nor by circumſcription of place. For [hic and illic] here and there, in Chryſoſtom, do aſſign no place, as Auguſtine ſaith; "The Lord is above, but the "truth of the Lord is in all places."

Weſt. You cannot ſo eſcape. He ſaith not the verity of Chriſt is one; but one Chriſt is in all places, both here and there.

Rid. One ſacrifice is in all places, becauſe of the unity of him whom the ſacrifice doth ſignify: not that the ſacrifices be all one and the ſame.

Weſt. Ergo, By your ſaying, it is not Chriſt, but the ſacrifice of Chriſt.

But Chryſoſtom ſaith, One body and one Chriſt is there, and not one ſacrifice.

Rid. I ſay, that both Chriſt and the ſacrifice of Chriſt is there: Chriſt by ſpirit, grace, and verity; the ſacrifice by ſignification.

Thus I grant with Chryſoſtom, that there is one hoſt or ſacrifice, and not many: and this our hoſt is called one, by reaſon of the unity of that one, which one only all our hoſts do repreſent. The only hoſt was never other, but that which was once offered on the altar of the croſs, of which hoſt all our hoſts are but ſacramental examples.

And where you alledge out of Chryſoſtom, that Chriſt is offered in many places at once, both here full Chriſt, and there full Chriſt: I grant it to be true, that is, that Chriſt is offered in many places at once, in a myſtery and ſacramentally, and that he is full Chriſt in all thoſe places, but not after the corporal ſubſtance of our fleſh which he took, but after the benediction which giveth life; and he is given to the godly receivers in bread and wine, as Cyril ſpeaketh; concerning the oblation of Chriſt, whereof Chryſoſtom here ſpeaketh, he himſelf doth clearly ſhew what he meaneth thereby, in ſaying by the way of correction, "We always do the ſelf-ſame, howbeit by the re-"cordation or remembrance of his ſacrifice."

Weſt. The ſecond witneſs is Bernard in a ſermon that he made of the ſupper of the Lord, who ſaith, "How "cometh this to us, moſt gentle Jeſus, that we ſilly "worms creeping on the face of the earth, that we, I "ſay, which are but duſt and aſhes, may deſerve to have "thee preſent in our hands, and before our eyes, who "both together, full and whole, doſt ſit at the right hand "of the Father, and who alſo in the moment of one "hour, from the riſing of the ſun to the going down of "the ſame, art preſent one and the ſelf-ſame in many "and divers places?"

Rid. Theſe words of Bernard make for you nothing at all. But I know that Bernard was in ſuch a time, that in this matter he may worthily be ſuſpected. He hath many good and fruitful ſayings; as alſo in the ſame foreſaid place by you alledged. But yet he followed in ſuch an age, when as the doctrine of the holy ſupper was ſore perverted. Notwithſtanding, yet I will ſo expound him, rather than reject him, that he ſhall make nothing for you at all. He ſaith, That we have Chriſt in a myſtery, in a ſacrament, under a veil or cover, but hereafter ſhall have him without veil or cover. In the mean time, here now he ſaith, That the verity of Chriſt is every where. The verity of Chriſt is both here and there, and in all places.

Weſt. What do you call verity? He ſaith not the verity of Chriſt, but the verity of the body of Chriſt.

Rid. The verity of the body of Chriſt is the true faith of the body of Chriſt: after that verity he is with them which truly believe upon him.

Weſt. Chriſt is one and the ſame in divers places. I urge theſe words [in divers places,] and yet I am not ſatisfied.

Smith. Chriſt was ſeen really and corporally on the earth after his aſcenſion, and continually ſitting at the right hand of the Father.

Ergo, The aſcenſion and perpetual ſitting in heaven hinder nothing, but that he may be really and corporally in the ſacrament.

Rid. If by perpetual ſitting you mean the reſidence of his body in heaven, your reaſon containeth manifeſt contradiction.

Smith. Theſe two have no contradiction in them at all, both to ſit continually at his Father's right hand, and alſo to be ſeen here really on earth after his aſcenſion. Firſt, You will give me that Chriſt ſitteth in heaven at the right hand of his Father. For ſo it is written, Acts 5.

" Heaven muſt needs receive him unto the time of re-
" ſtoring of all, &c." Secondly, he was alſo ſeen of Paul here corporally on earth.

Wherefore theſe two do import, as ye ſee, no contradiction.

Rid. What letteth, but that Chriſt, if it pleaſe him, and when it pleaſeth him, may be in heaven and in earth, and appear to whom he will? And yet notwithſtanding you have not yet proved that he will ſo do. And though Chriſt continually ſhall be reſident in heaven unto the judgment, yet there may be ſome intermiſſion, that notwithſtanding. But this controverſy, as I ſaid, is amongſt all the ancient doctors and writers. And that Chriſt hath been here ſeen, that they grant all: but whether then he being in earth or in heaven, that is doubtful.

Smith. I will prove that he would appear in earth.

He ſo would, and alſo did appear here in earth after his aſcenſion: Ergo, &c.

Rid. He appeared, I grant; but how he appeared, whether then being in heaven or in earth, that is uncertain. So he appeared to Stephen, being then corporally ſitting in heaven. For, ſpeaking after the true manner of man's body, when he is in heaven, he is not the ſame time in earth; and when he is in earth, he is not the ſame time corporally in heaven.

Smith. Chriſt hath been both in heaven and in earth all at one time.

Ergo, You are deceived in denying that.

Rid. I do not utterly deny Chriſt here to have been ſeen on earth. Of uncertain things I ſpeak uncertainly.

Smith. He was ſeen of Paul, as being born before his time, after his aſcending up to heaven, 1 Cor. 15.

But his viſion was a corporal viſion:

Ergo, He was ſeen corporally upon the earth after his aſcending into heaven.

Rid. He was ſeen really and corporally indeed: but whether being in heaven or earth, is a doubt. And of doubtful things we muſt judge doubtfully. Howbeit you muſt prove that he was in heaven at the ſame time, when he was corporally on earth.

Smith. I would know of you, whether this viſion may inforce the reſurrection of Chriſt?

Rid. I account this a ſound and firm argument to prove the reſurrection. But whether they ſaw him in heaven or in earth, I am in doubt: and to ſay the truth, it maketh no great matter. Both ways the argument is of like ſtrength. For whether he were ſeen in heaven, or whether he were ſeen on earth, either of both maketh ſufficiently for the matter. Certain it is, he roſe again: for he could not have been ſeen, unleſs he had riſen again.

Smith. Paul ſaw him as he was here converſant on earth, and not out of heaven, as you affirm.

Rid. You run to the beginning again: that you take for granted, which you ſhould have proved.

Smith. You make delays for the nonce.

Rid. Say not ſo, I pray you. Thoſe that hear us be learned: they can tell both what you oppoſe, and what I anſwer well enough, I warrant you.

Treſh. He was ſeen after ſuch ſort, as that he might be heard.

Ergo, He was corporally on the earth, or elſe how could he be heard?

Rid. He that found the means for Stephen to behold him in heaven, even he could bring to paſs well enough, that Paul might hear him out of heaven.

Smith. As other ſaw him, ſo Paul ſaw him.

Other did ſee him viſibly and corporally on earth.

Ergo, Paul ſaw him viſibly and corporally on earth.

Rid. I grant he was ſeen viſibly and corporally: but yet have you not proved that he was ſeen in earth.

Smith. He was ſeen of him as of other.

But he was ſeen of other being on earth, and appeared viſibly to them on earth:

Ergo, He was ſeen of Paul on earth.

Rid. Your controverſy is about [exiſtens in terra,] that is, being on earth: if [exiſtere,] to be, be referred as unto the place, I deny that Chriſt after that ſort was on earth. But if it be referred to the verity of the body, then I grant it. Moreover, I ſay that Chriſt was ſeen of men in earth after his aſcenſion, it is certain: for he was ſeen of Stephen; he was ſeen alſo of Paul. But whether he deſcended unto the earth, or whether he being in heaven did reveal or manifeſt himſelf to Paul, when Paul was wrapt into the third heaven, I know that ſome contend about it: and the ſcripture, as far as I have read or heard, doth not determine it. Wherefore we cannot but judge uncertainly of thoſe things which be uncertain.

Smith. We have Egeſippus and Linus againſt you, which teſtify that Chriſt appeared corporally on the earth to Peter after his aſcenſion. " Peter, overcome with the " requeſts and mournings of the people, which deſired
" him to get him out of the city, becauſe of Nero's lying " in wait for him, began without company to convey " himſelf away from thence: And when he was come " to the gate, he ſeeth Chriſt come to meet him, and " worſhipping him, he ſaid, Maſter, whither walk you?
" Chriſt anſwered, I am come again to be crucified."
Linus writing of the paſſion of Peter, hath the ſelf-ſame ſtory. St. Ambroſe hath the ſame likewiſe, and alſo Abdias, ſcholar to the apoſtles, which ſaw Chriſt before his aſcending into heaven. With what face therefore dare you affirm it to be a thing uncertain, which theſe men do manifeſtly witneſs to have been done?

Rid. I ſaid before that the doctors in that matter did vary.

Smith. Do you think this ſtory is not certain, being approved by ſo ancient and probable authority?

Rid. I do ſo think, becauſe I take and eſteem not their words for the words of ſcripture. And though I did grant you that ſtory to be certain, yet it maketh not againſt me.

Smith. Such things as be certain, and approved of them, you do reject as things uncertain.

Rid. The ſtory of Linus is not of ſo great authority; although I am not ignorant that Euſebius ſo writeth alſo in the ſtory of the church. And yet I account not theſe men's reports ſo ſure as the canonical ſcriptures. Albeit if at any time he had to any man appeared here on the earth after his aſcenſion, that doth not diſprove my ſaying. For I go not about to tie Chriſt up in fetters (as ſome do untruly report of us), but that he may be ſeen upon the earth according to his divine pleaſure, whenſoever it liketh him. But we affirm, that it is contrary to the nature of his manhood, and the true manner of his body, that he ſhould be together and at one inſtant both in heaven and earth, according to his corporal ſubſtance. And the perpetual ſitting at the right hand of the Father, may (I grant) be taken for the ſtability of Chriſt's kingdom, and his continual or everlaſting equality with his Father in the glory of heaven.

Smith. Now whereas you boaſt that your faith is the very faith of the ancient church, I will ſhew here that it is not ſo; but that it doth directly ſtrive againſt the faith of the old fathers, I will bring in Chryſoſtom for this point. " Eliſeus received the mantle, as a right great " inheritance. For it was indeed a right excellent in" heritance, and more precious than any gold beſide.
" And the ſame was a double Helias: He was both " Helias above, and Helias beneath. I know well you " think that juſt man to be happy, and you would gladly
" be every one of you as he is. What will you then
" ſay if I ſhall declare unto you a certain other thing,
" which all we that are endued with theſe holy myſteries
" do receive much more than that? Helias indeed left
" his mantle to his ſcholar: But the Son of God aſ-
" cending did leave here his fleſh unto us. Helias left it,
" putting off the ſame: but Chriſt both left it to us, and
" aſcended alſo to heaven, having it with him."

Rid. I grant that Chriſt did both; that is, both took up his fleſh with him aſcending up, and alſo did leave the ſame behind him with us, but after a diverſe manner and reſpect. For he took his fleſh with him, after the true and corporal ſubſtance of his body and fleſh: again, he left the ſame in myſtery to the faithful in the ſupper, to be received after a ſpiritual communication, and by grace. Neither is the ſame received in the ſupper only, but alſo at other times, by hearing the goſpel, and by faith. For, The bread which we break, is the communication of the body of Chriſt: And generally, Unleſs ye eat the fleſh of the Son of man, and drink his blood, ye ſhall have no life in you.

Smith. Chryſoſtom ſaith: "O miracle, O good will "of God! He that ſitteth above at the ſacrifice time, is "contained in the hands of men." Or elſe as other have tranſlated it, thus: "O miracle, O the gentleneſs "of God! He that ſitteth above with the Father, is "handled with the hands of all men at the very ſame "moment of time, and doth himſelf deliver himſelf to "them that are deſirous to take and embrace him."

Rid. He that ſitteth there is here preſent in myſtery and by grace, and is holden of the godly, ſuch as communicate him, not only ſacramentally with the hand of the body, but much more wholeſomely with the hand of the heart, and by inward drinking is received; but by the ſacramental ſignification he is holden of all men.

Seaton. Where is then the miracle if he be only preſent through his grace and myſtery only?

Rid. Yes, there is a miracle, good Sir, Chriſt is not idle in his ſacraments. Is not the miracle great, trow you, when bread, which is wont to ſuſtain the body, becometh food to the ſoul? He that underſtandeth not that miracle, he underſtandeth not the force of that myſtery. God grant we may every one of us underſtand his truth, and obey the ſame.

Smith. Chryſoſtom calleth it a miracle, that Chriſt ſitteth at the right hand of God in heaven, and at the ſame time is held in the hands of men; not that he is handled with the hands of men: only in a myſtery, and is with them through grace. Therefore while you deny that, you are altogether deceived, and ſtray far from the truth.

Harpſ. The former part of Chryſoſtom is not to be let ſlip. Let me, before I begin, aſk this one queſtion of you. Is it not a great matter that Elias left his cloak or mantle, and the gift of his prophecy to his ſcholar?

Rid. Yes ſurely, it is a great matter.

Harpſ. Did not Elias then leave great grace?

Rid. He did ſo.

Harpſ. But Chriſt left a far greater grace than Elias: for he could not both leave his cloak and take it with him; Chriſt doth both in his fleſh.

Rid. I am well content to grant, that Chriſt left much greater things to us than Elias to Eliſeus, albeit he be ſaid to have left his double ſpirit with him; for that the ſtrength and grace of the body of Chriſt, which Chriſt aſcending up here left us, is the only ſalvation and life of all men which ſhall be ſaved: which life Chriſt hath here left unto us, to be received by faith through the hearing of the word, and the right adminiſtration of the ſacraments. This virtue and grace Chryſoſtom, after the phraſe and manner of John the evangeliſt, calleth Chriſt's fleſh.

Harpſ. But Chriſt performed a great matter. He carried up, and left behind, You underſtand not the compariſon. The compariſon is in this, That Elias left his mantle, and carried it not with him; Chriſt left his fleſh behind him, and carried it with him alſo.

Rid. True it is, and I myſelf did affirm no leſs before. Now where you ſeem to ſpeak many things, indeed you bring no new things at all. Let there be a compariſon between grace and grace, then Chriſt gave the far greater grace, when he did inſert or graft us into his fleſh.

Harpſ. If you will give me leave, I will aſk you this queſtion. If Chryſoſtom would have meant ſo, that Chriſt left his body in the euchariſt, what plainer words think you, or more evident, could he have uſed than theſe?

Rid. Theſe things be not of ſo great force as they bear a great ſhew outwardly. He might alſo have uſed groſſer words, if he had liſted to have uttered his mind ſo groſly: for he was an eloquent man. Now he ſpeaketh after the manner of other doctors, which of myſtical matters ſpeak myſtically; and of ſacraments, ſacramentally.

Harpſ. The compariſon lieth in this; That which was impoſſible to Elias, is poſſible with Chriſt.

Rid. I grant it was poſſible to Chriſt, which was to the other impoſſible. Elias left his cloak: Chriſt both left his fleſh and took it with him.

Harpſ. Elias left behind him, and could not take with him: Chriſt both left behind him, and alſo took with him: except you will ſay the compariſon here made to be nothing.

Rid. He took up his fleſh with him to heaven, and left here the communion of his fleſh in earth.

Weſt. You underſtand in the firſt place his fleſh for very true fleſh; and in the ſecond place for grace, and communion of his fleſh: and why do you not underſtand it in the ſecond place alſo for his true fleſh? I will make it evident how blockiſh and groſs your anſwer is.

Rid. Theſe be taunts and reproaches, not beſeeming, as I think, the modeſty of this ſchool.

Weſt. Elias left his cloak to his diſciples; but the Son of God going up to heaven, left his fleſh. But Elias certainly left his cloak behind, and Chriſt likewiſe his fleſh, and yet aſcending he carried the ſame with him too. By which words we make this reaſon:

Chriſt left his fleſh to his diſciples, and yet for all that he took the ſame up with him:

Ergo, He is preſent here with us.

Here Dr. Weſton crying to the people, ſaid unto them, Mr. Doctor anſwereth it after this faſhion;

He carried his fleſh into heaven, and he left the communion of his fleſh behind. Aſſuredly the anſwer is too unlearned.

Rid. I am glad you ſpeak in Engliſh. Surely, I wiſh that all the whole world might underſtand your reaſons and my anſwers. He left his fleſh. This you underſtand of his fleſh, and I underſtand the ſame of grace. He carried his fleſh into heaven, and left behind the communion of his fleſh unto us.

Weſt. Ye judges, what think you of this anſwer?

Judges. It is ridiculous and a very fond anſwer.

Rid. Well I take your words patiently for Chriſt's cauſe.

Weſt. Weſton here cited a place; We are ſprinkled with the blood of Chriſt.

Rid. Mr. Doctor, it is the ſame blood, but yet ſpiritually received, and indeed all the prophets were ſprinkled with the ſame blood, but yet ſpiritually I ſay, and by grace. And whatſoever they be that are not ſprinkled with this blood, they cannot be partakers of the everlaſting ſalvation.

Weſt. Here I bring Bernard unto you again, "Even "from the weſt unto the eaſt, from the north unto the "ſouth, there is one and the ſelf-ſame Chriſt in many "and divers places."

Rid. The anſwer is ſoon made, that one Chriſt is here and in divers places. For God according to his majeſty, and according to his providence, as St. Auguſtine ſaith, is every where with the godly, according to his inviſible and unſpeakable grace. Or elſe, if ye would underſtand Bernard according to the corporal preſence, how monſtrous, or huge, and giant-like a body would you then make Chriſt's body to be, which would reach even from north to ſouth, from weſt to eaſt?

Weſt. Nay, nay, you make a monſtrous anſwer, and unlearned.

Ward. Before I come in with thoſe reaſons which I had had purpoſed to bring againſt you, I am minded to come again to Mr. Doctor's argument, by which you being brought into the briars, ſeemed to doubt of Chriſt's preſence on the earth. To the proof of which matter I will bring nothing elſe, than that which was agreed upon in the cathechiſm of the ſynod of London, ſet out not long ago by you.

Rid. Sir, I give you to wit, before you go any farther, that I did ſet out no catechiſm.

Weſt. Yes, you made one ſubſcribe to it, when you were a biſhop in your ruff.

Rid. I compelled no man to ſubſcribe.

Ward. Yes, by rood, you are the very author of that hereſy.

Rid. I put forth no catechiſm.

Cole. Did you never conſent to the ſetting out of thoſe things which you allowed?

Rid. I grant that I ſaw the book: but I deny that I wrote it. I peruſed it after it was made, and I noted many things for it. So I conſented to the book; I was not the author of it.

Judges. The catechiſm is ſo ſet forth, as though the whole convocation houſe had agreed to it. Cranmer ſaid yeſterday, that you made it.

Rid. I think ſurely, that he would not ſay ſo.

Ward. The catechiſm hath this clauſe; If viſibly on the earth.

Rid. I anſwer that thoſe articles were ſet out, I both witting and conſenting to them. Mine own hand will teſtify the ſame, and Mr. Cranmer put his hand to them likewiſe, and gave to other afterward. Now, as for the place you alledged out of it, that may eaſily be expounded, and without any inconvenience.

Ward. Chriſt is the power and virtue of his Father.

Ergo, He was not of ſo little ſtrength, that he could not bring to paſs whatſoever he would himſelf.

Rid. I grant.

Ward. Chriſt was the wiſdom of the Father.

Ergo, That he ſpake, he ſpake wiſely, and ſo as every man might underſtand: neither was it his mind to ſpeak one thing inſtead of another.

Rid. All this I grant.

Ward. Chriſt was likewiſe the very truth: Ergo, He made and performed indeed that which he intended to make. And likewiſe it is, that he doth neither deceive, nor could be deceived, nor yet would go about to deceive other.

Weſt. Hilarius hath theſe words: "All God's words "or ſayings are true, and neither idly placed, or unpro- "fitably, but fiery, and wonderful fiery, without all "doubtfulneſs of ſuperfluous vanity, that there may be "nothing thought to be there, which is not abſolute and "proper."

Ward. He is the truth of the Father: Ergo, He can neither deceive, nor yet be deceived; eſpecially I mean when he ſpake at his latter end, and his Teſtament.

Rid. Chriſt is the very truth of the Father: and I perceive well to what ſcope you drive your reaſon. This is but a far fetched compaſs of words. If that theſe words of Chriſt, This is my body, which you mean, be rightly underſtood, they are moſt true.

Ward. He took, he brake, he gave, &c. What took he?

Rid. Bread, his body.

Ward. What brake he?

Rid. Bread.

Ward. What gave he?

Rid. Bread.

Ward. Gave he bread made of wheat, and material bread?

Rid. I know not whether he gave bread of wheat; but he gave true and material bread.

Ward. I will prove the contrary by ſcriptures.

He delivered to them that which he bade them take.

But he bade not them take material bread, but his own body.

Ergo, He gave not material bread, but his own body.

Rid. I deny the minor. For he bade them take his body ſacramentally in material bread, and after that ſort it was both bread which he bade them take, becauſe the ſubſtance was bread; and it was alſo his body, becauſe it was the ſacrament of his body, for the ſanctifying and the coming of the Holy Ghoſt, which is always aſſiſtant to thoſe myſteries which were inſtituted of Chriſt, and lawfully adminiſtered.

Harpſ. What is he that ſo ſaith, By the coming unto of the Holy Spirit?

Rid. I have Theophylact for mine author for this manner of ſpeaking. And here I bring him, that ye may underſtand that phraſe not to be mine, upon Matthew 26. Furthermore the ſaid Theophylact writing upon theſe words, This is my body, ſheweth, that the body of the Lord is bread, which is ſanctified on the altar.

Ogle. That place of Theophylact maketh openly againſt you. For he ſaith in that place, that Chriſt ſaid not, This is the figure of my body, but my body. For, ſaith he, by an unſpeakable operation it is transformed, although it ſeem to us to be bread.

Rid. It is not a figure, that is to ſay, Non tantum eſt figura; that is, It is not only a figure of his body.

Weſt. Where have you that word [Tantum] only?

Rid. It is not in that place, but he hath it in another; and Auguſtine doth ſo ſpeak many times, and other doctors more.

Weſt. Here Weſton repeating the words of Theophylact in Engliſh, ſaid, He ſaith it is no figure, and you ſay it is a figure.

And the ſame Theophylact ſaith moreover, that the converting or turning of the bread is made into the Lord's fleſh.

That which Chriſt gave, we do give.

But that which he gave was not a figure of his body.

Ergo, We give no figure, but his body.

As concerning the authority of Theophylact, what he thought and might have ſpoken of that author, Dr. Ridley did not then ſpeak, nor could conveniently (as he himſelf afterward declared, reporting and writing with his own hand the diſputations in the priſon) becauſe of the uproars and clamours, which were ſo great, and he of ſo many called upon, that he could not anſwer as he would, and what he thought touching the authority of Theophylact, but anſwered ſimply to that which is brought out of that author on this ſort.

I grant, quoth he, the bread to be converted and turned into the fleſh of Chriſt, but not by tranſubſtantiation, but by a ſacramental converſion or turning. It is transformed, ſaith Theophylact, in the ſame place, by a myſtical benediction, and by the acceſſion or coming of the Holy Ghoſt unto the fleſh of Chriſt. He ſaith not, by expulſion or driving away the ſubſtance of bread, and by ſubſtituting or putting in its place the corporal ſubſtance of Chriſt's fleſh. And where he ſaith, It is not a figure of the body, we ſhould underſtand that ſaying, as he himſelf doth elſewhere add [only,] that is, it is no naked or bare figure only. For Chriſt is preſent in his myſteries, neither at any time, as Cyprian ſaith, doth the Divine Majeſty abſent himſelf from the Divine Myſteries.

Weſt. You put in [only,] and that is one lye. And I tell you farther, Peter Martyr was fain to deny the author, becauſe the place was ſo plain againſt him. But mark his words, how he ſaith, It is no figure, but his fleſh.

Rid. To take his words, and not his meaning, is to do injury to the author.

Hard. No other doctor maketh more againſt you; for the words in Greek are μεταστοιχείται which is in Latin, Tranſelementatur; that is, turned from one element into another.

another. And ſhewing the cauſe why it is in form of bread, he ſaith, "Becauſe we are infirm, and abhor to "eat the raw fleſh, ſpecially the fleſh of man; therefore "it appeareth bread, but it is fleſh."

Rid. That word hath not that ſtrength which you ſeem to give it. You ſtrain it overmuch, and yet it maketh not ſo much for your purpoſe. For the ſame author hath in another place, ἡμεῖς μεταστοιχειούμεθα; that is, We are tranſelemented, or transformed, and changed into the body of Chriſt. And ſo by that word, in ſuch meaning as you ſpeak of, I could prove as well that we are transformed indeed into the very body of Chriſt.

Ward. Learned Mr. Doctor, thus you expound the place, This is my body; that is, a figure of my body.

Rid. Although I know there be ſome that ſo expound it, yet that expoſition is not full to expreſs the whole.

Ward. My ſheep hear my voice, and follow me.

But all the ſheep of Chriſt hear his voice, This is my body, without a figure:

Ergo, The voice of Chriſt here hath no figure.

Rid. The ſheep of Chriſt follow the voice of Chriſt, unleſs they be ſeduced and deceived through ignorance.

Ward. But the fathers took this place for no figurative ſpeech.

Rid. Yet they do all number this place among figurative and tropical ſpeeches.

Ward. Juſtin Martyr in his ſecond apology hath thus: ἐ γὰρ ὡς κοινὸν ἄρτον οὐδὲ κοινὸν πόμα ταῦτα λαμβάνομεν, ἀλλ' ὃν τρόπον διὰ λόγου Θεοῦ σαρκοποιηθεὶς Ἰησοῦς Χριστὸς ὁ σωτὴρ ἡμῶν, καὶ σάρκα καὶ αἷμα ὑπὸ σωτηρίας ἡμῶν ἔσχεν, οὕτω καὶ τὴν δι' εὐχῆς λόγου τοῦ παρ' αὐτοῦ εὐχαριστηθεῖσαν τροφὴν, ἐξ ἧς αἷμα καὶ σάρκες κατὰ μεταβολὴν τρέφονται ἡμῶν, ἐκεῖνα τοῦ σαρκοποιηθέντος Ἰησοῦ καὶ σάρκα καὶ αἷμα ἐδιδάχθημεν εἶναι.

This place Cranmer hath corrupted: thus it is engliſhed. "For we do not take this for common bread and drink, "but like as Jeſus Chriſt our Saviour incarnate by the "Word of God, had fleſh and blood for our ſalvation; "even ſo we be taught the food wherewith our fleſh and "blood is nouriſhed by alteration, when it is conſecrated "by the prayer of his Word, to be the fleſh and blood "of the ſame Jeſus incarnate."

Dr. Cranmer hath thus tranſlated it: "Bread, water, "and wine, are not to be taken as other common meats "and drinks be, but they be ordained purpoſely to give "thanks to God, and therefore be called Euchariſtia, "and be called the body and blood of Chriſt; and that "it is lawful for none to eat and drink of them, but ſuch "as profeſs Chriſt, and live according to the ſame: and "yet the ſame meat and drink is changed into our fleſh "and blood, and nouriſheth our bodies."

Rid. O good Mr. Doctor, go ſincerely to work: I know that place, and I know how it is uſed.

Ward. Ward here repeated the place again out of Juſtin, We are taught, &c. as above.

Rid. O what upright dealing is this! I have the ſelf-ſame place of Juſtin here copied out. You know yourſelf, which are ſkilful in Greek, how the words here be removed out of the right place, and without any juſt cauſe.

Ward. I ſtand ſtill upon mine argument. What ſay you?

Rid. If you will that I ſhould anſwer to Juſtin, then you muſt hear. I have but one tongue, I cannot anſwer at once to you all.

Weſt. Chriſt gave us his very and true fleſh to be eaten.

But he never gave it to be eaten but in his laſt ſupper, and in the ſacrament of the altar:

Ergo, There is the very fleſh of Chriſt.

Rid. If you ſpeak of the very true fleſh of Chriſt, after the ſubſtance of his fleſh taken in the womb of the virgin Mary, and not by grace and ſpiritually, I then do deny the firſt part of your reaſon. But if you underſtand it of the true fleſh, after grace and ſpiritual communication, I then grant the firſt part, and deny the ſecond. For he giveth unto us truly his fleſh, to be eaten of all that believe in him. For he is the very and true meat of the ſoul, wherewith we are fed unto everlaſting life, according to his ſaying, My fleſh is meat indeed, &c.

Ward. "I have deſired with my hearty deſire to eat "this paſchal with you." What paſchal, I pray you, deſired he to eat? If you ſtand in doubt, you have Tertullian againſt Marcion: "He therefore proteſting a "great deſire to eat his paſchal, his own paſchal, I ſay "(for it was not meet that he ſhould deſire any other "than his own), taking bread and diſtributing it to his "diſciples, made it his body, ſaying, This is my "body," &c.

What ſay you? Did he underſtand by this paſchal the Judaical lamb, or by that which afterwards he gave in his ſupper?

Rid. I ſuppoſe that the firſt he underſtood of the Judaical paſſover, and afterward of the euchariſt.

Ward. Nay then Tertullian is againſt you, which ſaith: He deſired to eat his paſſover.

But the Judaical paſſover was not his, but ſtrange from Chriſt:

Ergo, He meant not of the Judaical paſſover.

Rid. The Judaical paſſover was not ſtrange from Chriſt, but his own: Inſomuch as he is the Lord of all; and as well the Lord of the Judaical paſſover, as of his own ſupper.

Ward. What anſwer you then to Tertullian, the which ſaith, He deſired to eat his own paſſover, and not the Jewiſh paſſover, which ſtood upon words without fleſh?

Rid. Tertullian may here dally in ſenſe analogical. I know that Cyprian hath theſe words; "He began then "to inſtitute the holy euchariſt, but both were Chriſt's."

Ward. Auguſtine, in Pſalm 96. writing upon theſe words, "Worſhip his footſtool, &c." "I aſk (ſaith he) "what is the footſtool of his feet? and the ſcripture "telleth me, The earth is the footſtool of my feet. And "ſo in ſearching thereof I turn myſelf to Chriſt, becauſe "I ſeek him here in the earth, and find how, without "impiety, the footſtool of his feet may be worſhipped; "for he took earth of earth, in that he is fleſh and earth, "and of the fleſh of Mary he took fleſh, and becauſe "that in the ſame fleſh here he walked, and alſo he gave "the ſame fleſh to us to be eaten unto ſalvation. But "no man eateth that fleſh except he have worſhipped "before. And ſo it is found, how ſuch a footſtool of "the feet of the Lord is to be worſhipped, ſo that not "only we ſin in not worſhipping, but alſo do ſin in not "worſhipping the ſame."

He gave to us his fleſh to be eaten, the which he took of the earth, in which alſo here he walked, &c:

But he never gave his fleſh to be eaten, but when he gave it at his ſupper, ſaying, This is my body:

Ergo, In the euchariſt he gave us his fleſh.

Rid. You do alledge the place of Auſtin upon the 98th Pſalm, where he ſaith, that Chriſt gave his fleſh to be eaten which he took of the earth, and in which here he walked, inferring hereupon that Chriſt never gave the ſame his fleſh to be eaten, but only in the euchariſt: I deny your minor; for he gave it both in the euchariſt to be eaten, and alſo otherwiſe, as well in the word, as alſo upon the croſs.

Smith. What if Auguſtine ſay, that Chriſt did not only give himſelf to us in a figure, but gave his own very fleſh indeed and really?

Rid. I never ſaid that Chriſt gave only a figure of his body. For indeed he gave himſelf in a real communication, that is, he gave his fleſh after a communication of his fleſh.

Weſt. Here Weſton read the place of Auguſtine in Engliſh, and afterward ſaid: Ye ſay, Chriſt gave not his body, but a figure of his body.

Rid. I ſay not ſo, I ſay he gave his own body verily. But he gave it by a real, effectual, and ſpiritual communication.

After this, Dr. Glin began to reaſon, who (notwithſtanding Mr. Ridley had always taken him for his old friend) made a very contumelious preface againſt him. This preface Mr. Ridley therefore did the more take to heart, becauſe it proceeded from him. Howbeit he thought that Dr. Glin's mind was to ſerve the time. For afterward he came to the houſe wherein Mr. Ridley was kept, and, as far as Mr. Ridley could call to remembrance, before Dr. Young and Dr. Oglethorpe he deſired him to pardon his words. The which Mr. Ridley did even from the very heart, and wiſhed earneſtly, that God would give not only to him, but unto all other, the true and evident knowledge of God's evangelical ſincerity, that all offences put apart, they being perfectly and fully reconciled, might agree and meet together in the houſe of the heavenly Father.

Glin. I ſee that you elude or ſhift away all ſcriptures and fathers; I will go to work with you after another ſort.

Chriſt hath here his church known in earth, of which you were once a child, although now you ſpeak contumeliouſly of the ſacraments.

Rid. This is a grievous contumely, that you call me a ſhifter away of the ſcripture, and of the doctors: as touching the ſacraments, I never yet ſpake contumeliouſly of them. I grant that Chriſt hath here his church in earth; but that church did ever receive and acknowledge the euchariſt to be a ſacrament of the body of Chriſt, yet not the body of Chriſt really, but the body of Chriſt by grace.

Glin. Then I aſk this queſtion; Whether the catholic church hath ever or at any time been idolatrous?

Rid. The church is the pillar and ſtay of the truth, that never yet hath been idolatrous in reſpect of the whole: but peradventure in reſpect of ſome part thereof, which ſometimes may be ſeduced by evil paſtors, and through ignorance.

Glin. That church ever hath worſhipped the fleſh of Chriſt in the euchariſt.

But the church hath never been idolatrous:

Ergo, It hath always judged the fleſh of Chriſt to be in the euchariſt.

Rid. And I alſo worſhip Chriſt in the ſacrament, but not becauſe he is included in the ſacrament, like as I worſhip Chriſt alſo in the ſcriptures, not becauſe he is really included in them. Notwithſtanding I ſay, that the body of Chriſt is preſent in the ſacrament, but yet ſacramentally and ſpiritually, according to his grace giving life, and in that reſpect really, that is, according to his benediction giving life.

Furthermore, I acknowledge gladly the true body of Chriſt to be in the Lord's ſupper, in ſuch ſort as the church of Chriſt (which is the ſpouſe of Chriſt, and is taught of the Holy Ghoſt, and guided by God's word) doth acknowledge the ſame. But the true church of Chriſt doth acknowledge a preſence of Chriſt's body in the Lord's ſupper to be communicated to the godly, by grace, and ſpiritually, as I have often ſhewed, and by a ſacramental ſignification, but not by the corporal preſence of the body of his fleſh.

Glin. Auſtin ſaith: "Some there were which thought "us, inſtead of bread and of the cup, to worſhip Ceres "and Bacchus."

Upon this place I gather, that there was an adoration of the ſacrament among the fathers; and Eraſmus, in an epiſtle to the brethren of Low-Germany, ſaith, that the worſhipping of the ſacrament was before Auſtin and Cyprian.

Rid. We do handle the ſigns reverently: but we worſhip the ſacrament as a ſacrament, not as a thing ſignified by the ſacrament, Glin. What is the ſymbol or ſacrament?

Rid. Bread.

Glin. Ergo, We worſhip bread.

Rid. There is a deceit in this word [Adoramus.] We worſhip the ſymbols, when reverently we handle them. We worſhip Chriſt whereſoever we perceive his benefits. But we underſtand his benefit to be greateſt in the ſacrament.

Glin. So I may fall down before the bench here, and worſhip Chriſt: and if any man aſk me what I do, I may anſwer, I worſhip Chriſt.

Rid. We adore and worſhip Chriſt in the euchariſt. And if you mean the external ſacrament; I ſay, that alſo is to be worſhipped as a ſacrament.

Glin. So was the faith of the primitive church.

Rid. Would to God we would all follow the faith of that church.

Glin. Think you that Chriſt hath now his church?

Rid. I do ſo.

Glin. But all the church adoreth Chriſt, verily, and really in the ſacrament.

Rid. You know yourſelf that the eaſtern church would not acknowledge tranſubſtantiation, as appeareth in the council of Florence.

Cole. That is falſe. For in the ſame they did acknowledge tranſubſtantiation, although they would not intreat of the matter, for that they had not in their commiſſion ſo to do.

Rid. Nay, they would determine nothing of the matter, when the article was propounded unto them.

Cole. It was not becauſe they did not acknowledge the ſame, but becauſe they had no commiſſion ſo to do.

Curtop. Reverend Sir, I will prove and declare, that the body of Chriſt is truly and really in the euchariſt: and whereas the holy fathers, both of the weſt and eaſt church, have written both many things and no leſs manifeſt of the ſame matter, yet will I bring forth only Chryſoſtom.

That which is the cup, is the ſame that flowed from the ſide of Chriſt.

But true and pure blood did not flow from the ſide of Chriſt:

Ergo, His true and pure blood is in the cup.

Rid. It is his true blood which is in the chalice, I grant, and the ſame which ſprang from the ſide of Chriſt. But how? It is blood indeed, but not after the ſame manner, after which manner it ſprang from his ſide. For here is the blood, but by way of a ſacrament.

Again, I ſay, like as the bread of the ſacrament and of thanſgiving is called the body of Chriſt given for us: ſo the cup of the Lord is called the blood which ſprang from the ſide of Chriſt. But that ſacramental bread is called the body, becauſe it is the ſacrament of his body: even ſo likewiſe the cup is called the blood alſo which flowed out of Chriſt's ſide, becauſe it is the ſacrament of that blood which flowed out of his ſide, inſtituted of the Lord himſelf for our ſingular commodity: namely, for our ſpiritual nouriſhment: like as baptiſm is ordained in water to ſpiritual regeneration.

Cur. The ſacrament of the blood is not the blood.

Rid. The ſacrament of the blood is the blood; and that is attributed to the ſacrament, which is ſpoken of the thing of the ſacrament.

Weſt. Here Weſton repeateth Curtop's argument in Engliſh.

That which is in the chalice, is the ſame which flowed out of Chriſt's ſide.

But there came out very blood:

Ergo, There is blood in the chalice.

Rid. The blood of Chriſt is in the chalice indeed, but not in the real preſence, but by grace, and in a ſacrament.

Weſt. That is very well. Then we have blood in the chalice.

Rid. It is true, but by grace, and in a ſacrament.

Here the people hiſſed at him.

Rid.

Rid. O my maſters! I take this for no judgment: I will ſtand to God's judgment.

Wat. Good Sir, I have determined to have reſpect of the time, and to abſtain from all thoſe things which may hinder the entrance of our diſceptation: and therefore firſt I aſk this queſtion, When Chriſt ſaid in the ſixth of John, "He that eateth my fleſh," &c. doth he ſignify in thoſe words the eating of his true and natural fleſh, or elſe of the bread and ſymbol?

Rid. I underſtand that place of the very fleſh of Chriſt to be eaten, but ſpiritually: and further I ſay, that the ſacrament alſo pertaineth unto the ſpiritual manducation. For without the Spirit, to eat the ſacrament is to eat it unprofitably. For whoſo eateth not ſpiritually, he eateth his own condemnation.

Wat. I aſk then, whether the euchariſt be a ſacrament?

Rid. The euchariſt, taken for a ſign or ſymbol, is a ſacrament.

Wat. Is it inſtituted of God?

Rid. It is inſtituted of God.

Wat. Where?

Rid. In the ſupper.

Wat. With what words is it made a ſacrament?

Rid. By the words and deeds which Chriſt ſaid and did, and commanded us to ſay and do the ſame.

Wat. It is a thing commonly received of all, that the ſacraments of the new law give grace to them that worthily receive.

Rid. True it is, that grace is given by the ſacrament, but as by an inſtrument. The inward virtue and Chriſt give the grace through the ſacrament.

Wat. What is a ſacrament?

Rid. I remember there be many definitions of a ſacrament in Auguſtine: but I will take that which ſeemeth moſt fit to this preſent purpoſe. A ſacrament is a viſible ſign of inviſible grace.

Wat. Ergo, Grace is given to the receivers.

Rid. The ſociety or conjunction with Chriſt through the Holy Ghoſt is grace, and by the ſacrament we are made the members of the myſtical body of Chriſt, for that by the ſacrament the part of the body is grafted in the head.

Wat. But there is difference between the myſtical body, and natural body.

Rid. There is (I grant you) a difference, but the head of them both is one.

Wat. The euchariſt is a ſacrament of the New Teſtament:

Ergo, It hath a promiſe of grace.

But no promiſe of grace is made to bread and wine:

Ergo, Bread and wine be not the ſacraments of the New Teſtament.

Rid. I grant that grace pertaineth to the euchariſt, according to this ſaying, "The bread which we break, is "it not the communication or partaking of the body of "Chriſt?" And like as he that eateth, and he that drinketh unworthily the ſacrament of the body and blood of the Lord, eateth and drinketh his own damnation: even ſo he that eateth and drinketh worthily, eateth life, and drinketh life. I grant alſo that there is no promiſe made to bread and wine. But inaſmuch as they are ſanctified, and made the ſacraments of the body and blood of the Lord, they have a promiſe of grace annexed unto them; namely, of ſpiritual partaking of the body of Chriſt to be communicated and given, not to the bread and wine, but to them which worthily receive the ſacrament.

Wat. If the ſubſtance of bread and wine do remain, then the ſociety betwixt Chriſt and us is promiſed to them that take bread and wine.

But that ſociety is not promiſed to bread and wine, but to the receivers of the fleſh and blood. John 6. "He "that eateth my fleſh," &c.

Ergo, The ſubſtance of bread and wine remaineth not.

Rid. The promiſe undoubtedly is made to the fleſh and blood, but the ſame is to be received in the ſacrament through faith.

Wat. Every ſacrament hath a promiſe of grace annexed unto it.

Ergo, The bread and wine are not ſacraments.

Rid. True it is, every ſacrament hath grace annexed unto it inſtrumentally. But there is diverſe underſtanding of this word [Habet] hath. For the ſacrament hath not grace included in it; but to thoſe that receive it well, it is turned to grace. After that manner the water in baptiſm hath grace promiſed, and by that the Holy Spirit is given; not that grace is included in water, but that grace cometh by water.

Wat. This promiſe is made to the fleſh and blood of Chriſt, and not to the bread and wine.

Ergo, The ſacrament is not bread and wine, but the body and blood of Chriſt.

Rid. There is no promiſe made to him that taketh common bread and common wine; but to him that receiveth the ſanctified bread, and bread of the communion, there is a large promiſe of grace made: neither is the promiſe given to the ſymbols, but to the thing of the ſacrament. But the thing of the ſacrament is the fleſh and blood.

Wat. Every ſacrament of the New Teſtament giveth grace, promiſed of God to thoſe that worthily receive it.

Rid. This ſacrament hath a promiſe of grace made to thoſe that receive it worthily, becauſe grace is given by it, as by an inſtrument, not that Chriſt hath transfuſed grace into the bread and wine.

Wat. But this promiſe which is made, is not but to thoſe that worthily receive the fleſh and blood; not the bread and wine.

Rid. That propoſition of yours hath a diverſe underſtanding. There is no promiſe made to them that receive common bread, as it were: but to thoſe that worthily receive the ſanctified bread, there is a promiſe of grace made, like as Origen doth teſtify.

Wat. Where is that promiſe made?

Rid. "The bread which we break, is it not a com-"munication of the body of Chriſt?" And "we being "many are one bread, one body of Chriſt?"

Wat. What doth he mean by bread in that place?

Rid. The bread of the Lord's table, the communion of the body of Chriſt.

Wat. Hearken what Chryſoſtom ſaith upon that place; "The bread which we break, is it not the communica-"tion of Chriſt's body? Wherefore did he not ſay, par-"ticipation? Becauſe he would ſignify ſome great mat-"ter, and that he would declare a great convenience and "conjunction betwixt the ſame. For we do not com-"municate by participation only and receiving, but alſo "by co-uniting. For likewiſe as that body is co-united "to Chriſt, ſo alſo we by the ſame bread are conjoined "and united to him."

Rid. Let Chryſoſtom have his manner of ſpeaking, and his ſentence. If it be true, I reject it not. But let it not be prejudicial to me to name it true bread.

Wat. "All (ſaith Chryſoſtom) which ſit together at "one board, do communicate together of one true body." "What do I call (ſaith he) this communicating? We "are all the ſelf-ſame body. What doth bread ſignify? "The body of Chriſt. What be they that receive it? "The body of Chriſt. For many are but one body." Chryſoſtom doth interpret this place againſt you. "All "we be one bread, and one myſtical body, which do "participate together one bread of Chriſt."

Rid. All we be one myſtical body, which do communicate of one Chriſt in bread, after the efficacy of regeneration or quickening.

Wat. Of what manner of bread ſpeaketh he?

Rid. Of the bread of the Lord's table.

Wat. Is that bread one?

Rid. It is one, of the church being one, becauſe one bread is ſet forth upon the table: and ſo of one bread all together do participate which communicate at the table of the Lord.

Wat. See how abſurdly you ſpeak. Do you ſay all which be from the beginning to the end of the world?

Rid. All, I ſay, which at one table together have communicated in the myſteries, might well ſo do. Albeit the heavenly and celeſtial bread is likewiſe one alſo, whereof the ſacramental bread is a myſtery: the which being one, all we together do participate.

Wat. A perverſe anſwer. Which All? Mean you all chriſtian men?

Rid. I do diſtribute this word (All:) for all were wont together to communicate of the one bread divided into parts. All, I ſay, which were one congregation, and which all did communicate together at one table.

Wat. What? Do you exclude then from the body of Chriſt all them which did not communicate, being preſent?

Feck. But Cyprian ſaith, "Bread which no multitude "doth conſume." Which cannot be underſtood but only of the body of Chriſt.

Rid. Alſo Cyprian in this place did ſpeak of the true body of Chriſt, and not of material bread.

Feck. Nay, rather he did there intreat of the ſacrament in that tractation De Cœna Domini, writing upon the ſupper of the Lord.

Rid. Truth it is, and I grant he intreateth there of the ſacrament: but alſo he doth admix ſomething therewithal of the ſpiritual manducation.

Smith. When the Lord ſaith, This is my body, he uſeth no tropical ſpeech:

Ergo, You are deceived.

Rid. I deny your antecedent.

Smith. I bring here Auguſtine in Pſalm 33. expounding theſe words, Ferebatur in manibus ſuis, He was carried in his own hands. "How may this be underſtood to be "done in man? For no man is carried in his own hands, "but in the hands of other. How this may be under-"ſtood of David after the letter, we do not find; Of "Chriſt we find it. For Chriſt was borne in his own "hands, when he ſaith, This is my body, for he carried "the ſame body in his own hands," &c.

Auguſtine here did not ſee how this place after the letter could be underſtood of David, becauſe no man can carry himſelf in his own hands. Therefore, ſaith he, this place is to be underſtood of Chriſt after the letter. For Chriſt carried himſelf in his own hands in his ſupper, when he gave the ſacrament to his diſciples, ſaying, This is my body.

Rid. I deny your argument, and I explicate the ſame. Auſtin could not find after his own underſtanding how this could be underſtood of David after the letter. Auſtin goeth here from other in this expoſition, but I go not from him. But let this expoſition of Auſtin be granted to you; although I know this place of ſcripture be otherwiſe read of other men, after the verity of the Hebrew text, and it is alſo otherwiſe to be expounded. Yet to grant to you this expoſition of Auſtin, I ſay yet notwithſtanding it maketh nothing againſt my aſſertion: For Chriſt did bear himſelf in his own hands, when he gave the ſacrament of his body to be eaten of his diſciples.

Smith. Ergo, It is true of Chriſt after the letter, that he was borne in his own hands.

Rid. He was borne literally, and after that letter which was ſpoken of David: but not after the letter of theſe words, Hoc eſt corpus meum.

I grant that St. Auſtin ſaith, that it is not found literally of David, that he carried himſelf in his own hands, but that it is found of Chriſt. But this word, [ad literam,] literally, you do not well refer to that which was borne, but rather it ought to be referred to him that did bear it. St. Auguſtine's meaning is this; that it is not read any where in the Bible, that this carnal David, the ſon of Jeſſe, did bear himſelf in his hands, but of that ſpiritual David that overthrew Goliah the devil; that is, of Chriſt our Saviour, the ſon of the Virgin, it may well be found literally, that he bare himſelf in his own hands after a certain manner, namely, in carrying the ſacrament of himſelf. And note, that St. Auſtin hath theſe words, Quodam modo, after a certain manner; which manifeſtly declare how the doctor's meaning is to be taken.

Smith. When then was he borne in his own hands, and after what letter?

Rid. He was borne in the ſupper ſacramentally, when he ſaid, This is my body.

Smith. Every man may bear in his own hands a figure of his body.

But Auguſtine denieth that David could carry himſelf in his hands:

Ergo, He ſpeaketh of no figure of his body.

Rid. If Auſtin could have found in all the ſcripture, that David had carried the ſacrament of his body, then he would never have uſed that expoſition of Chriſt.

Smith. But he did bear himſelf in his own hands:

Ergo, He did not bear a figure only.

Rid. He did bear himſelf, but in a ſacrament: and Auſtin afterward addeth, Quodam modo, that is, ſacramentally.

Smith. You underſtand not what Auſtin meant when he ſaid, Quodam modo; for he meant that he did bear his very true body in that ſupper, not in figure and form of a body, but in form and figure of bread:

Ergo, You are holden faſt, neither are you able to eſcape out of this labyrinth.

Dr. Weſton repeated this place again in Engliſh. Which done, then Dr. Treſham began thus to ſpeak, moved (as it ſeemed to Mr. Ridley) with great zeal, and deſired that he might be inſtead of John Baptiſt, in converting the hearts of the fathers, and in reducing the ſaid biſhop Ridley again to the mother church. Now at the firſt, not knowing the perſon, he thought he had been ſome good old man, which had the zeal of God, altho' not according to knowledge, and began to anſwer him with manſuetude and reverence. But afterward he ſmelled a fox under a ſheep's cloathing.

"God Almighty grant that it may be fulfilled in me, "that was ſpoken by the prophet Malachi of John Bap-"tiſt, which may turn the hearts of the fathers to the "children, and the hearts of the children to their fathers, "that you at length may be converted. The wiſe man "ſaith, Son, honour thy father, and reverence thy mo-"ther. But you diſhonour your Father in heaven, and "pollute your mother the holy church here on earth, "while ye ſet not by it."

Rid. Theſe by-words do pollute your ſchool.

Treſh. If there were an Arian which had that ſubtle wit that you have, he might ſoon ſhift off the authorities of the ſcripture and fathers.

Weſt. Either diſpute, or elſe hold your peace, I pray you.

Treſh. I bring a place here out of the council of Lateran; the which council repreſenting the univerſal church, wherein were congregated three hundred biſhops, aud ſeventy metropolitans, beſides a great multitude of other, decreed, That bread and wine, by the power of God's word, was tranſubſtantiate into the body and blood of the Lord. Therefore, whoſoever ſaith contrary, cannot be a child of the church, but an heretic.

Rid. Good Sir, I have heard what you have cited out of the council of Lateran, and remember that there was a great multitude of biſhops and metropolitans, as you ſaid: but yet you have not numbered how many abbots, priors, and friers, were in that council, who were to the number of eight hundred.

One of the ſcribes. What, will you deny then the authority of that council for the multitude of thoſe priors?

Rid. No Sir, not ſo much for that cauſe, as for that eſpecially, becauſe the doctrine of that council agreed not with with the word of God, as it may well appear by the acts of that council, which was holden under Innocent the third, a man (if we believe the hiſtories) moſt pernicious to the church and commonwealth of Chriſt.

Treſh. What, do you not receive the council of Lateran? Whereupon he with certain other cried, Write, write.

Rid. No, Sir, I receive not that council; Write, and write again.

Treſh. Evil men do eat the natural body of Chriſt.

Ergo, The true and natural body of Chriſt is on the altar.

Rid. Evil men do eat the very true and natural body of Chriſt ſacramentally, and no further, as St. Auguſtine ſaith: But good men do eat the very true body both ſacramentally, and ſpiritually by grace.

Treſh. I prove the contrary by Auguſtine, "Like as "Judas, to whom the Lord gave the morſel, did offend; "not in taking a thing that was evil, but in receiving it "after an evil manner, &c." And a little after, "Be- "cauſe ſome do not eat unto ſalvation, it followeth not "therefore that it is not his body."

Rid. It is the body to them, that is, the ſacrament of the body: and Judas took the ſacrament of the Lord to his condemnation. Auſtin hath diſtinguiſhed theſe things well in another place, where he ſaith, "The bread of "the Lord, the bread the Lord. Evil men eat the bread "of the Lord, but not bread the Lord. But good men "eat both the bread of the Lord, and bread the Lord."

Weſt. Paul ſaith the body; and you ſay, the ſacrament of the body.

Rid. Paul meaneth ſo indeed.

Wat. You underſtand it evil concerning the ſign: For the fathers ſay, that evil men do eat him which deſcended from heaven.

Rid. They eat him indeed, but ſacramentally. The fathers uſe many times the ſacrament for the matter of the ſacrament, and all that ſame place maketh againſt you; and ſo here he cited the place.

Weſt. I bring Theophylact, which ſaith: "That Ju- "das did taſte the body of the Lord. The Lord did ſhew "the cruelty of Judas, which, when he was rebuked, "did not underſtand, and taſted the Lord's fleſh, &c."

Rid. This phraſe to divines is well known, and uſed of the doctors. He taſted the fleſh of the Lord [Inſenſibly,] that is, the ſacrament of the Lord's fleſh.

Weſt. Chryſoſtom ſaith, That the ſame puniſhment remaineth to them which receive the body of the Lord unworthily, as to them which crucified him.

Rid. That is, becauſe they defile the Lord's body: for evil men do eat the body of Chriſt ſacramentally, but good men eat both the ſacrament and the matter of the ſacrament.

Wat. You reject the council of Lateran, becauſe (you ſay) it agreeth not with God's word. What ſay you then to the council of Nice? The words of the council be theſe, "Let us not look a-low by the ground upon "the bread and the drink ſet before us, but lifting up our "mind let us faithfully believe, there upon the holy table "to lie the Lamb of God taking away the ſins of the "world, being ſacrificed of the prieſts."

Rid. That council was collected out of ancient fathers, and is to me a great authority; for it ſaith, "That "bread is ſet upon the altar, and having our minds lifted "up, we muſt conſider him which is in heaven." The words of the council make for me.

Wat. [Exalta mente] with a mind exalted: that is, not as brute beaſts at the rack or manger, having an eye only upon the thing that is ſet before them. The Lamb of God lieth on the table, ſaith the council.

Rid. The Lamb of God is in heaven, according to the verity of the body: and here he is with us in a myſtery, according to his power, not corporally.

Wat. But the Lamb of God lieth on the table.

Rid. It is a figurative ſpeech, for in our mind we underſtand him which is in heaven.

Wat. But he lieth there, the Greek word is κεῖται,

Rid. He lieth there, that is, he is here preſent, not corporally, but he lieth there in his operation.

Wat. He lieth, but his operation lieth not.

Rid. You think very groſly of the ſitting or lying of the celeſtial Lamb on the table of the Lord. For we may not imagine any ſuch ſitting or lying upon the table, as the reaſon of man would judge: but all things are here to be underſtood ſpiritually. For that heavenly Lamb is (as I confeſs) on the table, but by a ſpiritual preſence, by grace, and not after any corporal ſubſtance of his fleſh taken out of the virgin Mary.

And indeed the ſame canon doth plainly teach, that the bread which is ſet on the table is material bread; and therefore it (the canon I mean) commandeth that we ſhould not creep on the ground in our cogitation, to thoſe things which are ſet before us: as who ſhould ſay, what other things are they (as much as pertaineth to their true ſubſtance) than bread and wine? but rather, ſaith the canon, lifting up our minds into heaven, let us conſider with faith the Lamb of God which taketh away the ſins of the world, ſitting or lying upon the table. For a lifted-up faith, ſaith he, ſeeth him which ſitteth on the right hand of God the Father, after the true manner of a body ſet by grace on the Lord's table, and taking away the ſins of the world. For I think you mean not ſo, as though the Lamb did lie there proſtrate with his members ſpread upon the table.

Smith. I bring another place out of the council of Nice: "None of the apoſtles ſaid, this is a figure of the body "of Chriſt: None of the reverend elders ſaid, the un- "bloody ſacrifice of the altar to be a figure."

Ergo, You are deceived.

Rid. This canon is not in the council of Nice. For I have read over this council many times.

Then came in another whom Mr. Ridley knew not, and ſaid, The univerſal church both of the Greeks and Latins, of the eaſt and of the weſt, have agreed in the council of Florence uniformly in the doctrine of the ſacrament, that in the ſacrament of the altar there is the true and real body.

Rid. I deny the Greek and the eaſt church to have agreed either in the council at Florence or at any time elſe with the Romiſh church, in the doctrine of tranſubſtantiation of bread into the body of Chriſt. For there was nothing in the council of Florence, wherein the Greeks would agree with the Romaniſts; albeit hitherto I confeſs it was left for every church to uſe, as they were wont, leavened or unleavened bread.

Here cried out Dr. Cole, and ſaid, they agreed together concerning tranſubſtantiation of bread into the body of Chriſt. Mr. Ridley ſaid that could not be.

Here ſtarted up another unknown to Mr. Ridley, but thought to be one of the ſcribes, who affirmed with him, that indeed there was nothing decreed concerning tranſubſtantiation; the council left that as a matter not meet nor worthy to diſturb the peace and concord of the church. To whom Mr. Ridley anſwered again, ſaying, that he ſaid the truth.

Pye. What ſay you to that council, where it is ſaid, that the prieſt doth offer an unbloody ſacrifice of the body of Chriſt?

Rid. I ſay, It is well ſaid, if it be rightly underſtood.

Pye. But he offereth an unbloody ſacrifice.

Rid. It was called unbloody, and is offered after a certain manner, and in a myſtery, and as a repreſentation of that bloody ſacrifice, and he doth not lye which ſaith Chriſt to be offered.

Weſt. I with one argument will throw down to the ground your opinion out of Chryſoſtom, Hom. 24. in 1. ad Cor. And I will teach, not only a figure and a ſign, or grace only, but the very ſame body, which was here converſant on the earth, to be in the euchariſt.

We worſhip the ſelf-ſame body in the euchariſt which the wiſe men did worſhip in the manger.

But that was his natural and real body not ſpiritual.

Ergo, The real body of Chriſt is in the euchariſt.

Again, the ſame Chryſoſtom ſaith, "We have not "here the Lord in the manger, but on the altar. Here "a woman holdeth him not in her hands, but a prieſt."

Rid. We worſhip, I confeſs, the ſame true Lord and Saviour of the world, which the wiſe men worſhipped in the manger, howbeit we do it in a myſtery, and in the ſacrament of the Lord's ſupper, and that in ſpiritual liberty, as ſaith St. Auſt. l. 3. De Doctrina Chriſtiana: not in carnal ſervitude; that is, we do not worſhip ſervilely the ſigns for the things: for that ſhould be, as he alſo ſaith, a part of a ſervile infirmity. But we behold with the eyes of faith him preſent after grace, and ſpiritually ſet upon the table; and we worſhip him which ſitteth above, and is worſhipped of the angels. For Chriſt is always aſſiſtant to his myſteries, as the ſaid Auguſtine ſaith. And the divine majeſty, as Cyprian ſaith, doth never abſent itſelf from the divine myſteries; but this aſſiſtance and preſence of Chriſt, as in baptiſm it is wholly ſpiritual, and by grace, and not by any corporal ſubſtance of the fleſh: even ſo it is here in the Lord's ſupper, being rightly and according to the word of God duly miniſtered.

Weſt. That which the woman did hold in her womb, the ſame thing holdeth the prieſt.

Rid. I grant the prieſt holdeth the ſame thing, but after another manner. She did hold the natural body; the prieſt holdeth the myſtery of the body.

Weſt. Weſton repeateth again this argument out of Chryſoſtom in Engliſh.

Rid. I ſay that the author meant it ſpiritually.

Dr. Weſton here diſſolving the diſputations, had theſe words: Here you ſee the ſtubborn, the boaſting, the crafty, the unconſtant mind of this man. Here you ſee, this day, that the ſtrength of the truth is without foil. Therefore I beſeech you all moſt earneſtly to blow the note; and he began, and they followed, Verity hath the victory, Verity hath the victory.

The Diſputation had at Oxford, April 18, 1554. between Mr. Hugh Latimer, Anſwerer; and Mr. Smith, and others, Oppoſers.

AFTER theſe diſputations of Biſhop Ridley were ended, Mr. Hugh Latimer was next brought out to diſpute, upon Wedneſday April 18. Which diſputation began at eight of the clock, in ſuch form as before: but it was moſt in Engliſh. For Mr. Latimer alledged, that he was out of uſe with the Latin, and unfit for that place.

There replied unto him Mr. Smith of Oriel college. Dr. Cartwright, Mr. Harpsfield, and ſeveral others had ſnatches at him, and gave him bitter taunts. He eſcaped no hiſſings and ſcornful laughings, no more than they that went before him. He was very faint, and deſired that he might not long tarry. He durſt not drink for fear of vomiting. The diſputation ended before eleven of the clock. Mr. Latimer was not ſuffered to read what he had, as he ſaid, painfully written; but it was exhibited up, and the prolocutor read part thereof, and ſo proceeded unto the diſputation.

The Preface of Weſton unto the following diſputation.

Men and brethren, we are come together this day (by the help of God) to vanquiſh the ſtrength of the arguments, and diſperſed opinions of adverſaries, againſt the truth of the real preſence of the Lord's body in the ſacrament. And therefore, you father, if you have any thing to anſwer, I do admoniſh that you anſwer in ſhort and few words.

Latimer. I pray you, good maſter Prolocutor, do not exact that of me, which is not in me; I have not theſe twenty years much uſed the Latin tongue.

Weſt. Take your eaſe, father.

Lat. I thank you, Sir, I am well; let me here proteſt my faith, for I am not able to diſpute: and afterwards do your pleaſure with me.

The Proteſtation of Mr. Hugh Latimer, given up in writing to Dr. Weſton.

The Concluſions whereunto I muſt anſwer, are theſe:

1. The firſt is, That in the ſacrament of the altar by the virtue of God's word pronounced by the prieſt, there is really preſent the natural body of Chriſt, conceived of the virgin Mary, under the kinds of the appearance of bread and wine; in like manner his blood.
2. The ſecond is, That after conſecration there remaineth no ſubſtance of bread and wine, nor any other ſubſtance, but the ſubſtance of God and man.
3. The third is, That in the maſs there is the lively ſacrifice of the church, which is propitiable, as well for the ſins of the quick, as of the dead.

Concerning the firſt concluſion, me thinketh it is ſet forth with certain new found terms that be obſcure, and do not ſound according to the ſpeech of the ſcripture. Howbeit, howſoever I underſtand it, this I do anſwer plainly, though not without peril; I anſwer, I ſay, that to the right celebration of the Lord's ſupper there is no other preſence of Chriſt required, than a ſpiritual preſence: and this preſence is ſufficient for a chriſtian man, as a preſence by which we abide in Chriſt, and Chriſt abideth in us, to the obtaining of eternal life, if we preſevere. And the ſame preſence may be called moſt fitly a real preſence, that is, a preſence not feigned, but a true and a faithful preſence. Which thing I here rehearſe, leſt ſome ſycophant or ſcorner ſhould ſuppoſe me, with the Anabaptiſts, to make nothing elſe of the ſacrament, but a naked and a bare ſign. As for that which is feigned of many concerning their corporal preſence, I for my part take it but for a papiſtical invention; therefore think it utterly to be rejected.

Concerning the ſecond concluſion, I dare be bold to ſay, that it hath no ground or ſtay in God's word, but is a thing invented and found out by man; and therefore to be taken as fond and falſe: and I had almoſt ſaid, as the mother and nurſe of the other errors. It were good for my lords and maſters of the tranſubſtantiation, to take heed leſt they conſpire with the Neſtorians, for I do not ſee how they can avoid it.

The third concluſion (as I do underſtand it) ſeemeth ſubtilly to ſow ſedition againſt the offering which Chriſt himſelf offered for us in his own proper perſon, according to that pithy place of Paul, Heb. 1. where he ſaith, "That Chriſt his own ſelf hath made purgation of our "ſins." And afterward, "That he might (ſaith he) "be a merciful and faithful biſhop, concerning thoſe "things which are to be done with God, for the taking "away of our ſins." So that the expiation or taking away of our ſins may be thought rather to depend on this, that Chriſt was an offering biſhop, than that he was offered, were it not that he was offered of himſelf: and therefore it is needleſs that he ſhould be offered of any other. I will ſpeak nothing of the wonderful preſumption of man, to dare to attempt this thing without a manifeſt vocation, ſpecially in that it tendeth to the overthrowing and making fruitleſs (if not wholly, yet partly) of the croſs of Chriſt; for truly it is no baſe or mean thing to offer Chriſt. And therefore worthily a man may ſay to my lords and maſters the offerers, By what authority do ye this? and who gave you this authority? Where? When? A man cannot (ſaith the baptiſt) take any thing except it be given him from above: much leſs then may any man preſume to uſurp any honour, before he be thereto called. Again, If any man ſin (ſaith St. John) we have (ſaith he) not a maſter or offerer at home, which can ſacrifice crifice for us at maſs, but we have (ſaith he) an advocate Jeſus Chriſt, which once offered himſelf long ago; of which offering the efficacy and effect is perdurable for ever, ſo that it is needleſs to have ſuch offerers.

What meaneth Paul, when he ſaith, "They that ſerve "at the altar, are partakers of the altar?" and ſo addeth; "So the Lord hath ordained, that they that "preach the goſpel, ſhall live of the goſpel." Whereas he ſhould have ſaid, The Lord hath ordained, that they that ſacrifice at maſs, ſhould live of their ſacrificing, that there might be a living aſſigned to our ſacrificers now, as was before Chriſt's coming, to the Jewiſh prieſts. For now they have nothing to alledge for their living, as they that be preachers have. So that it appeareth, that the ſacrificing prieſthood is changed by God's ordinance into a preaching prieſthood, and the ſacrificing prieſthood ſhould ceaſe utterly, ſaving inaſmuch as all chriſtian men are ſacrificing prieſts.

The ſupper of the Lord was inſtituted to provoke us to thankſgiving for the offering which the Lord himſelf did offer for us, much rather than that our offerers ſhould do there as they do. "Feed (ſaith Peter) as "much as ye may, the flock of Chriſt:" nay rather let us ſacrifice as much as we may for the flock of Chriſt. If ſo be the matter be as now men make it, I can never wonder enough, that Peter would or could forget this office of ſacrificing, which at this day is in ſuch a price and eſtimation, that to feed is almoſt nothing with many. If thou ceaſe from feeding the flock, how ſhalt thou be taken? Truly catholic enough. But if thou ceaſe from ſacrificing and maſſing, how will that be taken? At the leaſt, I warrant thee, thou ſhalt be called an heretic.

And whence, I pray you, come theſe papiſtical judgments? Except perchance they think a man feedeth the flock in ſacrificing for them: and then what needeth there any learned paſtors? For no man is ſo fooliſh, but ſoon may he learn to ſacrifice and maſs it.

Thus lo, I have taken the more pains to write, becauſe I refuſed to diſpute, in conſideration of my debility thereunto: that all men may know, how that I have ſo done not without great pains, having not any man to help me, as I have never before been debarred to have. O Sir, you may chance to live till you come to this age and weakneſs that I am of. I have ſpoken in my time before two kings more than once, two or three hours together, without interruption: But now, that I may ſpeak the truth (by your leave) I could not be ſuffered to declare my mind before you, no, not by the ſpace of a quarter of an hour, without ſnatches, revilings, checks, rebukes, taunts, ſuch as I have not felt the like, in ſuch an audience, all my life long. Surely it cannot be but an heinous offence that I have given. But what was it? Forſooth I had ſpoken of the four marrow-bones of the maſs. The which kind of ſpeaking I never read to be a ſin againſt the Holy Ghoſt.

I could not be allowed to ſhew what I meant by my metaphor: But, Sir, now by your favour I will tell your maſterſhip what I mean.

The firſt is the popiſh conſecration, which hath been called a God's body-making.

The ſecond is tranſubſtantiation.

The third is maſſal oblation.

The fourth adoration.

The chief and principal portions, parts and points belonging or incident to the maſs, and moſt eſteemed and had in price in the ſame, I call the marrow-bones of the maſs; which indeed you, by force, might, and violence intrude in ſound of words in ſome of the ſcripture, with racking and cramping, injuring and wronging the ſame: but elſe indeed, plain out of the ſcripture, as I am thoroughly perſuaded, although in diſputation I now could nothing do to perſuade the ſame to others, being both unapt to ſtudy, and alſo to make a ſhew of my former ſtudy in ſuch readineſs as ſhould be requiſite to the ſame.

I have heard much talk of Mr. Doctor Weſton to and fro in my time: but I never knew your perſon to my knowledge, till I came before you, as the queen's majeſty's commiſſioner. I pray God ſend you ſo right judgment, as I perceive you have a great wit, great learning, with many other qualities. God give you grace ever well to uſe them, and ever to have in remembrance, that he that dwelleth on high, looketh on the low things on the earth; and that there is no counſel againſt the Lord; and alſo that this world hath been, and yet is a tottering world. And yet again, that though we muſt obey the princes, yet that hath this limitation, namely, in the Lord. For whoſo doth obey them againſt the Lord, they be moſt pernicious to them, and the greateſt adverſaries that they have: For they ſo procure God's vengeance upon them, if God be the only ruler of things.

There be ſome ſo corrupt in mind, the truth being taken from them, that they think gain to be godlineſs; great learned men, and yet men of no learning, but of railing, and raging about queſtions and ſtrife of words. I call them men of no learning, becauſe they know not Chriſt, how much elſe ſoever they know. And on this ſort we are wont to call great learned clerks, being ignorant of Chriſt, unlearned men; for it is nothing but plain ignorance, to know any thing without Chriſt: whereas whoſo knoweth Chriſt, the ſame hath knowledge enough, although in other knowledge he be to ſeek. The apoſtle St. Paul confeſſeth of himſelf to the Corinthians, that he did know nothing but Jeſus Chriſt crucified. Many men babble many things of Chriſt, which yet know not Chriſt; but pretending Chriſt do craftily colour and darken his glory. Depart from ſuch men, ſaith the apoſtle St. Paul to Timothy.

It is not out of the way to remember what St. Auguſtine ſaith. The place where, I now well remember not, except it be againſt the epiſtles of Petilian; "Whoſoever "(ſaith he) teacheth any thing neceſſarily to be believed, "which is not contained in the Old and New Teſtament, "the ſame is accurſed." Oh! beware of this curſe, if you be wiſe. I am much deceived if Baſilius have not ſuch like words: "Whoſoever (ſaith he) is beſides the "holy ſcripture, if the ſame be taught as neceſſarily to be "believed, that is ſin." Oh therefore take heed of this ſin!

There be ſome that ſpeak many falſe things more probable, and more like to the truth, than the truth itſelf. Therefore Paul giveth a watch-word; "Let no man "(ſaith he) deceive you with probability and perſuaſions "of words." But what mean you, ſaith one, by this talk ſo far from the matter? Well, I hope, good maſters, you will ſuffer an old man a little to play the child, and to ſpeak one thing twice. O Lord God! you have changed the moſt holy communion into a private action; and you deny to the laity the Lord's cup, contrary to Chriſt's commandment: and you do blemiſh the annunciation of the Lord's death till he come: For you have changed the common prayer, called the divine ſervice, with the adminiſtration of the ſacraments, from the vulgar, and known language, into a ſtrange tongue, contrary to the will of the Lord revealed in his word. God open the door of your heart, to ſee the things you ſhould ſee herein! I would as fain obey my ſovereign as any in this realm; but in theſe things I can never do it with an upright conſcience. God be merciful unto us, Amen.

Weſt. Then refuſe you to diſpute? Will you here then ſubſcribe?

Lat. No, good maſter, I pray be good to an old man. You may, if it pleaſe God, be once old, as I am: you may come to this age, and to this debility.

Weſt. Ye ſaid upon Saturday laſt, that ye could not find the maſs, nor the marrow-bones thereof in your book: but we will find a maſs in that book.

Lat. No, good Mr. Doctor, ye cannot.

Weſt. What find you then there?

Lat. Forſooth a communion I find there.

Weſt. Which communion, the firſt or the laſt?

Lat. I find no great diverſity in them; they are one ſupper of the Lord: but I like the laſt very well.

Weſt. The firſt was naught belike.

Lat. I do not well remember wherein they differ.

Weſt. Then cake bread and loaf bread are all one with you. Ye call it the ſupper of the Lord, but you are deceived in that: for they had done the ſupper before, and therefore the ſcripture ſaith, After they had ſupped. For ye know that St. Paul findeth fault with the Corinthians, for that ſome of them were drunken at this ſupper; and ye know no man can be drunken at your communion.

Lat. The firſt was called [Cœna Judaica] The Jewiſh ſupper, when they did eat the paſchal lamb together; the other was called [Cœna Dominica] The Lord's ſupper.

Weſt. That is falſe; for Chryſoſtom denieth that. And St. Ambroſe in cap. 10. prioris ad Corinthios, ſaith, that "the myſtery of the ſacrament, given as they were "at ſupper, is not the ſupper of the Lord."

And Gregory Nazianzen ſaith the ſame, "Again he "kept the holy feaſt of paſſover with his diſciples in the "dining chamber after the ſupper, and one day before "his paſſion. But we keep it both in the churches and "houſes of prayer, both before the ſupper, and alſo after "the reſurrection."

And that firſt ſupper was called ἀγάπη: can you tell what that is?

Lat. I underſtand no Greek. Yet I think it meaneth Charity.

Weſt. Will you have all things done that Chriſt did then? Why, then muſt the prieſt be hanged on the morrow? And where find you, I pray you, that a woman ſhould receive the ſacrament?

Lat. Will you give me leave to turn my book? I find it in the 11th chapter to the Corinthians. I trow theſe be his words, Probet autem ſeipſum homo, &c.

I pray you, good maſter, what gender is Homo?

Weſt. Marry the common gender.

Cole. It is in the Greek, ὁ ἄνθρωπος.

Harpſ. It is ἄνηρ, that is, Vir.

Lat. It is in my book of Eraſmus's tranſlation, Probet ſeipſum homo.

Feck. It is Probet ſeipſum indeed, and therefore it importeth the maſculine gender.

Lat. What then? I trow when the woman touched Chriſt, he ſaid, Quis tetigit me? Scio quod aliquis me tetigit; that is, "Who touched me? I know that ſome man touched me."

Weſt. I will be at hoſt with you anon. When Chriſt was at ſupper, none were with him but his apoſtles only.

Ergo, He meant no woman, if you will have his inſtitution kept.

Lat. In the twelve apoſtles was repreſented the whole church, in which you will grant both men and women to be.

Weſt. So through the whole heretical tranſlated Bible ye never make mention of prieſt, till ye come to the putting of Chriſt to death. Where find you then that a prieſt or miniſter (a minſtrel I may call him well enough) ſhould do it of neceſſity?

Lat. A miniſter is a more fit name for that office; for the name of a prieſt importeth a ſacrifice.

Weſt. Well, remember that ye cannot find that a woman may receive by ſcripture. Mr. Opponent, fall to it.

Smith. Becauſe I perceive that this charge is laid upon my neck to diſpute with you: to the end that the ſame may go forward after a right manner and order, I will propoſe three queſtions, ſo as they are put forth unto me. And firſt I aſk this queſtion of you, although the ſame indeed ought not to be called in queſtion: but ſuch is the condition of the church, that it is always vexed of the wicked ſort. I aſk, I ſay, whether Chriſt's body be really in the ſacrament?

Lat. I truſt I have obtained of Mr. Prolocutor, that no man ſhall exact that thing of me which is not in me. And I am ſorry that this worſhipful audience ſhould be deceived of their expectation for my ſake. I have given up my mind in writing to Mr. Prolocutor.

Smith. Whatſoever ye have given up, it ſhall be regiſtered among the acts.

Lat. Diſputation requireth a good memory; my memory is gone clean, and marvellouſly weakened, and never the better, I wis, for the priſon.

Weſt. How long have ye been in priſon?

Lat. This three quarters of this year.

Weſt. And I was in priſon ſix years.

Lat. The more pity, Sir.

Weſt. How long have you been of this opinion?

Lat. It is not long, Sir, that I have been of this opinion.

Weſt. The time hath been when you ſaid maſs full devoutly.

Lat. Yea, I cry God mercy heartily for it.

Weſt. Where learned you this new fangleneſs?

Lat. I have long ſought for the truth in this matter of the ſacrament, and have not been of this mind paſt ſeven years: and my lord of Canterbury's book hath eſpecially confirmed my judgment herein. If I could remember all therein contained, I would not fear to anſwer any man in this matter.

Treſh. There are in that book ſix hundred errors.

Weſt. You were once a Lutheran.

Lat. No, I was a papiſt: for I never could perceive how Luther could defend his opinion without tranſubſtantiation. The Tygurines once did write a book againſt Luther, and I oft deſired God that he might live ſo long to make them anſwer.

Weſt. Luther, in his book De privata miſſa, ſaid, That the devil reaſoned with him, and perſuaded him that the maſs was not good, fol. 14. Contigit me, &c. Whereof it may appear, that Luther ſaid maſs, and the devil diſſuaded him from it.

Lat. I do not take in hand here to defend Luther's ſayings or doings. If he were here, he would defend himſelf well enough I trow. I told you before, that I am not meet for diſputations. I pray you read mine anſwer, wherein I have declared my faith.

Weſt. Do you believe this as you have written?

Lat. Yea, Sir.

Weſt. Then have you no faith.

Lat. Then would I be ſorry, Sir.

Treſh. It is written, "Except you ſhall eat the fleſh "of the Son of man, and drink his blood, ye ſhall have "no life in you." Which when the Capernaites, and many of Chriſt's diſciples heard, they ſaid, This is a hard ſaying, &c. Now that the truth may the better appear, here I aſk of you, Whether Chriſt ſpeaking theſe words, did mean of his fleſh to be eaten with the mouth, or of the ſpiritual eating of the ſame?

Lat. I anſwer (as Auguſtine underſtandeth) that Chriſt meant of the ſpiritual eating of his fleſh.

Treſh. Of what fleſh meant Chriſt, his true fleſh, or no?

Lat. Of his true fleſh, ſpiritually to be eaten in the ſupper by faith, and not corporally.

Treſh. Of what fleſh meant the Capernaites?

Lat. Of his true fleſh alſo; but to be eaten with the mouth.

Treſh. They, as ye confeſs, did mean his true fleſh to be eaten with the mouth. And Chriſt alſo (as I ſhall prove) did ſpeak of the receiving of his fleſh with the mouth.

Ergo, They both did underſtand it of the eating of one thing, which is done by the mouth of the body.

Lat. I ſay Chriſt underſtood it not of the bodily mouth, but of the mouth of the ſpirit, mind and heart.

Treſh. I prove the contrary, that Chriſt underſtandeth it of the eating with the bodily mouth. For whereas cuſtom is a right good miſtreſs and interpreter of things, and whereas the acts put in practice by Chriſt, do certainly declare thoſe things which he firſt ſpake: Chriſt's deeds in his ſupper, where he gave his body to be taken with the mouth, together with the cuſtom which hath been ever ſince that time of that eating which is done with the mouth, doth evidently infer that Chriſt did underſtand his words, here cited of me out of the ſixth of John, of the eating with the mouth.

Lat. He gave not his body to be received with the mouth, but he gave the ſacrament of his body to be received with the mouth: he gave the ſacrament to the mouth, his body to the mind.

Treſh. But my reaſon doth conclude, That Chriſt ſpake concerning his fleſh to be received with the corporal mouth: for otherwiſe (which God forbid) he had been a deceiver, and had been offenſive to the Capernaites and his diſciples, if he had not meant in this point as they thought he meant: for if he had thoughts as you do feign, it had been an eaſy matter for him to have ſaid, You ſhall not eat my fleſh with your mouth, but the ſacrament of my fleſh; that is to ſay, Ye ſhall receive with your mouth not the thing itſelf, but the figure of the thing, and thus he might have ſatisfied them: but ſo he ſaid not, but continued in the truth of his words, as he was wont. Therefore Chriſt meant the ſelf-ſame thing that the Capernaites did, I mean concerning the thing itſelf to be received with the mouth, videlicet, that his true fleſh is truly to be eaten with the mouth. Moreover, foraſmuch as you do expound for [Corpus Chriſti] the body of Chriſt [Sacramentum corporis Chriſti] the ſacrament of the body of Chriſt, and hereby do ſuppoſe that we obtain but a ſpiritual union, or union of the mind between us and Chriſt, plain it is, that you are deceived in this thing, and do err from the mind of the fathers: for they affirm by plain and expreſs words, that we are corporally and carnally joined together. And theſe be the words of Hilary, "Therefore if Chriſt did truly take the fleſh of "our body upon him, and the ſame man be Chriſt indeed "which was born of Mary; then we alſo do receive "under a myſtery the fleſh of his body indeed, and there-"by ſhall become one, becauſe the Father is in him, and "he in us. How is the unity of will affirmed, when a "natural propriety by the ſacrament is a perfect ſacra-"ment of unity?"

Thus far hath Hilary. Lo here you ſee how manifeſtly theſe words confound your aſſertion. To be ſhort, I myſelf have heard you preaching at Greenwich before king Henry VIII. where you did openly affirm, That no chriſtian man ought to doubt of the true and real preſence of Chriſt's body in the ſacrament, foraſmuch as he had the word of ſcripture on his ſide, [videlicet] Hoc eſt corpus meum, This is my body: whereby he might be confirmed. But now there is the ſame truth: the word of ſcripture hath the ſelf-ſame thing which it then had. Therefore why do you deny at this preſent that, whereof it was not lawful once to doubt before when you taught it?

Lat. Will you give me leave to ſpeak?

Treſh. Speak Latin, I pray you, for ye can do it, if ye liſt, promptly enough.

Lat. I cannot ſpeak Latin ſo long and ſo largely. Mr. Prolocutor hath given me leave to ſpeak Engliſh. And as for the words of Hilary, I think they make not ſo much for you. But he that ſhall anſwer the doctors had not need to be in my caſe, but ſhould have them in a readineſs, and know their purpoſe. Melancthon ſaith, If the doctors had foreſeen that they ſhould have been ſo taken in this controverſy, they would have written more plainly.

Smith. I will reduce the words of Hilary into the form of a ſyllogiſm.

Such as is the unity of our fleſh with Chriſt's fleſh, ſuch (yea greater) is the unity of Chriſt with the Father.

But the unity of Chriſt's fleſh with ours is true and ſubſtantial.

Ergo, The unity of Chriſt with the Father is true and ſubſtantial.

Lat. I underſtand you not.

Seaton. I know your learning well enough, and how ſubtle ye be: I will uſe a few words with you, and that out of Cyprian, De cœna Domini. The Old Teſtament doth forbid the drinking of blood; the New Teſtament doth command the drinking and taſting of blood: but where doth it command the drinking of blood?

Lat. In theſe words, Bibite ex hoc omnes; that is, Drink ye all of this.

Seat. Then we taſte true blood.

Lat. We do taſte true blood, but ſpiritually; and this is enough.

Seat. Nay, the Old and New Teſtament in this do differ; for the one doth command, and the other doth forbid to drink blood.

Lat. It is true as touching the matter, but not as touching the manner of the thing.

Seat. Then there is no difference between the drinking of blood in the New Teſtament, and that of the Old; for they alſo drank ſpiritually.

Lat. And we drink ſpiritually alſo, but a more precious blood.

Weſt. Auguſtine upon the 45th Pſalm, ſaith, "Drink "boldly the blood which ye have poured out."

Ergo, It is blood.

Lat. I never denied it, nor ever will I go from it, but that we drink the very blood of Chriſt indeed, but ſpiritually: for the ſame Auguſtine ſaith "Believe, and thou haſt eaten."

Weſt. Nay, to believe, is not to drink or eat. You will not ſay, I pledge you, when I ſay, I believe in God.

Lat. Is not [Manducare] To eat, in your learning put for [Credere] To believe?

Weſt. I remember my lord chancellor demanded Mr. Hooper of theſe queſtions, Whether [Edere] To eat, were [Credere] To believe, and [Altare] an altar, were Chriſt in all the ſcripture, &c. And he anſwered, Yea.

Then ſaid my lord chancellor, Why then [Habemus altare de quo non licet edere] that is, We have an altar, of which it is not lawful to eat, is as much as to ſay, [Habemus Chriſtum, in quo non licet credere] We have a Chriſt, in whom we may not believe.

Treſh. Believe, and thou haſt eaten, is ſpoken of the ſpiritual eating.

Lat. It is true, I do allow your ſaying; I take it ſo alſo.

Weſt. We are commanded to drink blood in the new law.

Ergo, It is very blood.

Lat. We drink blood, ſo as appertaineth to us to drink to our comfort, in ſacramental wine. We drink blood ſacramentally: he gave us his blood to drink ſpiritually, he went about to ſhew, that as certainly as we drink wine, ſo certainly we drink his blood ſpiritually.

Weſt. Do you not ſeem to be a papiſt, which do bring in new words, not found in ſcripture? Where find you that [Sacramentaliter] Sacramentally, in God's book?

Lat. It is neceſſarily gathered upon ſcripture.

Weſt. The Old Teſtament doth forbid the taſting of blood, but the New doth command it.

Lat. It is true, not as touching the thing, but as touching the manner thereof.

Weſt. Hear ye people, this is the argument:

That which was forbidden in the Old Teſtament, is commanded in the New.

To drink blood was forbidden in the Old Teſtament, and commanded in the New.

This argument, becauſe the Major thereof is no univerſal, is not formal, and may well be retorted againſt Weſton thus.

No natural or moral thing, forbidden materially in the Old Teſtament, is commanded in the New.

To drink man's natural blood is forbidden materially in the Old Teſtament.

Ergo, To drink man's natural blood materially is not commanded in the New.

Lat. It is commanded ſpiritually to be drank; I grant it is blood drank in the New Teſtament, but we receive it ſpiritually.

Pye. It was not forbidden ſpiritually in the old law.

Lat. The ſubſtance of blood is drank, but not in one manner.

Pye. It doth not require the ſame manner of drinking.

Lat. It is the ſame thing, not the ſame manner. I have no more to ſay.

Weſt. Here Weſton cited the place of Chryſoſtom, of Judas's treaſon: "O the madneſs of Judas! He "made bargain with the Jews for thirty pence to ſell "Chriſt, and Chriſt offered him his blood which he "ſold."

Lat. I grant he offered to Judas his blood which he ſold, but in a ſacrament.

Weſt. Becauſe ye can defend your doctors no better, ye ſhall ſee what worſhipful men ye hang upon, and one that hath been of your mind ſhall diſpute with you. Mr. Cartwright, I pray you diſpute.

Cart. Reverend father, becauſe it is given me in commandment to diſpute with you, I will do it gladly. But firſt underſtand ere we go any further, that I was in the ſame error that you are in: but I am ſorry for it, and do confeſs myſelf to have erred, I acknowledge mine offence, and I wiſh and deſire God that you may alſo repent with me.

Lat. Will you give me leave to tell what hath cauſed Mr. Doctor here to recant? It is Pœna legis, the pain of the law, which hath brought you back, and converted you, and many more; the which letteth many to confeſs God. And this is a great argument, there are few herecan diſſolve it.

Cart. That is not my caſe, but I will make you this ſhort argument, by which I was converted from mine errors.

If the true body of Chriſt be not really in the ſacrament, all the whole church hath erred from the apoſtles time.

But Chriſt would not ſuffer his church to err:

Ergo, It is the true body of Chriſt.

Lat. The Popiſh church hath erred, and doth err. I think for the ſpace of ſix or ſeven hundred years, there was no mention made of any eating but ſpiritually: for, before theſe five hundred years, the church did ever confeſs a ſpiritual manducation. But the Romiſh church begat the error of tranſubſtantiation. My Lord of Canterbury's book handleth that very well, and by him I could anſwer you if I had him.

Cart. Linus and all the reſt do confeſs the body of Chriſt to be in the ſacrament: and St. Auguſtine alſo upon the 99th Pſalm, upon this place, "Worſhip his "footſtool, &c." granteth that it is to be worſhipped.

Lat. We do worſhip Chriſt in the heavens, and we do worſhip him in the ſacrament: but the maſſing worſhip is not to be uſed.

Smith. Do you think that Cyril was of the ancient church?

Lat. I do think ſo.

Smith. He ſaith, That Chriſt dwelleth in us corporally: Theſe be Cyril's words of the myſtical benediction.

Lat. That [corporally] hath another underſtanding than you do groſly take it.

Cyril ſaith, That Chriſt dwelleth corporally in us, but he ſaith not that Chriſt dwelleth corporally in the bread. Which dwelling of Chriſt in us, is as our dwelling is alſo in Chriſt, not local or corporal, but ſpiritual and heavenly. Corporally therefore is to be taken in the ſame ſenſe as St. Paul ſaith the fulneſs of divinity to dwell in Chriſt corporally, that is, not lightly nor accidentally, but perfectly and ſubſtantially, with all his virtue and power, &c. And ſo dwelleth Chriſt corporally in us alſo.

Smith. Here Smith repeateth theſe words of Cyril, "By the communicating of the body of Chriſt, Chriſt "dwelleth in us corporally."

Lat. The ſolution of this is in my lord of Canterbury's book.

Smith. Cyril was a papiſt, and yet theſe be his words, "Chriſt dwelleth in us corporally:" But you ſay he dwelleth in us ſpiritually.

Lat. I ſay both, that he dwelleth in us both corporally and ſpiritually, according to his meaning: Spiritually by faith, and corporally by taking our fleſh upon him. For I remember I have read this in my lord of Canterbury's book.

Weſt. Becauſe your learning is let out to farm, and ſhut up in my lord of Canterbury's book, I will recite unto you a place of St. Ambroſe, De apparatione ad miſſam, where he ſaith, "We ſee the chief prieſt com-"ing unto us, and offering blood, &c."

Likewiſe both Auguſtine in the 38th Pſalm, and Chryſoſtom concerning the incomprehenſible nature of God, tom. 3. ſay, Non ſolum homines, &c.

Lat. I am not aſhamed to acknowledge mine ignorance, and theſe teſtimonies are more than I can bear away.

Weſt. Then you muſt leave ſome behind you for lack of carriage.

Lat. But of Chryſoſtom, he hath many figurative ſpeeches, and emphatical locutions in many places; as in that which you have now recited: But he ſaith not, For the quick and the dead; he taketh the celebration for the ſacrifice.

Weſt. You ſhall hear Chryſoſtom again, upon the ninth chapter of the Acts, Quid dicis? Hoſtia in manibus ſacerdotis, &c. He doth not call it a cup of wine.

Lat. Ye have mine anſwer there with you in a paper; and yet he calleth it not, a propitiatory ſacrifice.

Weſt. You ſhall hear it to be ſo: and I bring another place of Chryſoſtom out of the ſame treatiſe, Non temere ab apoſtolis eſt inſtitutum, &c.

Lat. He is too precious a thing for us to offer; he offereth himſelf.

Weſt. Here in another place of Chryſoſtom to the people of Antioch, and alſo to the Philippians, he ſaith, "There ſhould be a memory and ſacrifice for the dead."

Lat. I do ſay, that the holy communion beareth the name of a ſacrifice, becauſe it is a ſacrifice memorative.

Weſt. How ſay you to the ſacrifice of the dead?

Lat. I ſay that it needeth not, and it booteth not.

Weſt. Auguſtine in his Enchiridion, ſaith, "We muſt "not deny that the ſouls of the dead are relieved by "the devotion of their friends which are living, when "the ſacrifice of the mediator is offered for them." Where he proveth the verity of Chriſt's body, and prayeth for the dead. And it is ſaid, that the ſame Auguſtine ſaid maſs for his mother.

Lat. But that maſs was not like yours, which thing doth manifeſtly appear in his writings, which are againſt it in every place. And Auguſtine is a reaſonable man, he requireth to be believed no further than he bringeth ſcripture for his proof, and agreeth with God's word.

Weſt. In the ſame place he proveth a propitiatory ſacrifice, and that upon an altar, and no oyſter-board.

Lat. It is the Lord's table, and no oyſter-board. It may be called an altar, and ſo the doctors call it in many places: but there is no propitiatory ſacrifice, but only Chriſt. The doctors might be deceived in ſome points, though not in all things; I believe them when they ſay well.

Cole. Is it not a ſhame for an old man to lye? You ſay you are of the old fathers faith where they ſay well, and yet ye are not.

Lat. I am of their faith when they ſay well. I refer myſelf to my lord of Canterbury's book wholly herein.

Smith. Then are not you of Chryſoſtom's faith, nor of St. Auguſtine's faith.

Lat. I have ſaid, when they ſay well, and bring ſcripture for them, I am of their faith; and further Auguſtine requireth not to be believed.

Weſt. Origen, Hom. 13. upon Leviticus.

Lat. I have but one word to ſay, The ſacramental bread is called a propitiation, becauſe it is a ſacrament of the propitiation. What is your vocation?

Weſton. My vocation is at this time to diſpute; otherwiſe I am a prieſt, and my vocation is to offer.

Lat. Where have you that authority given you to offer?

Weſt. Hoc facite, Do this; for Facite in that place is taken for Offerte, that is, Offer you.

Lat. Is Facere, nothing but Sacrificare, to ſacrifice? Why, then no man muſt receive the ſacrament but prieſts only: For there may none other offer but prieſts.

Ergo, There may none receive but prieſts.

Weſt. Your argument is to be denied.

Lat. Did Chriſt then offer himſelf at his ſupper?

Pye. Yea, he offered himſelf for the whole world.

Lat. Then if this word [Facite] Do ye, ſignify [Sacrificare] Sacrifice ye, it followeth, as I ſaid, that none but prieſts only ought to receive the ſacrament, to whom it is only lawful to ſacrifice: And where find you that, I pray you?

Weſt. Forty years agon whither could you have gone to have found your doctrine?

Lat. The more cauſe we have to thank God, that hath now ſent the light into the world.

Weſt. The light? Nay light and lewd preachers; for you could not tell what you might have. Ye altered and changed ſo often your communions and altars, and all for this one end, to ſpoil and rob the church.

Lat. Theſe things pertain nothing to me, I muſt not anſwer other mens deeds, but only for mine own.

Weſt. Well, Mr. Latimer, this is our intent, to will you well, and to exhort you to come to yourſelf, and remember, that without Noah's ark there is no health. Remember what they have been, that were the beginners of your doctrine; none but a few flying apoſtates, running out of Germany for fear of the faggot. Remember what they have been which have ſet forth the ſame in this realm: A ſort of fling-brains and light heads, which were never conſtant in any one thing, as it was to be ſeen in the turning of the table, where like a ſort of apes they could not tell which way to turn their tails, looking one day weſt, and another day eaſt; one that way, and another this way. They will be like (they ſay) to the apoſtles, they will have no churches; a hovel is good enough for them. They come to the communion with no reverence. They get them a tankard, and one ſaith, I drink, and I am thankful; the more joy of thee, ſaith another. And in them was it true that Hilary ſaith, "We make every year and every month a faith." A runnagate Scot did take away the adoration or worſhipping of Chriſt in the ſacrament, by whoſe procurement that hereſy was put into the laſt communion-book; ſo much prevailed that one man's authority at that time. You never agreed with the Tygurines or Germans, or with the church, or with yourſelf. Your ſtubbornneſs cometh of a vain glory, which is to no purpoſe; for it will do you no good when a faggot is in your beard. And we ſee all, by your own confeſſion, how little cauſe you have to be ſtubborn, for your learning is in feoffers hold. The Queen's grace is merciful, if ye will turn.

Lat. You ſhall have no hope in me to turn. I pray for the Queen daily, even from the bottom of my heart, that ſhe may turn from this religion.

Weſt. Here you all ſee the weakneſs of hereſy againſt the truth: He denieth all truth, and all the old fathers.

Here all good readers may ſee how this glorious prolocutor triumpheth; but whether he hath victory or no, that I ſuppoſe they have yet neither heard nor ſeen. And grant that he had the victory, yet what great marvel was it, diſputing as he did, Non ſine ſuo Theſeo, that is, not without his tipling cup ſtanding at his elbow all the time of his diſputation; not without a privy noting and ſmiling of them that beheld the matter; but eſpecially at that time, when Dr. Ridley diſputing with one of the opponents, the ſaid prolocutor took the cup, and holding it in his hand, ſaid to the opponent, Urge hoc, urge hoc, nam hoc facit pro nobis. In which words, as he moved the beholders thereof to laughter, ſo I thought it proper to mention here, to delight the reader withal, after his tedious wearineſs in reading the ſtory thereof.

And thus haſt thou (loving reader) the whole action and ſtage of this doctorly diſputation ſhewed forth unto thee, againſt theſe three worthy confeſſors and martyrs of the Lord; wherein thou mayeſt behold the diſordered uſage of the univerſity men, the unmannerly manner of the ſchool, the rude tumult of the multitude, the fierceneſs and interruption of the doctors, the full pith and ground of all their arguments, the cenſures of the judges, the railing language of the oblocutor, with his blaſt of triumph in the latter end, being both the actor and moderator, and alſo judge himſelf. And what marvel then if the courage of this victorious conqueror, having the law in his own hands, to do and ſay what he pleaſed, would ſay for himſelf, Vicit veritas, although he ſaid never a true word, nor ever made a true concluſion, almoſt in all that diſputation.

It furthermore followed, after diſputation of theſe three days being ended, that Mr. Harpsfield, the next day after, which was April 19, ſhould diſpute for his form, to be made doctor. To which diſputation the archbiſhop of Canterbury was brought forth, and permitted among the reſt to utter an argument or two in defence of his cauſe; as in ſequel hereof may appear.

The Diſputation of Mr. Harpsfield, Bachelor of Divinity, anſwering for his Form to be made Doctor.

Mr. Harpsfield.

I AM not ignorant what a weighty matter it is to intreat of the whole order and trade of the ſcriptures: And moſt hard it is too, in the great contention of religion, to ſhew the ready way whereby the ſcriptures may beſt be underſtood; for the often reading of them doth not bring the true underſtanding of them. What other thing is there then? Verily this is the ready way, not to follow our own heads and ſenſes, but to give over our judgment unto the holy catholic church, who hath had of old years the truth, and always delivered the ſame to their poſterity: but if the often reading of ſcriptures, and never ſo painful comparing of places, ſhould bring the true underſtanding, then divers heretics might prevail even againſt whole general councils. The Jews did greatly brag of the knowledge of the law, and of the Saviour that they waited for. But what availed it them? Notwithſtanding, I know right well, that divers places of the ſcripture do much warn us of the often reading of the ſame, and what fruit doth thereby follow; as, "Search "the ſcriptures, for they do bear witneſs of me, &c. "The law of the Lord is pure, able to turn ſouls." And that ſaying of St. Paul, "All ſcripture inſpired "from above, doth make that a man may be inſtructed "to all good works." Howbeit doth the law of the Jews convert their ſouls? Are they by reading inſtructed to every good work? The letter of the Old Teſtament is the ſame that we have.

The heretics alſo have ever had the ſame ſcriptures which we have that be catholics. But they are ſerved as Tantalus that the poets ſpeak of, who in the plenty of things to eat and drink, is ſaid to be oppreſſed with hunger and thirſt. The ſwifter that men do ſeek the ſcripſcriptures without the catholic church, the deeper they fall, and find hell for their labour. St. Cyprian never ſwerving from the catholic church, ſaith, "He that "doth not acknowledge the church to be his mother, "ſhall not have God to his Father." Therefore it is true divinity to be wiſe with the church, where Chriſt ſaith, "Unleſs ye eat my fleſh, and drink my blood, ye "have no life in you."

If he had meant of only eating bread and drinking wine, nothing had been more pleaſant to the Capernaites, neither would they have forſaken him. The fleſh profiteth nothing to them that do ſo take it. For the Capernaites did imagine Chriſt to be given in ſuch ſort as he lived. But Chriſt ſpake high things; not that they ſhould have him as fleſh in the market, but to conſider his preſence with the Spirit, under the forms whereby it is given. As there is an alteration of bodies by courſes and times of ages, ſo there is no leſs variety in eating of bodies.

Theſe things which I have recited briefly, Mr. Harpſfield did ſet out with many more words: and hereupon Dr. Weſton diſputed againſt him.

Weſt. Chriſt's real body is not in the ſacrament.

Ergo, You are deceived.

Harpſ. I deny the antecedent.

Weſt. John 16. "I ſpeak the truth unto you: it be-"hoveth me that I go away from you. For unleſs I do "depart, that Comforter cannot come, &c."

Upon this I will make this argument.

Chriſt is ſo gone away, as he did ſend the Holy Ghoſt.

But the Holy Ghoſt did verily come into the world:

Ergo, Chriſt is verily gone.

Harpſ. He is verily gone, and yet remaineth here.

Weſt. St. Auguſtine ſaith, that theſe words, "I will "be with you even to the end of the world." are accompliſhed, [Secundum Majeſtatem] According to his majeſty: but [Secundum præſentiam carnis non eſt hic] By the preſence of his fleſh he is not here. The church hath him not in fleſh, but by belief.

Harpſ. We muſt diligently weigh that there are two natures in Chriſt: the divine nature, and human nature. The divine nature is of ſuch ſort, that it cannot chooſe but be in all places. The human nature is not ſuch, that of force it muſt be in all places, altho' it be in divers after diverſe manner. So where the doctors do intreat of his preſence by majeſty, they do commend the majeſty of the divine nature, not to hinder us of the natural preſence here in the ſacrament.

Weſt. He ſaith farther, "Ye ſhall not have me always "with you," is to be underſtood in the fleſh.

Harpſ. The preſence of the fleſh is to be conſidered, that he is not here as he was wont to live in converſation with them, to be ſeen, talked withal, or in ſuch ſort as a man may give him any thing: afrer that ſort he is not preſent.

Weſt. But what ſay you to this of Auguſtine, "He is "not here?"

Harpſ. I do anſwer out of St. Auguſtine upon John, Tractat. 25. upon theſe words, "I go to the Father, "ye ſhall not ſee me; that is, Such as I am now." Therefore I do deny the manner of his preſence.

Weſt. I will overthrow St. Auguſtine with St. Auguſtine; who ſaith this alſo, "How may a man hold "Chriſt? ſend thy faith, and thou holdeſt him."

So he ſheweth, that by ſending our faith, we do hold Chriſt.

Harpſ. Indeed no man holdeth Chriſt unleſs he believe in him; but it is another thing to have Chriſt merciful and favourable unto us, and to have him preſent in the ſacrament.

There St. Auguſtine ſpeaketh of holding him by faith, as he is favourable unto us.

Weſt. Nay, he ſpeaketh there how the fathers had him in the fleſh, and teacheth that we have him not ſo in the fleſh, as they had him long time, ſaying, "Your "fathers did hold Chriſt preſent in the fleſh: Do you "hold him in your heart?" What words can be more plain? Further he ſaith, "He is gone, and is not here: "he hath left us, and yet hath not forſaken us. He is "here in majeſty, and gone touching the fleſh."

Harpſ. I do underſtand Auguſtine thus, that Chriſt is here in his fleſh to them that receive him worthily: to ſuch as do not worthily receive him, to them he is not preſent in the fleſh. I judge St. Auguſtine meaneth ſo. We have him, and have him not: we have him in receiving him worthily, otherwiſe not.

Weſt. Nay, Tenere carnem eſt tenere corticem literæ. I will proſecute another argument. Cyril doth ſay, "By "the majeſty of his divinity he is ever here, but the "preſence of his fleſh hath he taken away."

Harpſ. The ſenſe of Cyril is thus to be underſtood: The moſt true fleſh of Chriſt is at the right hand of the Father. Thus the fathers taught, and ſo they believed. Thus ſaid Cyril; thus ſaid Auguſtine: and becauſe this is the foundation of our faith, they did oftentimes teach it. Therefore when they prove this (the body to be in heaven), they do not make againſt the preſence in the ſacrament.

So unleſs ye can plainly ſhew, that the fathers do directly ſay he is not in the ſacrament, you make nothing againſt me: For I have ſhewed why the fathers ſo ſpake. They did teach the great difference between the divine nature, and the human nature, as I have before ſaid.

Weſt. I will then prove, that he is not in the ſacrament. Vigilius againſt the heretic Eutyches, upon theſe words, "Ye ſhall not have me always with you," ſaith, "The Son of God, as touching his humanity, he is "gone from us, by his divinity he remaineth with us." And the ſame Vigilius in his fourth book ſaith, "He that "is in the heaven, is not in the earth;" ſpeaking of Chriſt.

Harpſ. I will ſhew you the reaſon of theſe words. The heretic Eutyches did believe that the divine nature of Chriſt was faſtened on the croſs, and believed that Chriſt had no natural body. To this Vigilius ſaid, That the human nature was taken up and aſcended, which could not ſo have done, unleſs he had a body. This he ſaid not, to take away the preſence in the ſacrament.

For what had he to refer this ſentence to the ſacrament? He never did ſo much as dream of the ſacrament.

Weſt. Cyril ſaith, "Although he be abſent from us "in body, yet are we governed by his Spirit."

Harpſ. By theſe words he gave us a chearfulneſs to aſpire upwards, ſeeking there hence our help. For as touching his converſation, he is not ſo in the ſacrament as one meet to be lived withal. But let him not teach us that he is not there to feed us; for after that ſort he is here.

Weſt. You have ſatisfied me with your anſwers, in doing the ſame learnedly, and catholicly. But now to another argument.

Chriſt is now ſo abſent from the earth by his body, as he was abſent from heaven when he lived here.

But when he did live bodily on earth, the ſame natural body was out of heaven.

Ergo, Now whilſt this natural body is in heaven, it is not in the earth.

Harpſ. I deny the Major.

Weſt. Fulgentius ad Thraſimundum regem, lib. 2. ſaith, "Secundum humanam ſubſtantiam abſens erat "cœlo, cum deſcendit de cœlo" Theſe are Fulgentius's words touching his human ſubſtance, "He was "abſent from heaven, when he deſcended from heaven; "and touching the ſame ſubſtance, now he is in heaven "he is not on the earth: but concerning the divine "nature, he never forſook neither heaven nor earth."

After theſe words, not waiting Harpsfield's anſwer, he offered Mr. Cranmer to diſpute; who began in this wiſe.

Cranmer. I have heard you right learnedly and eloquently quently intreat of the dignity of the ſcriptures, which I do both commend, and have marvelled thereat within myſelf. But whereas you refer the true ſenſe and judgment of the ſcriptures to the catholic church as judge thereof, you are much deceived; eſpecially for that under the name of the church you appoint ſuch judges as have corruptly judged, and contrary to the ſenſe of the ſcripture. I wonder likewiſe why you attribute ſo little to the diligent reading of the ſcriptures, and conferring of places, ſeeing the ſcriptures do ſo much commend the ſame, as well in divers other places, as alſo in thoſe which you yourſelf have already alledged. And as touching your opinion of theſe queſtions, it ſeemeth to me neither to have any ground of the word of God, nor of the primitive church. And to ſay the truth, the ſchoolmen have ſpoken diverſely of them, and do not agree thereof among themſelves. Wherefore, minding here briefly to ſhew my judgment alſo, I muſt deſire you firſt to anſwer to me a few queſtions which I ſhall demand of you. Which being done, we ſhall the better proceed in our diſputation. Moreover, I muſt deſire you to bear alſo with my rudeneſs in the Latin tongue, which through long diſuſe is not now ſo prompt and ready with me as it hath been: and now all other things ſet apart, I mind chiefly to have regard to the truth. My firſt queſtion is this: How Chriſt's body is in the ſacrament, according to your mind or determination?

Then anſwered a doctor, He is there as touching his ſubſtance, but not after the manner of his ſubſtance.

Harpſ. He is there in ſuch ſort and manner, as he may be eaten.

Cran. My next queſtion is, Whether he hath his quantity and qualities, form, figure, and ſuch like properties?

Harpſ. Are theſe your queſtions, ſaid Mr. Harpsfield? I may likewiſe aſk you, When Chriſt paſſed through the virgin's womb, An ruperit necne? When they had thus a little while contended, there were divers opinions in this matter.

All the doctors fell in a buzzing, uncertain what to anſwer: ſome thought one way, ſome another; and thus Mr. Doctors could not agree.

Then Mr. Cranmer ſaid thus; You put off queſtions with queſtions, and not with anſwers; I aſk one thing of you, and you anſwer another. Once again I aſk, Whether he have thoſe properties which he had on the earth?

Treſh. No, he hath not all the quantities and qualities belonging to a body.

Smith. Stay you, Mr. Treſham. I will anſwer you, Mr. Doctor, with the words of Damaſcene, [Transformatur panis, &c.] The bread is transformed, &c. But if thou wilt enquire how, [Modus impoſſibilis,] The manner is impoſſible.

Then two or three others added their anſwers to this queſtion, ſomewhat doubtfully. A great hurly-burly was among them, ſome affirming one thing, and ſome another.

Cran. Do you appoint me a body, and cannot tell what manner of body? Either he hath not his quantity, or elſe you are ignorant how to anſwer it.

Harpſ. Theſe are vain queſtions, and it is not meet to ſpend the time on them.

Weſt. Hear me a while. Lanfrancus, ſometime biſhop of Canterbury, doth anſwer in this wiſe unto Berengarius, upon ſuch like queſtions, "They may well be believed, but never faithfully aſked."

Cran. If you think good to anſwer it, ſome of you declare it.

Harpſ. He is there as pleaſeth him to be there.

Cran. I would be beſt contented with that anſwer, if that your appointing of a carnal preſence had not driven me of neceſſity to have inquired, for diſputation's ſake, how you place him there, ſince you will have a natural body.

When again he was anſwered of divers at one time, ſome denying it to be a [Quantum,] ſome ſaying it to be [Quantitativum,] ſome affirming it to have [Modum quanti,] ſome denying it; ſome one thing, ſome another: up ſtarts Dr. Weſton, and doughtily decided, as he thought, all the matter, ſaying, It is a body having quantity, but not according to the manner of quantity.

Whereunto Mr. Ward, a great ſophiſter, thinking the matter not fully anſwered, did largely declare and diſcourſe his ſentence: how learnedly and truly I cannot tell, nor I think he himſelf neither, nor yet the beſt learned there. For it was ſaid ſince, That far better learned than he, laid as good ear to him as they could, and yet could by no means perceive to what end all his talk tended. Indeed he told a formal tale to clout up the matter. He was full of [Quantum & quantitativum.] This that follows was, as it is thought, the effect, yet others think not. Howbeit we will rehearſe the ſum of his words, as it is thought he ſpake them.

Ward. We muſt conſider, ſaith he, that there are two poſitions. The one ſtandeth by the order of parts, with reſpect of the whole. The other in reſpect of that which containeth Chriſt, is in the ſacrament in reſpect of the whole. This propoſition is one of Ariſtotle's predicaments, called Situs. I remember I did intreat theſe matters very largely, when I did rule and moderate the philoſophical diſputations in the public ſchools. This poſition is [Sine modo quantitativo,] as by an enſample, you can never bring heaven to a quantity. So I conclude that he is in the ſacrament [Quantum, ſine modo quantitativo.]

Theſe words he amplified very largely, and ſo high he climbed into the heavens with Duns's ladder, and not with the ſcriptures, that it is to be marvelled how he could come down again without falling. To whom Mr. Cranmer ſaid, Then thus do I make my argument.

Cran. In heaven his body had quantity, in earth it hath none by your ſaying.

Ergo, He hath two bodies, the one in heaven, the other in earth.

Here ſome would have anſwered him, that he had quantity in both, and ſo put off the antecedent: but thus ſaid Mr. Harpsfield:

Harpſ. I deny your argument. Though ſome would not have had him ſay ſo.

Cran. The argument is good. It ſtandeth upon contradictories, which is the moſt ſure hold.

Harpſ. I deny that there are contradictions.

Cran. I thus prove it. Habere modum quantitativum & non habere, ſunt contradictoria.

Sed Chriſtus in cœlis, ut dicitis, habet modum quantitativum, in terra non habet:

Ergo, Duo ſunt corpora ejus in quæ cadunt hæc contradictoria; Nam in idem cadere non poſſunt.

Weſt. I deny the Minor.

Harpſ. I anſwer that the Major is not true. For Habere quantum, & non habere, non ſunt contradictoria, niſi ſic conſiderentur, ejuſdem ad idem, eodem modo & ſimpliciter.

Weſt. I confirm the ſame; for one body may have Modum quantitativum, and not have; and the ſame body was paſſible and impaſſible; one body may have wounds and not wounds.

Cran. This cannot be at one time.

Weſt. The enſample of the potter doth prove that which I ſay; who, of that which is clay now, maketh a pot or cup forthwith.

Cran. But I ſay again that it is ſo, but at divers times as one piece of meat to be raw and ſodden, cannot be at one time together. But you would have it otherwiſe, that Chriſt ſhould be here and in heaven at one time, and ſhould have Modum quantitativum, and not have; which cannot be but by ſuch argument as I have ſhewed you.

Weſt. But I ſay Chriſt's body was paſſible and not paſſible at one inſtant.

Seaton. You may aſk as well other queſtions, how he is in heaven? whether he ſit or ſtand? and whether he be there as he lived here?

Cran. You yourſelf, by putting a natural preſence, do force me to queſtion, how he is here. Therefore next I do aſk this queſtion, Whether good and evil men do eat the body in the ſacrament?

Harpſ. Yea, they do ſo, even as the ſun doth ſhine upon kings palaces, and on dung-heaps.

Cran. Then do I inquire, how long Chriſt tarrieth in the eater?

Harpſ. Theſe are curious queſtions, unmeet to be aſked.

Cran. I have taken them out of your ſchools and ſchoolmen, which you yourſelves do moſt uſe: and there alſo do I learn to aſk how far he goeth into the body.

Harpſ. We know that the body of Chriſt is received to nouriſh the whole man, both body and ſoul. Eouſque progreditur corpus quouſque ſpecies.

Cran. How long doth he abide in the body?

Seaton. St. Auguſtine ſaith, our fleſh goeth into his fleſh. But after he is once received into the ſtomach, it maketh no matter for us to know how far he doth pierce, or whither he is conveyed.

Here Mr. Treſham and one Mr. London anſwered, that Chriſt being given there under ſuch form and quantity as pleaſed him, it was not to be inquired of his tarrying, or of his deſcending into the body.

Harpſ. You were wont to lay to our charge, that we added to the ſcripture, ſaying always that we ſhould fetch the truth out of the ſcripture, and now you yourſelf bring queſtions out of the ſchoolmen, which you have diſallowed in us.

Cran. I ſay as I have ſaid alway, that I am conſtrained to aſk theſe queſtions, becauſe of this carnal preſence which you imagine: and yet I know right well that theſe queſtions be anſwered out of the ſcriptures. As to my laſt queſtion, How long he abideth in the body, &c. the ſcripture anſwereth plainly, that Chriſt doth ſo long dwell in his people, as they are his members. Whereupon I make this argument.

They which eat the fleſh of Chriſt do dwell in him, and he in them.

But the wicked do not remain in him, nor he in them:

Ergo, The wicked do not eat his fleſh, nor drink his blood.

Harpſ. I will anſwer unto you as St. Auguſtine ſaith, not that howſoever a man do eat, he eateth the body; but he that eateth after a certain manner.

Cran. I cannot tell what manner ye appoint, but I am ſure that evil men do not eat the fleſh and drink the blood of Chriſt, as Chriſt ſpeaketh in the ſixth of John.

Harpſ. In the ſixth of John ſome things are to be referred to the godly, and ſome to the ungodly.

Cran. Whatſoever he doth intreat there of eating, doth pertain unto good men.

Harpſ. If you do mean only of the word of eating, it is true; if concerning the thing, it is not ſo: and if your meaning be of that which is contained under the word of eating, it may be ſo taken, I grant.

Cran. Now to the argument; He that eateth my fleſh, and drinketh my blood, dwelleth in me, and I in him. Doth not this prove ſufficiently, that evil men do not eat that the good do?

Treſh. You muſt add, He that eateth worthily.

Cran. I ſpeak of the ſame manner of eating that Chriſt ſpeaketh of.

Weſt. Auguſtinus ad Fratres in Eremo, Serm. 28. ſays, There is a certain manner of eating. Auguſtine ſpeaketh of two manners of eating; the one of them that eat worthily, the other that eat unworthily.

Harpſ. All things in the ſixth of John are not to be referred to the ſacrament, but to the receiving of Chriſt by faith. The fathers do agree, that there is not intreaty made of the ſupper of the Lord, before they come unto "The bread which I give, is my fleſh, &c."

Cran. There is intreating of manna both before and after.

Harpſ. I will apply another anſwer. This argument hath a kind of poiſon in it, which muſt be thus bitten away; that manna and this ſacrament be not both one. Manna hath not his efficacy of himſelf, but of God.

Cran. But they that did take manna worthily had fruit thereby: and ſo by your aſſertion, he that doth eat the fleſh of Chriſt worthily, hath his fruit by that. Therefore the like doth follow of them both, and ſo there ſhould be no difference between manna and this ſacrament, by your reaſon.

Harpſ. When it is ſaid, that they which did eat manna are dead, it is to be underſtood, that they did want the virtue of manna.

Cran. They then which do eat either of them worthily, do live.

Harpſ. They do live which do eat manna, worthily, not by manna, but by the power of God given by it. The other which do eat this ſacrament, do live by the ſame.

Cran. Chriſt did not intreat of the cauſe, but the effect which followed: he doth not ſpeak of the cauſe whereof the effect proceedeth.

Harpſ. I do ſay, the effects are diverſe, life, and death, which do follow the worthy and unworthy eating thereof.

Cran. Since you will needs have an addition to it, we muſt uſe both in manna and in the ſacrament, indifferently, either worthily or unworthily. Chriſt ſpake abſolutely of manna and of the ſupper, ſo that after that abſolute ſpeaking of the ſupper, wicked men can in no wiſe eat the fleſh of Chriſt, and drink his blood.

Further, Auguſtine upon John, Tractat. 26. upon theſe words, "He that eateth, &c." ſaith, "There is "no ſuch reſpects in common meats, as in the Lord's "body. For who that eateth other meats hath ſtill "hunger, and needeth to be ſatisfied daily; but he that "doth eat the fleſh of Chriſt, and drinketh his blood, "doth live for ever." But you know wicked men do not ſo.

Ergo, Wicked men do not receive.

Harpſ. St. Auguſtine meaneth, That he who eateth Chriſt's fleſh, &c. after a certain manner, ſhould live for ever. Wicked men do eat, but not after that manner.

Cran. Only they which participate Chriſt be of the myſtical body.

But the evil men are not of the myſtical body.

Ergo, They do not participate Chriſt.

Weſt. Your wonderful gentle behaviour and modeſty, good Mr. Doctor Cranmer, is worthy much commendation: and that I may not deprive you of your right and juſt deſerving, I give you moſt hearty thanks in my own name, and in the name of all my brethren. At which ſaying all the doctors gently put off their caps. Then Dr. Weſton did oppoſe the reſpondent on this wiſe.

Weſt. Tertullian doth call the ſacrament the ſign and figure of the Lord.

St. Auguſtine ad Dardanum ſaith, "The Lord did "not ſtick to ſay, This is my body, when he gave a ſign "of his body."

Beſides this, he giveth rules how to underſtand the ſcriptures, ſaying, If the ſcriptures ſeem to command ſome heinous thing, then it is figurative, as by example; "To eat the fleſh, and drink the blood, is a tropical "ſpeech."

Harpſ. Tertullian did write in that place againſt Marcion an heretic, who denied Chriſt to have a true body, and ſaid he had only a fantaſtical body. He went about to ſhew, that we had Chriſt both in heaven and in earth; and though we have the true body in the ſacrament, yet he would not go about ſo to confound him, as to ſay, That Chriſt was truly in the ſacrament: for that heretic would have thereat rather marvelled, than believed it. Therefore he ſhewed him, that it was the figure of Chriſt: and a figure cannot be but of a thing that is, or hath been extant.

To the text of Auguſtine, the church hath never taught the contrary. There is an outward thing in the ſacrament, which ſometimes hath ſundry names. For it may be called a figure in this declaration, That body which is in the ſacrament, is a figure of Chriſt dwelling in heaven.

To the third, That which is wrought by Auguſtine for example, about the underſtanding of the ſcriptures, is thus to be underſtood, as tending to a general manner of eating; ſo, To eat the fleſh, and drink the blood, may be a figurative ſpeech to exclude Anthropophagiam, that is, the eating of man's fleſh. The which is, when we eat man's fleſh cut in morſels, as we eat common meat; ſo as we neither have, nor eat Chriſt in the ſacrament.

Weſt. I underſtand your ſhort and learned anſwer, which doth ſufficiently content me. But now to the ſecond queſtion, which is of tranſubſtantiation.

The ſcripture calleth it bread.

Ergo, It is bread.

Harpſ. In the name of bread all is ſignified which we do eat.

Weſt. Theodoret an ancient writer, in his firſt dialogue, ſaith, "That Chriſt changeth not the nature, but called "it his body."

Harpſ. He doth there ſpeak De Symbolo, which is the outward form of the ſacrament. He meaneth, that that doth tarry in his own nature. Moreover as it was reported, he brought for his anſwer Auguſtinum in ſententiis proſperi.

Weſt. Theodoret alſo, in his ſecond dialogue of thoſe kinds of bread and wine, ſaith, "They go not out of "their own nature, but they tarry in their own ſub-"ſtance."

Harpſ. They are underſtood to be of the ſame ſubſtance wherein they are turned.

Weſt. But what ſay you to this? "They remain in their "former ſubſtance."

Harpſ. Symbola manent, that is, The outward ſigns do tarry.

Weſt. But what is meant here by this word ſymbolum?

Harpſ. The outward form or ſhape only of the nature.

Weſt. Then you cannot call them a ſubſtance.

Harpſ. Yes, Sir, every thing hath a certain ſubſtance in his kind.

Weſt. That is true, but accidents are not ſubſtances in their kind.

Harpſ. Sunt quid in ſuo genere. Of this they contended much.

Weſt. Chryſoſtom to Cæſarius the monk, ſaith, "Like "as before it is conſecrated, it is bread; ſo after it is "conſecrated, it is delivered from the name of bread, "and is endued with the name of the Lord's body, "whereas the nature doth remain."

Harpſ. Where read you this place, I pray you?

Weſt. Here in Peter Martyr I find it; I have his book in my hand.

Harpſ. The author ſhall be of more credit before that I make ſo much of him as to frame an anſwer unto it.

Weſt. Indeed I know not well where he findeth it. But Gelaſius ſaith, That the nature of bread and wine do tarry.

Harpſ. What is that Gelaſius?

Weſt. A biſhop of Rome.

Harpſ. Then he allowed the maſs.

Weſt. Yea, and oftentimes ſaid it: and purgatory he alſo allowed, and ſo prayer for the dead, relics, and invocation to the ſaints.

Harpſ. Belike then he meant nothing againſt tranſubſtantiation.

Weſt. It doth appear ſo indeed. But Origen ſaith, "That the material bread doth tarry, and is conveyed "into the privy, and is eaten of worms."

Harpſ. Tuſh, tuſh, this place appertaineth unto holy bread.

Weſt. What, doth it appertain to holy bread?

Harpſ. Yea, unto holy bread.

Weſt. By what means can you ſhew how this miraculous work bringeth Chriſt into the ſacrament?

Harpſ. By the ſcriptures I prove that, which ſaith, "This is my body."

Weſt. It doth rejoice us all not a little, that you have ſo well maintained the ſound doctrine of the ſacrament of the altar, wherein you have faithfully cleaved to the catholic church, as an only ſtay of our religion: by which means you have proved yourſelf meet to be authoriſed further towards the practiſing of the ſcripture.

And here, I do openly witneſs, that I do thoroughly conſent with you, and have for diſputation's ſake only, brought theſe arguments againſt you, which you have right learnedly ſatisfied: and now all things being done, after our form and manner, we will end this diſputation, ſaying, In oppoſitum eſt ſacra theologia, In oppoſitum eſt, &c.

Thus have ye heard in theſe aforeſaid diſputations about the holy ſupper of the Lord, the reaſons and arguments of the doctors, the anſwers and reſolutions of the biſhops, and the triumph of the prolocutor, triumphing before the victory, with, The truth hath overcome; who rather in my mind, ſhould have exclaimed, Power hath overcome: as it happeneth always, where the greater part overcometh the better. For elſe, if power had not helped the prolocutor more than truth, there had been a ſmall victory. But ſo it is where judgments be partial, there all things turn to victory, though it be never ſo mean and ſimple, as in this diſputation doth well appear.

For firſt, of the opponent part, there was ſcarce any argument rightly framed in true mood and figure: neither could the anſwerers be permitted to ſpeak for themſelves: and if they anſwered any thing, it was condemned before they began to ſpeak. Again, ſuch diſturbance and confuſion (more like a conſpiration than any diſputation, without all form and order) was in the ſchools during the time of their anſwering, that the anſwerers could not have place to utter their minds, neither would the opponents be ſatisfied with any reaſons. Concerning which diſturbance of that miſruled diſputation, you ſhall hear what maſter Ridley himſelf reporteth by his own deſcription, in the following narration.

The Report and Narration of Mr. Ridley, concerning the miſ-ordered Diſputation had againſt him and his Fellow-Priſoners at Oxford.

I Never yet, ſince I was born, ſaw or heard any thing done or handled more vainly and tumultuouſly, than the diſputation which was with me in the ſchools at Oxford. Yea, verily, I could never have thought that it had been poſſible to have found amongſt men recounted to be of knowledge and learning in this realm, any ſo brazen-faced and ſhameleſs, ſo diſorderly and vainly to behave themſelves, more like ſtage-players in interludes to ſet forth a pageant, than to grave divines in ſchools to diſpute. The ſorbonical clamours (which at Paris I have ſeen in times paſt, when popery moſt reigned) might be worthily worthily thought (in compariſon of this thraſonical oſtentation) to have had much modeſty. And no great marvel, ſeeing they which ſhould have been moderators, and overſeers of others, and which ſhould have given good examples in words and gravity; they themſelves, above all other, gave worſt example, and did as it were blow the trump to the reſt, to rave, roar, rage, and cry out. By reaſon whereof (good chriſtian reader) manifeſtly it may appear, that they never ſought for any truth or verity, but only for the glory of the world, and their own bragging victory. But leſt by the innumerable railings and reproachful taunts, wherewith I was baited on every ſide, our cauſe, yea rather God's cauſe and his church's, ſhould be evil ſpoken of, and ſlandered to the world through falſe reports, and untrue examples given out of diſputation, and ſo the verity might ſuſtain ſome damage, I thought it no leſs than my duty to write mine anſwers; to the intent, that whoſoever is deſirous to know the truth thereof, may by this perceive as well thoſe things which were chiefly objected, as ſummarily that which was anſwered of me unto every of them. Howbeit (good reader) I confeſs this to be moſt true, that it is impoſſible to ſet forth either all that was, God knoweth, tumultuouſly and confuſedly objected of their parts, being ſo many, ſpeaking many times all together ſo thick, that one could not well hear another, neither all that was anſwered on my behalf to them ſo ſundry and divers opponents.

Moreover, a great part of the time appointed for the diſputations was vainly conſumed in opprobrious checks and reviling taunts, with hiſſing and clapping of hands, and that in the Engliſh tongue, to procure the people's favour withal. All which things, when I with great grief of heart did behold, proteſting openly, that ſuch exceſſive and outrageous diſorder was unſeemly for thoſe ſchools, and men of learning and gravity, and that they which were the doers and ſtirrers of ſuch things, did nothing elſe but betray the ſlenderneſs of their cauſe, and their own vanities: I was ſo far off by this my humble complaint, from doing any good at all, that I was inforced to hear ſuch rebukes, checks, and taunts for my labour, as no perſon of any honeſty, without bluſhing, could abide to hear the like ſpoken of a moſt vile varlet, againſt a moſt wretched ruffian.

At the firſt beginning of the diſputation, when I ſhould have firſt confirmed mine anſwer to the firſt propoſition, in few words, and that (after the manner and law of ſchools) afore I could make an end of my firſt probation, which was not very long, even the doctors themſelves cried out, He ſpeaketh blaſphemies, he ſpeaketh blaſphemies. And when I on my knees beſought them, and that heartily, that they would vouchſafe to hear me to the end (whereat the prolocutor being moved, cried out on high, Let him read it, let him read it). Yet, when I began to read again, there followed immediately ſuch ſhouting, ſuch a noiſe and tumult, ſuch confuſion of voices, crying, Blaſphemies, blaſphemies, as I to my remembrance never heard or read the like, except it be that one which was, in the Acts of the apoſtles, ſtirred up of Demetrius the ſilverſmith, and other of his occupation, crying out againſt Paul, Great is Diana of the Epheſians, Great is Diana of the Epheſians! and except it be a certain diſputation which the Arians had againſt the Orthodox, and ſuch as were of godly judgement in Africa, where it is ſaid, that ſuch as the preſident and rulers of the diſputation were, ſuch was the end of the diſputations. All were in a hurly-burly, and ſo great were the ſlanders which the Arians caſt out, that nothing could quietly be heard. This writeth Victor in the ſecond book of his hiſtory.

The which cries and tumults of them againſt me ſo prevailed, that, will I, nill I, I was inforced to leave off reading of my probations, although they were ſhort. If any man doubt of the truth hereof, let the ſame aſk any one that was there, and utterly perverted in popery, and I am aſſured, he will ſay, I ſpeak the leaſt. But to complain of theſe things further, I will ceaſe.

And further ſpeaking of this diſputation, he concluded with theſe words: and thus was ended this moſt glorious diſputation of the moſt holy fathers, ſacrificers, doctors and maſters, which fought moſt manfully, as ye may ſee, for their God and goods, for their faith and felicity, for their country and kitchen, for their beauty and belly, with triumphant applauſes and favour of the whole univerſity.

After the diſputation of Mr. Latimer was ended, on the Friday following, April 20, the commiſſioners ſate in St. Mary's church, as they did the Saturday before, and Dr. Weſton uſed particular diſſuaſions with every one of them, and would not ſuffer them to anſwer in any wiſe, but directly and peremptorily, as his words were, to ſay whether they would ſubſcribe or no. And firſt to Dr. Cranmer he ſaid, He was overcome in diſputations. To whom the biſhop anſwered, That whereas Dr. Weſton ſaid, he hath anſwered and oppoſed, and could neither maintain his own errors, nor impugn the verity; all that he ſaid was falſe: for he was not ſuffered to oppoſe as he would, nor could anſwer as he was required, unleſs he would have brawled with them, ſo thick their reaſons came one after another, four or five frequently interrupting him, that he could not ſpeak. Mr. Ridley and Mr. Latimer were aſked what they would do: they replied, that they would ſtand to that they had ſaid. Then they were all called together, and ſentence read over them, that they were no members of the church: and therefore they, their favourers and patrons, were condemned as heretics. And in reading of it, they were aſked, Whether they would turn or no? But they bade them read on in the name of God, for they were not minded to turn. So they were all three condemned.

After which ſentence of condemnation being awarded againſt them, they anſwered again each in his turn, in manner and effect of words as followeth: the archbiſhop ſpeaking firſt.

Dr. Cranmer. "From this your judgment and ſentence "I appeal to the juſt judgment of God Almighty, truſt-"ing to be preſent with him in heaven, for whoſe pre-"ſence in the altar I am thus condemned."

Dr. Ridley. "Although I be not of your company, "yet doubt I not but my name is written in another "place, whither this ſentence will ſend us ſooner, than "we ſhould by the courſe of nature have come."

Mr. Latimer. "I thank God moſt heartily, that he "hath prolonged my life to this end, that I may in this "caſe glorify God by that kind of death."

Dr. Weſton's anſwer unto Latimer. "If you go "to heaven in this faith, then I will never come thither, "as I am thus perſuaded."

After ſentence was pronounced, they were ſeparated one from another, namely, the archbiſhop was returned to Bocardo, Dr. Ridley to the ſheriff's houſe, Mr. Latimer to the bailiff's.

On Saturday following, they had a maſs, with a general proceſſion and great ſolemnity. Dr. Cranmer was cauſed to behold the proceſſion out of Bocardo, Dr. Ridley out of the ſheriff's houſe. Latimer alſo being brought to ſee it from the bailiff's houſe, thought that he ſhould have gone to burning, and ſpake to one Auguſtine Cooper, a catch-pole, to make a quick fire. But when he came to Carſox, and ſaw the matter, he ran as faſt as his old bones would carry him, to one Spenſer's ſhop, and would not look towards it. Laſt of all Dr. Weſton carried the ſacrament, and four doctors carried the canopy over him.

Immediately after the ſentence was given, Dr. Ridley writeth to the prolocutor in the following manner.

MR. Prolocutor, you remember, I am ſure, how you promiſed me openly in the ſchools, after my proteſtation, that I ſhould ſee how my anſwers were there taken and written of the notaries whom ye appointed (Me fateor neminem recuſare) to write what ſhould be ſaid, and to have had licenſe to have added unto them, or to have altered them, as upon more deliberation ſhould have ſeemed me beſt. Ye granted me alſo, at the delivery of my anſwer unto your firſt propoſition, a copy of the ſame. Theſe promiſes are not performed. If your ſudden departure be any part of the cauſe thereof, yet I pray you remember that they may be performed; for performance of promiſe is to be looked for at a righteous judge's hands. Now I ſend you here my anſwers in writing to your ſecond and third propoſitions, and do deſire and require earneſtly a copy of the ſame, and I ſhall by God's grace procure the pains of the writer to be paid for, and ſatisfied accordingly. Maſter Prolocutor, in the time of my anſwering in the ſchools, when I would have confirmed my ſayings with authorities and reaſons, ye ſaid then openly, that I ſhould have time and place to ſay and bring whatſoever I could, another time, and the ſame your ſaying was then and there confirmed of other of the commiſſioners: Yea, and (I dare ſay) the audience alſo thought then that I ſhould have had another day, to have brought and ſaid what I could for the declaration and confirmation of mine aſſertions. Now that this was not done, but ſo ſuddenly ſentence given before the cauſe was perfectly heard, I cannot but marvel, &c.

On Monday next enſuing, April 23. Dr. Weſton took his journey up to London, with the letters certificatory from the univerſity to the queen, by whom the archbiſhop directed his letters ſupplicatory unto the council; which letters after the prolocutor had received, and had carried them well near half-way to London, by the way he opened the ſame, and ſeeing the contents thereof, ſent them back again, refuſing to carry them. Likewiſe biſhop Ridley hearing of the prolocutor's going to London, writeth to him his letters, wherein he deſireth him to carry his anſwers up to certain biſhops in London; the form of which letters, firſt of Dr. Ridley, then of the archbiſhop, and laſtly, another Letter of Dr. Ridley to the archbiſhop, here in order followeth.

Biſhop Ridley's Letter to the Prolocutor.

MR. Prolocutor, I deſire you, and in God's name require you, that you truly bring forth and ſhew all mine anſwers, written and ſubſcribed with mine own hand, unto the higher houſe of the convocation, and eſpecially to my lord chancellor, my lords of Durham, Ely, Worceſter, Norwich, and Chicheſter; and alſo to ſhew and exhibit this my writing unto them, which in theſe few lines here I write unto you: and that I did make this requeſt unto you by this my writing, know ye, that I did take witneſs of them by whom I ſend you this writing, and alſo of thoſe which were then with them preſent, viz. The two bailiffs of Oxford, and of Mr. Iriſh, alderman, then there called to be a witneſs.

By me NICHOLAS RIDLEY,
April 23. 1554.

The Archbiſhop of Canterbury's Letter to the Council.

IN right humble wiſe ſheweth unto your honourable lordſhips, Thomas Cranmer late archbiſhop of Canterbury, beſeeching the ſame to be a means for me unto the queen's highneſs for her mercy and pardon. Some of you know by what means I was brought and trained unto the will of our late ſovereign lord king Edward the ſixth, and what I ſpake againſt the ſame, wherein I refer me to the reports of your honours and worſhips. Furthermore, this is to ſignify unto your lordſhips, that upon Monday, Tueſday, and Wedneſday laſt paſt, were open diſputations here in Oxford againſt me, Mr. Ridley, and Mr. Latimer, in three matters concerning the ſacrament: Firſt, of the real preſence. Secondly, of tranſubſtantiation. And thirdly, of the ſacrifice of the maſs. Upon Monday againſt me; upon Tueſday againſt Dr. Ridley; and upon Wedneſday againſt Mr. Latimer. How the other two were ordered, I know not, for we were ſeparated, ſo that none of us knoweth what the other ſaid, nor how they were ordered. But as concerning myſelf I can report: Dr. Chedſey was appointed to diſpute againſt me; but the diſputation was ſo confuſed that I never knew the like, every man bringing forth what him liked without order: and ſuch haſte was made, that no anſwer could be ſuffered to be taken fully to any argument, before another brought a new argument. And in ſuch weighty matters the diſputation muſt needs be ended in one day, which can ſcantly be ended in three months. And when we had anſwered them, they would not appoint us one day to bring forth our proofs, that they might anſwer us, being required by me thereunto, whereas I myſelf have more to ſay, than can be well diſcuſſed, as I ſuppoſe, in twenty days. The means to reſolve the truth, had been to have ſuffered us to anſwer fully to all that they could ſay, and then they again to anſwer us fully to all that we can ſay. But why they would not anſwer us, what other cauſe can there be, but that either they feared their matter, that they were not able to anſwer us, or elſe for ſome conſideration they made ſuch haſte, not to ſeek the truth, but to condemn us, that it muſt be done in poſt-haſte before the matters could be thoroughly heard: for in haſte we were all three condemned of hereſy. Thus much I thought good to ſignify unto your lordſhips, that you may know the indifferent handling of matters, leaving the judgment thereof unto your wiſdoms. And I beſeech your lordſhips to remember me, a poor priſoner, unto the queen's majeſty, and I ſhall pray, as I do daily unto God, for the long preſervation of your good lordſhips in all godlineſs and felicity. April 23.

Dr. Ridley to Dr. Cranmer.

I Wiſh ye might have ſeen theſe mine anſwers before I had delivered them, that ye might have corrected them. But I truſt, in the ſubſtance of the matter we do agree fully, both led by one ſpirit of truth, and both walking after one rule of God's word. It is reported, that ſerjeant Morgan, the chief juſtice of the common pleas, is gone mad. It is ſaid alſo, that juſtice Hales hath recanted, perverted by Dr. Moreman. Item, That Maſter Rogers, Doctor Crome, and Maſter Bradford ſhall be had to Cambridge, and there be diſputed with, as we were here; and that the doctors of Oxford ſhall go likewiſe thither, as Cambridge men came hither. When ye have read mine anſwers, ſend them again to Auſten, except ye will put any thing to them. I truſt the day of our delivery out of all miſeries, and of our entrance into perpetual reſt, and unto perpetual joy and felicity, draweth nigh: The Lord ſtrengthen us with his mighty ſpirit of grace. If you have not to write with, you muſt make your man your friend. And this bearer deſerveth to be rewarded; ſo he may, and will do you pleaſure. My man is truſty, but it grieveth both him and me, that when I ſend him with any thing to you, your man will not let him come up to ſee you, as he may to Maſter Latimer, and yours to me. I have a promiſe to ſee how my anſwers were written in the ſchools, but as yet I cannot come by it. Pray for me, I pray for you, and ſo ſhall I for you. The Lord have mercy of his church, and lighten the eyes of the magiſtrates, that God's extream plagues light not on this realm of England.

TURN, OR BURN.

Theſe diſputations being thus diſcuſſed and ended, now let us return again to the proſecuting of our ſtory, touching other things likewiſe that happened in other parts of the realm, in this tumultuous time of queen Mary. And becauſe ſo many things happened in that time, that it is hard to keep a perfect order in reciting them all; to the intent therefore to inſert things left out before, or elſe to proſecute the ſame more at large, we have thought here a little to interrupt the order of time, returning again to the month of July the year before, viz. 1553, in which month of July I ſhewed before, how the duke of Northumberland was apprehended by the guard, and brought to London by the earl of Arundel, and other lords and gentlemen appointed for that purpoſe, on St. James's day, being July 25, and ſo to the Tower, where he remained. Theſe be the names of them which were committed to the Tower with the duke.

The earl of Warwick, the earl of Huntington, lord Ambroſe, and lord Henry Dudley, lord Haſtings, who was delivered again the ſame night; Sir John Gates, Sir Henry Gates, Sir Andrew Dudley, Sir Thomas Palmer, and Dr. Sands chancellor of Cambridge.

July 26. the lord marquis of Northampton, the biſhop of London, lord Robert Dudley, and Sir Richard Corbet were brought and committed to the Tower.

July 27. the lord chief juſtice of England, and the lord Mountacute chief juſtice of the common pleas, were committed to the Tower.

July 28. the duke of Suffolk and Sir John Cheek were committed to the Tower.

July 30. the lord Ruſſel was committed to the ſheriff of London's cuſtody.

July 31. the earl of Rutland was committed to the Fleet; and on the ſame day the duke of Suffolk was delivered out of the Tower again.

Upon Thurſday Auguſt 3. the queen entered into the city of London at Aldgate, and ſo to the Tower, where ſhe remained ſeven days, and then removed to Richmond.

Auguſt 4. Dr. Day was delivered out of the Fleet; and the day after the lord Ferris was committed to the Tower, and Dr. Bonner delivered out of the Marſhalſea. The ſame day at night Dr. Cocks was committed to the Marſhalſea, and one Mr. Edward Underhill to Newgate. Alſo the ſame day Dr. Tonſtal and Stephen Gardiner were delivered out of the Tower, and Gardiner received into the queen's privy council, and made lord chancellor.

On Sunday Auguſt 7. Henry Dudley captain of the guard at Guines, who before had been ſent to the French king by his couſin the duke of Northumberland, after the diſpatch of his ambaſſage with the French king, returned to Guines, and ſo was taken, and this day brought to the Tower.

On Monday Auguſt 7. Dirige in Latin was ſung within the Tower by all the king's chapel, and the biſhop of Wincheſter was chief miniſter, the queen being preſent and moſt of the council.

On Tueſday Auguſt 8. the king's body was brought to Weſtminſter, and there buried; where Dr. Day biſhop of Chicheſter preached. The ſame day a maſs of Requiem was ſung within the Tower by the biſhop of Wincheſter, who had on his mitre; and did all things as in times paſt was done; the queen being preſent.

Upon Thurſday the duke of Norfolk came forth of the Tower, with whom the ducheſs of Somerſet was alſo delivered.

On Sunday Auguſt 11. Dr. Bourne preached at Paul's Croſs: of which ſermon read before, page 5.

In the week following, commandment was given throughout the city, that no apprentices ſhould come to the ſermon, nor bear any knife or dagger.

On Wedneſday Auguſt 16. Mr. Bradford, Mr. Beacon, and Mr. Vernon, were committed to the Tower: with whom alſo Mr. Sampſon ſhould have been committed, and was ſought for the ſame time at Mr. Elſing's houſe in Fleet-ſtreet, where Mr. Bradford was taken: and becauſe he was not found, the biſhop of Wincheſter was greatly diſpleaſed with the meſſenger.

Auguſt 18. the duke of Northumberland, the marquis of Northampton, and the earl of Warwick, were arraigned at Weſtminſter, and condemned the ſame day, the duke of Norfolk that day being the high judge.

Auguſt 19. Sir Andrew Dudley, Sir John Gates, Sir Henry Gates, and Sir Thomas Palmer, were arraigned at Weſtminſter, and condemned the ſame day, the lord marquis of Wincheſter being high judge.

Upon which day a letter was ſent unto Sir Henry Tirril, Anthony Brown, and Edmund Brown, Eſquires, praying them to commit to ward all ſuch as ſhall contemn the queen's order of religion, or ſhall keep themſelves from church, there to remain until they be conformable, and to ſignify their names to the council.

Upon Sunday Auguſt 20. Dr. Watſon, the biſhop of Wincheſter's chaplain, preached at Paul's Croſs, at whoſe ſermon were preſent the marquis of Wincheſter, the earl of Bedford, the earl of Pembroke, the lord Rich, and 200 of the guard with their halberds, leſt the people ſhould have made any ſtir againſt the preacher.

Upon Monday Auguſt 21. the duke of Northumberland, the marquis of Northampton, Sir Andrew Dudley, Sir John Gates, and Sir Thomas Palmer, heard a maſs within the Tower, and after maſs they all five received the ſacrament in one kind only, as in the popiſh time was uſed. On which day alſo queen Mary ſet forth a proclamation, ſignifying to the people, that ſhe could not hide any longer the religion which ſhe from her infancy had profeſſed, &c. inhibiting in the ſaid proclamation, printing, and preaching; the tenor whereof read before, page 4.

Upon Tueſday, Auguſt 22. the duke of Northumberland, Sir John Gates, and Sir Thomas Palmer, were beheaded at Tower-hill, as before is ſaid, p. 3. The ſame day certain noble perſonages heard maſs within the Tower, and likewiſe after maſs received the ſacrament in one kind.

Upon Sunday Auguſt 27. Dr. Chedſey preached at Paul's Croſs, and the ſame day the archbiſhop of Canterbury, Sir Thomas Smith, and the dean of Paul's, were cited to appear the week following before the queen's commiſſioners, in the biſhop's conſiſtory within Paul's.

In the mean time it was noiſed abroad by running rumours falſly and craftily deviſed, either to eſtabliſh the credit of the maſs, or elſe to bring Thomas Cranmer archbiſhop of Canterbury out of credit, that he, to curry favour with queen Mary, ſhould promiſe to ſay Dirige maſs after the old cuſtom for king Edward, and that he had already ſaid maſs at Canterbury, &c. Wherefore to ſtop the ſlanders of thoſe rumours, the ſaid Thomas archbiſhop of Canterbury, the ſeventh day of September, ſet forth a letter, which was alſo printed, in purgation of himſelf, the copy of which letter here followeth.

A Purgation of Thomas Archbiſhop of Canterbury, againſt certain ſlanders falſly raiſed upon him.

AS the devil, Chriſt's ancient adverſary, is a lyar, and the father of lyes, even ſo hath he ſtirred up his ſervants and members to perſecute Chriſt and his true word and religion with lying; which he ceaſeth not to do moſt earneſtly at this preſent time. For whereas the prince of famous memory king Henry the eighth, ſeeing the great abuſes of the Latin maſs, reformed ſome things therein in his life-time, and after our late ſovereign lord king Edward the ſixth took the ſame wholly away, for the manifold and great errors and abuſes of the ſame, and reſtored in the place thereof Chriſt's holy ſupper, according to Chriſt's own inſtitution, and as the apoſtles uſed the ſame in the primitive church, the devil goeth about now by lying to overthrow the Lord's ſupper again, and to reſtore his Latin ſatisfactory maſs, a thing of his own invention and device. And to bring the ſame more eaſily to paſs, ſome have abuſed the name of me Thomas archbiſhop of Canterbury, bruiting abroad, that I have ſet up the maſs at Canterbury, and that I offered to ſay maſs at the burial of our late ſovereign prince king Edward the ſixth, and that I offered to ſay maſs before the queen's highneſs, and at Paul's church, and I wot not where. And although I have been well exerciſed theſe twenty years to ſuffer and bear evil reports and lyes, and have not been much grieved thereat, but have borne all things quietly; yet when untrue reports and lyes turn to the hindrance of God's truth, they are in no wiſe to be ſuffered. Wherefore theſe be to ſignify unto the world, that it was not I that ſet up the maſs at Canterbury, but it was a falſe, flattering, lying, and diſſembling monk, which cauſed maſs to be ſet up there without mine advice or council; Reddat illi Dominus in die illo. And as for offering myſelf to ſay maſs before the queen's highneſs, or in any other place, I never did it, as her grace well knoweth. But if her grace will give me leave, I ſhall be ready to prove, againſt all that will ſay the contrary, that all that is contained in the holy communion, ſet out by the moſt innocent and godly prince king Edward the ſixth, in his high court of parliament, is conformable to that order which our Saviour Chriſt did both obſerve, and command to be obſerved, and which his apoſtles and the primitive church uſed many years; whereas the maſs, in many things, not only hath no foundation of Chriſt, his apoſtles, nor the primitive church, but is manifeſtly contrary to the ſame, and containeth many horrible abuſes in it. And although many, either unlearned or malicious, do report, that Mr. Peter Martyr is unlearned, yet if the queen's highneſs will grant thereunto, I, with the ſaid Mr. Peter Martyr, and other four or five, which I ſhall chuſe, will, by God's grace, take upon us to defend, not only the common prayers of the church, the miniſtration of the ſacraments, and other rites and ceremonies, but alſo all the doctrine and religion ſet out by our ſovereign lord king Edward the ſixth, to be more pure, and according to God's word, than any other that hath been uſed in England theſe 1000 years: ſo that God's word may be judge, and that the reaſons and proofs of both parties may be ſet out in writing, to the intent, as well that all the world may examine and judge thereon, as that no man ſhall ſtart back from his writing. And where they boaſt of the faith, that hath been in the church theſe 1500 years, we will join with them in this point; and that the ſame doctrine and uſage is to be followed, which was in the church 1500 years paſt: And we ſhall prove, That the order of the church, ſet out at this preſent in this realm by act of parliament, is the ſame that was uſed in the church 1500 years paſt, and ſo ſhall they be never able to prove theirs.

On Thurſday September 7, lord Mountacute, chief juſtice, and lord chief baron were delivered out of the Tower.

September 13, the reverend father maſter Hugh Latimer was committed to the Tower.

September 14, the archbiſhop of Canterbury was committed to the Tower.

September 26, one Mr. Gray of Cambridge, called before him one Mr. Garth, for that he would not ſuffer a boy of Peter-houſe to help him ſay maſs in Pembroke-hall, which was before any law was eſtabliſhed for that behalf.

On Thurſday Septumber 28, the queen came to the Tower of London, and upon the Saturday following ſhe rode from the Tower through the city, where were made many pageants to receive her, and ſo ſhe was triumphantly brought to Whitehall.

Upon Sunday, October 1, the queen's highneſs went from Whitehall to Weſtminſter-abbey, accompanied with the moſt part of the nobility of this realm: namely, theſe, the duke of Norfolk, the earl of Arundel, the earl of Shrewſbury, the marquis of Wincheſter, the earls of Derby, Bedford, Worceſter, Cumberland, Weſtmoreland, Oxford, Suſſex, Devonſhire, Pembroke, the lord Dacres of the north, lord Ferris, lord Cobham, lord Abergavenny, lord Wentworth, lord Scroope, lord Rich, lord Vaus, lord Howard, lord Conias, lord Morley, lord Paget, and the lord Willoughby, with other nobles, and all the embaſſadors of divers countries, the mayor of London, with all the aldermen. Alſo out of the abbey, to receive her coming, came three ſilver croſſes, and to the number of about fourſcore ſinging men, all in very rich and gorgeous copes. Amongſt whom was the dean of Weſtminſter, and divers of the queen's chaplains, which bare every one ſome enſign in their hands, and after them followed ten biſhops, all mitred, and their croſier ſtaves in their hands, and rich copes upon them every one. And in this order they returned from Weſtminſter-hall before the queen to the Abbey, where ſhe was crowned by Stephen Gardiner biſhop of Wincheſter, and lord chancellor of England. At the time of the coronation, Dr. Day biſhop of Chicheſter made a ſermon to the queen's majeſty, and to the reſt of the nobility.

Alſo there was a general pardon proclaimed within the Abbey at the time of her coronation, out of which proclamation all the priſoners of the Tower and of the Fleet were excepted, and 62 more; whereof Mr. Whitchurch and Mr. Grafton were two.

October 3, the vice-chancellor of Cambridge did challenge one Mr. Pierſon, for that he miniſtered ſtill the communion in his own pariſh, and did receive ſtrangers of other pariſhes to the ſame, and would not ſay maſs. Whereupon within two days after he was clean diſcharged from further miniſtering in his cure.

Upon the Wedneſday following, the archbiſhop of York was committed to the Tower.

Upon Tueſday, October 5, 1553, the queen rode to the parliament in her robes, and all the nobility with her; and when they were ſet in the parliament-houſe, the biſhop of Wincheſter made to them a ſolemn oration, and ſerjeant Pollard was choſen ſpeaker. The ſame day the biſhops of Lincoln, Hereford, and Weſt-cheſter, were diſcharged from the parliament and convocation.

Alſo October 10, the earl of Huntingdon was delivered out of the Tower.

Upon Sunday after, October 15, Mr. Laurence Saunders preached at Alhallows in Bread-ſtreet in the morning: where he fully declared the abomination of the maſs, with divers other matters; whereof more ſhall be heard by God's leave hereafter, when we come to his ſtory. In which his doing, as he ſhewed himſelf to be God's faithful miniſter, ſo is he ſure not to be defrauded of God's faithful promiſe, who ſaith, Matt. 10. "Whoſoever ſhall "confeſs me before men, him will I confeſs alſo before "my Father which is in heaven." But about noon of the ſame day, he was ſent for by the biſhop of London, and committed to the Marſhalſea.

Upon the Sunday following, October 20, Dr. Weſton preached at Paul's Croſs. Who in the beginning of his ſermon willed the people to pray for the ſouls departed, on this wiſe: "You ſhall pray for all them that be de-"parted, that be neither in heaven, nor hell, but in a "place not yet ſufficiently purged to come to heaven, that "they may be relieved by your devout prayers." He named the Lord's table an oyſter-board. He ſaid, that the catechiſm in Latin, lately ſet out, was abominable hereſy, and likened the ſetters out of the ſame catechiſm to Julian the apoſtate, and the book to a dialogue ſet out by the ſaid Julian, wherein Chriſt and Pilate were the ſpeakers, with many other things. Which ſermon, with all the points thereof, Mr. Coverdale the ſame time learnedly confuted by writing, which remaineth yet in my hands to be ſeen.

In the week following the diſputations began in the convocation houſe in St. Paul's church, whereof ſufficient hath been before declared.

October 26, the vice-chancellor of Cambridge went to Clare-hall, and in the preſence of Dr. Walker diſplaced

Dr. Madew, and placed Mr. Swyborne in the maſterſhip there, by virtue of the lord chancellor's letters, for that he was (as they termed it) Uxoratus, that is, married.

October 28. the papiſts in the king's college in Cambridge (not tarrying the making of any law, but of their blind zeal) had their whole ſervice again in the Latin tongue contrary to the law then in force.

October 31, the vice-chancellor of Cambridge did ſharply reprove and threaten one Mr. Thrackold, for that he challenged the ſaid vice-chancellor, who had ſuffered Mr. Bovel (contrary to the ſtatutes then in force) to depart quietly without puniſhment, notwithſtanding that he refuſed to ſwear to the ſupremacy of the queen, and the abrogation of the biſhop of Rome.

November 3. the vice-chancellor ſent for the curate of the round pariſh in Cambridge, commanding him not to miniſter any more in the Engliſh tongue, ſaying he would have one uniform order of ſervice throughout the town, and that in Latin, with maſs, which was eſtabliſhed the twelfth day of this month.

November 6. Mr. Pollard preached at St. Michael's, and in the ſermon approved purgatory.

November 28. the archdeacon's official viſited in Hinton, where he gave in charge to preſent all ſuch as did diſturb the queen's proceedings, in hindering the Latin ſervice, the ſetting up of their altars, and ſaying of maſs, or any part thereof: whereby it was eaſy to ſee how theſe good fellows meant to proceed having the law once on their ſide, that thus readily, againſt a manifeſt law, would attempt the puniſhment of any man.

December 15. There were two proclamations at London; the one for the repealing of certain acts made by king Edward, and for the ſetting up of the maſs the 20th of December then next following. The other was, that no man ſhould interrupt any of thoſe that would ſay maſs.

The parliament beginning about the 5th of October, continued till the 5th of December. In which parliament were diſſolved as well all the ſtatutes made of Premunire in the time of king Henry VIII. &c. as alſo other laws and ſtatutes concerning religion and adminiſtration of ſacraments, decreed under king Edward VI. In which parliament was appointed, that on December 20, then next enſuing the ſame year, 1553, the old form and manner of church-ſervice uſed in the laſt year of king Henry, ſhould now again be reſtored.

On December 31, the lord marquis of Northampton was delivered out of the Tower.

About this time a prieſt of Canterbury ſaid maſs on one day, and the next day after, he came into the pulpit, and deſired all the people to forgive him; for he ſaid he had betrayed Chriſt, not as Judas did, but as Peter did, and there made a long ſermon againſt the maſs.

January 2, 1554, four embaſſadors came into London from the emperor, and were honourably received. Their names were, Le Countie de Egmont, Le Countie de Lalen, Monſieur Corire, Le Chancellor Nigre.

About this time a great number of new biſhops, deans, &c. were choſe, more than were made at one time ſince the conqueſt: namely, Dr. Holyman, biſhop of Briſtol; Dr. Coates, biſhop of Weſt Cheſter; Dr. Hopton, biſhop of Norwich; Dr. Bourne, biſhop of Bath; Dr. White, biſhop of Lincoln; Dr. Mores, biſhop of Rocheſter; Dr. Morgan, biſhop of St. David's; Dr. Poole, biſhop of St. Aſaph; Dr. Brooks, biſhop of Glouceſter; Dr. Moreman, coadjutor to the biſhop of Exeter, and after his deceaſe biſhop of Exeter; Dr. Glin, biſhop of Bangor; Mr. Fecknam, dean of Paul's; Dr. Reynold's, dean of Briſtol, with others.

January 12. the vice-chancellor of Cambrid gecalled a congregation general, wherein amongſt other things he ſhewed, that the queen would have there a maſs of the Holy Ghoſt upon the 18th of February then next following, for that it was her birth-day; which was fulfilled the day appointed, and that very ſolemnly.

On Saturday January 13. Dr. Crome was committed to the fleet: alſo the Sunday following one Mr. Addington was committed to the Tower. The ſame Sunday likewiſe the biſhop of Wincheſter declared openly in the court, that the marriage between the queen's majeſty and the king of Spain was concluded; and the day following, January 15. the mayor with the aldermen and certain commons were at the court, and there they were commanded by the lord chancellor to prepare the city ready to receive the ſaid king of Spain; who declared unto them what a catholic, mighty, prudent, and wiſe prince the ſaid king was, with many other commendations of him.

On Saturday January 20. the court of the firſt fruits and tenths was diſſolved.

On Thurſday night following, January 25. the lord marquis of Northampton was again committed to the Tower, and Sir Edward Warner with him; who were brought to the Tower by the mayor.

On Saturday following, January 26. juſtice Hales was committed to the Marſhalſea; and the ſame day Mr. Rogers was committed to Newgate. Upon this Saturday, Sunday and Monday following, the Londoners prepared a number of ſoldiers. by the queen's command, to go into Kent againſt the commons; whereof were chief captains the duke of Norfolk, the earl of Wormwood, Sir Henry Jeningham, Sir George Howard, and ten other captains; which ſoldiers when they came to Rocheſter bridge, where they ſhould have ſet upon their enemies, moſt of them (as it is ſaid) left their own captains, and came wholly to the Kentiſh men; and ſo the aforeſaid captains returned to the court both void of men and victory, leaving behind them ſix pieces of ordnance and treaſure.

About the latter end of January the duke of Suffolk with his brethren departed from his houſe at Shene, and went into Leiceſterſhire; after whom the earl of Huntington was ſent, to take him and bring him to London, who proclaimed the ſaid duke traitor by the way as he rode.

And thus paſſing to the month of February, here is to be noted, by way of ſtory, that upon the 15th day of the ſaid month, being Thurſday, within the city of London, about nine of the clock in the forenoon, ſtrange ſights were ſeen. Two ſuns both ſhining at once, the one a good way diſtant from the other; at the ſame time was alſo ſeen a rainbow turned contrary, and a great deal higher than hath been accuſtomed. The common ſtanding of the rainbow is thus ⌒, but this ſtood thus ⌣ with the head downward, and the feet as it were upward. Both theſe ſights were ſeen as well at Weſtminſter, in Cheapſide, on the ſouth ſide of Paul's, as in many other places, and that by a great number of honeſt men. Alſo certain aldermen went out of Guildhall to behold the ſight.

As touching the riſing of Mr. Wyat, with Sir William Cobham, and others in Kent, and their coming to London in the month of February: alſo of the queen's coming to Guildhall, and her oration there made; and of the taking of the ſaid Wyat and his company; likewiſe of the apprehenſion of the duke of Suffolk with his brother lord John Gray; and the next day after of the beheading of the lord Guilford and lady Jane, which was February 12. and how the day before, which was the 11th of February, lord William Howard, and Sir Edward Haſtings were ſent for the lady Elizabeth; and how the ſame Sunday, Sir Henry Iſeley, Mr. Culpepper, and Mr. Winter were committed to the Tower, the biſhop of Wincheſter the ſame day, February 11. preaching before the queen, and perſuading her to uſe no mercy toward theſe Kentiſh men, but ſevere execution, all which was in the month of February; becauſe moſt of theſe matters have been briefly touched before, or elſe may be found in other chronicles, I will ceaſe to make any further ſtory of them: having ſomewhat notwithſtanding to declare touching the arraignment and death of the duke of Suffolk.

Upon Saturday February 17. the duke of Suffolk was arraigned at Weſtminſter, and the ſame day condemned to die by his peers; the earl of Arundel was chief judge for this day.

Upon the Sunday following, which was the 18th day of the ſaid month, ſeſſions was kept in London, which hath not before been kept upon the Sunday.

Upon Monday February 19. the lord Cobham's three ſons, and four other men, were arraigned at Weſtminſter: of which ſons the youngeſt was condemned, whoſe name was Thomas, and the other two came not at the bar; and the other four men were condemned.

Upon Tueſday February 20. the lord John Gray was arraigned at Weſtminſter, and there condemned the ſame day, and other three men, whereof one was named Nailer.

Upon Wedneſday February 21. the lord Thomas Gray and Sir James Croft were brought through London to the Tower with a number of horſemen.

Upon Thurſday February 22. Sir Nicholas Throgmorton was committed to the Tower.

Upon Friday February 23. 1554. the duke of Suffolk was beheaded at Tower-hill, the order of whoſe death here followeth.

On Friday February 23. about nine of the clock in the forenoon, the lord Henry Gray, duke of Suffolk, was brought forth of the Tower of London unto the ſcaffold on Tower-hill, with a great company, &c. and in his coming thither, there accompanied him Dr. Weſton as his ghoſtly father, notwithſtanding, as it ſeemed, againſt the will of the ſaid duke. For when the duke went up to the ſcaffold, the ſaid Weſton, being on the left hand, preſſed to go up with him; the duke with his hand, put him down again off the ſtairs; and Weſton taking hold of the duke, forced him down likewiſe. And as they aſcended the ſecond time, the duke again put him down. Then Weſton ſaid, that it was the queen's pleaſure he ſhould ſo do. Wherewith the duke caſting his hands abroad, aſcended up the ſcaffold, and pauſed a pretty while after. And then he ſaid: "Maſters, I "have offended the queen, and her laws, and thereby "am juſtly condemned to die, and am willing to die, "deſiring all men to be obedient; and I pray God that "this my death may be an enſample to all men, be-"ſeeching you all to bear me witneſs, that I die in the "faith of Chriſt, truſting to be ſaved by his blood only, "and by no other trumpery, the which died for me, and "for all men that truly repent, and ſtedfaſtly truſt in "him. And I do repent, deſiring you all to pray to "God for me: and that when you ſee my breath depart "from me, you will pray to God that he may receive "my ſoul." And then he deſired all men to forgive him, ſaying, that the queen had forgiven him.

Then Dr. Weſton declared with a loud voice, that the queen's majeſty had forgiven him. With that ſeveral of the ſtanders-by ſaid with good and audible voices: Such forgiveneſs God ſend thee, meaning Dr. Weſton. Then the duke kneeled down upon his knees, and ſaid the Pſalm Miſerere mei Deus unto the end, holding up his hands, and looking up to heaven. And when he had ended the Pſalm, he ſaid, Into thy hands, O Lord, I commend my ſpirit, &c. Then he aroſe and ſtood up, and delivered his cap and his ſcarf unto the executioner. Then the ſaid executioner kneeled down, and aſked the duke forgiveneſs. And the duke ſaid, God forgive thee, and I do: and when thou doeſt thine office, I pray thee, do it well, and bring me out of this world quickly, and God have mercy to thee. Then ſtood there a man and ſaid, My lord, how ſhall I do for the money you do owe me? And the duke ſaid, Alas, good fellow, I pray thee trouble me not now, but go thy way to my officers. Then he knit a kercher about his face, and kneeled down and ſaid, Our Father which art in heaven, &c. unto the end. And then he ſaid, Chriſt have mercy upon me, and laid down his head on the block, and the executioner took the ax, and at the firſt chop ſtruck off his head, and held it up to the people, &c.

The ſame day a number of priſoners had their pardon, and came through the city with their halters about their necks. They were in number about 200.

Upon Saturday February 24. Sir William Sentlow was committed as priſoner to the maſter of the horſe to be kept. This Sir William was at this time one of the lady Elizabeth's gentlemen.

Upon Sunday February 25. Sir John Rogers was committed to the Tower.

In this week, all ſuch prieſts within the dioceſe of London as were married, were divorced from their livings, and commanded to bring their wives within a fortnight, that they might be likewiſe divorced from them. This the biſhop did of his own power.

Upon Tueſday in the ſame week, February 27. certain gentlemen of Kent were ſent into Kent, there to be executed. Their names were theſe, the two Mantels, two Knevets, and Bret; with theſe Mr. Rudſton alſo and certain others were condemned, and ſhould have been executed, but they had their pardon.

As concerning the foreſaid Mr. Mantel the elder, here is to be noted, that as he was led to execution, and at his firſt caſting under the gallows, the rope brake. Then they would have had him recanted the truth, and received the ſacrament of the altar (as they term it) and then they ſaid he ſhould have the queen's pardon: but Mr. Mantel, like a worthy gentleman, refuſed their ſerpentine counſel, and choſe rather to die, than to live for diſhonouring of God.

Moreover, as touching the ſaid Mr. Mantel, for that he was reported falſly to have fallen from the conſtancy of his profeſſion; to clear himſelf thereof, and to reprove the ſiniſter ſurmiſe of his recantation, he wrote this brief apology to clear himſelf: the copy whereof here followeth.

The Apology of Mr. Mantel, ſenior.

PErceiving that already certain falſe reports are raiſed of me concerning my anſwer in the behalf of my belief while I was priſoner in the Tower of London, and conſidering how ſore a matter it is to be an occaſion of offence to any of thoſe little ones that believe in Chriſt: I have thought it the duty of a chriſtian man, as near as I can (with the truth) to take away this offence. It pleaſed the queen's majeſty to ſend unto me Mr. Doctor Bourne, unto whom at the firſt meeting I acknowledged my faith in all points to agree with the four creeds, that is, the common Creed, the Creed of Nicene, Quicunque vult, and Te Deum laudamus.

Further, as concerning confeſſion and penance, I declare that I could be content to ſhew unto any learned miniſter of Chriſt's church any thing that troubled my conſcience, and of ſuch a man I would moſt willingly hear abſolution pronounced.

Touching the ſacrament of the altar (as he termed it) I ſaid that I believed Chriſt to be there preſent as the Holy Ghoſt meant, when theſe words were written; "This is my body."

Further, when this would not ſatisfy, I deſired him to conſider, that I was a condemned man to die by a law, and that it was more meet for me to ſeek a readineſs and preparation to death. And inſomuch as I diſſented not from him in any article of the chriſtian faith neceſſary to ſalvation, I deſired him for God's ſake no more to trouble me with ſuch matters, as which to believe, is neither ſalvation; nor not to believe, damnation. He anſwered, that if I diſſented but in the leaſt matter from the catholic church, my ſoul was in great danger; therefore much more in this great matter, alledging this text, "He "that offendeth in the leaſt of theſe, is guilty of them all." Yea, quoth I, it is true of theſe commandments of God. To this I deſired him to conſider it was not my matter, nor could I in theſe matters keep diſputation, nor minded ſo to do; and therefore to take theſe few words for a full anſwer, that I not only in the matter of the ſacrament, but alſo in all other matters of religion, believe as the holy catholic church of Chriſt (grounded upon the prophets and apoſtles) believeth. But upon this word Church we agree not; for I took exception at the antichriſtian popiſh church.

Then fell we in talk of the maſs, wherein we agreed not; for I both for the occaſion of idolatry, and alſo the clear ſubverſion of Chriſt's inſtitution, thought it naught; and he, è contra, upon certain conſiderations ſuppoſed it good. I found fault that it was accounted a ſacrifice propitiatory for ſin, and at certain other applications of it. But he ſaid that it was not a propitiatory ſacrifice for ſin (for the death of Chriſt only was the ſacrifice) and this but a commemoration of the ſame. Then, if ye think ſo (certain blaſphemous collects left out), I could be content (were it not for offending my poor brethren that believe in Chriſt, which know not ſo much) to hear your maſs. See, quoth he, how vain-glory toucheth you. Not ſo, Sir, quoth I, I am not now, I thank God, in caſe to be vain-glorious.

Then I found further fault with it, that it was not a communion. Yea, ſaith he, one prieſt ſaying maſs here, and another there, and the third in another place, &c. is a communion. This agreeth ſcarcely with theſe words of Paul, ſaid I, "Ye come not after a better manner, but "after a worſe." Yea, and it is a communion too, ſaid he, when they come together. Now draweth on the time, quoth he, that I muſt depart from you to the court, to ſay maſs before the queen, and muſt ſignify unto her in what caſe I find you, and methink I find you ſore ſeduced. Then I ſaid, I pray you report the beſt; for I truſt you find me not obſtinate. What ſhall I ſay, are ye content to hear maſs, and to receive the ſacrament of the maſs? I beſeech you, ſaid I, ſignify unto her majeſty, that I am neither obſtinate nor ſtubborn, for time and perſuaſion may alter me, but as yet my conſcience is ſuch, that I can neither hear maſs, nor receive the ſacrament after that ſort. Thus, after certain requeſts made to the queen's majeſty concerning other matters, he departed.

The next day he came to me again, and brought with him St. Cyprian's works; for ſo I had required him to do the day before, becauſe I would ſee his ſermon De Mortalitate. He had in this book turned and interlined certain places both concerning the church and the ſacrament, which he willed me to read. I read as much as my time would ſerve, and at his next coming I ſaid, that I was wholly of Cyprian's mind in the matter of the ſacrament. Dr. Weſton and Dr. Mallet came after to me, whom I anſwered much after that ſort as I did the other. Dr. Weſton brought in the place of St. Cyprian, Panis iſte non effigie, ſed natura mutatus, &c. I aſked of him how Natura was taken in the convocation-houſe, in the diſputation upon the place of Theodoret.

To be ſhort, Dr. Bourne came often unto me, and I always ſaid unto him, that I was not minded, nor able to diſpute in matters of religion; but I believed as the holy catholic church of Chriſt, grounded upon the prophets and apoſtles, doth believe; and namely in the matter of the ſacrament, as the holy fathers St. Cyprian and St. Auguſtine do write, and believed; and this anſwer and none other they had of me in effect, what words ſoever have been ſpread abroad of me, that I ſhould be conformable to all things, &c. The truth is, I never heard maſs, nor received the ſacrament during the time of my impriſonment.

One time he willed me to be confeſſed. I ſaid, I am content. We kneeled down to pray together in a window, I began without Benedicite, deſiring him not to look at my hand for any ſuperſtitious particular enumeration of my ſins. Therewith he was called away to the council; & ego liberatus. Thus much I bear only for my life, as God knoweth. If in this I have offended any chriſtian, from the bottom of my heart I aſk them forgiveneſs. I truſt God hath forgiven me, who knoweth that I durſt never deny him before men, leſt he ſhould deny me before his heavenly Father.

Thus I have left behind me written with mine own hand, the effect of all the talk, eſpecially of the worſt that ever I granted unto, to the uttermoſt I can remember, as God knoweth. All the whole communication I have not written; for it were both too long and too fooliſh ſo to do. Now I beſeech the living God, which hath received me to his mercy, and brought to paſs, that I die ſtedfaſt and undefiled in his truth, at utter defiance and deteſtation of all papiſtical and antichriſtian doctrine; I beſeech him, I ſay, to keep and defend all his choſen for his name's ſake, from the tyranny of the biſhop of Rome that Antichriſt, and from the aſſault of all his ſatellites. God's indignation is known: he will try and prove who be his. Amend your lives. Deny not Chriſt before men, leſt he deny you before his heavenly Father. Fear not to loſe your lives for him; for ye ſhall find them again. God hold his merciful hand over this realm, and avert the plagues imminent from the ſame. God ſave the queen, and ſend her knowledge in his truth, Amen. Pray, pray, pray, ye chriſtians, and comfort yourſelves with the ſcriptures.

Written March 2. 1554. by me Walter Mantel, priſoner, whom both God and the world hath forgiven his offences. Amen.

And thus much concerning the purgation of Mr. Walter Mantel, who if he had conſented unto the queen, when ſhe ſent Dr. Bourne unto him to deny his faith, it is not otherwiſe to be thought but he would have been pardoned.

On Saturday March 3. Sir Gawen Carew and Mr. Gibbes were brought through London to the Tower with a company of horſemen.

March 17. every houſholder in London was commanded to appear before the aldermen of their ward, and there were commanded, that they, their wives and ſervants, ſhould prepare themſelves to confeſſion, and receive the ſacrament at Eaſter, and that neither they, nor any of them, ſhould depart out of the city until Eaſter was paſt.

Upon the Sunday following, March 18. the lady Elizabeth, the queen's ſiſter, of whom mention was made before, was brought to the Tower.

Upon Eaſter eve March 24. the lord marquis of Northampton, the lord Cobham, and Sir William Cobham were delivered out of the Tower.

March 25. being Eaſter-day in the morning, at St. Pancraſs in Cheap, the crucifix with the pyx [the veſſel in which the hoſt was kept] were taken out of the ſepulchre, before the prieſt roſe to the reſurrection: ſo that when after his accuſtomed manner he put his hand into the ſepulchre, and ſaid very devoutly, He is riſen, He is not here; he found his words true, for he was not there indeed. Whereupon being half diſmayed, they conſulted among themſelves whom they thought to be the likelieſt to do this thing: in which conſultation they remembered one Marſh, which a little before had been put from that parſonage becauſe he was married, to whoſe charge they laid it. But when they could not prove it, being brought before the mayor, they then burthened him to have kept company with his wife, ſince that they were by commandment divorced. Whereto he anſwered, That he thought the queen had done him wrong, to take from him both his living and his wife: which words were then noted, and taken very grievouſly, and he and his wife were both committed to ſeveral Compters, notwithſtanding that he had been very ſick.

The 8th of April there was a cat hanged upon a gallows at the croſs in Cheapſide, apparelled like a prieſt ready to ſay maſs, with a ſhaven crown: Her two fore feet were tied over her head, with a round paper like a wafer-cake put between them; whereon aroſe great evil will againſt the city of London. For the queen and the biſhops were very angry; and the ſame afternoon there was a proclamation mation iſſued, that whoſoever could bring forth the party that did hang up the cat, ſhould have twenty nobles, which was afterwards increaſed to twenty marks, but none could or would earn it.

As touching the firſt occaſion of ſetting up this gallows in Cheapſide, here is to be underſtood, that after the biſhop of Wincheſter's ſermon abovementioned, made before the queen for the ſpeedy execution of Wyat's ſoldiers, immediately upon the ſame, February 13. there were ſeveral gibbets ſet up in divers parts of the city; namely, two in Cheapſide, one at Leaden hall, one at Billingſgate, one at St. Magnus church, one in Smithfield, one in Fleet-ſtreet, four in Southwark, one at Aldgate, one at Biſhopſgate, one at Alderſgate, one at Newgate, one at Ludgate, one at St. James park corner, one at Cripplegate: all which remained for the terror of others, from February 13. to June 4; and then at the coming in of king Philip were taken down.

April 11. Sir Thomas Wyat was beheaded and quartered on Tower-hill, where he ſpoke theſe words concerning the lady Elizabeth and the earl of Devonſhire; "Concerning, ſaid he, what I have ſaid of others in "my examination, to charge any others as partaking "of my doings, I accuſe neither my lady Elizabeth's "grace, nor my lord of Devonſhire. I cannot accuſe "them, neither am I able to ſay, that to my knowledge "they knew any thing of my riſing." And when Dr. Weſton told him, that his confeſſion was otherwiſe before the council, he anſwered, "That which I ſaid "then, I ſaid; but that which I ſay now, is true."

Upon Tueſday, April 17. Sir James Croft and Mr. Winter were brought to Guildhall, with whom alſo was brought Sir Nicholas Throgmorton, and there arraigned of treaſon, for that he was ſuſpected to be of the conſpiracy with the duke of Suffolk and the reſt, againſt the queen; where he ſo learnedly and wiſely behaved himſelf (as well in clearing his own caſe, as alſo in opening ſuch laws of the realm as were then alledged againſt him) that the queſt which was charged with this matter, could not in conſcience but find him not guilty; for which, the ſaid twelve perſons of the queſt, being ſubſtantial men of the city, were each bound in the ſum of 500 pounds, to appear before the queen's council at a day appointed, there to anſwer ſuch things as ſhould be laid againſt them. Which queſt appeared accordingly before the council in the Star-chamber upon Wedneſday April 25. From whence, after certain queſtioning, they were committed to priſon, Emanuel Lucar and Mr. Whetſtone were committed to the Tower, and the other ten to the Fleet.

As concerning the condemnation of Dr. Cranmer, Dr. Ridley, and Mr. Latimer, which was the 20th of this month of April, and alſo of their diſputations, having ſaid enough before, we need not here rehearſe again.

The Friday after their condemnation, April 27. the lord Thomas Gray, brother to the late duke of Suffolk, was beheaded at Tower-hill.

On Saturday, April 28. Sir James Croft and Mr. Winter were again brought to Guild hall, where Sir James Croft was arraigned and condemned; and becauſe the day was far ſpent, Mr. Winter was not arraigned.

Upon Thurſday, May 17. William Thomas was arraigned at Guildhall, and the ſame day condemned, who the next day after was hanged, drawn and quartered. His accuſation was, for conſpiring the queen's death; which how true it was I have not to ſay. This is certain, that he made a right godly end, and wrote many fruitful exhortations, letters and ſonnets in the priſon before his death.

In the month of May it was given out, that a ſolemn diſputation ſhould be held at Cambridge (as ye heard before in Dr. Ridley's letter, pag. 65.) between Mr. Bradford, Mr. Saunders, Mr. Rogers, and others of that ſide, and the doctors of both the univerſities on the other ſide, like as had been before in Oxford. Whereupon the godly preachers who were in priſon having notice thereof, albeit they were deſtitute of their books, and were not ignorant of the purpoſe of their adverſaries, and how the cauſe was prejudiced before, alſo how the diſputations were confuſedly handled at Oxford; nevertheleſs they thought not to refuſe the offer of diſputation, ſo that they might be quietly and indifferently heard; and therefore wiſely pondering the matter with themſelves, by a public conſent directed out of priſon a declaration of their mind by writing the 8th of May. Wherein firſt, as touching the diſputation, although they knew that they ſhould do no good, becauſe all things were pre-determined before; yet nevertheleſs they would not deny to diſpute, if the diſputation might be either before the queen, or before the council, or before the parliament, or if they might diſpute by writing; for elſe if the matter were brought to the doctors handling in their own ſchools, they have ſufficient proof, they ſaid, by the experience of Oxford, that little good will be done at Cambridge; and ſo conſequently declaring the faith and doctrine of their religion, and exhorting the people withal to ſubmit themſelves with all patience and humility, either to the will or puniſhment of the higher powers; they appealed in the end from them to be their judges in this behalf, and ſo ended their proteſtation: the copy and contents whereof I thought not unfit here to be inſerted.

A Copy of the Declaration drawn up by Mr. Bradford, Mr. Saunders, and ſeveral others.

BEcauſe we hear that it is determined of the magiſtrates, and ſuch as be in authority, eſpecially of the clergy, to ſend us ſpeedily out of the priſons of the King's-Bench, the Fleet, the Marſhelſea, and Newgate, where at this preſent we are, and of long time ſome of us have been, not as rebels, traitors, ſeditious perſons, thieves, or tranſgreſſors of any laws of this realm, inhibitions, proclamations, or commandments of the queen's highneſs, or of any of the councils (God's name be praiſed therefore) but alonely for the conſcience we have to God, and his moſt holy word and truth, upon moſt certain knowledge: becauſe, we ſay, we hear that it is determined, we ſhall be ſent to one of the univerſities of Cambridge or Oxford, there to diſpute with ſuch as are appointed in that behalf: in that we purpoſe not to diſpute otherwiſe than by writing, except it may be before the queen's highneſs and her council, or before the parliament-houſes; and therefore perchance it will be bruited abroad, that we are not able to maintain by the truth of God's word, and the conſent of the true and catholic church of Chriſt, the doctrine we have generally and ſeverally taught, and ſome of us have written and ſet forth, where through the godly and ſimple may be offended, and ſomewhat weakened: we have thought it our bounden duty now whilſt we may, by writing to publiſh and notify the cauſes why we will not diſpute otherwiſe than is aboveſaid, to prevent the offences which might come thereby.

Firſt, Becauſe it is evidently known unto the whole world, that the determinations of both the univerſities in matters of religion, eſpecially wherein we ſhould diſpute, are directly againſt God's word, yea, againſt their own determination in the time of our late ſovereign lord and moſt godly prince, king Edward: and further it is known they be our open enemies, and have already condemned our cauſes, before any diſputation had of the ſame.

Secondly, Becauſe the prelates and clergy do not ſeek either us or the verity, but our deſtruction and their glory. For if they had ſought us (as charity requireth) then would they have called us forth hereabouts before their laws were ſo made, that frankly and without peril we might have ſpoken our conſciences. Again, If they had ſought for the verity, they would not have concluded of controverſies before they had been diſputed: ſo that it eaſily appeareth, that they ſeek their own glory and our deſtruction, and not us and the verity: and therefore we have good cauſe to refuſe diſputation, as a thing which ſhall not further prevail than to the ſetting forth of their glory, and ſuppreſſion of the verity.

Thirdly, Becauſe the cenſors and judges (as we hear who they be) are manifeſt enemies to the truth, and that which worſe is, obſtinate enemies, before whom pearls are not to be caſt, by the commandment of our Saviour Jeſus Chriſt, and by his own example. That they be ſuch, their doings of late at Oxford, and in the convocation-houſe, in October laſt paſt, do moſt evidently appear.

Fourthly, Becauſe ſome of us have been in priſon theſe eight or nine months, where we have had no books, no paper, no pen, no ink, or convenient place for ſtudy, we think we ſhould do evil, thus ſuddenly to deſcend into diſputation with them, which may alledge, as they liſt, the fathers and their teſtimonies, becauſe our memories have not that which we have read ſo readily, as to reprove, when they ſhall report and wreſt the authors to their purpoſe, or to bring forth that we may have there for our advantage.

Fifthly, Becauſe in diſputation we ſhall not be permitted to proſecute our arguments, but be ſtopt when we ſhould ſpeak; one ſaying this, another that, the third his mind, &c. As was done to the godly learned fathers, eſpecially Dr. Ridley at Oxford, who could not be permitted to declare his mind and meaning of the propoſitions, and had oftentimes half a dozen at once ſpeaking againſt him, always hindering him to proſecute his argument, and to anſwer accordingly: we will not ſpeak of the hiſſing, ſcoffing, and taunting which wonderfully then was uſed. If on this ſort, and much worſe they handled theſe fathers, much more will they be ſhameleſs bold with us, if we ſhould enter into diſputation with them.

Sixthly, Becauſe the notaries, that ſhall receive and write the diſputations ſhall be of their appointment, and ſuch as either do not or dare not favour the truth, and therefore muſt write either to pleaſe them, or elſe they themſelves (the cenſors and judges we mean) at their pleaſure will put to, and take from that which is written by the notaries; who cannot, or muſt not have in their cuſtody that which they write, longer than the diſputation endureth, as their doings at Oxford declareth. No copy nor ſcroll could any man have by their good will. For the cenſors and judges will have all delivered into their hands. Yea, if any man was ſeen there to write, as the report is, the ſame man was ſent for, and his writings taken from him: ſo muſt the diſputation ſerve only for the glory, not of God, but of the enemies of his truth.

For theſe cauſes we all think it ſo neceſſary not to diſpute with them, as if we did diſpute we ſhould do that which they deſire and purpoſely ſeek, to promote the kingdom of Antichriſt, and to ſuppreſs (as much as may be) the truth. We will not ſpeak of the offence that might come to the godly, when they ſhall hear, by the report of our enemies, our anſwers and arguments framed (you may be ſure) for their fantaſies, to the ſlandering of the verity.

Therefore we publiſh, and by this writing notify unto the whole congregation and church of England, that for theſe aforeſaid cauſes we will not diſpute with them, otherwiſe than with the pen, unleſs it be before the queen's highneſs and her council, or before the houſes of the parliament, as is aboveſaid. If they will write, we will anſwer; and by writing confirm and prove out of the infallible verity, even the very word of God, and by the teſtimony of the good and moſt ancient fathers in Chriſt's church, this our faith and every piece thereof, which hereafter we, in a ſum, do write and ſend abroad purpoſely, that our good brethren and ſiſters in the Lord may know it: and to ſeal up the ſame, we are ready through God's help and grace to give our lives to the halter or fire, or otherwiſe, as God ſhall appoint: humbly requiring, and in the bowels of our Saviour Jeſus Chriſt beſeeching all that fear God, to behave themſelves as obedient ſubjects to the queen's highneſs and the ſuperior powers, which are ordained of God under her, rather after our example to give their heads to the block, than in any point to rebel, or once to mutter againſt the Lord's anointed; we mean our ſovereign lady queen Mary, into whoſe heart we beſeech the Lord of mercy plentifully to pour the wiſdom and grace of his Holy Spirit, now and for ever. Amen.

Firſt, We confeſs and believe all the canonical books of the Old Teſtament, and all the books of the New Teſtament, to be the very true Word of God, and to be written by the inſpiration of the Holy Ghoſt, and are therefore to be heard accordingly, as the judge in all controverſies and matters of religion.

Secondly, We confeſs and believe, that the catholic church, which is the ſpouſe of Chriſt, as a moſt obedient and loving wife, doth embrace and follow the doctrine of theſe books in all matters of religion, and therefore is ſhe to be heard accordingly; ſo that thoſe which will not hear this church thus following and obeying the word of her huſband, we account as heretics and ſchiſmatics, according to this ſaying. "If he will not hear the church, "let him be to thee as a heathen."

Thirdly, We believe and confeſs all the articles of faith and doctrine ſet forth in the ſymbol of the apoſtles, which we commonly call the Creed, and in the ſymbols of the council of Nice, kept in the year 324. of Conſtantinople, in the year 384. of Epheſus, in the year 432. of Chalcedon, in the year 454. of Toletum the firſt and fourth. Alſo in the ſymbols of Athanaſius, Ireneus, Tertullian, and of Damaſus, which was about the year of our Lord 376. we confeſs and believe (we ſay) the doctrine of the ſymbols generally and particularly; ſo that whoſoever doth otherwiſe, we hold the ſame to err from the truth.

Fourthly, We believe and confeſs concerning juſtification, that as it cometh only from God's mercy through Chriſt, ſo it is perceived and had of none, which be of years of diſcretion, otherwiſe than by faith only: which faith is not an opinion, but a certain perſuaſion wrought by the Holy Ghoſt in the mind and heart of man, where through as the mind is illuminated, ſo the heart is ſuppled to ſubmit itſelf to the will of God unfeignedly, and ſo ſheweth forth an inherent righteouſneſs, which is to be diſcerned in the article of juſtification, from the righteouſneſs which God endueth us withal, juſtifying us, although inſeparably they go together. And this we do not for curioſity or contention ſake, but for conſcience ſake, that it might be quiet, which it can never be, if we confound without diſtinction forgiveneſs of ſins, and Chriſt's juſtice imputed to us, with regeneration and inherent righteouſneſs. By this we diſallow papiſtical doctrine of free-will, of works of ſupererogation, of merits, of the neceſſity of auricular confeſſion and ſatisfaction to God-wards.

Fifthly, We confeſs and believe concerning the exterior ſervice of God, that it ought to be according to the word of God; and therefore in the congregation all things public ought to be done in ſuch a tongue as may be moſt to edify, and not in Latin, where the people underſtand not the ſame.

Sixthly, We confeſs and believe that God only by Chriſt Jeſus is to be prayed unto and called upon; and therefore we diſallow invocation or prayer to ſaints departed this life.

Seventhly, We confeſs and believe, that as a man departeth this life, ſo ſhall he be judged in the laſt day generally, and in the mean ſeaſon is entered either into the ſtate of the bleſſed for ever, or damned for ever; and therefore is either paſt all help, or elſe needs no help of any in this life. By reaſon whereof we affirm purgatory, maſſes maſſes of Scala cœli, trentals, and ſuch ſuffrages as the popiſh church doth obtrude as neceſſary, to be the doctrine of Antichriſt.

Eighthly, We confeſs and believe the ſacraments of Chriſt, which be baptiſm and the Lord's ſupper, that they ought to be miniſtered according to the inſtitution of Chriſt, concerning the ſubſtantial parts of them: and that they be no longer ſacraments, than they be had in uſe, and uſed to the end for which they were inſtituted.

And here we plainly confeſs, that the mutilation of the Lord's ſupper, and the ſubtraction of the one kind from the lay people, is antichriſtian. And ſo is the doctrine of tranſubſtantiation of the ſacramental bread and wine after the words of conſecration, as they be called.

Item, The adoration of the ſacrament with honour due unto God; the reſervation and carrying about of the ſame.

Item. The maſs to be a propitiatory ſacrifice for the quick and dead, or a work that pleaſeth God.

All theſe we believe and confeſs to be Antichriſt's doctrine: as is the inhibition of marriage as unlawful to any ſtate. And we doubt not by God's grace, but we ſhall be able to prove all our confeſſions here to be moſt true by the verity of God's word, and conſent of the catholic church, which followeth and hath followed the governance of God's Spirit, and the judgment of his word.

And this through the Lord's help we will do, either in diſputation by word before the queen's highneſs and her council, either before the parliament houſes, of whom we doubt not but to be indifferently heard, or elſe with our pens, whenſoever we ſhall be thereto by them that have authority, required and commanded.

In the mean ſeaſon, as obedient ſubjects, we ſhall behave ourſelves towards all that be in authority, and not ceaſe to pray to God for them, that he would govern them all, generally and particularly, with the ſpirit of wiſdom and grace. And ſo we heartily deſire, and humbly pray all men to do, in no point conſenting to any kind of rebellion or ſedition againſt our ſovereign lady the queen's highneſs: but where they cannot obey, but they muſt diſobey God, there to ſubmit themſelves with all patience and humility to ſuffer as the will and pleaſure of the high powers ſhall judge: as we are ready through the goodneſs of the Lord to ſuffer whatſoever they ſhall adjudge us unto, rather than we will conſent to any doctrine contrary to this which we here confeſs, unleſs we ſhall be juſtly convinced thereof, either by writing or by word, before ſuch judges as the queen's highneſs and her council, or the parliament houſes ſhall appoint. For the univerſities and clergy have condemned our cauſes already by the bigger, but not by the better part, without all diſputation of the ſame: and therefore moſt juſtly we may, and do appeal from them to be our judges in this behalf, except it may be in writing, that to all men the matter may appear. The Lord of mercy endue us all with the Spirit of his truth and grace of perſeverance therein unto the end. Amen.

May 8. 1554.

To theſe things aboveſaid, do I Miles Coverdale, late of Exon, conſent and agree, with theſe mine afflicted brethren being priſoners, mine own hand.

And thus much concerning this preſent declaration ſubſcribed by theſe preachers, which was on the 8th day of May.

Furthermore, the 19th of the ſaid month, the Lady Elizabeth, the queen's ſiſter, was brought to the Tower, and committed to the cuſtody of Sir John Williams, afterwards lord Williams of Tame, by whom her highneſs was gently and courteouſly intreated: who afterwards was had to Woodſtock, and there committed to the keeping of Sir Henry Benefield, knight, of Oxborough in Norfolk; who, on the other ſide, both forgetting her eſtate, and his own duty, as it is reported, ſhewed himſelf more hard and ſtreight unto her, than either cauſe was given of her part, or reaſon of his own part would have led him, if either grace or wiſdom in him might have ſeen before, what danger might have enſued thereof afterward. Of which we ſhall intreat more at large hereafter, the Lord willing, in the ſtory and life of queen Elizabeth.

On Friday, July 20. king Philip arrived at Southampton. The prince himſelf was the firſt that landed; who immediately as he ſet foot upon the land, drew out his ſword, and carried it naked in his hand. A little without the town the mayor of Southampton, with certain commoners, met him, and delivered the keys of the town unto the prince, who removed his ſword, naked as it was, out of his right hand into his left, and ſo received the keys of the mayor without any word ſpeaking, or countenance of thankfulneſs, and after a while delivered the keys to the mayor again. At the town gate the earl of Arundel and the lord Williams met him, and ſo he was brought to his lodging.

Upon Wedneſday following, July 25. being St. James's day, Philip prince of Spain, and Mary queen of England, were ſolemnly married in the cathedral church at Wincheſter, by the biſhop of Wincheſter, in the preſence of a great number of noblemen of both the realms. At the time of this marriage, the emperor's ambaſſador being preſent, openly pronounced, that in conſideration of that marriage, the emperor had granted and given unto his ſon the kingdom of Naples, &c.

Whereupon the firſt of Auguſt following, there was a proclamation, that from that time forth the ſtyle of all manner of writings ſhould be altered, and this following uſed:

"Philip and Mary, by the grace of God, king and "queen of England, France, Naples, Jeruſalem and Ire-"land, Defenders of the Faith, Princes of Spain and "Sicily, Archdukes of Auſtrich, dukes of Milan, Bur-"gundy, and Brabant, Counties of Haſpurge, Flanders "and Tyrol."

Of this marriage as the papiſts chiefly ſeemed to be very glad, ſo ſeveral of them, after divers ſtudies to ſhew forth their inward affections, made interludes and pageants, ſome drew forth genealogies, deriving his pedigree from Edward III. and John of Gaunt. Amongſt others, Mr. White, then biſhop of Lincoln (his poetical vein being drunk with joy of the marriage) made certain verſes; a tranſlation whereof we have here inſerted.

The genealogy of Philip and Mary, whereby both princes are ſhewn to have deſcended from John of Gaunt, ſon of Edward III. king of England and France. The author Mr. White biſhop of Lincoln.

JOHN of Gaunt, father of princes did beget,
John the puiſſant earl of Somerſet:
From him John duke of Somerſet did ſpring,
Whoſe daughter Marg'ret brought forth England's king,
Henry the ſeventh, who of life bereft,
The throne unto his ſon prince Henry left:
His daughter Mary, England's ſcepter bears,
And may ſhe bear it long exempt from cares.

Verſes of Mr. White biſhop of Lincoln, concerning the marriage of Philip and Mary.

THE devil, that old enemy of mankind,
Strives to prevent, tho' to it God's inclin'd,

That Mary, England's queen, ſhould join her hands
To Engliſh Philip in hymeneal bands.
Againſt the match, with the dark prince of Night,
The helpleſs Scots, and timorous French unite,
With theſe hell's prelates join, Caiaphas's race,
Eight married fathers, void of heav'nly grace,
John Dudley, Wyat, and rebellious Kent,
With Gray, conſpire the marriage to prevent.
But that the nuptials ſhould performed be,
Cæſar and Flanders would, and Italy,
Catholic biſhops, and with theſe comply
Five holy Fathers, for their ſanctity
In fetters bound, the ſenate of the nation,
And all true catholics in every ſtation,
Lords, commons, learned, ignorant, and we,
'Cauſe God himſelf doth thereunto agree.
When Philip to queen Mary ſhall be join'd,
Their blood its wonted courſe ſhall run refin'd.

Anſwer to White biſhop of Lincoln, by the reverend biſhop of Norwich.

THAT Mary ſhould to Spaniſh Philip wed,
And England's glory be extirpated,
The devil wills, jointly with him agree,
All Flanders, Italy, and Germany,
Caiaphas's race, the mitered company
Of popiſh biſhops, Five for impiety
In priſon caſt: but God's extended arm
Kindly ſupports us, and averts the harm:
He nills the match, gives England liberty,
With him the warlike Scots and French agree,
Eight married in the Lord: and Dudley you,
Foreboding diſmal things, the marriage view,
The ſenate nills; brave Wyat doth eſpouſe
With pious zeal his country's injur'd cauſe;
With him Gray, and the Kentiſh folk comply,
Either to gain their liberty, or die.
Then ſay, what profits will the Spaniſh king,
Having wedded Mary, to the Engliſh bring?

Another Anſwer by the ſaid Author.

SATAN, your all-confounding ſire it's plain,
Would have queen Mary wed the prince of Spain;
That ſo he may Britannia's noble race
Eradicate, and ſuddenly deface.
But God, the Father of the Engliſh ſtill, Reſents the rancour of his wicked will.
Nor do the warlike French nor Scots agree;
Tho' Flanders, Italy, and Germany,
Conſpire and jointly ſtrive that this may be.
The mitred prelates all the match proclaim;
Our holy Fathers all decry the ſame.
The Eight, who ſacred nuptial tyes revere,
Couragious, and unmov'd by ſlaviſh fear,
Will not, altho' the factious Five agree,
That were impriſon'd for impiety.
Dudley the brave Northumbrian hero ſtands:
Prompt to oppoſe the matrimonial bands;
And ſo will all prepar'd and ready be,
That love their country, laws, and liberty.
Wyat the brave this generous mind doth ſhew,
The nobles, commons, and the clergy too.
Ye will the match, who are by nature prone
To baniſh truth, and piety dethrone:
But Gray, and all the Kentiſh folk declare
Their juſt reſentment at the married pair.
What glory then from ſuch a marriage ſprings?
What ſplendor does it add unto the ancient kings?

Other Verſes anſwering to biſhop White, made by J. C.

THO' Philip to the Engliſh line pretend,
And Mary from the Spaniſh did deſcend;
Yet for an Engliſh queen of Mongrel breed,
To wed a Spaniſh prince (as 'tis decreed)
Is to her Sire and nation a diſgrace indeed.
Th' admirers of Old England's valour ſee,
With truth aud juſtice this can ne'er agree;
But God the ſame does for our ſins permit,
And therefore patiently they ſuffer it.
The people if they are not ſtrangely bent
Againſt our welfare, never will conſent
To this unhappy match, foreboding ill:
What's it to us if th' adverſe nation will?
All pious men againſt the match contend;
For they are mad indeed who it defend.
The Eight, who ſacred wedlock do revere,
Than the impriſon'd Five more wiſe appear;
For this pernicious marriage they oppoſe,
To ſave the nation from inſulting foes.
The Hero of Northumberland withſtands
Theſe inauſpicious and illegal bands:
O dire, infernal councellors, who will Promote this fatal match, preſaging ill!
Wyat in war unhappily engag'd,
Was at the marriage generouſly enrag'd:
None for it was; but all the ſame withſtood,
Except th' unthinking Popiſh multitude.
Gray, and the Britains all, will not agree
That this unhappy match ſhould ever be:
We, 'cauſe th' Almighty wills it ſo, ſubmit,
And patiently endure and ſuffer it:
But worſe things we ſhall bear, if Mary be
In ſacred wedlock, Philip, join'd to thee.

Other Verſes anſwering likewiſe,

SAY White, whom can you find that will agree,
That Mary ſhould to Philip married be?
It matters not what the vain multitude
Do Will or Nill (they're ignorant and rude).
To Will and Nill is God's chief property:
The queſtion then is, What he wills to be?
'Cauſe God hath will'd the match (you ſay) the ſame
Ye will, and loudly every where proclaim:
You ought indeed to know what God doth will,
Becauſe, dull fool, thou'rt ignorant of it ſtill.
This he hath will'd that in his augury
White ſhould a lying Pſeudo-prophet be.
A king tho' not the king ſhe weds indeed,
Herſelf an Engliſh queen, tho' not of Engliſh breed.
She's pregnant and not pregnant, yet pretends
Her teeming womb a joyful Offſpring ſends:
This ye with hearts exulting wiſh to ſee;
But lo! no Offſpring comes: This God would have to be.
He for a ſeaſon weds, and then forſakes her;
One day a bride, the next a widow makes her:
This God would have; (whoſe vengeance overtakes her)
So vain the prayers of wicked men are made,
Who for their country's ruin have deſtruction laid.
Sit Nomen Domini benedictum.

After the conſummation of the marriage, the king and queen removed from Wincheſter to ſeveral other places, and by eaſy journeys came to Windſor caſtle, where he was inſtalled in the order of the Garter, upon Sunday Auguſt 12. at which time an herald took down the arms of England at Windſor, and in the place of them would have ſet up the arms of Spain, but he was commanded to ſet them up again by certain lords. From thence they both removed to Richmond, and from thence by water to London, and landed at the biſhop of Wincheſter's houſe, through which they paſſed both into Southwark-park, and ſo to Southwark houſe called Suffolk place, where they lay that night, being the 18th of Auguſt.

And the next day the king and queen's majeſties rode from Suffolk place (accompanied with a great number, as well well of noblemen as gentlemen) through the city of London to Whitehall; and at London-bridge, as he entered at the draw-bridge, was a vain great ſpectacle ſet up, two images repreſenting two giants, one named Corineus, and the other Gogmagog, holding between them certain Latin verſes, which for the vain oſtentation of flattery I overpaſs.

And as they paſſed over the bridge, there was a number of ordnance ſhot off at the Tower, ſuch as by old men's report the like hath not been heard or ſeen theſe 100 year.

From London-bridge they paſſed the conduit in Gracious-ſtreet, which was finely painted, and among other things, the nine worthies, whereof king Henry VIII. was one. He was painted in harneſs, having in one hand a ſword, and in the other hand a book, whereon was written Verbum Dei, delivering the ſame book, as it were to his ſon king Edward, who was painted in a corner by him.

But this gave great offence; for the biſhop of Wincheſter, lord chancellor, ſent for the painter, and not only called him knave for painting a book in king Henry's hand, and ſpecially for writing thereupon Verbum Dei, but alſo rank traitor and villain, ſaying to him that he ſhould rather have put the book into the queen's hand, who was alſo painted there, for that ſhe had reformed the church and religion, with other things according to the pure and ſincere word of God indeed. The painter anſwered, and ſaid, That if he had known that had been the matter wherefore his lordſhip ſent for him, he could have remedied it, and not troubled his lordſhip. The biſhop anſwered, That it was the queen's majeſty's will and commandment that he ſhould ſend for him: and ſo commanding him to wipe out the book and Verbum Dei too, he ſent him home. The painter departed, but fearing leſt he ſhould leave ſome part either of the book, or of Verbum Dei in king Henry's hand; he wiped away a piece of his fingers withal.

Here I paſs over other gawds and pageants of paſtime ſhewed to him in paſſing through London, with the flattering verſes ſet up in Latin, wherein were blazed out in one place the five Philips, as the five worthies of the world, Philip of Macedone, Philip the emperor, Philip the bold, Philip the good, Philip prince of Spain, and king of England.

In another poetry, king Philip was reſembled by an image repreſenting Orpheus, and all Engliſh people reſembled to brute and ſavage beaſts following after Orpheus harp, and dancing after king Philip's pipe. Not that I reprehend the art of the Latin verſes, which was fine and cunning, but that I paſs over the matter, having graver things in hand; and therefore paſs over alſo the ſight at Paul's church ſide, of him that came down upon a rope tied to the battlements with his head before, neither ſtaying himſelf with his hand nor foot; which ſhortly after coſt him his life.

But one thing by the way I cannot let paſs, touching the rood newly ſet up againſt this time, to welcome king Philip into Paul's church. The ſetting up of which rood was this, and may make as good a a pageant as the beſt.

Anno 2 Mariæ, Bonner in his royalty, and all his prebendaries about him in Paul's quire, the rood laid along upon the pavements, and alſo the doors of Paul's being ſhut, the biſhop with others ſaid and ſung divers prayers by the rood: that being done, they anointed the rood with oil in divers places, and after the anointing, crept unto it, and kiſſed it.

After that, they took the ſaid rood, and weighed him up, and ſet him in his old accuſtomed place, and all the while they were doing thereof, the whole quire ſang Te Deum, and when that was ended, they rang the bells, not only for joy, but alſo for the notable and great fact they had done therein.

Not long after this, a merry fellow came into Paul's, and ſpied the rood with Mary and John new ſet up; whereto, among a great ſort of people, he made low courteſy, and ſaid: Sir, your maſterſhip is welcome to town. I had thought to have talked further with your maſterſhip, but that ye be here cloathed in the queen's colours. I hope that ye be but a ſummer's bird, in that ye be dreſſed in white and green.

The prince thus being in the church of Paul's, after Dr. Harpsfield had finiſhed his oration in Latin, ſet forward through Fleet-ſtreet, and ſo came to Whitehall, where he with the queen remained four days after, and from thence removed unto Richmond.

After this, all the lords had leave to depart into their countries, with ſtrait commandment to bring all their harneſs and artillery into the Tower of London with all ſpeed. Now remained there no Engliſh lord at the court, but the biſhop of Wincheſter. From Richmond they removed to Hampton-court, where the hall-door within the court was continually ſhut, ſo that no man might enter, unleſs his errand were firſt known, which ſeemed ſtrange to Engliſhmen that had not been uſed thereto.

About September 8. biſhop Bonner began his viſitation, who charged ſix men in every pariſh to enquire (according to their oaths) and to preſent before him the day after St. Matthew's day, all ſuch perſons as either had or ſhould offend in any of his articles, which he had ſet forth to the number of 37. of which viſitation of Bonner I ſhall ſpeak more largely, after I have related a few other things in courſe of the preſent ſtory.

September 17. was a proclamation in London, That all vagabonds and maſterleſs men, as well ſtrangers as Engliſhmen, ſhould depart the city within five days; and ſtraitly charging all innholders, victuallers, taverners, and alehouſe-keepers, with all other that ſell victuals, that they after the ſaid five days ſhould not ſell any meat, drink, or any kind of victuals to any ſervingman whatſoever, unleſs he brought a teſtimonial from his maſter to declare whoſe ſervant he was, and were in continual houſhold with his ſaid maſter, upon pain to run in danger of the law, if they offended herein.

Upon Sunday following, the biſhop of Wincheſter, lord chancellor of England, preached at Paul's Croſs, at whoſe ſermon were preſent all the council that were at the court: namely, the marquis of Wincheſter, the earl of Arundel, lord North, Sir Anthony Brown, Mr. Rocheſter, Mr. Walgrave, Mr. Englefield, lord Fitzwater, and ſecretary Peter, and the biſhops of London, Durham, and Ely, which three ſat under the biſhop's arms. The goſpel whereof he made his ſermon, is written in the twenty-ſecond chapter of Matthew, where the Phariſees came unto Chriſt, and among them one aſked Chriſt which was the greateſt commandment; Chriſt anſwered, "Thou ſhalt love the Lord thy God with all thy "heart, &c. and thy neighbour as thyſelf, in theſe two "is comprehended the law and the prophets."

After his long declaration of theſe words, ſpeaking very much of love and charity, at laſt he had occaſion upon St. James his words to ſpeak of the true teachers, and of the falſe teachers; ſaying, That all the preachers almoſt in king Edward's time, preached nothing but voluptuouſneſs, and filthy and blaſphemous lyes, affirming their doctrine to be that falſe doctrine whereof St. James ſpeaketh in this third chapter ſaying, that it was full of perverſe zeal, earthly, full of diſcord and diſſention, that the preachers aforenamed would report nothing truly, and that they taught that it was lawful for a man to put away his wife for adultery, and marry another, and that if a man vowed to-day, he might break it to-morrow at his pleaſure, with many other things which I omit. And when he ſpake of the ſacrament, he ſaid, that all the church from the beginning have confeſſed Chriſt's natural body to be in heaven, and here to be in the ſacrament, and ſo concluded that matter: and then willed all men to ſay with Joſeph's brethren, "We have all ſinned againſt our brother," and ſo ſaid he have I too. Then he declared what a noble king and queen we have, ſaying, that if he ſhould go about to ſhew that the king came hither for no neceſſity or need, and what he had brought with him, it ſhould be ſuperfluous, ſeeing it is evidently known, that he hath ten times as much as we are in hope and poſſeſſion of, affirming him to be as wiſe, ſober, gentle, and temperate a prince as ever was in England, and if it were not ſo proved, then to take him for a falſe lyar for his ſo ſaying: exhorting all men to make much of him, and to win him whilſt we had him, and ſo ſhould we alſo win all ſuch as he hath brought with him; and ſo made an end.

Upon Tueſday October 2. twenty carts came from Weſtminſter laden (as it was noiſed) with gold and ſilver, and certain of the guard with them thro' the city to the Tower, and it was received in by a Spaniard, who was the king's treaſurer, and had cuſtody of it within the Tower. It was matted about with mats, and mailed in little bundles about two foot long, and almoſt half a foot thick, and in every cart were ſix of thoſe bundles. What it was indeed, God knoweth, for it is to us uncertain.

About the ſame time, or a little before, upon Corpus Chriſti day, the proceſſion being made in Smithfield where after the manner the prieſt with his box went under the canopy, by chance there came by the way a certain ſimple man, named John Street, a Joyner of Coleman-ſtreet, who having ſome haſte in his buſineſs, and finding no other way to paſs through, by chance went under the canopy by the prieſt. The prieſt ſeeing the man ſo to preſume to come under the canopy, being belike afraid, and worſe feared than hurt, for fear let his pyx fall down. The poor man, being ſtreightways apprehended, was had to the Compter, the prieſt accuſing him unto the council, as though he had come to ſlay him; whenas the poor man, as himſelf hath ſince declared unto us, had no ſuch thought ever in his mind. Then from the Compter, he was had unto Newgate, where he was caſt into the dungeon, there chained to a poſt, where he was cruelly and miſerably handled, and ſo extreamly dealt withal, that being but ſimple before, he was now feared out of his wits altogether, and ſo upon the ſame had to Bedlam. Whereupon the brief chronicle of London in this point is not to be credited, which untruly reported that he feigned himſelf in Newgate to be mad: which thing we, in writing of this hiſtory, by due inquiſition of the party, have found to be contrary.

About the fifth of October, divers as well houſholders as ſervants and 'prentices were apprehended and taken, and committed to ſundry priſons, for having and ſelling of certain books which were ſent into England by the preachers that fled into Germany and other countries; which books nipped a great number ſo near, that within one fortnight there were little leſs than threeſcore imprioned for this matter: among whom was Mr. Brown a goldſmith, Mr. Spark a draper, Randal Tyrer a ſtationer, Mr. Beſton a merchant, with many others.

Upon Sunday October 14. the old biſhop of Durham preached in the ſhrouds.

Upon St. Luke's day, October 18. the king came from Weſtminſter to Paul's church along the ſtreets, accompanied with a great number of noblemen, and there he was received under a canopy at the weſt door, and ſo came into the chancel, where he heard maſs, which a Spaniſh biſhop and his own chaplain ſung; and that done, he returned to Weſtminſter to dinner.

Upon Friday October 26. certain men, whereof I ſpake before, which were of Mr. Throgmorton's queſt, being in number eight (for the other four were delivered out of priſon, for that they ſubmitted themſelves, and ſaid they had offended, like weaklings, not conſidering truth to be truth, but for fear ſaid ſo), theſe eight men, I ſay, whereof Mr. Emanuel Lucas and Mr. Whetſtone were chief, were called before the council in the Star-chamber: where they all affirmed that they had done all things in that matter according to their knowledge, and with good conſciences, even as they ſhould anſwer before God at the day of judgment. When Mr. Lucas ſaid openly before all the lords, that they had done in the matter like honeſt men and true and faithful ſubjects, and therefore they humbly beſought the lord chancellor, and the other lords, to be means to the king and queen's majeſties that they might be diſcharged and ſet at liberty, and ſaid that they were all contented humbly to ſubmit themſelves to their majeſties, ſaving and reſerving their truth, conſciences and honeſty. Some of the lords ſaid, that they were worthy to pay 1000 pounds apiece, and others ſaid, that Mr. Lucas and Mr. Whetſtone were worthy to pay 1000 marks apiece, and the reſt 500 l. apiece. In concluſion, ſentence was given by the lord chancellor, that they ſhould pay 1000 marks apiece, and be ſent to priſon again, there to remain till further order were taken for their puniſhment.

On Tueſday October 30. the lord J. Gray was delivered out of the Tower, and ſet at liberty.

On Sunday November 4, five prieſts did penance at Paul's Croſs, which were content to put away their wives, and take upon them again to miniſter. Every one of them had a taper in his hand, and a rod, wherewith the preacher did diſpel them.

Upon Wedneſday November 7. the lord Paget, and Sir Edward Haſtings maſter of the horſe, were ſent as ambaſſadors, I know not whither, but as it was adjudged, to cardinal Poole, who lay all the ſummer before at Bruſſels; and it was thought they were ſent to accompany and conduct him into England, where at that time he was nominated archbiſhop of Canterbury.

Upon Friday November 9. Mr. Barlow, late biſhop of Bath, and Mr. Cardmaker, were brought before the council in the ſtar-chamber, where, after communication, they were commanded to the Fleet.

Upon Saturday November 10. the ſheriffs of London had commandment to take an inventory of every one of their goods which were of maſter Throgmorton's queſt, and to ſeal up their doors; which was done the ſame day. Mr. Whetſtone, Mr. Lucas, Mr. Kytely, were judged to pay 1000 pounds apiece, and the reſt 1000 marks apiece, to be paid within one fortnight after. From this payment were exempted thoſe four which confeſſed a fault, and ſubmitted themſelves, whoſe names are theſe, Mr. Loe, Mr. Poynter, Mr. Beſwike, and Mr. Carter.

Mention was made a little before of the viſitation of Edmund Bonner biſhop of London, which began (as is ſaid) about the month of September; for the better preparation whereof were ſet forth certain articles to the number of 37. which articles, partly for the tedioufneſs of them, partly for that Mr. Bale, in a certain treatiſe, hath ſufficiently painted out the ſame in their colours, partly alſo becauſe I will not infect this book with them, I ſlip them over, proceeding in the progreſs of this biſhop in his viſitation in the county of Eſſex. Who paſſing through the ſaid county of Eſſex, being attended with divers worſhipful of the ſhire (for ſo they were commanded) arrived at Sterford in Hertfordſhire, where he reſted certain days, ſolacing himſelf after that painful peregrination with no ſmall feaſting and banquetting with his attendants aforeſaid, at the houſe of one Parſons his nephew, whoſe wife he commonly called his fair niece (and fair ſhe was indeed) he took there great pleaſure to hear her play upon the virginals, wherein ſhe excelled, inſomuch that every dinner (ſitting by his ſweet ſide) ſhe aroſe and played three ſeveral times at his requeſt, of his good and ſpiritual devotion towards her. After ſome days were paſſed in this faſhion, he proceeded in his popiſh viſitation toward Hadham, his own houſe and pariſh, not paſt two miles from Sterford, being there moſt ſolemnly rung out, as in all other places where he paſſed. At length drawing near unto Hadham, when he heard no ſtirring there in honour of his holineſs, he grew into ſome choler, and the nearer he approached the hotter was his fit: and the quieter the bells were, the unquieter was his mood. Thus rode he on, chafing and fuming with himſelf: "What meaneth (ſaith he) that knave the "clerk,

" clerk, that he ringeth not? and the parſon, that he " meeteth me not?" with other paſſionate expreſſions. There this patient prelate, coming to the town, alighted, calling for the key of the church, which was then all unready; for that, as they then pretended, he had prevented his time by two hours: whereupon he grew from choler to plain melancholy, ſo as no man willingly would deal with him to qualify the raging humour ſo far incorporated in his breaſt. At laſt, the church door being opened, the biſhop entered, and finding no ſacrament hanged up, no rood-loft decked after the popiſh precept (which had commanded about the ſame time a well-favoured rood, and of tall ſtature univerſally in all churches to be ſet up), curtailed his ſmall devotions, and fell from all choler and melancholy to flat madneſs in the greateſt degree, ſwearing and raging with an hunting oath or two (and by no ſmall oaths), that in his own church, where he hoped to have ſeen beſt order, he found moſt diſorder, to his honour's moſt heavy diſcomfort, as he ſaid, calling the parſon (whoſe name was Dr. Bricket) knave, and heretic. Who there humbled himſelf, and yielded, as it were, to his fault, ſaying, He was ſorry his lordſhip was come before that he and his pariſh looked for him, and therefore could not do their duties to receive him accordingly: and as for thoſe things which were lacking, he truſted in ſhort time hereafter he ſhould compaſs that which hitherto he could not bring about. Therefore if it pleaſed his lordſhip to come to his poor houſe, where his dinner was prepared, he would ſatisfy him in thoſe things which his lordſhip thought amiſs. Yet this reaſonable anſwer neither could ſatisfy nor aſſwage his unreaſonable paſſion. For the catholic prelate utterly defied him and his chear, commanding him out of his ſight, ſaying, as his by-word was, " Before God, thou art a knave; " avaunt, heretic;" and therewithal, whether thruſting or ſtriking at him, ſo it was that with his hand he gave Sir Thomas Joſſelin knight (who was then amongſt the reſt, and ſtood next the biſhop) a good blow upon the upper part of the neck, even under his ear, as ſome ſay which ſtood by; but, as he himſelf ſaid, he hit him full upon the ear; whereat he was ſomewhat aſtoniſhed at the ſuddenneſs of the quarrel for that time. At laſt he ſpake and ſaid, " What meaneth your lordſhip? have you " been trained in Will. Sommer's ſchool, to ſtrike him " that ſtandeth next you?" The biſhop ſtill in rage either heard not, or would not hear.

Then Mr. Fecknam, dean of Paul's, ſeeing the biſhop ſtill in this bitter rage, ſaid, " O Mr. Joſſelin, you muſt " bear with my lord, for truly his long impriſonment in " the Marſhalſea, and the miſuſing of him there hath " altered him, that in theſe paſſions he is not ruler of " himſelf, nor it booteth any man to give him counſel " until his heat be paſt, and then aſſure yourſelf, " Mr. Joſſelin, my lord will be ſorry for thoſe abuſes " that now he cannot ſee in himſelf." Whereunto he merrily replied, " So it ſeems, Mr. Fecknam, for now " that he is come forth of the Marſhalſea, he is ready to " go to Bedlam." At which merry conceit ſome laughed, and more ſmiled, becauſe the nail was ſo truly hit upon the head. The biſhop nothing abaſed at his own folly gave a deaf ear; and it was no marvel, that he was not aſhamed to ſtrike a ſtranger, who ſpared not the burning of ſo many good men.

After this worthy combat thus finiſhed, this martial prelate preſently taketh him to his horſe again, notwithſtanding he at firſt intended to tarry at Hadham three or four days, and had made proviſion in his own houſe accordingly; but leaving his dinner, he rode that night with a ſmall company of his houſhold to Ware, to the great wonder of all the country, who looked not for his coming till three days after.

At this haſty poſting away of the biſhop, his whole train of attendants there left him; alſo his doctors and chaplains, a few excepted, tarried behind, and dined at Dr. Bricket's as merrily as the biſhop rode toward Ware chafingly: which dinner was prepared for the biſhop himſelf. Now whether the biſhop were offended at thoſe ſolemnities which he wanted, and was accuſtomed to be ſaluted withal in other places where he journeyed, adding to that, that his great God was not exalted aboveground over the altar, nor his block almighty ſet ſeemly in the rood-loft to entertain ſtrangers, and thereupon took occaſion to quarrel with Dr. Bricket (whoſe religion perchance he ſomewhat ſuſpected), I have not perfectly to ſay, but ſo it was ſuppoſed of ſeveral the cauſe thereof to riſe, which drave the biſhop ſo haſtily from ſuch a dinner. Teſtified by ſuch as there and then were preſent.

In this viſitation of Biſhop Bonner above-mentioned, ye ſee how the biſhop took on for not ſetting up the rood, and ringing the bells at Hadham. Ye heard alſo of the precept, which commanded in every pariſh a rood to be erected, both well-favoured and of a tall ſtature. By occaſion whereof it cometh in mind, and not out of place, what happened in a certain town in Lancaſhire near to Lancaſter, called Cockram, where the pariſhioners and church-wardens, having at the ſame time a like charge for the erecting of a rood in their pariſh church, had made their bargain, and were at a price with one that could cunningly carve and paint ſuch idols, for the framing of their rood: who, according to his promiſe, made them one, and ſet it up in their church. This done, he demanded his money: but they miſliking his workmanſhip, refuſed to pay him, whereupon he arreſted them, and the matter was brought before the mayor of Lancaſter, who was a very fit man for ſuch a purpoſe, and an old favourer of the goſpel, which is rare in that country. Then the carver began to declare how they covenanted with him for the making of a rood with the appurtenances, ready carved and ſet up in their church, which he according to his promiſe had done; and now demanding his money, they refuſed to pay him. Is this true? quoth the mayor to the wardens. Yea, Sir, ſaid they. And why do you not pay the poor man his due? quoth he. And it pleaſe you, maſter mayor, quoth they, becauſe the rood we had before was a well-favoured man, and he promiſed to make us ſuch another; but this that he hath ſet us up now, is the worſt favoured thing that ever you ſet your eyes on, gaping and grinning in ſuch ſort, that none of our children dare once look him in the face, or come near him. The mayor thinking that it was good enough for that purpoſe if it had been worſe; My maſters, quoth he, howſoever the rood like you, the poor man's labour hath been never the leſs, and it is a pity that he ſhould have any hindrance or loſs thereby. Therefore I will tell you what you ſhould do: pay him the money ye promiſed him, and go your ways home and, look on it, and if it will not ſerve for a god, make no more ado, but clap a pair of horns on his head, and ſo he will make an excellent devil. This the pariſhioners took well in worth: the poor man had his money, and divers laughed well thereat: but ſo did not the Babyloniſh prieſts.

This Mayor above-mentioned continued a proteſtant almoſt 50 years, and was the only reliever of Mr. March the martyr (whoſe ſtory followeth hereafter) with meat, drink and lodging, while he lay in Lancaſter-caſtle, the ſpace of three quarters of a year, before he was had to Cheſter to be burned, &c.

About this time there came a precept or mandate from Bonner biſhop of London, to all biſhops and curates within his dioceſe, for the aboliſhing of ſuch ſcriptures and writings as had been painted upon church-walls in king Edward's days. The copy of which precept or mandate we thought good to inſert here, that the world might ſee the wicked proceedings of their impious zeal, or rather their malicious rage againſt the Lord and his word, and againſt the edifying of chriſtian people: whereby it might appear by this blotting out of the ſcriptures, not only how blaſphemouſly they ſpake againſt the holy ſcriptures of God, but alſo how ſtudiouſly they ſought all manner of means to keep the people ſtill in ignorance.

A Mandate of Biſhop Bonner, to aboliſh the Scriptures and Writings painted upon the Church-Walls.

EDMUND by God's permiſſion biſhop of London, to all and every parſons, vicars, clerks, and lettered, within the pariſh of Hadham, or within the precinct of our dioceſe of London, whereſoever being, ſendeth greeting, grace and benediction.

Becauſe ſome children of iniquity, given up to carnal deſires and novelties, have by many ways enterprized to baniſh the ancient manner and order of the church, and to bring in and eſtabliſh ſects and hereſies; taking from thence the picture of Chriſt, and many things beſides inſtituted and obſerved of ancient time laudably in the ſame, placing in the room thereof ſuch things, as in ſuch a place it behoveth them not to do; and alſo have procured as a ſtay to their hereſies (as they thought) certain ſcriptures wrongly applied to be painted upon the church-walls, all which perſons tend chiefly to this end; that they might uphold the liberty of the fleſh, and marriage of prieſts, and deſtroy as much as lay in them the reverend ſacrament of the altar, and might extinguiſh and enervate holy-days, faſting days, and other laudable diſcipline of the catholic church, opening a window to all vices, and utterly cloſing up the way unto virtue: wherefore we being moved with a chriſtian zeal, judging that the premiſes are not to be longer ſuffered, do for diſcharge of our duty, commit unto you jointly and ſeverally, and by the tenor hereof do ſtraitly charge and command you, that at the receipt hereof, with all ſpeed convenient, you do warn, or cauſe to be warned, firſt, ſecond, and third time, and peremptorily, all and ſingular church-wardens and pariſhioners whoſoever, within our foreſaid dioceſe of London, whereſoever any ſuch ſcriptures or paintings have been attempted, that they aboliſh and extinguiſh ſuch manner of ſcriptures, ſo that by no means they be either read or ſeen, and therein to proceed moreover as they ſhall ſee good and laudable in this behalf. And if after the ſaid monition, the ſaid church-wardens and pariſhioners ſhall be found remiſs and negligent or culpable, then you jointly and ſeverally ſhall ſee the aforeſaid ſcriptures to be razed, aboliſhed and extinguiſhed forthwith: citing all and ſingular thoſe church-wardens and pariſhioners (whom we alſo for the ſame do cite here by the tenor hereof) that all and ſingular the church-wardens and pariſhioners being ſlack and negligent, culpable therein, ſhall appear before us, our vicar-general and principal official, or our commiſſary ſpecial in our cathedral church of St. Paul at London, in the conſiſtory there, at the hour appointed for the ſame, the ſixth day next after their citation, if it be a court-day, or elſe at the next court-day after enſuing, whereas either we or our official or commiſſary ſhall ſit; there to ſay and alledge for themſelves ſome reaſonable cauſe, if they have or can tell of any, why they ought not to be excommunicated, or otherwiſe puniſhed for their ſuch negligence, ſlackneſs and fault, to ſay and to alledge, and further to do and receive, as law and reaſon requireth. And what you have done in the premiſes, do you certify us, or our vicar, principal official, and ſuch our commiſſary, diligently and duly in all things, and through all things, or let him among you thus certify us, which hath taken upon him to execute this mandate: In witneſs whereof we have ſet our ſeals to theſe preſents. Dated in the biſhop's palace at London the 25th day of the month of October, in the year of our Lord 1554. and of our tranſlation the 16th.

About this time the lord chancellor ſent Mr. Chriſtopherſon unto the univerſity of Cambridge, with theſe three articles, which he enjoined them to obſerve.

The firſt, That every ſcholar ſhould wear his apparel according to his degree in the ſchools.

The ſecond was touching the pronunciation of the Greek tongue.

The third, That every preacher there ſhould declare the whole ſtile of the king and queen in their ſermons.

In this univerſity of Cambridge, and alſo of Oxford, by reaſon of the bringing of theſe things, and eſpecially for the alteration of religion, many wiſe and learned men departed the univerſities: of whom, ſome of their own accord gave over, ſome were thruſt out of their fellowſhips, ſome were miſerably handled: inſomuch that in Cambridge, in the college of St. John, there were 24 places void together, in whoſe rooms were taken in 24 others, which neither in virtue nor religion were to be compared to thoſe that were before. And no leſs miſerable was the eſtate of Oxford, by reaſon of the time, and the ſtrait dealing of the viſitors, who for ſetting forward their papiſtical proceedings, had no regard or reſpect to the forwardneſs of good wits, and the maintenance of good letters, beginning then more and more to flouriſh in that univerſity.

And foraſmuch as we have entered into the mention of Oxford, we may not paſs over in ſilence the famous exhortation of Dr. Treſham, who ſupplying the room of the ſub-dean in Chriſt-church, after he had called the ſtudents of the college together, with great eloquence and art, began to commend the dignity of the maſs unto them, declaring, that there was ſtuff enough in the ſcripture to prove the maſs good. Then to allure them to the catholic ſervice of the church, he uſed theſe reaſons, declaring that there were a goodly company of copes, that were appointed to Windſor, but he had found the queen ſo gracious unto him, that they ſhould come to Chriſt's-church. Now, if they like honeſt men would come to church, they ſhould wear them on holy-days. And beſides all this, he would get them the lady bells of Bampton, and that ſhould make the ſweeteſt ring in all England. And as for an holy water to ſprinkle, he had already the faireſt that was within the realm. Wherefore he thought that no man would be ſo mad to forego theſe commodities, &c.

Which things I rehearſe, that it may appear what want of diſcretion is in the fathers of popery, and into what idle follies ſuch men do fall, whom I beſeech the Lord, if it be his pleaſure, to reduce to a better truth, and to open their eyes to ſee their own blindneſs.

But to proceed where we left off, being in the month of November, on the 12th day of the ſaid month, being Monday, the parliament began at Weſtminſter, in the beginning whereof both the king and queen rode in their parliament robes, having two ſwords borne before them. The earl of Pembroke bare the king's ſword, and the earl of Weſtmoreland the queen's. They had two caps of maintenance borne before them, whereof the earl of Arundel bare one, and the earl of Shrewſbury the other.

Cardinal Poole landed at Dover upon Wedneſday November 21. on which day one act paſſed in the parliament for his reſtitution in blood, utterly repealing, as falſe and moſt ſlanderous, that act made againſt him in the reign of king Henry VIII. and on the next day, November 22. the king and queen came to the parliament houſe to give their royal aſſent, and to eſtabliſh this act againſt his coming.

On Saturday November 24. the ſaid cardinal came by water to London, and ſo to Lambeth houſe, which was ready prepared againſt his coming.

On Wedneſday November 28. there was a general proceſſion in Paul's, for joy that the queen was conceived and quick with child, as it was declared in a letter ſent from the council to the biſhop of London. At this proceſſion ten biſhops, and all the prebendaries of Paul's were preſent, and alſo the lord mayor with the aldermen, and a great a great number of commons of the city in their beſt array. The copy of the council's letter here followeth.

A Letter from the Council to Edmund Bonner Biſhop of London, concerning Queen Mary's conceiving with child.

AFTER our hearty commendations unto your good lordſhip: Whereas it hath pleaſed Almighty God amongſt other his infinite benefits of late moſt graciouſly poured upon us and this whole realm, to extend his benediction upon the queen's majeſty in ſuch ſort, as ſhe is conceived and quick of child: whereby her majeſty (being our natural liege lady, queen, and undoubted inheritor of this imperial crown) good hope of certain ſucceſſion in the crown is given unto us, and conſequently the great calamities (which for want of ſuch ſucceſſion might otherwiſe have fallen upon us and our poſterity) ſhall by God's grace be well avoided, if we thankfully acknowledge this benefit of almighty God, endeavouring ourſelves with earneſt repentance to thank, honour and ſerve him, as we be moſt bounden: theſe be not only to advertiſe you of this good news to be by you publiſhed in all places within your dioceſe, but alſo to pray and require you, that both yourſelf do give God thanks with us for this his ſpecial grace, and alſo give order that thanks may be openly given by ſinging of Te Deum in all the churches within your ſaid dioceſe: and that likewiſe all prieſts and other eccleſiaſtical miniſters, in their maſſes, and other divine ſervices, may continually pray to almighty God ſo to extend his holy hand over her majeſty, the king's highneſs, and the whole realm, as that this thing being by his omnipotent power graciouſly thus begun, may by the ſame be well continued and brought to good effect, to the glory of his name. Whereunto, albeit we doubt not, ye would of yourſelf have had a ſpecial regard without theſe our letters, yet for the earneſt deſire we have to have this thing done out of hand, and diligently continued, we have alſo written theſe our letters, to put you in remembrance; and ſo bid your lordſhip moſt heartily well to fare. From Weſtminſter, November 27. 1554. Your aſſured loving friends,

Alſo the ſame day in the afternoon cardinal Poole came to the parliament-houſe, which at that time was kept in the great chamber of the court at Whitehall, becauſe the queen was then ſick, and could not go abroad: where the king and queen's majeſty ſitting under the cloth of ſtate, and the cardinal ſitting on the right hand, with all the other eſtates of the parliament being preſent, the biſhop of Wincheſter, being lord chancellor, began in this manner:

MY lords of the upper houſe, and you my maſters of the nether houſe, here is preſent the right reverend father in God my lord cardinal Poole, come from the apoſtolic ſee of Rome, as ambaſſador to the king and queen's majeſties, upon one of the weightieſt cauſes that ever happened in this realm, and which pertaineth to the glory of God, and your univerſal benefit. The which ambaſſage their majeſties pleaſure is to be ſignified unto you all by his own mouth, truſting that you will receive and accept it in as benevolent and thankful wiſe as their highneſſes have done, and that you will give an intent and inclinable ear unto him.

The lord chancellor having ended, the cardinal began his oration, wherein he declared the cauſes of his coming, and what were his deſires and requeſts. In the mean time the court gate was kept ſhut till he had made an end.

MY lords all, and you that are the commons of this preſent parliament aſſembled, which in effect is nothing elſe but the ſtate and body of the whole realm. As the cauſe of my repair hither hath been moſt wiſely and gravely declared by my lord chancellor, ſo, before that I enter to the particularities of my commiſſion, I have ſomewhat touching myſelf, and to give moſt humble and hearty thanks to the king and queen's majeſties, and, after them, to you all, which of a man exiled and baniſhed from the commonwealth, have reſtored me to be a member of the ſame; and of a man having no place neither here or elſewhere within this realm, having admitted me in a place, where to ſpeak and to be heard. This I proteſt unto you all, that though I was exiled my native country without juſt cauſe, as God knoweth, yet the ingratitude could not pull from me the affection and deſire that I had to profit and do you good. If the offer of my ſervice might have been received, it was never to ſeek, and where that could not be taken, you never failed of my prayer, nor ever ſhall.

But leaving the rehearſal thereof, and coming more near to the matter of my commiſſion, I ſignify unto you all, That my principal travail is for the reſtitution of this noble realm to the ancient nobility, and to declare unto you, that the ſee apoſtolic, from whence I come, hath a ſpecial reſpect to this realm above all other, and not without cauſe, ſeeing that God himſelf, as it were by providence, hath given this realm prerogative of nobility above other: which to make more plain to you, it is to be conſidered, that this iſland firſt of all iſlands received the light of Chriſt's religion. For as ſtories teſtify, it was Prima provinciarum quæ amplexa eſt fidem Chriſti.

For the Britons being firſt inhabitants of this realm (notwithſtanding the ſubjection of the emperors and heathen princes) did receive Chriſt's faith from the apoſtolic ſee univerſally, and not in parts as other countries, nor by one and one, as clocks increaſe their hours by diſtinction of times, but altogether at once, as it were in a moment. But after that their ill merits or forgetfulneſs of God had deſerved expulſion, and that ſtrangers being infidels, had poſſeſſed this land, yet God of his goodneſs, not leaving where he once loved, ſo illuminated the hearts of the Saxons, being heathen men, that they forſook the darkneſs of heathen errors, and embraced the light of Chriſt's religion; ſo that within a ſmall ſpace idolatry and heathen ſuperſtition was utterly abandoned in this iſland.

This was a great prerogative of nobility, the benefit whereof, though it be to be aſcribed to God, yet the mean occaſion of the ſame came from the church of Rome. In the faith of which church we have ever ſince continued and conſented with the reſt of the world in unity of religion. And to ſhew further the fervent devotion of the inhabitants of this iſland towards the church of Rome, we read that divers princes in the Saxons time, with great travail and expences, went perſonally to Rome, as Offa and Adulphus, which thought it not enough to ſhew themſelves obedient to the ſaid ſee, unleſs that in their own perſons they had gone to the ſame place from whence they had received ſo great a grace and benefit.

In the time of Carolus Magnus, who firſt founded the univerſity of Paris, he ſent into England for Alcuinus a great learned man, which firſt brought learning to that univerſity; whereby it ſeemeth, that the greateſt part of the world fetched the light of religion from England.

Adrian

Adrian the fourth, being an Engliſhman, converted Norway from infidelity; which Adrian afterwards, upon the great affection and love that he bare to this realm, being his native country, gave to Henry the ſecond, king of England, the right and ſeignory of the dominion of Ireland, which pertained to the ſee of Rome.

I will not rehearſe the manifold benefit that this realm hath received from the apoſtolic ſee, nor how ready the ſame hath been to relieve us all in our neceſſities. Nor will I rehearſe the manifold miſeries and calamities that this realm hath ſuffered by ſwerving from that unity. And even as in this realm, ſo alſo in all other countries which refuſing the unity of the catholic faith have followed fantaſtical doctrine, the like plagues have happened. Let Aſia and the empire of Greece be a ſpectacle unto the world, who by ſwerving from the unity of the church of Rome, are brought into captivity and ſubjection to the Turk. All ſtories be full of like examples: And to come unto the latter time, look upon our neighbours in Germany, who, by ſwerving from this unity, are miſerably afflicted with diverſities of ſects, and divided into factions.

What ſhall I rehearſe unto you the tumults and effuſion of blood that hath happened there of late days? or trouble you with the reheariſal of thoſe plagues that have happened ſince this innovation of religion, whereof you have felt the bitterneſs, and I have heard the report? of all which matters I can ſay no more, but ſuch was the miſery of the time. And ſee how far forth this fury went. For thoſe that live under the Turk may freely live after their conſcience, and ſo it was not lawful here.

If men examine well upon what grounds theſe innovations began, they will find that the root of many other miſchiefs, was avarice; and that the luſt and carnal affection of one man, confounded all laws both divine and human. And notwithſtanding all theſe devices and policies practiſed within this realm againſt the church of Rome, they needed not to have loſt you, but that they thought rather as friends to reconcile you, than as enemies to infeſt you. For they wanted not great offers of the moſt mighty potentates in all Europe to have aided the church in that quarrel. Then mark the ſequel: there ſeemed by theſe changes to riſe a great face of riches and gain, which in proof came to great miſery and lack. See how God then can confound the wiſdom of the wiſe, and turn unjuſt policy to mere folly; and that thing which ſeemed to be done for relief, was cauſe of plain ruin and decay. Yet ſee that goodneſs of God, which at no time failed us, but moſt benignly offered his grace, when it was of our parts leaſt ſought and worſe deſerved.

And when all light of true religion ſeemed utterly extinct, the churches defaced, the altars overthrown, the miniſters corrupted; even like as in a lamp the light being covered, yet it is not quenched, even ſo in a few remained the confeſſion of Chriſt's faith, namely in the breaſt of the queen's excellency, of whom, to ſpeak without adulation, the ſaying of the prophet may be verified, Ecce quaſi derelicta!

And ſee how miraculouſly God of his goodneſs preſerved her highneſs, contrary to the expectation of man, that when numbers conſpired againſt her, and policies were deviſed to diſinherit her, and armed power prepared to deſtroy her; yet ſhe being a virgin helpleſs, naked and unarmed, prevailed and had the victory of tyrants; which is not to be aſcribed to any policy of man, but to the almighty great goodneſs and providence of God, to whom the honour is to be given. And therefore it may be ſaid, Give glory to God. For in man's judgment, on her grace's part was nothing in appearance but deſpair.

And yet for all theſe practices and devices of ill men, here you ſee her grace eſtabliſhed in her eſtate, being your lawful queen and governeſs, born among you, whom God hath appointed to reign over you for the reſtitution of true religion, and extirpation of all errors and ſects. And to confirm her grace the more ſtrongly in this enterprize, lo! how the providence of God hath joined her in marriage with a prince of like religion; who being a king of great might, armor, and force, yet uſeth towards you neither armor nor force, but ſeeketh you by the way of love and amity: in which reſpect great cauſe you have to give thanks to almighty God, that hath ſent you ſuch a catholic governeſs. It ſhall be therefore your part again to love, obey, and ſerve them.

And as it was a ſingular favour of God to conjoin them in marriage, ſo it is not to be doubted but that he ſhall ſend them iſſue, for the comfort and ſurety of this commonwealth.

Of all princes in Europe, the emperor hath travailed moſt in the cauſe of religion, as it appeareth by his acts in Germany; yet happily, by ſome ſecret judgment of God, he hath not atchieved the end. With whom in my journey hitherwards I had conference touching my legation; whereof, when he had underſtanding, he ſhewed a great appearance of moſt earneſt joy and gladneſs, ſaying, That it rejoiced him no leſs of the reconcilement of this realm unto chriſtian unity, than that his ſon was placed by marriage in the kingdom; and moſt glad he was of all, that the occaſion thereof ſhould come by me being an Engliſhman born, which is (as it were) to call home ourſelves. I can well compare him to David, which though he were a man elect of God, yet, for that he was contaminate with blood and war, he could not build the temple of Jeruſalem, but left the finiſhing thereof to Solomon, which was Rex pacificus. So may it be thought, that the appeaſing of controverſies of religion in chriſtianity, is not appointed to this emperor, but rather to his ſon, who ſhall perform the building that his father had begun. Which church cannot be perfectly builded, unleſs univerſally in all realms we adhere to one head, and do acknowledge him to be the vicar of God, and to have power from above. For all power is of God, according to the ſaying, Non eſt poteſtas, niſi à Deo. And therefore I conſider that all power being in God, yet, for the conſervation of quiet and godly life in the world, he hath derived that power from above into the parts here in earth; which is, into the imperial and eccleſiaſtical. And theſe two powers, as they be ſeveral and diſtinct, ſo have they two ſeveral effects and operations. For ſecular princes, to whom the temporal ſword is committed, be miniſters of God to execute vengeance upon tranſgreſſors and evil livers, and to preſerve the well-doers and innocents from injury and violence. Which power is repreſented in theſe two moſt excellent perſons the king and queen's majeſty here preſent, who have this power committed unto them immediately from God, without any ſuperior in that behalf.

The other power is of miniſtration, which is the power of the keys, and order in the eccleſiaſtical ſtate, which is by the authority of God's word, examples of the apoſtles, and of all old holy fathers from Chriſt hitherto, attributed and given to the apoſtolic ſee of Rome, by ſpecial prerogative. From which ſee I am here deputed legate and embaſſador, having full and ample commiſſion from thence, and have the keys committed to my hands: I confeſs to you that I have the keys, not as mine own keys, but as the keys of him that ſent me, and yet cannot open; not for want of power in me to give, but for certain impediments in you to receive, which muſt be taken away before my commiſſion can take effect. This I proteſt before you, my commiſſion is not of prejudice to any perſon. I come not to deſtroy, but to build; I come to reconcile, not to condemn; I am not come to compel, but to call again; I am not come to call any thing in queſtion already done, but my commiſſion is of grace and clemency to ſuch as will receive it. For as touching all matters that be paſt, they ſhall be as things caſt into the ſea of forgetfulneſs.

But the means whereby you ſhall receive this benefit, is to revoke and repeal thoſe laws and ſtatutes, which be impediments, blocks and bars to the execution of my commiſſion. For like as I myſelf had neither place nor voice to ſpeak here among you, but was in all reſpects a baniſhed man, till ſuch time as ye had repealed thoſe laws that lay in my way, even ſo cannot you receive the benefits and grace offered from the apoſtolic ſee, until the abrogation of ſuch laws, whereby you have disjoined and diſſevered yourſelves from the unity of Chriſt's church.

It remaineth therefore that you, like true chriſtians, and provident men for the weal of your ſouls and bodies, ponder what is to be done in this ſo weighty a cauſe; and ſo to frame your acts and proceedings, as they may firſt tend to the glory of God, and next to the conſervation of your commonwealth, ſurety and quietneſs.

The next day after the three eſtates aſſembled again in the great chamber of the court at Weſtminſter: where the king, queen, and the cardinal being preſent, they did exhibit (all kneeling on their knees) a ſupplication to their highneſſes: the tenor whereof followeth.

The Supplication and Submiſſion exhibited to the King and Queen's Majeſties, by the Lords and Commons of the Parliament.

WE the lords ſpiritual and temporal, and the commons of this preſent parliament aſſembled, repreſenting the whole body of the realm of England and dominions of the ſame, in our own names particularly, and alſo of the ſaid body univerſally, in this ſupplication directed to your majeſties with moſt humble ſuit, that it may, by your gracious interceſſion and means, be exhibited to the moſt reverend father in God, the lord cardinal Poole, legate, ſent ſpecially hither from our moſt holy father pope Julius III. and the ſee apoſtolic of Rome, do declare ourſelves very ſorry and repentant for the ſchiſm and diſobedience committed in this realm and dominions of the ſame, againſt the ſaid ſee apoſtolic, either by making, agreeing or executing any laws, ordinances or commandments againſt the ſupremacy of the ſaid ſee, or otherwiſe doing or ſpeaking that might impugn the ſame; offering ourſelves and promiſing by this our ſupplication, that for a token and knowledge of our ſaid repentance, we be, and ſhall be alway ready, under and with the authority of your majeſties, to the uttermoſt of our power, to do that which ſhall be in us for the abrogation and repealing of the ſaid laws and ordinances in this preſent parliament; as well for ourſelves, as for the whole body whom we repreſent.

Whereupon we moſt humbly beſeech your majeſties, as perſons undefiled in the offence of this body towards the ſaid ſee, which nevertheleſs God by his providence hath made ſubject unto your majeſties, ſo to ſet forth this our moſt humble ſuit, that we may obtain from the ſee apoſtolic, by the ſaid moſt reverend father, as well particularly as univerſally, abſolution, releaſe and diſcharge from all dangers of ſuch cenſures and ſentences, as by the laws of the church we be fallen in; and that we may as children repentant, be received into the boſom and unity of Chriſt's church; ſo as this noble realm, with all the members thereof, may in unity and perfect obedience to the ſee apoſtolic, and pope for the time being, ſerve God and your majeſties, to the furtherance and advancement of his honour and glory. Amen.

The ſupplication being read, the king and queen delivered the ſame unto the cardinal, who (perceiving the effects thereof to anſwer his expectation) did receive the ſame moſt gladly from their majeſties: and after he had in few words given thanks to God, and declared what great cauſe he had to rejoice above all others, that his coming from Rome into England had taken ſuch happy ſucceſs, he, by the pope's authority, did give them this abſolution following:

OUR Lord Jeſus Chriſt, which with his moſt precious blood hath redeemed and waſhed us from all our ſins and iniquities, that he might purchaſe unto himſelf a glorious ſpouſe without ſpot or wrinkle, and whom the Father hath appointed head over all his church, he by his mercy abſolve you. And we by apoſtolic authority given unto us (by the moſt holy lord pope Julius III. his vicegerent in earth) do abſolve and deliver you, and every of you, with the whole realm and dominions thereof, from all hereſy and ſchiſm, and from all and every judgment, cenſures and pains, for that cauſe incurred; and alſo we do reſtore you again unto the unity of our mother the holy church, as in our letters more plainly it ſhall appear: in the name of the Father, of the Son, and of the Holy Ghoſt.

When all this was done, they went into the chapel, and there ſinging Te Deum, with great ſolemnity declared the joy and gladneſs that for this reconciliation was pretended.

The report of this was with great ſpeed ſent unto Rome; as well by the king and cardinal's letters, which hereafter follow, as alſo otherwiſe. Whereupon the pope cauſed three proceſſions to be made at Rome, and thanks to be given to God with great joy for the converſion of England to his church; and therefore praiſing the cardinal's diligence, and the devotion of the king and queen, on Chriſtmas-eve, by his bulls he ſet forth a general pardon to all ſuch as did truly rejoice for the ſame.

King Philip's Letter to Pope Julius.

MOST holy father, I wrote yeſterday unto Don John Maurique, that he ſhould declare by word of mouth, or elſe write to your holineſs, in what good ſtate the matter of religion ſtood in this realm, and of the ſubmiſſion to your holineſs, as to the chief. As this day, which is the feaſt of St. Andrew, late in the evening, we have done God that ſervice (to whoſe only goodneſs we muſt impute it, and to your holineſs, who have taken ſo great pains to gain theſe ſouls) that this realm with full and general conſent of all them that repreſent the ſtate, being very penitent for that was paſt, and well bent for that they come to do, ſubmitted themſelves to your holineſs, and to that holy ſee; whom, at the requeſt of the queen and me, your legate did abſolve. And foraſmuch as the ſaid Don John ſhall ſignify unto your holineſs all that paſſed in this matter, I will write no more thereof, but only that the queen and I, as moſt faithful and devout children of your holineſs, have received the greateſt joy and comfort thereof that may be expreſſed with tongue; conſidering that beſides the ſervice done to God hereby, it hath chanced in the time of your holineſs, to place as it were in the lap of the holy catholic church ſuch a kingdom as this is. And therefore I think I cannot be thankful enough for that it is done this day. And I truſt in him, that your holineſs ſhall alway underſtand, that the holy ſee hath not had a more obedient ſon than I, nor more deſirous to preſerve and increaſe the authority of the ſame. God guide and proſper the moſt holy perſonage of your holineſs as I deſire.

From London the 30th of November, 1554.

Your holineſs's moſt obedient ſon the king, &c.

Cardinal Poole's Letter to the ſaid Pope.

THOSE things which I wrote unto your holineſs of late, of that hope which I truſted would come to paſs, that in ſhort ſpace this realm would be reduced to the unity of the church, and obedience of the apoſtolic ſee, though I did write then not without great cauſe; yet neverthelefs I could not be void of all fear, not only for that difficulty which the minds of our countymen did ſhew, being ſo long alienated from the ſee apoſtolic, and for the old hatred which they had borne ſo many years to that name: but much more I feared, leſt the firſt entry into the cauſe itſelf ſhould be put off by ſome other matter or convention coming betwixt.

For the avoiding whereof, I made great means to the king and queen, which little needed, for their own godlineſs, forwardneſs and earneſt deſire to bring the thing to paſs, far ſurmounted my great and earneſt expectation. This day in the evening, being St. Andrew's day (who firſt brought his brother Peter to Chriſt), it is come to paſs, by the providence of God, that this realm is reclaimed to give due obedience unto Peter's ſeat and your holineſs, by whoſe means it may be conjoined to Chriſt the head, and his body which is the church. The thing was done and concluded in parliament (the king and queen being preſent) with ſuch full conſent and great rejoicing, that incontinently after I had made my oration, and given the benediction, with a great joy and ſhout there was divers times ſaid, Amen, Amen. Which doth evidently declare, that that holy ſeed, although it hath been long oppreſſed, yet was not utterly quenched in them; which chiefly was declared in the nobility. Returning home to my houſe, theſe things I wrote unto your holineſs, upon the ſudden rejoicing that I had ſo luckily brought to paſs ſo weighty a matter by the divine providence, thinking to have ſent my letters by the king's poſt, who (as it was ſaid) ſhould have departed ſhortly: but afterwards changing my purpoſe, when I had determined to ſend one of mine own men, I thought good to add thus much to my letters, for the more ample gratulation and rejoicing at that good chance: which thing as it was right great gladneſs to me, through the event of the ſame (being itſelf very great and ſo holy, ſo profitable to the whole church, ſo healthful to this my country which brought me forth, ſo honourable to the ſame which received me): ſo likewiſe I took no leſs rejoicing of the princes themſelves, through whoſe virtue and godlineſs the matter did take ſucceſs and perfection. Of how many, and how great things may the church (which is the ſpouſe of Chriſt, and our mother) make her account through thoſe her children? Oh notable zeal of godlineſs! Oh ancient faith! which undoubtedly doth ſo manifeſtly appear in them both, that whoſo ſeeth them, muſt needs (whether he will or no) ſay the ſame which the prophet ſpake of the firſt children of the church: "Theſe are the ſeed which the "Lord hath bleſſed. This is the Lord's planting to "glory in." How holily did your holineſs with all your authority and earneſt affection favour this marriage? which truly ſeemeth to expreſs a great ſimilitude of the higheſt king, which being heir of the world, was ſent down by his Father from the regal ſeat, to be ſpouſe and ſon of the Virgin, and by this means to comfort all mankind: for even ſo this king himſelf, the greateſt heir of all men which are in the earth, leaving his Father's kingdoms that are moſt great, is come into this little kingdom, and is become both the ſpouſe and ſon of this Virgin (for he ſo behaveth himſelf as though he were a ſon, whereas indeed he is a huſband), that he might, as he hath in effect already performed, ſhew himſelf an aider and helper to reconcile this people to Chriſt and his body, which is the church. Which things ſeeing they are ſo, what may not our mother the church herſelf look for at his hands, that hath brought this to paſs, to convert the hearts of the fathers towards their ſons, and the unbelievers to the wiſdom of the righteous? which virtue truly doth wonderfully ſhine in him. But the queen, which at that time, when your holineſs ſent me legate unto her, did riſe up as a rod of incenſe ſpringing out of the trees of myrrh, and as frankincenſe out of the deſert: ſhe, I ſay, which a little before was forſaken of all men, how wonderfully doth ſhe now ſhine? What a ſavour of myrrh and frankincenſe doth ſhe give forth unto her people? which (as the prophet ſaith of the mother of Chriſt) brought forth before ſhe laboured; before ſhe was delivered brought forth a man-child: who ever heard of ſuch a thing? and who hath ſeen the like of this? Shall the earth bring forth in one day, or ſhall a whole nation be brought forth together? But ſhe now hath brought forth a whole nation before the time of that delivery, whereof we are in moſt great hope.

How great cauſe is given to us to rejoice? how great cauſe have we to give thanks to God's mercy, your holineſs, and the emperor's majeſty, which have been cauſers of ſo happy and ſo godly a marriage; by which we being reconciled, are joined to God the Father, to Chriſt, and to the church? of the which although I cannot comprehend in words the joy that I have taken, yet I cannot keep ſilence of it. And to this my rejoicing this alſo was joined (which when I had perceived by the letters of the reverend archbiſhop of Conſane, your holineſs's nuncio with the emperor's majeſty, brought me marvellous great gladneſs) that your ſaid holineſs began to reſtore to the ancient beauty thoſe things, which in the church of Rome, through the corruption of times, were deformed, which truly, when it ſhall be finiſhed, then indeed may we well cry out with the prophet, and ſpeak unto your holineſs with theſe words: "Put off the ſtole of ſorrow "and vexation, and put on comelineſs, which thou haſt "of God in everlaſting glory. For thy name ſhall be "named of God everlaſting, peace of righteouſneſs, and "honour of godlineſs; and then it ſhall be ſaid, Look "about and ſee thy ſons gathered together from the ſun-"riſing, to the going down of the ſame, rejoicing in the "holy word." There is nothing truly (to ſpeak of thy children gathered together in the Weſt, which prepare themſelves to meet their mother) which they had rather ſee, than her apparelled (that I may uſe the words of the prophet) in that garment of righteouſneſs wherewith God adorned her in times paſt. This one thing remaineth, that your holineſs's joy, and the joy of all the univerſal church may be perfected, which, together with us her unworthy children, ceaſeth not to pray to God for it. The Almighty God preſerve your holineſs long to continue in health for the profit of his church. From London the laſt of November, 1554.

Your moſt humble ſervant,
Reginald Poole, Cardinal.

On Sunday, December 2. the biſhop of Wincheſter, lord chancellor of England, preached at Paul's Croſs, at which ſermon the king and cardinal Poole were preſent. He took for his theme the 13th chapter of the epiſtle of St. Paul to the Romans, "This alſo we know the ſeaſon, "brethren, that we ſhould now awake out of ſleep, for "now is our ſalvation nearer than when we believed, &c." Some notes whereof, as they came to my hands faithfully gathered (as it appeareth by ſundry copies), I have thought good here to ſet forth.

Firſt, He ſhewed how the ſaying of St. Paul was verified upon the Gentiles who had a long time ſlept in dark ignorance, not knowing God: therefore St. Paul, quoth he, to ſtir up their heavy dulneſs, willed them to awake out of their long ſleep, becauſe their ſalvation was nearer, than when they believed. In amplifying this matter, and comparing our times with theirs, he took occaſion to declare what difference the Jewiſh ſacraments had from theſe of the chriſtians, wherein he uſed theſe words:

Even as the ſacrament of the Jews did declare Chriſt to come, ſo do our ſacraments declare Chriſt to be already come: But Chriſt to come, and Chriſt to be come, is not all one. For now that he is come, the Jews ſacraments be done away, and ours only remain, which declare that he is already come, and is nearer us, than he was to the fathers of the old law: for they had him but in ſigns, but we have him in the ſacrament of the altar, even his very body. Wherefore now alſo it is time that we awake out of our ſleep, who have ſlept, or rather dreamed theſe twenty years paſt, as ſhall more eaſily appear by declaring at large ſome of the properties and effects of a ſleep or a dream. And firſt, As men intending to ſleep, do ſeparate themſelves from company, and deſire to be alone; even ſo have we ſeparated ourſelves from the ſee apoſtolic of Rome: and have been alone, no realm in Chriſtendom like us.

Secondly, As in ſleep men dream ſometime of killing, ſometime of maiming, ſometime of drowning, or burning, ſometime of ſuch beaſtlineſs as I dare not name, but will ſpare your ears: ſo we have in this our ſleep not only dreamed of beaſtlineſs, but we have done it indeed. For in this our ſleep hath not one brother deſtroyed another? hath not half our money been wiped away at one time? And again, thoſe that would defend their conſcience, were ſlain, and others alſo otherwiſe troubled; beſides infinite other things, which you all know as well as I, whereof I report me to your conſciences. Further, in a man's ſleep all his ſenſes are ſtopped, ſo that he can neither ſee, ſmell, nor hear: even ſo whereas the ceremonies of the church were inſtituted to move and ſtir up our ſenſes, they being taken away, were not our ſenſes (as ye would ſay) ſtopped, and we faſt aſleep? Moreover, when a man would gladly ſleep, he will put out the candle, leſt peradventure it may lett his ſleep, and awake him: ſo of late all ſuch writers as did hold any thing with the apoſtolic ſee, were condemned and forbidden to be read; and images (which were laymen's books) were caſt down and broken.

The ſleep hath continued with us theſe twenty years, and we all that while without a head. For when king Henry did firſt take upon him to be head of the church, it was then no church at all. After whoſe death, king Edward (having over him governors and protectors which ruled as them liſted) could not be heard of the church, but was only a ſhadow or ſign of a head, and at length it came to paſs, that we had no head at all: no, not ſo much as our two archbiſhops. For on the one ſide, the queen being a woman, could not be head of the church; and on the other ſide, they both were convicted of one crime, and ſo depoſed. Thus while we deſired to have a ſupreme head among us, it came to paſs, that we had no head at all. When the tumult was in the north in the time of king Henry VIII. (I am ſure) the king was determined to have given over the ſupremacy again to the pope; but the hour was not then come, and therefore it went not forward, leſt ſome would have ſaid, that he did it for fear.

After this, Mr. Knevet and I were ſent ambaſſadors unto the emperor, to deſire him that he would be a mean between the pope's holineſs and the king, to bring the king to the obedience of the ſee of Rome; but the time was not yet come. For it might have been ſaid, that it had been done for a civil policy. Again, in the beginning of king Edward's reign, the matter was moved, but the time was not yet; for it would have been ſaid, that the king (being but a child) had been bought and ſold. Neither in the beginning of the queen's reign was the hour come; for it would have been ſaid, that it was done in a time of weakneſs. Likewiſe when the king firſt came, if it had been done, they might have ſaid it had been by force and violence. But now, even now, the hour is come, when nothing can be objected, but that it is the mere mercy and providence of God. Now hath the pope's holineſs, pope Julius III. ſent unto us this moſt reverend father, Cardinal Poole, an ambaſſador from his ſide. What to do? not to revenge the injuries done by us againſt his holineſs, but to give his benediction to thoſe that defamed and perſecuted him.

And that we may be the more meet to receive the ſaid benediction, I ſhall deſire you that we may always acknowledge ourſelves offenders againſt his holineſs; I do not exclude myſelf forth of the number, I will "Weep "with them that weep, and rejoice with them that re- "joice." And I ſhall deſire you, that we may defer the matter no longer, for now the hour is come. The king and queen's majeſties have already reſtored our holy father the pope to his ſupremacy; and the three eſtates aſſembled in the parliament, repreſenting the whole body of the realm, have alſo ſubmitted themſelves to his holineſs, and his ſucceſſors for ever; wherefore let us not any longer ſtay. And even as St. Paul ſaid to the Corinthians, that he was their father, ſo may the pope ſay, that he is our father: for we received our doctrine firſt from Rome, therefore he may challenge us as his own. We have all cauſe to rejoice, for his holineſs hath ſent hither and prevented us, before we ſought him; ſuch care hath he for us. Therefore let us ſay, "This is the day "which the Lord hath made, we will rejoice and be glad "in it." Rejoice in this day, which is of the Lord's working, that ſuch a noble birth is come, yea, ſuch a holy father (I mean my lord cardinal Poole) which can ſpeak unto us as unto brethren, and not as unto ſtrangers, who hath a long time been abſent. And let us now awake, which ſo long have ſlept, and in our ſleep have done ſo much naughtineſs againſt the ſacraments of Chriſt, denying the bleſſed ſacrament of the altar, and pulled down the altar, which thing Luther himſelf would not do, but rather reproved them that did, examining them of their belief in Chriſt.

This was the ſum of his ſermon before his prayers, wherein he prayed firſt for pope Julius the third, with all his college of cardinals, the biſhop of London, with the reſt of that order: then for the king and queen, and the nobility of this realm; and laſtly, for the commons of the ſame with the ſouls departed, lying in the pains of purgatory. This ended, the time being late, they began in Paul's to ring to their evening ſong, whereby the preacher could not be well heard, which cauſed him to make an end of his ſermon.

About this time a meſſenger was ſent from the whole parliament to the pope, to deſire him to confirm and eſtabliſh the ſale of abbey-lands and chauntry lands: for the lords and the parliament would grant nothing in the pope's behalf, before their purchaſes were fully confirmed.

On Thurſday, December 6. the whole convocation, both biſhops and others, were ſent for to Lambeth to the cardinal, who the ſame day forgave them all their perjurations, ſchiſms and hereſies, and they all there kneeled down and received his abſolution; and after an exhortation and gratulation for their converſion to the catholic church, made by the cardinal, they departed.

On Wedneſday, December 12. five of the eight men which lay in the Fleet, that were of Mr. Throgmorton's queſt, were diſcharged, and ſet at liberty upon paying their fine, which was 220 pound apiece; and the other three put up a ſupplication, therein declaring, that their goods did not amount to the ſum that they were appointed to pay; and ſo upon that declaration paying 40 pound apiece, they were delivered out of priſon on the 21ſt of December.

On Saturday, December 22. all the whole parliament had a ſtrict command, that none of them ſhould depart into the country this Chriſtmas, nor before the parliament were ended. Which command was very contrary to their expectations; for as well many of the lords, as alſo many of the commons, had ſent for their horſes, and had them brought hither.

On Friday, December 28. the prince of Piedmont came to the court at Weſtminſter.

On New-year's day at night, ſeveral honeſt men and women of the city, to the number of thirty, and Mr. Roſe, a miniſter, with them, were taken as they were in a houſe in Bow-church-yard at the communion, and the ſame night were all committed to priſon. And on the third of January following Mr. Roſe was before the biſhop of Wincheſter, the lord chancellor, and from thence the ſame day committed to the Tower, after ſome communication between the biſhop and him.

The ſame day the act of ſupremacy paſſed in the parliament. Alſo the ſame day at night a great tumult was at Weſtminſter, between ſome Spaniards and Engliſhmen, whereof a great miſchief had like to have enſued, by means of a Spaniſh friar, who got into the church and rung the alarum. The occaſion was about two whores which were in the cloiſter at Weſtminſter with a ſort of Spaniards, whereof whilſt ſome played the knaves with them, others kept the entry of the cloiſter with dags in harneſs: In the mean time ſome of the dean's men came into the cloiſter, and the Spaniards diſcharged their dags, and hurt ſome of them. By and by the noiſe of this doing came into the ſtreets, ſo that the whole town was up almoſt, but never a ſtroke was ſtricken. Notwithſtanding the noiſe of this doing with the dean's men, and alſo the ringing of the alarum, made much ado, and a great number to be ſore afraid.

Yet heard a little before the council's letter ſent to biſhop Bonner, ſignifying the good news of queen Mary to be not only conceived, but alſo quick with child, which was the 28th of November. Of this child great talk at this time began to riſe in every man's mouth, eſpecially amongſt ſuch as ſeemed to carry Spaniſh hearts in Engliſh bodies. In which number here is not to be forgotten, nor defrauded of his condign commendation for his worthy affection toward his prince and her iſſue, one Sir Richard Southwell, who being the ſame time in the parliament-houſe, when as the lords were occupied in other affairs and matters of importance, ſuddenly ſtarting up, for fulneſs of joy burſt out in theſe words following: "Tuſh, my maſters, quoth he, what talk ye of theſe "matters? I would have you take ſome order for our "maſter that is now coming into the world apace, leſt "he find us unprovided, &c." By which words, and alſo by the aforeſaid letters of the council, and the common talk abroad, it may appear what an aſſured opinion was then conceived in men's heads, of queen Mary to be conceived and quick with child. Inſomuch that at the ſame time, and in the ſame parliament, there was a bill exhibited, and an act made upon the ſame, the words whereof, for the more evidence, I thought good here to exemplify, as followeth.

The Words of the Act.

ALbeit we the lords ſpiritual and temporal, and the commons in this preſent parliament aſſembled, have him hope and confidence in the goodneſs of Almighty God, that like as he hath hitherto miraculouſly preſerved the queen's majeſty from many great imminent perils and dangers; even ſo he will of his infinite goodneſs give her highneſs ſtrength, the rather by our continual prayers, to paſs well the danger of deliverance of child, wherewith it hath pleaſed him (to all our great comforts) to bleſs her; yet foraſmuch as all things of this world be uncertain, and having before our eyes the dolorous experience of this inconſtant government, during the time of the reign of the late king Edward the ſixth, do plainly ſee the manifold inconveniences, great dangers and perils that may enſue in this whole realm, if foreſight be not uſed to prevent all evil chances, if they ſhould happen: For the eſchewing hereof, we the lords ſpiritual and temporal, and the commons in this preſent parliament aſſembled, for and in conſideration of a moſt ſpecial truſt and confidence that we have and repoſe in the king's majeſty, for and concerning the politic government, order and adminiſtration of this realm in the time of the young years of the iſſue or iſſues of her majeſty's body to be born, if it ſhould pleaſe God to call the queen's highneſs out of this preſent life, during the tender years of ſuch iſſue or iſſues (which God forbid) according to ſuch order and manner, as hereafter in this preſent act his highneſs' moſt gracious pleaſure is, ſhould be declared and ſet forth, have made our humble ſuit, by the aſſent of the queen's highneſs, that his majeſty would vouchſafe to accept and take upon him the rule, order, education, and government of the ſaid iſſue or iſſues to be born, as is aforeſaid. Upon which our ſuit, being of his ſaid majeſty moſt graciouſly accepted, it hath pleaſed his highneſs not only to declare, that like as for the moſt part his majeſty verily truſteth that almighty God (who hath hitherto preſerved the queen's majeſty, to give this realm ſo good an hope of certain ſucceſſion in the blood royal of the ſame realm) will aſſiſt her highneſs with his graces and benedictions, to ſee the fruit of her body well brought forth, live, and able to govern (whereof neither all this realm, nay all the world beſides, ſhould or could receive more comfort than his majeſty ſhould and would) yet if ſuch chance ſhould happen, his majeſty at our humble deſires is pleaſed and contented, not only to accept and take upon him the cure and charge of the education, rule, order and government of ſuch iſſues as of this moſt happy marriage ſhall be born between the queen's highneſs and him; but alſo, during the time of ſuch government, would by all ways and means, ſtudy, travail, and imploy himſelf to advance the weal both public and private of this realm and dominion thereunto belonging, according to the ſaid truſt in his majeſty repoſed, with no leſs good will and affection, than if his highneſs had been naturally born among us. In conſideration whereof, be it enacted by the king and the queen's moſt excellent majeſties, by the aſſent of the lords ſpiritual and temporal, and the commons in this preſent parliament aſſembled, and by the authority of the ſame, &c.

Thus much I thought fit to rehearſe out of the act and ſtatute, to the intent the reader may underſtand not ſo much how parliaments may ſometimes be deceived (as by this child of queen Mary may appear) as rather what cauſe we Engliſhmen have to render moſt earneſt thanks unto almighty God, who ſo mercifully, againſt the opinion, expectation, and working of our adverſaries, hath helped and delivered us in this caſe, which otherwiſe might have opened ſuch a window to the Spaniards to have entered and repleniſhed this land, that peradventure by this time Engliſhmen ſhould have enjoyed no great quiet in their own country: The Lord therefore make us perpetually mindful of his benefits. Amen.

Thus we ſee then how man doth purpoſe, but God diſpoſeth as pleaſeth him. For all this great labour, proviſion and order taken in the parliament-houſe for their young maſter long looked for, coming ſo ſurely into the world, in the end appeared neither young maſter, nor young miſtreſs, that any man yet to this day can hear of. Furthermore, as the labour of the lay ſort was herein deluded; ſo no leſs ridiculous it was to behold, what little effect the prayers of the papiſts had with almighty God, who travailed no leſs with their proceſſions, maſſes and collects, for the happy deliverance of this young maſter to come, as here followeth to be ſeen.

A Prayer made by Dr. Weſton, Dean of Weſtminſter, daily to be ſaid for the Queen's deliverance.

OMoſt righteous Lord God, which for the offence of the firſt woman, hath threatened unto all women a common, ſharp and inevitable malediction, and hath enjoined them that they ſhould conceive in ſin, and being conceived, ſhould be ſubject to many and grievous torments; and finally, be delivered with the danger and jeopardy of their lives: we beſeech thee for thine exceeding great goodneſs and bottomleſs mercy, to mitigate the ſtrictneſs of that law. Aſſuage thine anger for a while, and cheriſh in the boſom of thy favour and mercy our gracious queen Mary, being now at the point to be delivered.

livered. So help her, that without danger of her life ſhe may overcome the ſorrow, and in due ſeaſon bring forth a child, in body beautiful and comely, in mind noble and valiant. So that afterward, ſhe, forgetting the trouble, may with joy laud and praiſe the bountifulneſs of thy mercy, and, together with us, praiſe and bleſs both thee and thy holy name world without end. This, O Lord, we deſire thee, we beſeech thee, and moſt heartily crave of thee. Hear us, O Lord, and grant us our petition: let not the enemies of thy faith, and of thy church ſay, Where is their God?

A ſolemn Prayer made for King Philip and Queen Mary's Child, that it may be a Male-Child, well-favoured and witty, &c.

O Moſt mighty Lord God, which regardeſt the prayer of the humble, and deſpiſeſt not their requeſt; bow down from thine high habitation of the heavens, the eyes of thy mercy unto us wretched ſinners, bowing the knees of our hearts, and with many and deep ſighs bewailing our ſins and offences, humbly with eyes intent, and hands diſplayed, praying and beſeeching thee, with the ſhield of thy protection, to defend Mary thy ſervant, and our queen, who hath none other helper but thee, and whom, through thy grace, thou haſt willed to be conceived with child: and at the time of her travail graciouſly with the help of thy right hand deliver her, and from all danger, with the child in her conceived, mercifully preſerve.

It hath ſeemed good in thy ſight, merciful Father, by thy ſervant Mary to work theſe wonders; that is to ſay, in her hands to vanquiſh and overthrow the ſtout enemy, and to deliver us, thy people, out of the hands of heretics, infidels, enemies to thee, and to the croſs of thy beloved Son Jeſus Chriſt, that of thy ſervant thou mighteſt ſpeak in far countries. Therefore for theſe wonderful works, which thou doſt to thy ſervants, thou art magnified, Lord God, for ever; and we thy people bleſs thee the God of heaven, which hath brought upon us this great mercy, and hath excluded from us the heretic, the enemy of truth, the perſecutor of thy church. We know, we know, that we have grievouſly (Lord) ſinned, that we have been deceived by vanity, and that we have forſaken thee our God. Our iniquities be multiplied on our head, and our ſins be increaſed up to heaven: and we ourſelves having offended, and our princes and our prieſts, for theſe our ſins have deſerved an hypocrite to our prince, our ſins have deſerved a tyrant to our governor, that ſhould bring our life to bitterneſs. We be not worthy to have ſo gentle and merciful a queen, ſo godly a ruler, and finally, ſo virtuous a prince; at the very beginning of whoſe reign, a new light as it were, of God's religion, ſeemed to us for to ſpring and riſe. The Jews did bleſs the widow Judith with one voice, ſaying, "Thou art the glory of Jeruſalem, thou art the joy of "Iſrael, thou art the honour of our people, for that "thou haſt loved chaſtity, and thou ſhalt be bleſſed for "ever."

And we the Engliſh people with one agreeable conſent do cry, Thou Mary art the glory of England, our joy, the honour of thy people, for that thou haſt embraced chaſtity; thine heart is ſtrengthened, for the hand of our Lord hath comforted thee, and therefore thou ſhalt be bleſſed for ever. But bow down, O moſt merciful Father, thine ear, and open thine eyes, and behold our affliction, and our humble confeſſion. Thou knoweſt, Lord, that againſt Philip, not by human, but by thy ordinance our king, and againſt thy ſervant Mary, by thy providence our queen, the reſtorers, and maintainers of thy Teſtament of the faith, and moſt conſtant defenders of thy church: thou knoweſt, I ſay, that againſt theſe our two governors, the enemies of thy holy Teſtament, and of the church thy ſpouſe, be moſt rank rebels and ſpiteful murmurers, walking after their luſts, whoſe mouth ſpeaketh words of pride, to the end they may ſet up the kingdom of heretics and ſchiſmatics. By the power of their hands they would change thy promiſes, and deſtroy thine inheritance, and ſtop and ſhut up the mouths of them that praiſe thee, and extinguiſh the glory of thy catholic church and altar.

It is manifeſt and plain, how many contentions, how many conſpiracies and ſeditions, how great wars, what tumults, how many and how great troubleſome vexations, how many hereſies and ſchiſms (for theſe be the moſt ready devices, and evident tokens of heretics) for our ſins do hang over us, if thy ſervant be taken from this life: for we acknowledge that our Lord is omnipotent, who hath pitched his dwelling-place in the midſt of his people, to the intent to deliver us out of the hands of our enemies. Turn therefore thy countenance unto us, ſhew unto us, O Lord, thy face. Puniſh us for our ſins according to thy will and pleaſure, only now deliver us. We bowing the knees of our heart, beſeech thee, that thou wilt not reſerve unto us puniſhment for ever, and we ſhall praiſe thee all the days of our life. Hear our cry, and the prayer of thy people, and open to them the treaſure of thy mercy, thy gracious favour, the ſpring of lively water. Thou that haſt begun, make in the hand of thy ſervant a perfect work. Suffer not, we pray thee, the faithleſs rebels to ſay of thy ſervant and her counſellors, that they have deviſed matters which they cannot perform. And grant unto thy ſervant an happy and eaſy travail. For it is not impoſſible to thy power, nor indecent to thy juſtice, nor unwonted to thy mercy.

It is well known unto us, how marvellouſly thou didſt work in Sarah of the age of 90 years, and in Elizabeth the barren, and alſo far ſtricken in age: for thy counſel is not in the power of men. Thou, Lord, that art the ſearcher of hearts and thoughts, thou knoweſt that thy ſervant never luſted after man, never gave herſelf to wanton company, nor made herſelf partaker with them that walk in lightneſs: but ſhe conſented to take an huſband with thy fear, and not with her luſt. Thou knoweſt that thy ſervant took an huſband not for carnal pleaſure, but only for the deſire and love of poſterity, wherein thy name might be bleſſed for ever and ever. Give therefore unto thy ſervants, Philip our king, and Mary our queen, a male iſſue, which may ſit in the ſeat of thy kingdom. Give unto our queen thy ſervant a little infant, in faſhion and body comely and beautiful, in pregnant wit notable and excellent.

Grant the ſame to be in obedience like Abraham, in hoſpitality like Lot, in chaſtity and brotherly love like Joſeph, in meekneſs and mildneſs like Moſes, in ſtrength and valour like Sampſon. Let him be found faithful as David after thy heart. Let him be wiſe among kings as the moſt wiſe Solomon. Let him be like Job, a ſimple and an upright man, fearing God, and eſchewing evil. Let him finally be garniſhed with the comelineſs of all virtuous conditions, and in the ſame let him wax old and live, that he may ſee his childrens children to the third and fourth generation. And give unto our ſovereign lord and lady, king Philip and queen Mary, thy bleſſings and long life upon earth; and grant that of them may come kings and queens, which may ſtedfaſtly continue in faith, love and holineſs. And bleſſed be their ſeed of our God, that all nations may know, thou art only God in all the earth, which art bleſſed for ever and ever. Amen.

Another Prayer for Queen Mary, and her conceived Child.

O Almighty Father, which didſt ſanctify the bleſſed virgin and mother Mary in her conception, and in the birth of Chriſt our Saviour thine only Son: alſo by thine omnipotent power didſt ſafely deliver the prophet Jonas out of the whale's belly: defend, O Lord, we beſeech thee, thy ſervant Mary, our queen, with child conceived, and ſo viſit her in and with thy godly gift of health, that not only the child thy creature, within her contained, may joyfully come from her into this world, and receive the bleſſed ſacraments of baptiſm and confirmation, enjoying therewith daily increaſe of all princely and gracious gifts both of body and ſoul; but that alſo ſhe the mother, through thy ſpecial grace and mercy, may in time of her travail avoid all exceſſive dolour and pain, and abide perfect and ſure from all peril and danger of death, with long and proſperous life, through Chriſt our Lord. Amen.

It followeth now further in proceſs of the ſtory, that upon Tueſday, January 10. nineteen of the lower houſe of the parliament, with the ſpeaker, came to Whitehall to the king, and offered him the government of the realm, and of the iſſue, if the queen ſhould fail, which was confirmed by act of parliament within ten days after.

On Wedneſday, January 26. the parliament was diſſolved. In this parliament the biſhop of Rome was eſtabliſhed, and all ſuch laws as were made againſt him ſince the twentieth year of king Henry VIII. were repealed, and alſo cardinal Poole, biſhop Pates, Lilly, and others were reſtored to their blood. Alſo there was an act made for ſpeaking of words; that whoever ſhould ſpeak any thing againſt the king or queen, or that might move any ſedition or rebellion, at the firſt time to have one of his ears cut off, or to forfeit an hundred marks; and at the ſecond time, to have both his ears cut off, or elſe to forfeit an hundred pound; and whoſoever ſhould write, cypher, or print any of the premiſes, to have their right hand cut off.

Alſo in this parliament three ſtatutes were revived for trial of hereſy: one made in the fifth year of Richard II. another in the ſecond year of Henry IV. and the third in the ſecond year of Henry V. Alſo the doing of Mr. Roſe, and the others that were with him, was communed of in this parliament, and upon that occaſion an act was made, That certain evil prayers ſhould be treaſon againſt the queen's highneſs. The prayers of theſe men were thus: "God turn the heart of queen Mary from idolatry, or elſe ſhorten her days."

At the taking of Mr. Roſe and his fellows, word was brought thereof to Mr. Hooper, being then in the Fleet; whereupon the ſaid Mr. Hooper ſendeth anſwer again, with a letter alſo of conſolation to the ſaid priſoners; the copy whereof I thought here not to overpaſs.

The anſwer of Mr. Hooper to a letter ſent unto him, concerning certain Priſoners taken in Bow-Church-yard.

THE grace of God be with you. Amen. I perceive by your letter, how that upon New-year's-day at night, there were taken a godly number of chriſtians whilſt they were praying. I do rejoice in that men can be ſo well occupied in this perilous time, and flee unto God for remedy by prayer, as well for their own lacks and neceſſities, as alſo charitably to pray for them that perſecute them. So doth the word of God command all men to pray charitably for them that hate them, and not to revile any magiſtrate with words, or to mean him evil by force or violence. They alſo may rejoice that in well-doing they were taken to the priſon. Wherefore I have thought it good to ſend them this little writing of conſolation; praying God to ſend them patience, charity, and conſtancy in the truth of his moſt holy word. Thus fare you well, and pray God to ſend his true word into this realm again amongſt us, which the ungodly biſhops have now baniſhed. Jan. 4. 1555.

Mr. Hooper's Letter of Conſolation to the aforeſaid Priſoners.

THE grace, favour, conſolation, and aid of the Holy Ghoſt, be with you now and ever. So be it.

Dearly beloved in the Lord, ever ſince your impriſonment I have been marvelloufly moved with great affections and paſſions, as well of mirth and gladneſs, as of heavineſs and ſorrow. Of gladneſs in this, that I perceived how ye be bent and given to prayer and invocation of God's help in theſe dark and wicked proceedings of men againſt God's glory. I have been ſorry to perceive the malice and wickedneſs of men to be ſo cruel, deviliſh, and tyrannical, to perſecute the people of God for ſerving of God, ſaying and hearing of the holy pſalms, and the word of eternal life. Theſe cruel doings do declare, that the papiſts church is more bloody and tyrannical, than ever was the ſword of the Ethnics and Gentiles.

When I heard of your taking, and what ye were doing, wherefore, and by whom ye were taken, I remembered how the chriſtians in the primitive church were uſed by the cruelty of unchriſtened heathens, in the time of Trajan the emperor, about 77 years after Chriſt's aſcenſion into heaven: and how the chriſtians were perſecuted very ſore, as though they had been traitors and movers of ſedition. Whereupon the gentle emperor Trajan required to know the true cauſe of chriſtian mens trouble. A great learned man called Pliny, wrote unto him, and ſaid, it was becauſe the chriſtians ſaid certain pſalms before day unto one called Chriſt, whom they worſhipped for God. When Trajan the emperor underſtood it was for nothing but for conſcience and religion, he cauſed by his commandments every where, that no man ſhould be perſecuted for ſerving of God. But the pope and his church hath caſt you in priſon, being taken even doing the work of God, and one of the excellenteſt works that is required of chriſtian men: that is to wit, whilſt ye were in prayer, and not in ſuch wicked and ſuperſtitious prayers as the papiſts uſe, but in the ſame prayer that Chriſt hath taught you to pray. And in his name only ye gave God thanks for that ye have received, and for his ſake ye aſked for ſuch things as ye want. O, glad may ye be that ever ye were born, to be apprehended whilſt ye were ſo virtuouſly occupied. Bleſſed be they that ſuffer for righteouſneſs ſake. For if God hath ſuffered them that took your bodies, then to have taken your life alſo, now had you been following the Lamb in perpetual joys, away from the company and aſſembly of wicked men. But the Lord would not have you ſuddenly ſo to depart, but reſerveth you, gloriouſly to ſpeak and maintain his truth to the world.

Be ye not careful what ye ſhall ſay, for God will go out and in with you, and will be preſent in your hearts, and in your mouths to ſpeak his wiſdom, although it ſeemeth fooliſhneſs to the world. He that hath begun this good work in you, continue you in the ſame unto the end; and pray unto him that ye may fear him only, that hath power to kill both body and ſoul, and to caſt them into hell-fire. Be of good comfort. All the hairs of your head are numbered, and there is not one of them can periſh, except your heavenly Father ſuffer it to periſh. Now be ye in the field, and placed in the fore front of Chriſt's battle. Doubtleſs it is a ſingular favour of God, and a ſpecial love of him towards you, to give you this foreward and preheminence, a ſign that he truſteth you before others of his people. Wherefore (dear brethren and ſiſters) continually fight this fight of the Lord. Your cauſe is moſt juſt and godly, ye ſtand for the true Chriſt (who is after the fleſh in heaven) and for his true religion and honour, which is amply, fully, ſuffiiciently and abundantly contained in the holy teſtament, ſealed with

Chriſt's

Chriſt's own blood. How much be ye bound to God, who puts you in truſt with ſo holy and juſt a cauſe?

Remember what lookers on you have to ſee and behold you in your fight, God and all his angels, who be ready always to take you up into heaven, if ye be ſlain in his fight. Alſo you have ſtanding at your backs all the multitude of the faithful, who ſhall take courage, ſtrength, and deſire to follow ſuch noble and valiant chriſtians as you be. Be not afraid of your adverſaries: for he that is in you, is ſtronger than he that is in them. Shrink not although it be pain to you, your pains be not now ſo great, as hereafter your joys ſhall be. Read the comfortable chapters to the Romans, 8, 10, 15. Hebrews 11, 12. And upon your knees thank God that ever ye were accounted worthy to ſuffer any thing for his name's ſake. Read the ſecond chapter of St. Luke's goſpel, and there you ſhall ſee how the ſhepherds that watched upon their ſheep all night, as ſoon as they heard that Chriſt was born in Bethlehem, by and by went to ſee him. They did not reaſon nor debate with themſelves, who ſhould keep the wolf from the ſheep in the mean time, but did as they were commanded, and committed their ſheep unto him whoſe pleaſure they obeyed. So let us do now we be called, commit all other things to him that calleth us. He will take heed that all things ſhall be well. He will help the huſband, he will comfort the wife, he will guide the ſervants, he will keep the houſe, he will preſerve the goods; yea, rather than it ſhould be undone, he will waſh the diſhes, and rock the cradle. Caſt therefore all your care upon God, for he careth for you.

Beſides this, you may perceive by your impriſonment, that your adverſaries weapons againſt you be nothing but fleſh, blood and tyranny. For if they were able, they would maintain their wicked religion by God's word; but for lack of that, they would violently compel us, as they cannot by holy ſcripture perſuade, becauſe the holy word of God, and all Chriſt's doings be contrary unto them. I pray you, pray for me, and I will pray for you. And although we be aſunder after the world, yet in Chriſt (I truſt) for ever joining in the Spirit, and ſo ſhall meet in the palace of the heavenly joys, after this ſhort and tranſitory life is ended. God's peace be with you. Amen. The 14th of January, 1555.

On Friday, January 18. all the council went unto the Tower, and there the ſame day ſet at liberty all the priſoners of the Tower, or the moſt part of them, namely, the late duke of Northumberland's ſons, Ambroſe, Robert and Henry; Sir Andrew Dudly, Sir John Rogers, Sir James Crofts, Sir Nicholas Throgmorton, Sir Nicholas Arnal, Sir George Harper, Sir Edward Warner, Sir William Sentlow, Sir Gawen Carew, Mr. Gibbes, Cuthbert Vaughan, with many others.

On Tueſday, January 22. all the preachers that were in priſon were called before the biſhop of Wincheſter lord chancellor, and certain others, at the biſhop's houſe at St. Mary Overy's. From whence (after communication, being aſked whether they would convert and enjoy the queen's pardon, or elſe ſtand to that they had taught; they all anſwered, that they would ſtand to that they had taught) they were committed to ſtraighter priſon than before, with charge that none ſhould ſpeak with them. Among which number, one James George the ſame time died in priſon, being there in bands for religion and righteouſneſs ſake; who therefore was exempted to be buried in the popiſh church-yard, and was buried in the fields.

Upon Wedneſday, January 23. all the biſhops with all the reſt of the convocation-houſe were before the cardinal at Lambeth, where he deſired them to repair every man where his cure and charge lay, exhorting them to intreat their flock with all gentleneſs, and to endeavour to win the people rather by gentleneſs than by extremity and rigour, and ſo let them depart.

Upon Friday, January 25. and the day of the converſion of St. Paul, there was a general and ſolemn proceſſion through London, to give God thanks for their converſion to the catholic church: wherein (to ſet out their glorious pomp) there were fourſcore and ten croſſes, 160 prieſts and clerks, who had every one of them copes upon their backs, ſinging very luſtily. There followed alſo for the better eſtimation of the ſight, eight biſhops, and laſt of all came Bonner the biſhop of London, carrying the popiſh pyx under a canopy.

Beſides, there was alſo preſent the mayor, aldermen, and all the livery of every occupation. Moreover the king alſo himſelf, and the cardinal, came to Paul's church the ſame day. From whence after maſs they returned to Weſtminſter again. As the king was entering the church, at the ſteps going up to the quire, all the gentlemen that of late were ſet at liberty out of the Tower, kneeled before the king, and offered unto him themſelves and their ſervices.

After the proceſſion there was alſo commandment given to make bonfires at night. Whereupon did riſe among the people a doubtful talk why all this was done. Some ſaid it was that the queen being (as they ſaid) with child, might have a ſafe delivery. Others thought that it was for joy that the realm was joined again to the ſee of Rome, which opinion, of both, ſeemed moſt true.

Upon Monday, January 28. the biſhop of Wincheſter, and the other biſhops, had commiſſion from the cardinal to ſit upon, and order, according to the laws, all ſuch preachers and heretics (as they termed them) as were in priſon; and according to this commiſſion, the ſame day the biſhop of Wincheſter, and the other biſhops, with certain of the council, ſate in St. Mary Overy's church, and called before them theſe three, Mr. Hooper, Mr. Rogers, and Mr. Cardmaker, who were brought thither by the ſheriffs; from whence after communication they were committed to priſon till the next day, but Cardmaker this day ſubmitted himſelf unto them.

Upon Tueſday, January 29. Hooper, Rogers, Dr. Taylor and Bradford were brought before them, where ſentence of excommunication, and judgment eccleſiaſtical was pronounced upon Mr. Hooper and Mr. Rogers, by the biſhop of Wincheſter, who ſate as judge in Caiaphas's ſeat, who drave them out of the church, according to their law and order. Dr. Taylor and Bradford were committed to priſon till the next day.

Upon Wedneſday, January 30. Dr. Taylor, Dr. Crome, Mr. Bradford, Mr. Saunders, and Dr. Ferrar, ſometime biſhop of St. David's, were before the ſaid biſhops, where three of them, Dr. Taylor, Mr. Saunders, and Mr. Bradford, were likewiſe excommunicated, and ſentence pronounced upon them, and ſo committed to the ſheriffs. Dr. Crome deſired two months reſpite, and it was granted him; and Mr. Ferrar was again committed to priſon till another time. All theſe men ſhewed themſelves to be learned, as indeed they were no leſs: but what availeth either learning, reaſon, or truth itſelf, where will beareth rule?

After the examination and condemnation of theſe good men and preachers above recited, commiſſions and inquiſitors were ſent abroad likewiſe into all parts of the realm: by reaſon whereof, a great number of moſt godly and true chriſtians (out of all the quarters of the realm, but eſpecially Kent, Eſſex, Norfolk, and Suffolk) were apprehended, brought up to London, caſt into priſon, and afterwards (moſt of them) either conſumed cruelly by fire, or elſe through evil handling died in priſons, and were buried on the dung-hills abroad in the fields, or in ſome backſide of the priſon. Of all which matters, concerning the tragical handling of the bleſſed martyrs and witneſſes of Jeſus Chriſt, of all the bloody perſecution of this time, now followeth (the Lord ſo granting) ſeverally and more particularly in this next book in order to be declared: after that I ſhall firſt recite a general ſupplication, given up in the name of the preachers aforeſaid lying in priſon, unto the king and queen during the time of the parliament, as followeth.

Unto the King and Queen's moſt excellent Majeſties, and to their moſt Honourable High Court of Parliament.

IN moſt humble and lamentable wiſe complain unto your majeſties, and to your high court of parliament, your poor deſolate and obedient ſubjects: H. F. T. B. P. R. S. &c. That whereas your ſaid ſubjects, living under the laws of God, and of this realm in the days of the late moſt noble king Edward the ſixth, did in all things ſhew themſelves true, faithful and diligent ſubjects, according to their vocation, as well in the ſincere miniſtering of God's moſt holy word, as in due obedience to the higher powers, and in the daily practice of ſuch virtues and good demeanor, as the laws of God at all times, and the ſtatutes of the realm did then allow: your ſaid ſubjects nevertheleſs, contrary to all laws of juſtice, equity, and right, are in very extream manner, not only caſt into priſon (where they have remained, now theſe fifteen or ſixteen months) but their livings alſo, their houſes and poſſeſſions, their goods and books taken from them, and they ſlandered to be moſt heinous heretics, their enemies themſelves being both witneſſes, accuſers, and judges, belying, ſlandering, and miſreporting your ſaid ſubjects at their pleaſure; whereas your ſaid ſubjects, being ſtraitly kept in priſon, cannot yet be ſuffered to come forth, and make anſwer accordingly.

In conſideration whereof, it may pleaſe your moſt excellent majeſties, and this your high court of parliament, graciouſly to tender the preſent calamity of your ſaid poor ſubjects, and to call them before your preſence, granting them liberty, either by mouth or writing in the plain Engliſh tongue, to anſwer before you, or before indifferent arbiters to be appointed by your majeſties, unto ſuch articles of controverſy in religion as their ſaid adverſaries have already condemned them of, as of heinous hereſies: provided, that all things may be done with ſuch moderation and quiet behaviour, as becometh ſubjects and children of peace, and that your ſaid ſubjects may have the free uſe of all their own books, and conference together among themſelves.

Which thing being granted, your ſaid ſubjects doubt not but it ſhall plainly appear, that your ſaid ſubjects are true and faithful chriſtians, and neither heretics, neither teachers of hereſy, nor cut off from the true catholic univerſal church of Chriſt; yea, that rather their adverſaries themſelves be unto your majeſties as were the charmers of Egypt to Pharaoh, Zedechias and his adherents unto the king of Iſrael, and Barjeſus to the proconſul Sergius Paulus. And if your ſaid ſubjects be not able by the teſtimony of Chriſt, his prophets, apoſtles, and godly fathers of his church, to prove, that the doctrine of the church, homilies, and ſervice taught and ſet forth in the time of our late moſt godly prince and king, Edward the ſixth, is the true doctrine of Chriſt's catholic church, and moſt agreeable to the articles of the chriſtian faith; your ſaid ſubjects offer themſelves then to the moſt heavy puniſhment, that it ſhall pleaſe your majeſties to appoint.

Wherefore for the tender mercy of God in Chriſt (which you look for at the day of judgment) your ſaid poor ſubjects in bonds moſt humbly beſeech your moſt excellent majeſties, and this your high court of parliament, benignly and graciouſly to hear and grant this their petition, tending ſo greatly to the glory of God, to the edifying of his church, to the honour of your majeſties, to the commendation and maintenance of juſtice, right, and equity both before God and man. And your ſaid ſubjects, according to their bounden duty, ſhall not ceaſe to pray unto Almighty God for the gracious preſervation of your moſt excellent majeſties long to endure.

THE END OF THE FIRST BOOK.

An Account of the Sufferings and Death of the Proteſtants in the Reign of Queen MARY the Firſt.

BOOK II.

The Life and Martyrdom of Mr. John Rogers, Vicar of St. Sepulchre's, and Reader of St. Paul's in London.

JOHN ROGERS was brought up in the univerſity of Cambridge, where he profited much in good learning, and at length was choſe by the merchants adventurers to be their chaplain at Antwerp in Brabant, whom he ſerved many years to their great ſatisfaction. He chanced there to fall in company with that worthy ſervant and martyr of God, William Tindal, and with Miles Coverdale, both of whom, for the hatred they bare to popiſh ſuperſtition and idolatry, and love to true religion, had forſaken their native country. In conferring with them the ſcriptures, he came to great knowledge in the goſpel of God, inſomuch that he caſt off the heavy yoke of popery, perceiving it to be impure and filthy idolatry, and joined with them in that painful and moſt profitable labour of tranſlating the Bible into the Engliſh tongue, which is intituled, The tranſlation of Thomas Matthew. He knowing by the ſcriptures, that unlawful vows may lawfully be broken, and that matrimony is both honeſt and honourable among all men, joined himſelf in lawful matrimony, and ſo went to Wittenberg in Saxony, where he with much ſoberneſs of living did not only greatly increaſe in all good learning, but alſo ſo much profited in the knowledge of the Dutch tongue, that the charge of a congregation was orderly committed to his cure.

In which miniſtry he diligently and faithfully ſerved many years, until ſuch time as it pleaſed God, by the faithful travail of his choſen and dear ſervant, king Edward VI. utterly to baniſh all popery out of England, and to receive in true religion, ſetting God's goſpel at liberty.

liberty. He then being orderly called, having both a conſcience and a ready good will to help forward the work of the Lord in his native country, left his living in Saxony, and came into England to preach the goſpel, without certainty of any condition. In which office, after he had a while diligently and faithfully travailed, Nicholas Ridley, then biſhop of London, gave him a prebend in the cathedral church of Paul's; and the dean and chapter choſe him to be the reader of the divinity leſſon there, wherein he continued, until ſuch time as queen Mary obtaining the crown, baniſhed the goſpel and true religion, and brought in the Antichriſt of Rome, with his idolatry and ſuperſtition.

After the queen was come to the Tower of London, Mr. Rogers preached at Paul's croſs; confirming ſuch true doctrine as he and others had there taught in king Edward's days, exhorting the people conſtantly to remain in the ſame, and to beware of all peſtilent popery, idolatry, and ſuperſtition. The council being then overmatched with popiſh and bloody biſhops, called him to account for his ſermon: to whom he made a bold, wiſe, and pious anſwer, and yet in ſuch ſort handled himſelf, that at that time he was clearly diſmiſſed. But after that proclamation was ſet forth by the queen to prohibit true preaching, he was called again before the council; for the biſhops thirſted after his blood. The council quarrelled with him concerning his doctrine, and in concluſion commanded him, as priſoner, to keep his own houſe, and ſo he did: although by flying he might eaſily have eſcaped their cruel hands, and many things there were which might have moved him thereunto. He did ſee the recovery of religion in England, for that preſent, deſperate; he knew he could not want a living in Germany, and he could not forget his wife and ten children, and to ſeek means to ſuccour them. But all theſe things ſet apart, after he was called to anſwer in Chriſt's cauſe, he would not depart, but ſtoutly ſtood in defence of the ſame, and for the trial of that truth was content to hazard his life.

He remained a priſoner in his own houſe a long time, till at length, through the uncharitable procurement of Bonner biſhop of London, who could not abide ſuch honeſt neighbours to dwell by him, he was removed from his own houſe to the priſon of Newgate, where he was lodged a great while among thieves and murderers: during which time, what buſineſs he had with the adverſaries of Chriſt, all is not known, neither yet any certainty of his examinations, further than he himſelf did leave in writing, which God would not to be loſt, but to remain for a perpetual teſtimony in the cauſe of God's truth, as here followeth recorded and teſtified by his own writing.

The Examination and Anſwer of Mr. John Rogers, made to the Lord Cnancellor, and the reſt of the Council, January 22. 1555.

FIRST, the lord chancellor ſaid unto me thus: Sir, ye have heard the ſtate of the realm in which it ſtandeth now.

Rogers. No, my lord, I have been kept in cloſe priſon, and except there have been ſome general things ſaid at the table when I was at dinner or ſupper, I have heard nothing; and there have I heard nothing whereupon any ſpecial thing might be grounded.

Then ſaid the lord chancellor; General things? general things? mockingly: ye have heard of my lord cardinal's coming, and that the parliament hath received his bleſſing, not one reſiſting unto it, but one man which did ſpeak againſt it. Such an unity, and ſuch a miracle hath not been ſeen. And all they, of which there are eight ſcore in one houſe (ſaid one that was by, whoſe name I know not), have with one aſſent and conſent received pardon of their offences, for the ſchiſm that we have had in England, in refuſing the holy father of Rome to be head of the catholic church. How ſay ye? are you content to unite and knit yourſelf to the faith of the catholic church with us, in the ſtate in which it is now in England? will ye do that?

Rog. The catholic church I never did nor will diſſent from.

L. Chan. Nay, but I ſpeak of the ſtate of the catholic church, in that wiſe in which we ſtand now in England, having received the pope to be ſupreme head.

Rog. I know none other head but Chriſt of his catholic church, neither will I acknowledge the biſhop of Rome to have any more authority than any other biſhop hath by the word of God, and by the doctrine of the old and pure catholic church four hundred years after Chriſt.

L. Chan. Why didſt thou then acknowledge king Henry the eighth to be ſupreme head of the church, if Chriſt be the only head?

Rog. I never granted him to have any ſupremacy in ſpiritual things, as are the forgiveneſs of ſins; giving of the Holy Ghoſt; authority to be a judge above the word of God.

L. Chan. Yea, ſaid he, and Tonſtal biſhop of Durham, and N. biſhop of Worceſter, if thou hadſt ſaid ſo in his days (and they nodded the head at me with a laughter) thou hadſt not been alive now.

Rog. Which thing I denied, and would have told how he was ſaid and meant to be ſupreme head. But they looked and laughed one upon another, and made ſuch a buſineſs, that I was conſtrained to let it paſs. There lieth alſo no great weight thereupon; for all the world knoweth what the meaning was. The lord chancellor alſo ſaid to the lord William Haward, that there was no inconvenience therein, to have Chriſt to be ſupreme head and the biſhop of Rome alſo: and when I was ready to have anſwered, that there could not be two heads of one church, and have more plainly declared the vanity of that his reaſon, the lord chancellor ſaid, What ſay'ſt thou? make us a direct anſwer whether thou wilt be one of this catholic church or not, with us in that ſtate in which we are now.

Rog. My lord, without fail I cannot believe, that ye yourſelves do think in your hearts that he is ſupreme head in forgiving of ſin, &c. (as is before ſaid) ſeeing you, and all the biſhops of the realm, have now twenty years long preached, and ſome of you alſo written to the contrary, and the parliament hath ſo long agone condeſcended unto it. And there he interrupted me thus.

L. Chan. Tuſh, that parliament was with moſt great cruelty conſtrained to aboliſh and put away the primacy from the biſhop of Rome.

Rog. With cruelty? why then I perceive that you take a wrong way with cruelty to perſuade men's conſciences. For it ſhould appear by your doings now, that the cruelty then uſed hath not perſuaded your conſciences. How would you then have our conſciences perſuaded with cruelty?

L. Chan. I talk to thee of no cruelty, but that they were ſo often and ſo cruelly called upon in that parliament, to let the act go forward; yea, and even with force driven thereunto, whereas in this parliament it was ſo uniformly received, as is aforeſaid.

Rog. Here my lord Paget told me more plainly, what my lord chancellor meant. Unto whom I anſwered; My lord, what will ye conclude thereby; that the firſt parliament was of leſs authority, becauſe but few condeſcended unto it? and this laſt parliament was of great authority, becauſe more condeſcended unto it? it goeth not, my lord, by more or leſſer part, but by the wiſer, truer, and more godly part: and I would have ſa'd more, but the Lord chancellor interrupted me with his queſtion, willing me once again to anſwer him. For, ſaid he, we have more to ſpeak with than thou, which muſt come in after thee. And ſo there were indeed ten perſons more out of Newgate, beſides two that were not called. Of which ten, one was a citizen of London, which granted unto them; and nine were contrary: which all came to priſon again, and refuſed the cardinal's bleſſing, and the authority of his holy father's church, ſaving that one of theſe nine was not aſked the queſtion, otherwiſe than thus, Whether he would be an honeſt man as his father was before him? and he anſwering yea, he was ſo diſcharged by the friendſhip of my lord William Haward, as I have underſtood. He bade me tell him what I would do; whether I would enter into the one church with the whole realm as it is now, or not? No, ſaid I, I will firſt ſee it proved by the ſcriptures. Let me have pen, ink, and books, &c. and I ſhall take upon me plainly to ſet out the matter, ſo that the contrary ſhould be proved to be true, and let any man that will, confer with me by writing.

L. Chan. Nay, that ſhall not be permitted thee; thou ſhalt never have ſo much proffered thee as thou haſt now, if thou refuſe it; and will not now condeſcend and agree to the catholic church. Here are two things, mercy and juſtice: if thou refuſe the queen's mercy now, then ſhalt thou have juſtice miniſtered unto thee.

Rog. I never offended nor was diſobedient unto her grace, and yet I will not refuſe her mercy. But if this ſhall be denied me to confer by writing, and to try out the truth, then it is not well, but too far out of the way. Ye yourſelves (all the biſhops of the realm) brought me to the knowledge of the pretended primacy of the biſhop of Rome, when I was a young man twenty years paſt; and will ye now without collation have me to ſay and do the contrary? I cannot be ſo perſuaded.

L. Chan. If thou wilt not receive the biſhop of Rome to be ſupreme head of the catholic church, then thou ſhalt never have her mercy thou mayeſt be ſure. And as touching conferring and trial, I am forbidden by the ſcriptures to uſe any conferring and trial with thee. For St. Paul teacheth me, that I ſhould ſhun and eſchew an heretic after one or two monitions, knowing that ſuch an one is overthrown, and is faulty, inſomuch as he is condemned by his own judgment.

Rog. My lord, I deny that I am an heretic: prove ye that firſt, and then alledge the aforeſaid text. But ſtill the lord chancellor played on one ſtring, ſaying:

L. Chan. If thou wilt enter into one church with us, &c. tell us that, or elſe thou ſhalt never have ſo much proffered thee again as thou haſt now.

Rog. I will find it firſt in the ſcripture, and ſee it tried thereby, before I receive him to be ſupreme head.

Wor. Why? do ye not know what is in your creed? "I believe the holy catholic church."

Rog. I find not the biſhop of Rome there. For (catholic) ſignifieth not the Romiſh church: it ſignifieth the conſent of all true teaching churches of all times, and all ages. But how ſhould the biſhop of Rome's church be one of them, which teacheth ſo many doctrines that are plainly and directly againſt the word of God? can that biſhop be the true head of the catholic church that doth ſo? that is not poſſible.

L. Chan. Shew me one of them, one, let me hear one.

Rog. I remembered myſelf, that amongſt ſo many I were baſt to ſhew one, and ſaid, I will ſhew you one.

L. Chan. Let me hear that, let me hear that.

Rog. The biſhop of Rome and his church, ſay, read, and ſing, all that they do in their congregations, in Latin, wich is directly and plainly againſt the firſt to the Corinthians, the fourteenth chapter.

L. Chan. I deny that, I deny that that is againſt the word of God. Let me ſee you prove that; how prove you that?

Rog. Thus I began to ſay the text from the beginning of the chapter, Qui loquitur lingua, &c. To ſpeak with tongue, ſaid I, is to ſpeak with a ſtrange tongue, as Latin or Greek, &c. and ſo to ſpeak, is not to ſpeak unto men, but to God. But ye ſpeak in Latin, which is a ſtrange tongue, wherefore ye ſpeak not unto men, but unto God (meaning God only at the moſt). This he granted, that they ſpeak not unto men, but unto God.

L. Chan. Well, then it is in vain unto men.

Rog. No, not in vain. For one man ſpeaketh in one tongue, and another in another tongue, and all well.

L. Chan. Nay, I will prove then, that he ſpeaketh neither to God nor to man, but unto the wind.

Rog. I was willing to have declared how and after what ſort theſe two texts do agree (for they muſt agree, they be both the ſayings of the Holy Ghoſt, ſpoken by the apoſtle Paul) as to wit, to ſpeak not to men, but unto God, and to ſpeak unto the wind: and ſo to have gone forward with the proof of my matter begun; but here aroſe a noiſe and a confuſion. Then ſaid the lord chancellor:

L. Chan. To ſpeak unto God, and not unto God, were impoſſible.

Rog. I will prove them poſſible.

L. Haward. No, ſaid my lord Haward to my lord chancellor: now will I bear you witneſs that he is out of the way: for he granted firſt, that they which ſpeak in a ſtrange ſpeech, ſpeak unto God: and now he ſaith the contrary, that they ſpeak neither to God nor to man.

Rog. I have not granted nor ſaid (turning me to my lord Haward) as you report. I have alledged the one text, and now I am come to the other. They muſt agree, and I can make them to agree. But as for you, you underſtand not the matter.

L. Haward. I underſtand ſo much, that that is not poſſible.

This is a point of ſophiſtry, quoth ſecretary Bourne.

Then the lord chancellor began to tell the lord Haward, that when he was in High Dutchland they at Hale, which had before prayed and uſed their ſervice all in Dutch, began then to turn part into Latin, and part into Dutch.

Worceſt. Yea, and at Wittenberg too.

Rog. Yea (but I could not be heard for the noiſe), in an univerſity, where men for the moſt part underſtand the Latin, and yet not all in Latin. And I would have told the order, and have gone forward both to have anſwered my lord, and to have proved the thing that I had taken in hand; but perceiving their talk and noiſe to be too noiſom, I was fain to think this in my heart, ſuffering them in the mean while to talk one of them one thing, and another another. Alas! neither will theſe men hear me if I ſpeak, neither yet will they ſuffer me to write. There is no remedy, but let them alone, and commit the matter to God. Yet I began to go forward, and ſaid, that I would make the texts to agree, and to prove my purpoſe well enough.

L. Chan. No, no, thou canſt prove nothing by the ſcripture. The ſcripture is dead: it muſt have a lively expoſitor.

Rog. No, the ſcripture is alive. But let me go forward with my purpoſe.

Wor. All heretics have alledged the ſcriptures for them, and therefore we muſt have a lively expoſitor for them.

Rog. Yea, all heretics have alledged the ſcripture for them: but they were confuted by the ſcriptures, and by none other expoſitor.

Wor. But they would not confeſs that they were overcome by the ſcriptures, I am ſure of that.

Rog. I believe that: and yet were they overcome by them, and in all councils they were diſputed with and overthrown by the ſcriptures. And here I would have declared how they ought to proceed in theſe days, and ſo have come again to my purpoſe, but it was impoſſible: for one aſked one thing, another ſaid another, ſo that I was fain to hold my peace, and let them talk. And even when I would have taken hold on my proof, the lord chancellor bade to priſon with me again; and Away, away, ſaid he, we have more to talk withal: if I would not be reformed (ſo he termed it) away, away. Then up I ſtood, for I had kneeled all the while.

Then

Then Sir Richard Southwell, who ſtood by in a window, ſaid to me, Thou wilt not burn in this gear when it cometh to the purpoſe, I know well that.

Rog. Sir, I cannot tell, but I truſt in my Lord God, yes, lifting up mine eyes unto heaven.

Then my lord of Ely told me much of the queen's majeſty's pleaſure and meaning, and ſet out with large words, ſaying, That ſhe took them that would not receive the pope's ſupremacy, to be unworthy to have her mercy, &c.

Rog. I ſaid I would not refuſe her mercy, and yet I never offended her in all my life: and that I beſought her grace, and all their honours, to be good to me, reſerving my conſcience.

Divers ſpake at once. No? (quoth they then, a great many of them, and eſpecially ſecretary Bourne) a married prieſt, and have not offended the law!

Rogers. I ſaid, I had not broken the queen's law, nor yet any point of the law of the realm therein: for I married where it was lawful.

Divers at once. Where was that? ſaid they, thinking that to be unlawful in all places.

Rogers. In Dutchland. And if ye had not here in England made an open law that prieſts might have had wives, I would never have come home again; for I brought a wife and eight children with me: which thing ye might be ſure that I would not have done, if the laws of the realm had not permitted it before.

Then there was a great noiſe, ſome ſaying that I was come too ſoon with ſuch a ſort; I ſhould find a ſour coming of it: and ſome one thing, and ſome another. And one ſaid (I could not well perceive who) that there was never a catholic man or country, that ever granted that a prieſt might have a wife.

Rogers. I ſaid, the catholic church never denied marriage to prieſts, nor yet to any other man; and therewith was I going out of the chamber, the ſerjeant which brought me thither having me by the arm.

Then the biſhop of Worceſter turned his face towards me, and ſaid, that I knew not where the church was or is.

Rogers. I ſaid, yes, that I could tell where it was, but therewith the ſerjeant went with me out of the door.

This was the very true effect of all that was ſpoken unto me, and ſo of all that I anſwered thereunto.

And here would I gladly make a more perfect anſwer to all the former objections, as alſo a due proof of that which I had taken in hand; but at this preſent I was informed, that I ſhould to-morrow come to further anſwer. Wherefore I am compelled to leave out that which I would moſt gladly have done, deſiring here the hearty and unfeigned help of the prayers of all Chriſt's true members, the offspring of the true unfeigned catholic church, that the Lord God of all conſolation will now be my comfort, aid, ſtrength, buckler and ſhield: as alſo of all my brethren that are in the ſame caſe and diſtreſs, that I and they all may deſpiſe all manner of threats and cruelty, and even the bitter burning fire, and the dreadful dart of death, and ſtick like true ſoldiers to our dear and loving captain, Chriſt, our only Redeemer and Saviour, and alſo the only true head of the church, that doth all in us all, which is the very property of an head (and is a thing that all the biſhops of Rome cannot do), and that we do not traiterouſly run out of his tents, or out of the plain field from him, in the moſt jeopardy of the battle, but that we may perſevere in the fight (if he will not otherwiſe deliver us) till we be moſt cruelly ſlain of his enemies. For this I moſt heartily, and at this preſent with weeping tears moſt inſtantly and earneſtly deſire and beſeech you all to pray: and alſo if I die, to be good to my poor and moſt honeſt wife, being a poor ſtranger, and all my little ſouls, hers and my children. Whom, with all the whole faithful and true catholic congregation of Chriſt, the Lord of life and death ſave, keep, and defend in all the troubles and aſſaults of this vain world, and bring at the laſt to everlaſting ſalvation, the true and ſure inheritance of all croſſed chriſtians. Amen, Amen.

January 27. at night.

The ſecond Examination of Mr. John Rogers, January 28, 29. 1555.

FIRST, being aſked again by the lord chancellor, whether I would come into one church with the biſhops and whole realm, as now was concluded by parliament (in which all the realm was converted to the catholic church of Rome) and ſo receive the mercy before proffered me, ariſing again with the whole realm out of the ſchiſm and error in which we had long been, with recantation of my errors; I anſwered, that before I could not tell what his mercy meant, but now I underſtand that it was a mercy of the antichriſtian church of Rome, which I utterly refuſed; and that the riſing which he ſpake of, was a very fall into error and falſe doctrine. Alſo that I had and would be able, by God's grace, to prove that all the doctrine which I had ever taught was true and catholic, and that by the ſcriptures and the authority of the fathers that lived 400 years after Chriſt's death. He anſwered, that ſhould not, might not, nor ought not to be granted me: for I was but a private man, and might not be heard againſt the determination of the whole realm. Should, quoth he, when a parliament had concluded a thing, one, or any private perſon, have authority to diſcuſs, whether they had done right or wrong? No, that may not be.

I anſwered ſhortly, That all the laws of men might not, neither could rule the word of God, but that they all muſt be diſcuſſed and judged thereby, and obey thereto: and neither my conſcience, nor any chriſtian man's, could be ſatisfied with ſuch laws as diſagreed from that word: and ſo was willing to have ſaid much more. But the lord chancellor began a long tale to very ſmall purpoſe, concerning mine anſwer, to have defaced me; that there was nothing in me wherefore I ſhould be heard, but arrogancy, pride, and vain-glory. I alſo granted mine ignorance to be greater than I could expreſs, or than he took it; but yet that I feared not, by God's aſſiſtance and ſtrength, to be able by writing to perform my word, neither was I (I thanked God) ſo utterly ignorant as he would make me; but all was of God, to whom be thanks rendered therefore. Proud man was I never, nor yet vain-glorious. All the world knew well, where and on which ſide pride, arrogancy, and vain-glory was. It was a poor pride that was or is in us, God it knoweth.

Then ſaid he, that I at the firſt daſh condemned the queen and the whole realm to be of the church of Antichriſt, and burdened me highly therewithal. I anſwered, That the queen's majeſty (God ſave her grace) would have done well enough, if it had not been for his council. He ſaid, the queen went before him, and it was her own motion. I ſaid, without fail I neither could, nor would I ever believe it.

Then ſaid Dr. Aldrife the biſhop of Carliſle, that they the biſhops would bear him witneſs. Yea, quoth I, that I believe well; and with that the people laughed: for that day there were many, but on the morrow they kept the doors ſhut, and would let none in, but the biſhops adherents and ſervants in a manner, yea, and the firſt day the thouſand man came not in. Then Mr. Comptroller and ſecretary Bourne would have ſtood up alſo to bear witneſs, and did.

I ſaid it was no great matter: and to ſay the truth, I thought they were good helpers thereunto themſelves: but I ceaſed to ſay any more therein, knowing that they were too ſtrong and mighty of power, and that they ſhould be believed before me, yea, and before our Saviour Chriſt, and all his prophets and apoſtles too, in theſe days.

Then

Then after many words, he aſked me what I thought concerning the bleſſed ſacrament, and ſtood up, and put off his cap, and all his fellow biſhops (of which there were a great number, new men, of whom I knew few), whether I believed in the ſacrament to be the very body and blood of our Saviour Chriſt, that was born of the virgin Mary, and hanged on the croſs, really and ſubſtantially.

I anſwered, I had often told him that it was a matter in which I was no meddler, and therefore ſuſpected of my brethren to be of a contrary opinion. Notwithſtanding, even as the moſt part of your doctrine in other points is falſe, and the defence thereof only by force and cruelty: ſo in this matter I think it to be as falſe as the reſt. For I cannot underſtand (really and ſubſtantially) to ſignify otherwiſe than corporally: but corporally Chriſt is only in heaven, and ſo cannot Chriſt be corporally alſo in your ſacrament. And here I ſomewhat ſet out his charity after this ſort: My lord, quoth I, ye have dealt with me moſt cruelly: for ye have put me in priſon without law, and kept me there now almoſt a year and a half. For I was almoſt half a year in my houſe, where I was obedient to you, God knoweth, and ſpake with no man. And now have I been a full year in Newgate at great coſts and charges, having a wife and ten children to find, and I had never a penny of my livings; which was againſt the law.

He anſwered, that Dr. Ridley which had given them me, was an uſurper; and therefore I was the unjuſt poſſeſſor of them.

Was the king then an uſurper, quoth I, which gave Dr. Ridley the biſhoprick?

Yea, quoth he, and began to ſet out the wrongs that the king had done to the biſhop of London, and to himſelf alſo. But yet I do miſuſe my terms, quoth he, to call the king uſurper. But the word was gone out of the abundance of the heart before: and I think that he was not very ſorry for it in heart. I might have ſaid more concerning that matter, but I did not.

I aſked him wherefore he put me in priſon. He ſaid, becauſe I preached againſt the queen.

I anſwered that it was not true: and I would be bound to prove it, and to ſtand to the trial of the law, that no man ſhould be able to diſprove it, and thereupon would ſet my life. I preached (quoth I) a ſermon at the croſs, after the queen came to the Tower; but therein was nothing ſaid againſt the queen, I take witneſs of all the audience, which was not ſmall. I alledged alſo that he had, after examination, let me go at liberty after the preaching of that ſermon.

Yea, but thou didſt read thy lectures after, quoth he, againſt the commandment of the council.

That I did not, quoth I; let that be proved, and let me die for it. Thus have you now againſt the law of God and man handled me, and never ſent for me, never conferred with me, never ſpoke of any learning, till now that ye have gotten a whip to whip me with, and a ſword to cut off my neck, if I will not condeſcend to your mind. This charity doth all the world underſtand.

I might and would have added, if I could have been ſuffered to ſpeak, that it had been time enough to take away men's livings, and thereto have impriſoned them, after that they had offended laws: for they be good citizens that break not laws, and worthy of praiſe, and not of puniſhment. But their purpoſe is to keep men in priſon, until they may catch them in their laws, and ſo kill them. I could and would have added the example of Daniel, which by a crafty deviſed law was caſt into the lion's den. Item, I might have declared, that I moſt humbly deſired to be ſet at liberty, ſending my wife to him with a ſupplication, being great with child, and with her eight honeſt women, or thereabouts, to Richmond, at Chriſtmas was a twelvemonth, while I was yet in my houſe.

Item, I wrote two ſupplications to him out of Newgate, and ſent my wife many times to him. Mr. Goſnold alſo, that worthy man, who is now departed in the Lord, laboured for me, and ſo did divers other worthy men alſo take pains in the matter. Theſe things declare my lord chancellor's antichriſtian charity, which is, that he hath and doth ſeek my blood, and the deſtruction of my poor wife and my ten children.

This is a ſhort ſum of the words which were ſpoken on the 28th of January in the afternoon, after that Mr. Hooper had been the firſt, and Mr. Cardmaker the ſecond in examination before me. The Lord grant us grace to ſtand together, fighting lawfully in his cauſe, till we be ſmitten down together, if the Lord's will be ſo to permit it. For there ſhall not a hair of our heads periſh againſt his will, but with his will. Whereunto the ſame Lord grant us to be obedient unto the end, and in the end, Amen: ſweet, mighty, and merciful Lord Jeſus, the ſon of David and of God: Amen, Amen, let every true chriſtian ſay and pray.

Then the clock being, as I gueſſed, about four, the lord chancellor ſaid, that he and the church muſt yet uſe charity with me (what manner of charity it is, all true chriſtians do well underſtand, as to wit, the ſame that the Fox doth with the Chickens, and the Wolf with the Lambs) and gave me reſpite till to-morrow, to ſee whether I would remember myſelf well to-morrow, and whether I would return to the catholic church (for ſo he called his antichriſtian falſe church) again, and repent, and they would receive me to mercy.

I ſaid that I was never out of the true catholic church, nor would be: but into his church would I, by God's grace, never come.

Well, quoth he, then is our church falſe and antichriſtian?

Yea, quoth I.

And what is the doctrine of the ſacrament?

Falſe, quoth I; and caſt my hands abroad.

Then ſaid one, that I was a player. To whom I anſwered not; for I paſſed not upon his mock.

Come again, quoth the lord chancellor, to-morrow between nine and ten.

I am ready to come again, whenſoever ye call, quoth I.

And thus was I brought by the ſheriffs to the Compter in Southwark, Mr. Hooper going before me, and a great multitude of people being preſent, ſo that we had much to do to go in the ſtreets. Thus much was done January 28.

The ſecond day, which was January 29. we were ſent for in the morning about nine of the clock, and by the ſheriffs fetched from the Compter in Southwark to the church again, as to wit, to St. Mary Overy's, where we were the day before in the afternoon, as is ſaid. And when Mr. Hooper was condemned, as I underſtood afterward, then ſent they for me. Then my lord chancellor ſaid unto me:

Rogers, quoth he, here thou waſt yeſterday, and we gave thee liberty to remember thyſelf this night, whether thou wouldſt come to the holy catholic church of Chriſt again or not. Tell us now what thou haſt determined, whether thou wilt be repentant and ſorry, and wilt return again and take mercy.

My lord, quoth I, I have remembered myſelf right well what you yeſterday ſaid to me, and deſire you to give me leave to declare my mind, what I have to ſay thereunto; and that done, I ſhall anſwer you to your demanded queſtion.

When I yeſterday deſired that I might be ſuffered by the ſcripture and authority of the firſt, beſt, and pureſt church to defend my doctrine by writing (meaning not only of the primacy, but alſo of all the doctrine that ever I had preached) ye anſwered me, that it might not, nor ought not to be granted me, for I was a private perſon; and that the parliament was above the authority of all private perperſons, and therefore the ſentence thereof might not be found faulty and valueleſs by me, being but a private perſon. And yet, my lord, quoth I, I am able to ſhew examples, that one man hath come into a general council, and after the whole had determined and agreed upon an act or article, ſome one man coming in afterward, hath by the word of God declared ſo pithily that the council had erred in decreeing the ſaid article, that he cauſed the whole council to change and alter their act or article before determined. And of theſe examples, ſaid I, I am able to ſhew two. I can alſo ſhew the authority of St. Auguſtine; that when he diſputed with an heretic, he would neither himſelf, nor yet have the heretic to lean unto the determination of two former councils, of which the one made for him, and the other for the heretic that diſputed againſt him: but ſaid, that he would have the ſcriptures to be their judge, which were common and indifferent for them both, and not proper to either of them.

Item, I could ſhew, ſaid I, the authority of a learned lawyer Panormitanus, which ſaith, That unto a ſimple lay-man that bringeth the word of God with him, there ought more credit to be given, than to a whole council gathered together. By theſe things will I prove that I ought not to be denied to ſay my mind, and to be heard againſt a whole parliament, bringing the word of God for me, and the authority of the old church four hundred years after Chriſt, albeit that every man in the parliament had willingly and without reſpect of fear and favour agreed thereunto, which thing I doubt not a little of; ſpecially ſeeing the like had been permitted in the old church, even in general councils, yea, and that in one of the chiefeſt councils that ever was, unto which neither any acts of this parliament, nor yet any of the late general councils of the biſhops of Rome ought to be compared. For, ſaid I, if Henry VIII. were alive, and ſhould call a parliament, and begin to determine a thing (and here I would have alledged the example of the act of making the queen a baſtard, and of making himſelf the ſuperior head; but I could not, being interrupted by one whom God forgive); then will ye (pointing to my lord chancellor) and ye, and ye, and ſo ye all (pointing to the reſt of the biſhops) ſay, Amen: yea, and it like your grace, it is meet that it be ſo enacted.

Here my lord chancellor would ſuffer me to ſpeak no more; but bade me ſit down mockingly, ſaying, That I was ſent for to be inſtructed of them, and I would take upon me to be their inſtructor.

My lord, quoth I, I ſtand, and ſit not: ſhall I not be ſuffered to ſpeak for my life?

Shall we ſuffer thee to tell a tale, and to prate, quoth he? And with that he ſtood up, and began to face me, after his old arrogant proud faſhion, for he perceived that I was in a way to have touched them ſomewhat, which he thought to hinder by daſhing me out of my tale, and ſo he did: for I could never be ſuffered to come to my tale again, no not to one word of it: but he had much like communication with me as he had the day before, and as his manner is, taunt upon taunt, and check upon check. For in that caſe, being God's cauſe, I told him he ſhould not make me afraid to ſpeak.

Lord Chan. See what a ſpirit this fellow hath, ſaid he; finding fault at mine accuſtomed earneſtneſs, and hearty manner of ſpeaking.

Rogers. I have a true ſpirit, quoth I, agreeing and obeying the word of God, and would further have ſaid, that I was never the worſe but the better, to be earneſt in a juſt and true cauſe, and in my maſter Chriſt's matters; but I could not be heard. And at length he proceeded towards his excommunication and condemnation, after that I had told him that his church of Rome was the church of Antichriſt, meaning the falſe doctrine and tyrannical laws, with the maintenance thereof by cruel perſecutions uſed by the biſhops of the ſaid church (of which the biſhop of Wincheſter, and the reſt of his fellow biſhops that are now in England, are the chief members): of laws I mean, quoth I, and not all men and women which are in the pope's church. Likewiſe when I was ſaid to have denied their ſacrament (whereof he made his wonted reverent mention, more to maintain his kingdom thereby, than for the true reverence of Chriſt's inſtitution; more fit for his own and his popiſh generation's ſake, than for religion or God's ſake: I told him after what order I did ſpeak of it (for the manner of his ſpeaking was not agreeing to my words, which are before recited in the communication that we had January 28.) wherewith he was not contented, but he aſked the audience, whether I had not ſimply denied the ſacrament. They would have ſaid, and did what he deſired, for moſt of them were of his own ſervants at that day, the 29th of January I mean. At laſt I ſaid, I will never deny that I ſaid, that is, that your doctrine of the ſacrament is falſe: but yet I tell you after what order I ſaid it. To be ſhort, he read my condemnation before me, particularly mentioning therein but two articles: firſt, that I affirmed the Romiſh catholic church to be the church of Antichriſt; and that I denied the reality of their ſacrament. He cauſed me to be degraded and condemned, and put into the hands of the laity, and ſo he gave me over into the ſheriff's hands, which were much better than his.

The copy of Mr. Rogers his condemnation I thought good here to inſert in Engliſh, to the intent that the ſame being here once expreſſed, may ſerve to be referred to for all condemnatory ſentences through the whole ſtory.

The Sentence condemnatory againſt Mr. Rogers.

IN the name of God, Amen. We Stephen, by the permiſſion of God, biſhop of Wincheſter, lawfully and rightly proceeding with all godly favour by authority and virtue of our office, againſt thee John Rogers, prieſt, otherwiſe called Matthew, before us perſonnally here preſent, being accuſed and detected, and notoriouſly ſlandered of hereſy, having heard, ſeen, and underſtood, and with all diligent deliberation weighed, diſcuſſed, and conſidered the merits of the cauſe, all things being obſerved, which by us in this behalf in order of law ought to be obſerved, ſitting in our judgment-ſeat, the name of Chriſt being firſt called upon, and having only God before our eyes, becauſe by the acts enacted, propounded, and exhibited in this matter, and by thine own confeſſion judicially made before us, we do find that thou haſt taught, holden and affirmed, and obſtinately defended divers errors, hereſies, and damnable opinions contrary to the doctrine and determination of the holy church, as namely theſe; "That the catholic church of Rome is the church of Antichriſt. Item, That in the ſacrament of the altar there is not ſubſtantially nor really the natural body and blood of Chriſt." The which aforeſaid hereſies and damnable opinions, being contrary to the law of God, and determination of the univerſal and apoſtolical church, thou haſt arrogantly, ſtubbornly and wittingly maintained, held and affirmed, and alſo defended before us, as well in this judgment, as alſo otherwiſe, and with the like obſtinacy, ſtubbornneſs, malice and blindneſs of heart, both wittingly and willingly haſt affirmed, that thou wilt believe, maintain and hold, affirm and declare the ſame: We therefore, S. Wincheſter, biſhop, ordinary and dioceſan aforeſaid, by the conſent and aſſent as well of our reverend brethren the lords biſhops here preſent and aſſiſting, as alſo by the counſel and judgment of divers worſhipful lawyers and profeſſors of divinity, with whom we have communicated in this behalf, do declare and pronounce thee the ſaid John Rogers, otherwiſe called Matthew, through thy demerits, tranſgreſſions, obſtinacies and wilfulneſs (which through manifold ways thou haſt incurred by thine own wicked and ſtubborn obſtinacy), to have been and to be guilty of the deteſtable, horrible and wicked offences of heretical pravity and execrable doctrine, and that thou haſt before us ſundry times ſpoken, maintained, and wittingly and ſtubbornly defended the ſaid curſed and execrable doctrine in the ſundry confeſſions, aſſertions and recognitions here judicially before us oftentimes repeated, and yet ſtill doſt maintain, affirm and believe the ſame;" and that thou haſt been and art lawfully and ordinarily convicted in this behalf. We therefore, I ſay, albeit following the example of Chriſt, "which would not the death of a ſinner, but rather that he ſhould convert and live;" we have gone about oftentimes to correct thee, and by all lawful means that we could, and all wholeſome admonitions that we did know, to reduce thee again unto the true faith and unity of the univerſal catholic church, notwithſtanding have found thee obſtinate and ſtiff-necked, willingly continuing in thy damnable opinions and hereſies, and refuſing to return again unto the true faith and unity of the holy mother church; and as the child of wickedneſs and darkneſs ſo to have hardened thy heart, that thou wilt not underſtand the voice of thy ſhepherd, which with a fatherly affection doth ſeek after thee, nor wilt be allured with his fatherly and godly admonitions: We therefore, Stephen the biſhop aforeſaid, not willing that thou which art wicked ſhouldeſt now become more wicked, and infect the Lord's flock with thine hereſy (which we are greatly afraid of), with ſorrow of mind and bitterneſs of heart do judge thee, and definitively condemn thee the ſaid John Rogers, otherwiſe called Matthew, thy demerits and faults being aggravated through thy damnable obſtinacy, as guilty of moſt deteſtable hereſies, and as an obſtinate and impenitent ſinner, refuſing penitently to return to the lap and unity of the holy mother church, and that thou haſt been and art by law excommunicate, and do pronounce and declare thee to be an excommunicate perſon. Alſo we pronounce and declare thee, being an heretic, to be caſt out from the church, and left unto the judgment of the ſecular power, and now preſently ſo do leave thee as an obſtinate heretic, and a perſon wrapped in the ſentence of the great curſe, to be degraded worthily for thy demerits (requiring them notwithſtanding, in the bowels of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, that this execution and puniſhment worthily to be done upon thee, may ſo be moderated, that the rigour thereof be not too extreme, nor yet the gentleneſs too much mitigated, but that it may be to the ſalvation of thy ſoul, to the extirpation, terror, and converſion of the heretics to the unity of the catholic faith) by this our ſentence definitive which we here lay upon and againſt thee, and do with ſorrow of heart promulgate in this form aforeſaid.

After this ſentence was read, he ſent us (Mr. Hooper, I mean, and me) to the Clink, there to remain till night; and when it was dark they carried us, Mr. Hooper going before with one ſheriff, and I coming after with the other, with bills and weapons enow, out of the Clink, and led us through the biſhop's houſe, and St. Mary Overy's church-yard, and ſo into Southwark, and over the bridge on proceſſion to Newgate through the city. But I muſt ſhew you this alſo, that when the biſhop had read the condemnation, he declared that I was in the great curſe, and what a dangerous matter it was to eat and drink with us that were accurſed, or to give us any thing; for all that did ſo ſhould be partakers of the ſame great curſe.

Well, my lord, quoth I, here I ſtand before God and you, and all this honourable audience, and take him to witneſs, that I never wittingly or willingly taught any falſe doctrine; and therefore have I a good conſcience before God and all good men: I am ſure that you and I ſhall come before a Judge that is righteous, before whom I ſhall be as good a man as you; and I nothing doubt but that I ſhall be found there a true member of the true catholic church of Chriſt, and everlaſtingly ſaved. And as for your falſe church, ye need not to excommunicate me forth of it, I have not been in it theſe twenty years, the Lord be thanked therefore. But now ye have done what ye can, my lord, I pray you yet grant me one thing.

What it that, quoth he?

That my poor wife, being a ſtranger, may come and ſpeak with me ſo long as I live: for ſhe hath ten children that are hers and mine, and ſomewhat I would counſel her, what were the beſt for her to do.

No, quoth he, ſhe is not thy wife.

Yes, my lord, quoth I, and hath been theſe eighteen years.

Should I grant her to be thy wife, quoth he?

Chuſe you, quoth I, whether ye will or not; ſhe ſhall be ſo nevertheleſs.

She ſhall not come at thee, quoth he.

Then I have tried out all your charity, ſaid I. You make yourſelf highly diſpleaſed with the matrimony of prieſts, but you maintain open whoredom: as in Wales, quoth I, where every prieſt hath his whore openly dwelling with, and lying by him: even as your holy father ſuffereth all the prieſts in Dutchland and in France to do the like. Thereto he anſwered not, but looked as it were aſquint at it: and thus I departed, and ſaw him laſt.

There was other good matter penned by Mr. Rogers in the priſon, which he intended to give in anſwer, if he might have been permitted: which is as followeth.

Hitherto, dearly beloved, ye have heard what was ſaid: now hear what I purpoſed the night before to have ſaid, if I could have been permitted. Two things I purpoſed to have touched. The one, how it was lawful for a private man to reaſon and write againſt a wicked act of parliament, or ungodly council, which the lord chancellor the day before denied me. The other was to prove that proſperity was not always a token of God's love.

And this I purpoſed to ſpeak of, becauſe the lord chancellor boaſted of himſelf, that he was delivered forth of priſon, as it were by miracle, and preſerved of God to reſtore true religion, and to puniſh me and ſuch others whom he termed heretics. Concerning theſe two points, in this matter I purpoſed to have proceeded. It is not unknown to you, that king Henry VIII. in his time made his daughter, the queen that now is, a baſtard: he aboliſhed the authority of the biſhop of Rome: he pulled down abbeys: and all this he did by the conſent of parliament.

King Edward VI. in his time made lawful the marriage of prieſts, turned the ſervice into Engliſh, aboliſhed the idolatrous maſs, with all like ſuperſtitious trumpery, ſet up the holy communion, and all by conſent of parliament.

The queen that now is, hath repealed the act that made her a baſtard, hath brought in the biſhop of Rome, and ſet him in his old authority, beginneth to ſet up abbeys again, hath made the marriage of prieſts unlawful, hath turned the Engliſh ſervice into Latin again, hath ſet up the maſs again, with like baggage, and pulled down the holy communion: and all this is done by conſent of parliament.

If the acts of parliament, made in king Henry's time, and in king Edward's, had their foundation upon God's word, whereupon all poſitive law ought to be grounded; then theſe which are eſtabliſhed in the queen's time, being clean contrary to the others, as they are not warranted by God's word, ſo are they wicked, and therefore to be both ſpoken and written againſt of all men, as well of private as of public perſons.

If your acts, my lord chancellor, which you have lately coined (I call them yours, becauſe ye only bear the ſway, deviſe, and decree what ye liſt, all other men are forced to follow), be good, and according to God's word, then the

the former acts were naught, which thing ye seem to say, in utterly taking of them away, and setting up of the contrary: if the former were naught, why then did ye consent unto them, and confirm them to be good by your voluntary and advised writing? as it appeareth, and will do to the world's end, in your book, De vera obedientia, where you prove the queen a bastard, and the bishop of Rome to be an usurper, and to have no authority in the realm of England.

Ye must needs confess, that the most part of your act of parliament in these latter days have been according to the fantasies of a few, King Henry in his time established by parliament in a manner what he listed, and many things that might well have been amended.

In king Edward's days the dukes of Somerset and Northumberland bare a great stroke in things, and did not all things sincerely. Even so since the queen that now is came to the government of the realm, all things are ordered by your device and head, and the whole parliament-house is led as you list; by reason whereof they are compelled to condescend to things both contrary to God's manifest word, and also to their own consciences; so great is your cruelty.

For to bring your wicked purposes to pass, and to establish your antichristian kingdom (which, I trust, the Lord with the breath of his mouth will speedily blow over), ye have called three parliaments in one year and a half, that what you could not compass by subtle persuasion, ye might bring to pass by tyrannical threatening: for if ye had not used cruel force in your doings, ye had never brought to pass such things as this day ye have, to the utter defacing and abolishing of God's true religion, and to the casting away and destruction of your natural country, so much as in you lieth.

And as it is most true, that acts of parliament have in these latter days been ruled by the fantasies of a few; and the whole parliament-house, contrary to their minds, was compelled to such things as a few have conceived: so it must needs be granted, that the papists at all times were most ready to apply themselves to the present world, and like men-pleasers to follow the fantasies of such as were in authority, and turn with the state, which way soever it turned. Yea, if the state should change ten times in one year, they would ever be ready at hand to change with it, and so follow the cry, and rather utterly forsake God, and be of no religion, than that they should forego lust or living, for God or for religion.

King Henry by parliament, according to God's word, put down the pope: the clergy consented, and all men openly by oath refused his usurped supremacy, knowing by God's word, Christ to be the head of the church, and every king in his realm to have, under and next unto Christ, the chief sovereignty.

King Edward also by parliament, according to God's word, set the marriage of priests at liberty, abolished the popish and idolatrous mass, changed the Latin service, and set up the holy communion; the whole clergy consented hereunto; many of them set it forth by their preaching; and they all by practising confirmed the same.

Notwithstanding, now when the state is altered, and the laws changed, the papistical clergy, with other like worldlings, as men neither fearing God, neither flying worldly shame, neither yet regarding their consciences, oaths or honesty, like wavering weather-cocks turn round about, and putting on harlots foreheads, sing a new song, and cry with an impudent mouth, Come again, come again to the catholic church, meaning the antichristian church of Rome, which is the synagogue of Satan, and the very sink of all superstition, heresy, and idolatry.

Of what force, I pray you, may a man think these parliaments to be, which scarcely stand a year in strength? Or what credit is to be given to these law-makers, who are not ashamed to establish contrary laws, and to condemn that for evil, which before (the thing itself and the circumstances remaining all one) they affirmed and decreed to be good? Truly ye are so ready, contrary to all right, to change and turn for the pleasure of man, that at length, I fear, God will use you like changelings, and both turn you forth of his kingdom, and out of your own country.

Ye charge the gospel-preachers with the undoing of this realm: nay, it is the turning papists, which have not only set to sale their country like traitors, but also troubled the simple people, so that they cannot tell what they may believe. For that which they affirmed, and preached to be true doctrine in King Edward's days, now they cry against it, as it were most abominable heresy. This fault, I trust, ye shall never find at our hands.

Therefore to conclude that which I purposed, forsomuch as the acts of parliament of these latter times are one contrary to another, and those which ye now have established in your time are contrary to God's most manifest word, as is the usurped supremacy of the bishop of Rome, the idolatrous mass, the Latin service, the prohibiting of lawful marriage (which St. Paul calleth the doctrine of devils), with many such other: I say, it is not only lawful for any private man, which bringeth God's word for him, and the authority of the primitive and best church, to speak and write against such unlawful laws; but it is his duty, and he is bound in very conscience to do it. Which thing I have proved by divers examples before, and now will add but one other, which is written in the fifth of the Acts, where it appeareth that the high-priests, the elders, scribes, and pharisees, decreed in their council, and gave the same commandments to the apostles, that they should not preach in the name of Christ, as ye have also forbidden us; notwithstanding when they were charged therewithal, they answered, "We ought more to obey God than man:" Even so we may, and do answer you; God is more to be obeyed than man; and your wicked laws cannot so tongue-tie us, but we will speak the truth.

The apostles were beaten for their boldness, and they rejoiced that they suffered for Christ's cause. Ye have also provided rods for us and bloody whips: yet when ye have done that which God's hand and council hath determined that ye shall do, be it life or death, I trust that God will so assist us by his holy Spirit and grace, that we shall patiently suffer it, and praise God for it: and whatsoever become of me and others, which now suffer for speaking and professing of the truth, yet be ye sure that God's word will prevail and have the upper hand, when your bloody laws and wicked decrees, for want of sure foundation, shall fall in the dust: and that which I have spoken of your acts of parliament, the same may be said of the general councils of these latter days, which have been within these five hundred years, where the Antichrist of Rome, by reason of his usurped authority, ruled the roast, and decreed such things as made for his gain, not regarding God's glory: and therefore are they to be spoken, written, and cried out against of all such as fear God and love his truth.

And thus much I purposed to have said concerning the first point.

Now touching the second point. That whereas my lord chancellor had the day before said his pleasure of them that ruled the realm while he was in prison, and also rejoiced as though God had made this alteration, even for his sake and his catholic church, as he called it, and to declare as it were by miracle, that we were before in a schism and heresy, and the realm was now brought unto an unity, and to a truth, and I cannot tell whereto: to which I was fully purposed to have spoken. Secondly, my lord, whereas ye yesterday so much dispraised the government of them that ruled in innocent king Edward's days, it may please your lordship to understand, that we poor preachers, whom ye so evil intreat, did most boldly and plainly rebuke their evil government in many things, things, especially their covetousness, and neglect and small regard to live after the gospel, as also their negligence to occasion others to live thereafter, with more things than I can now rehearse. This all London can testify with us. I would also have told him, what I myself for my part did once at Paul's Cross, concerning the misuse of abbeys, and other church goods: and I am right well assured, that never a papist of them all did ever so much therein as I did, I thank the Lord therefore: I was also, as is well known, fain to answer therefore before all the council, and many of my brethren did the like, so that we for the not rebuking of their faults, shall not answer before God, nor be blameworthy before men. Therefore let the gentlemen and courtiers themselves, and all the citizens of London, testify what we did.

But, my lord, you could not abide them, for that which they did unto you, and for that they were of a contrary religion unto you. Wherefore in that you seem so inveterate against them, it is neither any just or public cause, but it is your own private hate that maketh you to report so evil of their governance. And ye may now say what ye list of them, when they be partly dead and gone, and partly by you put out of office.

But what shall be said of you when your fall shall follow, ye shall then hear. And I must say my conscience to you: I fear me, ye have and will with your governance bring England out of God's blessing into a warm sun. I pray God you do not.

I am an Englishman born, and, God knoweth, do naturally wish well to my country. And, my lord, I have often proved that the things, which I have much feared aforehand should come to pass, have indeed followed. I pray God I may fail of my guessing in this behalf: but truly, that will not be with expelling the true word of God out of the realm, and with the shedding of innocent blood.

And as touching your rejoicing, as though God had set you aloft to punish us by miracle (for so you report and brag openly of yourself) and to minister justice, if we will not receive your holy father's mercy, and thereby do declare your church to be true, and ours false, to that I answer thus: God's works be wonderful, and are not to be comprehended and perceived by man's wisdom, nor by the wit of the most wise and prudent. Yea, they are soonest deceived, and do most easily judge amiss of God's wonderful works, that are most worldly wise. God hath made all the wisdom of this world foolishness, first to the Corinthians, the first and second chapter.

"He that put his beloved and dear heart into the hands of the enemies thereof," Jeremiah 12. 7.

This thing doth God, which thing all wise men account to be the most foolish and unwise part that can be. Will the wise of the world, trow ye, put their most dear friends and tenderly beloved children into their enemies hands, to kill, slay, burn, &c. that is unto them a madness, above all madness. And yet doth God use this order, and this is an high and singular wisdom in his sight, which the world taketh to be the most extreme madness.

Can the world shew a cause why he suffered the great multitude of innocent children to be murdered of Herod of Ascalon? or why he put that most holy man, John Baptist, into the hands of Herod his son to be beheaded, and that in prison secretly without open judgment most tyrannously? why he suffered his beloved apostle James to be beheaded of another Herod? Acts 12. why he suffered his beloved seed of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, to be four hundred years in thraldom and bondage, and under Pharaoh? and all the stock of Juda and Benjamin, his beloved children and church, to come under the power, sword, and tyranny of Nebuchadnezzar? No verily, but his true catholic church knoweth divers causes thereof, which are now too long to rehearse, and which I would right gladly shew, if I had time.

But this I am right sure of, that it was not because that the aforesaid godly men were in heresies, and subject to false gods services, and idolat[illegible], and that their adversaries were men of God, and beloved of God: the contrary was true: John Baptist was beloved of God, and Herod hated, and so forth of the rest: and John Baptist, the innocent children, James, the children of Israel in Egypt, and in Babylon, were the catholic members and people of God: and their adversaries, into whose hands they were put and delivered, and that of God by his good will and pleasure, were idolaters, and the people of the devil: but they would be called the chief members of God, and rejoiced that they had the true God, and that it was now declared by miracle, that the Israelites had but a false god, and a false religion, seeing they were delivered into the Babylonians hands. And all the other (the Herods and Pharaoh I mean) plainly determined, that if the men, which they killed and handled evil, had been God's people, God would never have suffered them to come into their hands, but rather have done the contrary, and have let John Baptist kill Herod, and the Israelites, Pharaoh and Nebuchadnezzar. Even the like is now to be seen in us, and in our most cruel adversaries.

They are not therefore the catholic church, because our merciful God hath at this present given our lives into their hands: neither are we therefore heretics, because we suffer punishment at their hands, as the lord chancellor by his rejoicing seemeth to gather: the contrary is hereby to be gathered, that we be the members of the true catholic church, because we suffer for the same doctrine which John Baptist, James, the Israelites, yea Christ, and the apostles did teach: of which none taught any thing of our adversaries doctrine, namely, that the rotten antichristian head of Rome should be head of Christ's church: but they have manifestly taught the contrary, specially Paul, 2 Thess. 2. John in the Revelations: Daniel 11. Which thing, if I might have life and books, I would so (by God's grace) set forth, that all the world should see it: and that our adversaries, with their antichristian head, are the members of the devil's church, as they undoubtedly are. And in like case, as the above-mentioned holy men, though they in their days were counted to be heretics, seditious, and disturbers of the whole world; for unto John Baptist it was said, John 1. "Wherefore baptizest thou, if thou be not Elias, nor that prophet, &c.?" As who should say, thou hast no such authority to begin a new ceremony in the church. For we be in ordinary possession of the church: and of us thou hast received no such power: we abide by our circumcision: and the like could I declare of James, and of all the apostles and prophets, and of our Saviour Christ himself, that we are all condemned as heretics, and blasphemers of God, and disturbers of the whole world. Paul and Silas, Acts 16. heard like words of the Philippians, "These men trouble our city, seeing they are Jews, and preach institutions which are not lawful for us to receive, seeing we be Romans." And in the seventeenth chapter, in Athens, the wise men of this world, and such as gave their endeavour to wisdom, said by St. Paul, What will this prater (as my lord chancellor said to me, Shall we suffer this fellow to prate, when I would fain have said that thing that I have here written), trifler, news-carrier or bringer, that telleth whatsoever men will have him for gain or advantage, that will for a piece of bread say what ye will have him, &c. And another said in the same place, He seemeth to be a preacher of new devils, &c. And Acts 21. the Jews say by Paul, laying hands on him, "Help, O ye Israelites, say they, this is the man that teacheth all men every where against the people (meaning the Jews) and the law of this place," (meaning Jerusalem) and yet was never a word of these true. And Acts 22. the same Jews said of Paul, "Out of the earth with that man, or away with him: for it is not lawful for him to live, or he is not worthy to live." And how many more of these examples are to be found in the Bible? Although I say these men were in their days taken for heretics of them that were then in authority, and of the great multitude of the world, yet it is now well known, yea and very ſhortly after their deaths this was known, yea, and even in their lives alſo unto the true catholic church, that they were not only the chief and ſpecial members of the true catholic church, but alſo the founders and builders thereof (notwithſtanding the ſiniſter judgement that the wiſe and mighty men, and the great multitude of the world had of them), and in their conſciences they were always aſſuredly certified of the ſame. Even the ſame ſhall the world find true in us, ſhortly after our deaths, as alſo there be at this hour (the Lord be thanked therefore) not a few that already know it, as we ourſelves alſo are by God's grace aſſuredly certified in our conſciences, that we are not heretics, but members of the true catholic church, and that our adverſaries the biſhops and popiſh clergy, which will have that title, are the members of Satan's church, and their antichriſtian head of Rome with them.

But here they will cry out; Lo theſe men will be ſtill John Baptiſt, the apoſtles, and prophets, &c.

I anſwer, We make not ourſelves like unto them, in the ſingular virtues and gifts of God given unto them; as of doing miracles and of many other things. The ſimilitude and likeneſs of them and us conſiſteth not in all things, but only in this, that is, that we be like them in doctrine, and in the ſuffering of perſecution and infamy for the ſame,

We have preached their very doctrine, and none other thing: that we are able ſufficiently to declare by their writings; and by writing for my part, I have proffered to prove the ſame, as is now often ſaid. And for this cauſe we ſuffer the like reproach, ſhame, and rebuke of the world, and the like perſecution, loſing of our lives and goods, forſaking (as our maſter Chriſt commandeth) father, mother, ſiſter, brethren, wives, children, and all that there is, being aſſured of a joyful reſurrection, and to be crowned in glory with them, according to the infallible promiſes made unto us in Chriſt, our only and ſufficient mediator, reconciler, prieſt, and ſacrifice, which hath pleaſed the Father, and quieted and pacified his wrath againſt our ſins, and made us without ſpot or wrinkle in his ſight by imputation, although we, of and in ourſelves, are beſpotted, and be-blotted with many filthy ſins, which if the great mercy granted in Chriſt did not put away, by not imputing them unto us of his meaſureleſs unſpeakable mercy and love to ſave us, they would have brought us to everlaſting damnation, and death perpetual: herein, and in no other, do we affirm ourſelves to be like unto our head Chriſt, and all his apoſtles, prophets, martyrs, and ſaints. And herein ought all chriſtian men to be like them, and herein are all true chriſtian men and women like them: every one, according to the meaſure of the faith that God hath dealt unto them, and to the diverſity of the gifts of the Spirit given unto them. But let us now conſider, what if it be God's good will and pleaſure to give his own beloved heart, that is, his beloved church, and the members thereof, into the hands of their enemies, to chaſten, try and prove them, and to bring them to the true unfeigned acknowledging of their own natural ſtubbornneſs, diſobedience towards God and his commandments, as touching the love of God and of their brethren or neighbours, and their natural inclination, readineſs, and deſire to love creatures, to ſeek their own luſts, pleaſures and things forbidden of God, to obtain a true and earneſt repentance, and ſorrowfulneſs therefore, and to make them to ſigh and cry for the forgiveneſs of the ſame, and for the aid of the Spirit, daily to mortify and kill the ſaid evil deſires and luſts: yea, and often falling into groſs outward ſins, as did David, Peter, Magdalen, and others, to riſe again alſo thereout with a mighty crying for mercy, with many other cauſes; let us alſo conſider what he hereafter doth with the ſaid enemies, into whoſe hands he hath given his tender beloved dearlings to be chaſtened and tried. Forſooth, whereas he but chaſteneth his dearlings, and croſſeth them for a ſmall while, according to his good pleaſure, as all fathers do with their children, Heb. 12. Prov. 3. he utterly deſtroyeth, yea and everlaſtingly damneth the unrepentant enemies. Let Herod tell me what he won by killing James, and perſecuting Peter, and Chriſt's tender dearlings, and beloved ſpouſe and wife, his church. Verily God thought him not worthy to have death miniſtered unto him by men or angels, or any worthy creatures, but thoſe ſmall, and yet moſt vile vermin, lice and worms, muſt conſume and kill his beaſtly, vile, and tyrannous body. Pharaoh and Nebuchadnezzar, for all their pride and moſt mighty power, muſt at length let God's dearlings go freely away out of their land, yea out of their bands and tyranny. For when it could not be obtained at their hands that God's congregation might have true mercy miniſtered unto them, but the counterfeit mercy of theſe our days, that is to ſay, extreme cruelty, and even the very and that moſt horrible and cruel death, God aroſe and awoke out of his ſleep, and deſtroyed thoſe enemies of his flock with a mighty hand, and ſtretched out arm. Pharaoh did with moſt great and intolerable labours and burdens oppreſs and bring under the poor Iſraelites, and yet did the courtiers undoubtedly noiſe abroad, that the king was merciful unto them, to ſuffer them to live in the land, and to ſet them awork, that they might get them their livings. If he ſhould thruſt them out of his land, whither ſhould they go, like a ſort of vagabonds and runnagates? This title and name of mercy would that tyrant have, and ſo did his flattering falſe courtiers ſpread his vain praiſe abroad. Have not we the like example now-a-days? O that I had now time to write certain things pertaining to our Wincheſter's mercy! How merciful he hath been to me and my good brethren, I will not ſpeak of, neither yet unto the duke of Suffolk's moſt innocent daughter, and to her as innocent huſband. For although their fathers were faulty, yet had their youth and lack of experience deſerved a pardon by all true merciful men's judgments. O that I had time to paint out this matter aright! but there be many alive that can do it much better when I am dead. Pharaoh had his plagues, and his moſt flouriſhing land was by counterfeit mercy, which was indeed right cruelty and abominable tyranny, utterly deſtroyed. And think ye that bloody butcherly biſhop of Wincheſter, and his moſt bloody brethren, ſhall eſcape? or that England ſhall for their offences, and ſpecially for the maintenance of their idolatry, and wilful following of them, not abide as great brunts? Yes, undoubtedly.

After that John Rogers, as ye have heard, had been long and ſtraitly impriſoned, and lodged in Newgate among thieves, often examined, and very uncharitably intreated, and at length unjuſtly and moſt cruelly condemned by Stephen Gardiner, biſhop of Wincheſter; the fourth of February, in the year of our Lord 1555, being Monday in the morning, he was ſuddenly warned by the keeper of Newgate's wife, to prepare himſelf to the fire; who being then found aſleep, could ſcarce be awaked. At length being raiſed and awaked, and bid to make haſte, Then ſaid he, if it be ſo, I need not tie my points. And ſo was had down, firſt to biſhop Bonner to be degraded: which being done, he craved of Bonner but one petition: and Bonner aſking what that ſhould be? Mr. Rogers replied, that he might ſpeak a few words with his wife before his burning. But that could not be obtained of him. Then, ſaid he, you declare what your charity is: and ſo he was brought into Smithfield by Mr. Cheſter and Mr. Woodroofe, then ſheriffs of London, there to be burnt; where he ſhewed moſt conſtant patience, not uſing many words, for he could not be permitted, but only exhorting the people conſtantly to remain in that faith and true doctrine which he before had taught, and they had learned, and for the confirmation whereof he was not only content patiently to ſuffer and bear all ſuch bitterneſs and cruelty as had been ſhewed him, but alſo moſt gladly to reſign up his life, and to give his fleſh to the conſuming fire, for the teſtimony of the ſame.

Briefly, and in few words to comprehend the whole order of his life, doings and martyrdom: Firſt, this good man, Mr. Rogers, was committed to priſon, as above-ſaid, and there continued a year and half. In priſon he was merry and earneſt in all he went about. He wrote much, his own examinations he penned with his own hand, which elſe had never come to light. Wherein it is to be noted, by the way, a memorable working of God's providence. Ye heard a little above, how Mr. Rogers craved of biſhop Bonner, going to his burning, that he might ſpeak a few words before with his wife, which could not be granted. What theſe words were which he had to ſay to his wife, it is for no man certainly to determine. It may be ſuppoſed, that his purpoſe was, amongſt other things, to ſignify unto her of the book of his examinations and anſwers, which he had written and privily hid in a ſecret corner of the priſon where he lay. But where man's power lacketh, ſee how God's providence worketh. For notwithſtanding that during the time of his impriſonment, there was ſtrict ſearch made to take away his letters and writings; yet after his death, his wife and one of her ſons called Daniel, coming into the place where he lay, to ſeek for his books and writings, and now ready to go away, it chanced her ſon aforenamed, caſting his eye aſide, to ſpy a black thing (for it had a black cover, belike becauſe it ſhould not be known), lying in a blind corner under a pair of ſtairs. Who deſiring his mother to ſee what it was, found it to be the book written with his own hand, containing theſe his examinations and anſwers, with other matters above ſpecified. In the latter end whereof, this alſo was contained; which becauſe it concerneth a prophetical forewarning of things pertaining to the church, I thought to place the ſame in his own words, as they be there written, which are theſe: If God look not mercifully upon England, the ſeeds of utter deſtruction are ſown in it already by theſe hypocritical tyrants, and antichriſtian prelates, popiſh papiſts, and double traitors to their natural country. And yet they ſpeak of mercy, of bleſſing, of the catholic church, of unity, of power, and ſtrengthening of the realm. This double diſſimulation will ſhew itſelf one day when the plague cometh, which undoubtedly will light upon theſe crown-ſhorn captains, and that ſhortly, whatſoever the godly and the poor realm ſuffer in the mean while by God's ſufferance and will.

Spite of Nebuchadonoſor's beard, and maugre his heart, the captive, thrall, and miſerable Jews muſt come home again, and have their city and temple built up again by Zorobabel, Eſdras, and Nehemias, &c. and the whole kingdom of Babylon muſt go to ruin and be taken of ſtrangers, the Perſians and Medes. So ſhall the diſperſed Engliſh flock of Chriſt be brought again into their former eſtate, or to a better, I truſt in the Lord God, than it was in innocent king Edward's days; and our bloody Babylonical biſhops, and the whole crown-ſhorn company brought to utter ſhame, rebuke, ruin, decay and deſtruction. For God cannot, and undoubtedly will not ſuffer for ever their abominable lying, falſe doctrine, their hypocriſy, blood-thirſt, whoredom, idleneſs, their peſtilent life, pampered in all kind of pleaſure, their thraſonical boaſting pride, their malicious, envious, and poiſoned ſtomachs, which they bear towards his poor and miſerable chriſtians. Peter truly warneth, that "if judgment beginneth in the houſe of God, what ſhall be the end of them that believe not the goſpel? If the righteous ſhall ſcarcely be ſaved, where ſhall the ungodly and ſinner appear?" Some ſhall have their puniſhment here in this world, and in the world to come; and they that do eſcape in this world, ſhall not eſcape everlaſting damnation. This ſhall be your ſauce, O ye wicked papiſts, make ye merry as long as ye may.

Furthermore, amongſt other words and ſayings, which may ſeem prophetically to be ſpoken by him, this alſo may be added, and is notoriouſly to be marked, that he ſpake, being then in priſon, to the printer of this preſent book, who then alſo was laid up for like cauſe of religion; Thou, ſaid he, ſhalt live to ſee the alteration of this religion, and the goſpel to be freely preached again: and therefore have me commended to my brethren, as well in exile as others, and bid them be circumſpect in diſplacing the papiſts, and putting good miniſters into churches, or elſe their end will be worſe than ours. And for lack of good miniſters to furniſh churches, his device was, (Mr. Hooper alſo agreeing to the ſame), that for every ten churches ſome one good and learned ſuperintendent ſhould be appointed, which ſhould have under him faithful readers, ſuch as might well be got, ſo that popiſh prieſts ſhould clean be put out, and the biſhop once a year to overſee the profiting of the pariſhes; and if the miniſter did not his duty, as well in profiting himſelf in his book, and his pariſhioners in good inſtructions, ſo that they may be trained by little and little to give a reckoning how they do profit, then he to be expelled, and another put in his place: And the biſhop to do the like with the ſuperintendent: This was his counſel and requeſt; ſhewing moreover, and proteſting in his commendations to his brethren by the printer aforeſaid, that if they would not ſo do, their end, he ſaid, would be worſe than theirs.

Over and beſides divers things touching Mr. Rogers, this is not to be forgotten, how in the days of king Edward VI. there was a controverſy among the biſhops and clergy, for wearing of prieſts caps, and other attire belonging to that order. Mr. Rogers being one of that number which never went otherwiſe than in a round cap, during all the time of king Edward, affirmed that he would not agree to that decreement of uniformity, but upon this condition, that if they would needs have ſuch an uniformity of wearing the cap, tippet, &c. then it ſhould alſo be decreed withal, that the papiſts, for a difference betwixt them and others, ſhould be conſtrained to wear upon their ſleeves a chalice with an hoſt upon it. Whereupon, if they would conſent, he would agree to the other; otherwiſe he would not, he ſaid, conſent to the ſetting forth of the ſame, nor ever wear the cap, as indeed he never did.

To proceed now further in deſcribing the doings of this man, during the time he remained priſoner in Newgate, he was to the priſoners beneficial and liberal; for whom he had thus deviſed, that he with his fellows ſhould have but one meal a day, the paying notwithſtanding for the charges of the whole; the other meal ſhould be given to them that lacked on the other ſide of the priſon. But Alexander their keeper, a ſtrait man, and a right Alexander, a copperſmith indeed, would in no caſe ſuffer that, of whoſe doings more ſhall be ſaid, God willing, hereafter. The Sunday before Mr. Rogers ſuffered, he drank to Mr. Hooper, being then underneath him, and bade them commend him unto him, and tell him, there was never little fellow better would ſtick to a man, than he would ſtick to him, preſuppoſing they ſhould both be burned together, although it happened otherwiſe, for Mr. Rogers was burnt alone. And thus much briefly concerning the life and ſuch acts of Mr. Rogers, as I thought worthy noting.

Now when the time came, that he being delivered to the ſheriffs ſhould be brought out of Newgate to Smithfield, the place of his execution, Mr. Woodroofe, one of the aforeſaid ſheriffs, firſt came to Mr. Rogers, and aſked him, if he would revoke his abominable doctrine, and his evil opinion of the ſacrament of the altar. Mr. Rogers anſwered, That which I have preached I will ſeal with my blood. Then Mr. Woodroofe ſaid, Thou art an heretic. That ſhall be known, quoth Mr. Rogers, at the day of judgment. Well, ſaid Mr. Woodroofe, I will never pray for thee. But I will pray for you, ſaid Mr. Rogers; and ſo was brought the ſame day, which was Monday the fourth of February, by the ſheriffs, towards Smithfield, ſaying the pſalm Miſerere by the way, all the people wonderfully rejoicing at his conſtancy with great praiſes and thanks to God for the ſame. And there, in the preſence of Mr. Rocheſter, comptroller of the queen's houſhold, Sir Richard Southwell, both the Sheriffs, and a great number of people, he was burnt to aſhes, waſhing his hands in the flame as he was burning. A little before his burning, his pardon was brought, if he would have recanted, but he utterly refuſed it. He was the firſt Martyr of all the bleſſed company that ſuffered in queen Mary's time, that gave the firſt adventure upon the fire. His wife and children, being eleven in number, ten able to go, and one ſucking at her breaſt, met him by the way as he went towards Smithfield: this ſorrowful ſight of his own fleſh and blood could nothing move him, but that he conſtantly and chearfully took his death with wonderful patience, in the defence and quarrel of the goſpel of Chriſt.

Publiſh'd as the Act directs

The Life and Martyrdom of Mr. Laurence Saunders, who was burnt at Coventry, February 8. 1552.

AFTER that queen Mary, by public proclamation in the firſt year of her reign, had inhibited the ſincere preaching of God's holy word, as is before declared, ſeveral pious miniſters, who had the cure and charge of ſouls committed to them, did, notwithſtanding, according to their bounden duty, feed their flock faithfully, not as preachers authoriſed by public authority (as the godly order of the realm was in the happy days of bleſſed king Edward), but as the private paſtors of particular flocks, among whom Laurence Saunders was one, a man of worſhipful parentage. His bringing up was in learning from his youth, in places meet for that purpoſe, as namely in the ſchool of Eton. From whence (according to the manner there uſed) he was choſen to go to the King's college in Cambridge, where he continued ſcholar of the college three whole years, and there profited in knowledge and learning very much for that time: ſhortly after that, he did forſake the univerſity, and went to his parents, upon whoſe advice he minded to become a merchant, for that his mother, who was a gentlewoman of good eſtimation, being left a widow, and having a good portion for him among his other brethren, ſhe thought to ſet him up wealthy, and ſo he coming up to London, was bound apprentice with a merchant, named Sir William Cheſter (who afterwards chanced to be ſheriff of London the ſame year that Saunders was burnt at Coventry). Thus by the mind of his friends, Laurence ſhould needs have been a merchant; but Almighty God, who hath his ſecret working in all things, ſaw better for his ſervant, as it fell out in the end: for although that Saunders was bound by faſt indenture to play the merchant, yet the Lord ſo wrought inwardly in his heart, that he could find no liking in that vocation: ſo that when his other fellows were buſily occupied about that kind of trade, he would ſecretly withdraw himſelf into ſome privy corner, and there fall into his ſolitary lamentations, as one not pleaſed with that kind and trade of life.

It happened that his maſter, being a good man, and hearing his 'prentice thus in his ſecret prayers inwardly to mourn by himſelf, called him unto him, to know what the cauſe was of that his ſolitarineſs and lamentation: who then perceiving him not to fanſy that kind of life (for ſo Saunders declared unto him), and perceiving alſo his whole purpoſe to be bent to the ſtudy of his book, and ſpiritual contemplation, like a good man, directed his letters incontinently unto his friends, and giving him his indenture, ſet him free: and thus Laurence Saunders being raviſhed with the love of learning, and eſpecially with the reading of God's word, tarried not long in the traffick of merchandize, but ſhortly returned to Cambridge again to his ſtudy, where he began to couple to the knowledge of the Latin, and the ſtudy of the Greek tongue, wherein he profited very much in a little time: therewith alſo he joined the ſtudy of the Hebrew. Then he gave himſelf wholly to the ſtudy of the Holy Scripture, to furniſh himſelf to the office of a preacher.

In ſtudy he was diligent and painful, in godly life he declared the fruits of a well exerciſed conſcience; he prayed often and with great fervor, and in his prayers, as alſo at other times, he had his part of ſpiritual exerciſes, which his hearty ſighing to God declared, in which when any ſpecial aſſault did come, by prayer he felt preſent relief: then was his company marvellous comfortable. For as his exerciſes were ſpecial teachings, ſo in the end they proved ſingular conſolations: wherein he became ſo expert, that within ſhort ſpace he was able to comfort others who were in affliction, by the conſolation wherewith the Lord did comfort him. Thus continued he in the univerſity, till he proceeded maſter of arts, and a long ſpace after.

In the beginning of king Edward's reign, when God's true religion was begun to be reſtored, after licence obtained, he began to preach, and was ſo well liked of them which then had authority, that they had appointed him to read a divinity lecture in the college of Fotheringa, where by doctrine and life he edified the pious, drew many ignorant to the true knowledge of God, and ſtopped the mouths of the adverſaries. He married about that time, and in the married eſtate led a life unblameable before all men. The college of Fotheringa being diſſolved, he was placed to be a reader in the minſter at Litchfield: where he ſo behaved himſelf in teaching and living, that his very adverſaries did give a full report as well of his learning, as of his piety. After a certain ſpace, he departed from Litchfield to a benefice in Leiceſterſhire, called Church-Langton, where he keeping reſidence, taught diligently, and kept a liberal houſe. From thence he was orderly called to take a benefice in the city of London, named Alhallows in Bread-ſtreet. Then he was minded to give over his cure in the country; and therefore after he had taken poſſeſſion of his benefice in London, he departed from thence into the country, clearly to diſcharge himſelf thereof. And even at that time began the broil about the claim that queen Mary made to the crown, by reaſon whereof he could not accompliſh his purpoſe.

In this trouble, and even among the beginners of it (ſuch I mean as were for the queen), he preached at Northampton, nothing meddling with the ſtate, but boldly uttered his conſcience againſt popiſh doctrine and Antichriſt's damnable errors, which were like to ſpring up again in England, as a juſt plague for the little love which the Engliſh nation did bear to the bleſſed word of God, which had been ſo plentifully offered unto them. The queen's men which were there and heard him, were highly diſpleaſed with him for this ſermon, and for it kept him among them as priſoner. But partly for love of his brethren and friends, who were chief doers for the queen among them, partly becauſe there was no law broken by his preaching, they diſmiſſed him. He, ſeeing the dreadful days at hand, inflamed with the fire of godly zeal, preached with diligence at both thoſe benefices, as time could ſerve him, ſeeing he could reſign neither of them now, but into the hand of a papiſt.

Thus paſſed he to and fro preaching, until that proclamation was put forth, of which mention is made in the beginning; at which time he was at his benefice in the country, where he (notwithſtanding the proclamation aforeſaid) taught diligently God's truth, confirming the people therein, and arming them againſt falſe doctrine, until he was not only commanded to ceaſe, but alſo with force reſiſted, ſo that he could not proceed there in preaching. Some of his friends, perceiving ſuch fearful menacing, counſelled him to fly out of the realm, which he refuſed to do. But ſeeing he was with violence kept from from doing good in that place, he returned towards London to viſit the flock, of which he had there the charge.

On Saturday, October 14. as he was coming nigh to the city of London, Sir John Mordant, a counſellor to queen Mary, did overtake him, and aſked him whither he went. I have, ſaid Saunders, a cure in London, and now I go to inſtruct my people, according to my duty. If you will follow my counſel, quoth Mr. Mordant, let them alone, and come not at them. To this Saunders anſwered: How ſhall I then be diſcharged before God, if any be ſick, and deſire conſolation; if any want good counſel, and need inſtruction? or if any ſhould ſlip into error, and receive falſe doctrine? Did you not, quoth Mordant, preach ſuch a day, and named the day, in Bread-ſtreet in London? Yes verily, ſaid Saunders, that ſame is my cure. I heard you myſelf, quoth Mr. Mordant: and will you now preach there again? if it pleaſe you, ſaid Saunders, to-morrow you may hear me again in that ſame place, where I will confirm by the authority of God's word, all that I ſaid then, and whatſoever before that time I taught them.

I would counſel you, quoth the other, not to preach. If you can and will forbid me by lawful authority, then muſt I obey, ſaid Saunders. Nay, quoth he, I will not forbid you, but I do give you counſel. And thus entered they both the city, and departed each from other. Mr. Mordant, of an uncharitable mind, went to give warning to Bonner biſhop of London, that Saunders would preach in his cure the next day. Saunders reſorted to his lodging with a mind bent to do his duty. Where becauſe he ſeemed to be ſomewhat troubled, one who was there about him, aſked him how he did? In very deed, ſaid he, I am in priſon, till I be in priſon; meaning, that his mind was unquiet until he had preached, and that he ſhould have quietneſs of mind, though he were put in priſon.

The next day, which was Sunday in the forenoon, he made a ſermon in his pariſh, intreating on that place which Paul writeth to the Corinthians: "I have coupled you to one man, that ye ſhould make yourſelves a chaſte virgin unto Chriſt. But I fear leſt it come to paſs, that as the ſerpent beguiled Eve, even ſo your wits ſhould be corrupt from the ſingleneſs which ye had towards Chriſt." He recited a ſum of that true chriſtian doctrine, through which they were coupled to Chriſt, to receive of him free juſtification through faith in his blood. The papiſtical doctrine he compared to the ſerpent's deceiving: and leſt they ſhould be deceived by it, he made a compariſon between the voice of God, and the voice of the popiſh ſerpent; deſcending to more particular declaration thereof, as it were to let them plainly ſee the difference that is between the order of the church ſervice, ſet forth by king Edward in the Engliſh tongue, and comparing it with the popiſh ſervice then uſed in the Latin tongue.

The firſt he ſaid was good, becauſe it was according to the word of God, 1 Cor. 14. and the order of the primitive church. The other he ſaid was evil, and though in that evil be intermingled ſome good Latin words, yet was it but as a little honey or milk mingled with a great deal of poiſon, to make them drink up all. This was the ſum of his ſermon.

In the afternoon he was ready in his church to have given another exhortation to his people. But the biſhop of London interrupted him by ſending an officer for him. This officer charged him, upon pain of diſobedience and contumacy, forthwith to come to the biſhop his maſter. Thus, as the apoſtles were brought out of the temple, where they were teaching, unto the rulers of the prieſts, ſo was Laurence Saunders brought before the biſhop of London, who had in his company the aforenamed Sir John Mordant and ſome of his chaplains. The biſhop laid no more to Laurence Saunders's charge, but treaſon for breaking the queen's proclamation, hereſy and ſedition for his ſermon.

The treaſon and ſedition, his charity was content to let ſlip until another time. But an heretic he would now prove him, and all thoſe, he ſaid, who did teach and believe that the adminiſtration of the ſacraments, and all orders of the church are moſt pure, which do come moſt nigh to the order of the primitive church. For the church was then but in her infancy, and could not abide that perfection which was afterward to be furniſhed with ceremonies. And for this cauſe Chriſt himſelf, and after him the apoſtles, did in many things bear with the rudeneſs of that church. To this Laurence Saunders anſwered with the authority of St. Auguſtine, That ceremonies were even from the beginning invented and ordained for the rude infancy and weak infirmity of man, and therefore it was a token of the more perfection of the primitive church, that it had few ceremonies; and of the rudeneſs of the papiſtical church, becauſe it had ſo many ceremonies, partly blaſphemous, partly unſavoury and unprofitable.

After much talk concerning this matter, the biſhop deſired him to write what he believed of tranſubſtantiation. Laurence Saunders did ſo, ſaying, My lord, ye do ſeek my blood, and ye ſhall have it: I pray God that ye may be ſo baptized in it, that ye may hereafter loath bloodſucking, and become a better man. This writing the biſhop kept for his purpoſe, even to cut the writer's throat, as ſhall appear hereafter. The biſhop, when he had his will, ſent Laurence Saunders to the lord chancellor, as Annas ſent Chriſt to Caiaphas: and like favour found Saunders as Chriſt his maſter did before him. But the chancellor being not at home, Saunders was conſtrained to tarry for him the ſpace of four hours, in the outer chamber, where he found a chaplain of the biſhop's very merrily diſpoſed, with certain gentlemen playing at tables, with divers others of the ſame family or houſe occupied there in the ſame exerciſe.

All this time Saunders ſtood very modeſtly and ſoberly at the ſcreen or cupboard bare-headed, Sir John Mordant his guide or leader walking up and down by him: who (as I ſaid before) was then one of the council. At laſt the biſhop returned from the court, whom, as ſoon as he was entered, a great many ſuitors met and received; ſo that before he could get out of one houſe into another, half an hour was paſſed. At laſt he came into the chamber where Saunders was, and went through into another chamber: where in the mean time, Sir John Mordant gave him a writing, containing the cauſe, or rather the accuſation of the ſaid Saunders: which when he had peruſed, Where is the man, ſaid the biſhop? Then Saunders, being brought forth to the place of examination, firſt moſt lowly and meekly kneeled down, and made courteſy before the table where the biſhop did ſit; unto whom the biſhop ſpake on this wiſe:

How happened it, ſaid he, that notwithſtanding the queen's proclamation to the contrary, you have enterpriſed to preach?

Saunders denied not that he did preach; ſaying, that forſomuch as he ſaw the perilous times now at hand, he did but (according as he was admoniſhed, and warned by Ezekiel the prophet) exhort his flock and pariſhioners to perſevere and ſtand ſtedfaſtly in the doctrine which they had learned; ſaying alſo, that he was moved and pricked forward thereunto by the place of the apoſtle, wherein he was commanded rather to obey God than man; and moreover, that nothing more moved or ſtirred him thereunto, than his own conſcience.

A goodly conſcience ſurely, ſaid the biſhop. This your conſcience could make our queen a baſtard, or miſbegotten; would it not, I pray you?

Then ſaid Saunders, We, ſaid he, do not declare or ſay that the queen is baſe, or miſbegotten, neither go about any ſuch matter. But for that let them care whoſe writings are yet in the hands of men, witneſſing the ſame, not without the great reproach and ſhame of the author: privily taunting the biſhop himſelf, who had before

(to

(to get the favour of Henry VIII.) written and ſet forth in print, a book of true obedience, wherein he had openly declared queen Mary to be a baſtard. Now Mr. Saunders going forwards in his purpoſe, ſaid, We do only profeſs and teach the ſincerity and purity of the word; which, albeit it be now forbidden us to preach with our mouths, yet notwithſtanding, I do not doubt, but that our blood hereafter ſhall manifeſt the ſame. The biſhop being in this ſort prettily nipped and touched, ſaid; Carry away this frenzy fool to priſon. Unto whom Mr. Saunders anſwered, that he did give God thanks, which had given him at the laſt a place of reſt and quietneſs, where he might pray for the biſhop's converſion.

Furthermore, he that did lie with him afterwards in priſon, in the ſame bed, reported, that he heard him ſay, that even in the time of his examination he was wonderfully comforted, inſomuch as not only in ſpirit, but alſo in body, he received a certain taſte of that holy communion of ſaints, whilſt a moſt pleaſant refreſhing did iſſue from every part and member of the body unto the ſeat and place of the heart, and from thence did ebb and flow to and fro unto all the parts again.

Mr. Saunders continued in priſon a whole year and three months. In all which ſpace he ſent ſeveral letters to divers men; as one to Cranmer, Ridley, and Latimer; another to his wife, and alſo to others, certifying them both of the public calamity of the time, and alſo of his private afflictions, and of his ſundry conflicts with his adverſaries; as in writing to his friend he ſpeaketh of Dr. Weſton conferring with him in the priſon, whereof ye ſhall hear anon (by God's leave) as followeth in the ſtory. In the mean time the chancellor, after this little talk with Mr. Saunders (as is aforeſaid), ſent him to the priſon of the Marſhalſea, &c. For the Caiaphas (Winchester I mean) did nothing but bait him with ſome of his curriſh eloquence, and ſo committed him to the priſon of the Marſhalſea, where he was kept priſoner one whole year and a quarter. But of his cauſe and eſtate thou ſhalt now ſee what Mr. Saunders himſelf did write.

Part of a Letter which Mr. Saunders ſent to biſhop Gardiner, anſwering certain Things laid to his Charge.

TOuching the cauſe of my impriſonment. I doubt whether I have broken any law or proclamation. In my doctrine I did not, foraſmuch as at that time it was permitted by the proclamation to uſe, according to our conſciences, ſuch ſervice as was then eſtabliſhed. My doctrine was then agreeable unto my conſcience and the ſame ſervice then uſed. The act which I did [he meaneth public teaching of God's word in his own pariſh, called Alhallows in Breadſtreet in the city of London] was ſuch as being indifferently weighed, ſounded to no breaking of the proclamation, or at leaſt no wilful breaking of it, foraſmuch as I cauſed no bell to be rung, neither occupied I any place in the pulpit, after the order of ſermons or lectures. But be it that I did break the proclamation, this long time of continuance in priſon may be thought to be more than a ſufficient puniſhment for ſuch a fault.

Touching the charging of me with my religion, I ſay with St. Paul; this I confeſs, "That after the way which they call hereſy, ſo worſhip I the God of my fore-fathers, believing all things which are written in the law and the prophets, and have hope towards God, &c." And herein ſtudy I to have always a clear conſcience towards God and towards men; ſo that God I call to witneſs, I have a conſcience. And this my conſcience is not grounded upon vain fantaſy, but upon the infallible verity of God's word, with the witneſſing of his choſen church agreeable unto the ſame.

It is an eaſy thing for them which take Chriſt for their true paſtor, and be the very ſheep of his paſture, to diſcern the voice of their true ſhepherd, from the voice of wolves, hirelings and ſtrangers: foraſmuch as Chriſt ſaith, "My ſheep hear my voice:" yea, and thereby they ſhall have the gift to know the right voice of the true ſhepherd, and ſo to follow him. and to avoid the contrary, as he alſo ſaith, "The ſheep follow the ſhepherd, for they know his voice: and a ſtranger they will not follow, but will fly from him, for they know not the voice of a ſtranger." Such inward inſpiration doth the Holy Ghoſt put into the children of God, being indeed taught of God, but otherwiſe unable to underſtand the true way of their ſalvation. And albeit that the wolf (as Chriſt ſaith) cometh in ſheeps cloathing, yet he ſaith, by their fruits ye ſhall know them. For there be certain fruits whereby the wolf is bewrayed, notwithſtanding that otherwiſe, in ſundry ſorts of devout holineſs in outward ſhew, he ſeemeth never ſo ſimple a ſheep. That the Romiſh religion is ravening and wolfiſh, it is apparent in three principal points.

Firſt, it robbeth God of his due and only honour.

Secondly, it taketh away the true comfort of conſcience, in obſcuring, or rather burying of Chriſt and his office of ſalvation.

Thirdly, it ſpoileth God of his true worſhip and ſervice in ſpirit and truth, appointed in his preſcript commandments, and driveth men unto that inconvenience, againſt which Chriſt with the prophet Iſaiah doth ſpeak ſharply; "This people honoureth me with their lips, but their heart is far from me. They worſhip me in vain, teaching the doctrine and precepts of men." And in another place, "Ye caſt aſide the commandments of God, to maintain your own traditions."

Wherefore I in conſcience weighing the Romiſh religion, and by indifferent diſcuſſing thereof, finding the foundation unſtedfaſt, and the building thereupon but vain: and on the other ſide, having my conſcience framed after a right and uncorrupt religion, ratified and fully eſtabliſhed by the word of God, and the conſent of his true church, I neither may, nor do intend, by God's gracious aſſiſtance, to be pulled one jot from the ſame; no, though an angel out of heaven ſhould preach another goſpel than that which I have received of the Lord.

And although that for lack either of ſuch deep knowledge and profound judgment, or of expedite uttering of that I do know and judge, as is required in an excellent clerk, I ſhall not be able ſufficiently to anſwer, for the convincing of the gainſayer: yet nevertheleſs this my proteſtation ſhall be of me premiſed, that for the reſpect of the grounds and cauſes before conſidered, albeit I cannot Explicita fide, as they call it, conceive all that is to be conceived, neither can diſcuſs all that is to be diſcuſſed, nor can effectually expreſs all that can be expreſſed in the diſcourſe of the doctrine of this moſt true religion, whereunto I am profeſſed: yet do I bind myſelf, as by my humble ſimplicity, ſo by my Fidem implicitam; that is, by faith in generality (as they call it) to wrap my belief in the credit of the ſame, that no authority of that Romiſh religion repugnant thereunto, ſhall by any means remove me from the ſame, though it may hap that our adverſaries will labour to beguile us with enticing words, and ſeek to ſpoil us through philoſophy and deceitful vanity, after the traditions of men, and after the ordinances of the world, and not after Chriſt, &c.

And thus much of Mr. Saunders's letter, ſo much as remained thereof; the remainder, becauſe it was rent away, I could not adjoin thereunto. Notwithſtanding by this already expreſſed, it is ſufficient to underſtand, how good was the cauſe and ſtate of this bleſſed child of God, being priſoner for Chriſt's cauſe. For the defence whereof he wholly beſtowed and reſigned himſelf in ſuch ſort, as he forbad his wife to ſue for his delivery: and when others of his friends had by ſuit almoſt obtained it, he diſcouraged them, ſo that they did not follow their ſuit, as by his letter following may appear.

A Letter of Mr. Saunders to his Wife.

GRACE, mercy, and peace in Chriſt our Lord. Entirely beloved wife, even as unto mine own ſoul and body, ſo do I daily in my hearty prayer with unto you; for I do daily, twice at the leaſt, in this ſort remember you. And I do not doubt, dear wife, but that both I and you, as we be written in the book of life, ſo we ſhall together enjoy the ſame everlaſtingly, through the grace and mercy of God our dear Father, in his Son our Chriſt. And for this preſent life, let us wholly appoint ourſelves to the will of our good God, to glorify him either by life or by death; and even that ſame merciful Lord make us worthy to honour him either way as pleaſeth him, Amen. I am merry, I thank my God and my Chriſt, in whom and through whom I ſhall (I know) be able to fight a good fight, and finiſh a good courſe, and then receive the crown which is laid up in ſtore for me, and all the true ſoldiers of Chriſt. Wherefore, wife, let us, in the name of our God, fight luſtily to overcome the fleſh, the devil, and the world. What our harneſs and weapons be in this kind of fight, look in the ſixth chapter unto the Epheſians, and pray, pray, pray. I would that you make no ſuit for me in any wiſe. Thank, you know whom, for her moſt ſweet and comfortable putting me in remembrance of my journey whither I am paſſing. God ſend us all good ſpeed, and a joyful meeting. I have too few ſuch friends to further me in that journey, which is indeed the greateſt friendſhip. The bleſſing of God be with you all, Amen.

A priſoner in the Lord. L. Saunders.

This his conſtancy is ſufficiently commended and declared by his valiant buckling with two mighty enemies, Antichriſt and death. To neither of theſe did he give place: but by ſuffering their malice got the victory over them both. One of the conflicts which he had with Antichriſt and his members, I have gathered out of a letter of his own hand-writing. It was with Dr. Weſton, a man whom though I ſhould praiſe, yet would all good men worthily diſpraiſe. Of this the ſaid Laurence Saunders thus writeth, in a letter which he ſent to one of his friends, who wrote to him to know what Dr. Weſton did at the Marſhalſea: whereunto he thus anſwered.

Dr. Weſton came to confer with Mr. Grimoald: what he hath concluded with him I know not: I wiſh it may be to God's glory, Amen, Amen. Mr. Weſton of his gentleneſs viſited me, and offered me friendſhip in his worldly wily ſort, &c. I had not ſo much good manners as to take it at his hand: for I ſaid, that I was well enough, and ready chearfully to abide the extremity, to keep thereby a good conſcience. Ye be aſleep in ſin, ſaid he. I would awake, quoth I, and do not forget Vigilate & Orate, that is, Watch and Pray. What church was there thirty years paſt, ſaid he? What church was there, quoth I, in Elias's time? Joan of Kent, ſaid he, was of your church. No, ſaid I, we did condemn her as an heretic. Who was of your church, ſaid he, thirty years paſt? Such, quoth I, as the Romiſh Antichriſt, and his rabble, have reputed and condemned as heretics. Wickliff, ſaid he, Thorp, Oldcaſtle, &c. Yea, quoth I, with many more, as ſtories do tell. The biſhop of Rome hath, ſaid he, a long time played a part in your railing ſermons; but now be ye ſure, he muſt play another manner of part. The more pity, ſaid I, and yet ſome comfort it is to ſee, how that the beſt learned, wiſeſt, and holieſt of you all, have heretfore had him to play a part likewiſe in your ſermons and writings; though now to pleaſe the world, you do turn with the weather-cock. Did you ever, ſaid he, hear me preach againſt the biſhop of Rome? No, ſaid I, for I never heard you preach. But I believe you have been no wiſer than others, &c. with more about the ſacrament. Pray, pray. God keep your family, and bleſs it.

What bleſſed taſte this good man had of God's Holy Spirit, may appear to him that is diſpoſed to peruſe the ſame by ſeveral of his letters; whereof ſome we have here thought good to inſert, beginning firſt with that which he wrote out of the Marſhalſea to Dr. Cranmer, Ridley, and Latimer, priſoners for the like cauſe of Chriſt in Oxford.

To Archbiſhop Cranmer, Biſhop Ridley, and Mr. Latimer, being impriſoned in Oxford.

IN my moſt humble wiſe I ſalute you, moſt reverend fathers in Chriſt Jeſus our Lord. Immortal thanks and everlaſting praiſes be given unto that our Father of mercies, "Which hath made us meet to be partakers of the inheritance of the ſaints in light, which hath delivered us from the power of darkneſs, and hath tranſlated us into the kingdom of his beloved Son, by whom we have redemption through his blood, &c." O moſt happy eſtate, that in an unſpeakable wiſe our life is hid with Chriſt in God: but whenſoever Chriſt which is our life ſhall ſhew himſelf, then ſhall we alſo appear with him in glory. In the mean ſeaſon as our ſight is but in a glaſs, even in a dark ſpeaking, ſo we walk in faith, not after outward appearance: which faith although for want of outward appearance, reaſon reputeth but as vain, yet the choſen of God do know the effect thereof, to bring a more ſubſtantial ſtate and lively fruition of very felicity and perfect bleſſedneſs than reaſon can reach, or ſenſes receive. By this faith we have in our poſſeſſion all good things, yea even them "Which the eye hath not ſeen, and the ear hath not heard, neither hath entered the heart of man, &c." Then if hereby we do enjoy all good things, it followeth, that we muſt needs poſſeſs, have and enjoy you, moſt reverend fathers, who be no ſmall part of our joy and good things given us of God.

We therefore have had the fruition of you by bodily preſence to our inexplicable benefit, prailed be that our moſt gracious God therefore. And now in ſpirit we have the experience of unſpeakable comfort by our reverend fatherhoods, for that in this ſo glorious ſort ye become a town ſet upon a hill, a candle upon a candleſtick, a ſpectacle unto the world, both to the angels and unto men. So that as we to our great comfort do feel, you alſo may aſſuredly with St. Paul, that the things which happen unto us, do chance unto the great furtherance of the goſpel; ſo that our bonds in Chriſt are manifeſt, not only throughout all the judgment-hall, but in all Europe; inſomuch that many of the brethren in the Lord, being encouraged through our bonds, dare more boldly ſpeak the word without fear. And herein as you have with St. Paul greatly to rejoice, ſo we rejoice with you, and we do indeed with you give thanks for this worthy excellent favour of our God towards you, that Chriſt is thus magnified in you, yea, and hereafter ſhall be magnified in your bodies, whether it be through life or death. Of which thing truly we are aſſured in our prayers for you, and miniſtering of the Spirit. And although for our own parts, Chriſt is unto you in life and death advantage, and that your deſire is (as indeed it were better for you) to be looſed, and to be with Chriſt, yet for the church of Chriſt were it much more neceſſary, that ye ſhould abide in the fleſh. Yea, that merciful God, even for his Chriſt's ſake, grant that ye may abide and continue for the furtherance of the church, and rejoicing of faith, that the rejoicing thereof may be the more abundant through Chriſt by your reſtoring, Amen, Amen.

But if it ſeem better otherwiſe unto the divine wiſdom, that by ſpeedy death he hath appointed you to glorify him, the Lord's will be done. Yea, even as we do rejoice both on your behalfs, and alſo on our own, that God is magnified by life, and ſhould be more abundantly glad for the continuance thereof; ſo we ſhall no leſs rejoice joice to have the ſame wrought by death. We ſhall give thanks for this honour given unto you, rejoicing that ye are counted worthy to ſuffer for the name of Chriſt, and that "it is given to you of God, not only that ye ſhould believe in him, but alſo that ye ſhould ſuffer for his ſake." And herein we ſhall have to rejoice in the behalf of the church of Chriſt, whoſe faith may be the faſter fixed upon God's verity, being confirmed with three ſuch worthy witneſſes. O thanks be to God for this his unſpeakable gift!

And now, moſt reverend fathers, that you may underſtand the truth of us, and our eſtate how we ſtand in the Lord, I do aſſure your reverences, partly by that I perceive by ſuch of your brethren as be here in bonds with me, partly by that I hear of them which be in other places, and partly by that inward experience which I, moſt unworthy, have of God's good comfort (more abundance whereof I know there is in others), you may be aſſured (I ſay) by God's grace, that you ſhall not be fruſtrate of your hope, of our conſtant continuance in the chearful confeſſion of God's everlaſting verity. For even as we have received the word of truth, even the goſpel of our ſalvation, wherein we believing are ſealed with the Holy Spirit of promiſe, which is the earneſt of our inheritance (which Spirit certifieth our ſpirit, that we are the children of God, and therefore God hath ſent the Spirit of his Son into our hearts, crying, Abba, Father); ſo after ſuch portion as God meaſureth unto us, we with the whole church of Chriſt, and with you, reverend fathers, receiving the ſame Spirit of faith, according as it is written, "I believed, and therefore I have ſpoken:" we alſo believe, and therefore ſpeak. For which we in this dangerous bondage and other afflictions, having even ſuch a fight as we have ſeen in you, and have heard of you, are in no wiſe afraid of our adverſaries.

And foraſmuch as we have ſuch an office, even as God hath had mercy on us, we go not out of kind, but even with you, after our little power, we labour to maintain the faith of the goſpel, knowing moſt certainly, that though "we have this treaſure in earthen veſſels, that the excellency of this power might be God's, and not ours;" yet ſhall we not be daſhed in pieces: for the Lord will put his hand under us. When "we are troubled on every ſide, yet are we not without ſhift: when we are in poverty, we are not utterly without ſome thing; when we ſuffer perſecution, we are not forſaken therein: when we are caſt down, yet we ſhall not periſh:" but to communicate with our ſweet Saviour Chriſt in bearing the croſs, it is appointed unto us, that even with him alſo we ſhall be glorified: for it is a true ſaying, "If we be dead with him, we ſhall alſo live with him; if we be patient, we ſhall alſo reign with him; if we deny him, he ſhall alſo deny us." Wherefore be we of good cheer, "Always bearing about in our body the dying of the Lord Jeſus, that the life of Jeſus might appear alſo in our body: for we know, that he which raiſed up the Lord Jeſus, ſhall raiſe up us alſo by the means of Jeſus, and ſhall join us to himſelf together with you. Wherefore we are not wearied; but though our outward man periſh, yet the inward man is renewed day by day. For our tribulation which is momentary and light, prepareth an exceeding and eternal weight of glory unto us, while we look not on the things which are ſeen, but on the things which are not ſeen: for the things which are ſeen are temporal; but the things which are not ſeen, are eternal."

We teſtify unto you, reverend fathers, that we draw theſe matters with joy out of the wells of the Saviour. And I truſt we ſhall continually with you bleſs the Lord, and give thanks unto the Lord out of the wells of Iſrael; we truſt to be merry together at that great ſupper of the Lamb, whoſe ſpouſe we are by faith, and there to ſing that ſong of everlaſting Hallelujah, Amen. Yea, come Lord Jeſus. The grace of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt be with you. Amen.

Mr. Saunders's Letter to his Wife.

GRACE and comfort in Chriſt Jeſus, our only comfort in all extreme aſſaults, Amen.

Fain would this fleſh make ſtrange of that which the ſpirit doth embrace: Oh! Lord, how loth is this loitering ſluggard to paſs forth in God's path? It phantaſieth forſooth much fear of fray-hugs: and were it not for the force of faith which pulleth it forward by the rein of God's moſt ſweet promiſe, and of hope which pricketh on behind, great adventures there were of fainting by the way. But bleſſed and everlaſtingly bleſſed be that heavenly Father of ours, who in his Chriſt, our ſufficient Saviour, hath vouchſafed to ſhine in our hearts, that he giveth us the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jeſus Chriſt: and having "this treaſure in our earthen veſſels, that the excellency of the power might be God's and not ours; we are (according to his good will) "troubled on every ſide, yet are we not without ſhift; we are in poverty, but yet not without that is ſufficient; we ſuffer perſecution, but are not forſaken therein; we are caſt down, nevertheleſs we periſh not; we bear in the body the dying of the Lord Jeſus, that the life of Jeſus might alſo appear in our body." Wherefore by the grace of our Chriſt we ſhall not be wearied, neither be diſmayed by this our probation through the fire of affliction, as though ſome ſtrange thing had happened unto us: but by his power we ſhall rejoice, inaſmuch as we are partakers of Chriſt's paſſion, that when he doth appear, we may be merry and glad, knowing that "our tribulation, which is momentary and light, prepareth an exceeding and eternal weight of glory unto us, while we look not on the things which are ſeen, but on the things which are not ſeen. They that ſow in tears, ſhall reap in joy. For he that goeth on his way weeping and ſcattering his good ſeed, ſhall doubtleſs come again with joy, and bring his whole ſheaves with him." Then, then ſhall the Lord wipe away all tears from our eyes. "Then, then ſhall be brought to paſs that ſaying which is written, Death is ſwallowed up in victory. Death, where is thy ſting? Hell, where is thy victory? yea, thanks be to God, which hath given us the victory through our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, Amen."

In the mean ſeaſon it remaineth for us to follow St. Peter's advice, "Let them (ſaith he) that are troubled, according to the will of God, commit their ſouls to him with well-doing, as a faithful creator and maker." He is our maker, we are his handy-work and creatures, whom now when he hath made, he doth not leave and forſake, as the ſhipwright doth the ſhip, leaving it at all adventures to be toſſed in the tempeſt, but he comforteth us his creatures, and in him we live, move, and have our being; yea, not only that, but now that he hath in his dear Chriſt repaired us, being before utterly decayed, and redeemed us, purging us unto himſelf as a peculiar people by the blood of his Son, he hath put on a moſt tender good will and fatherly affection towards us, never to forget us: unto whom by ſuch promiſes he hath plighted ſuch faith, that though it were poſſible that the mother could forget her infant, and not be tender-hearted to the child of her womb, yet may not it be, that his faithful believers ſhould be forgotten of him. He exhorteth us, to caſt our care on him, and ſaith, that aſſuredly he careth for us. And what though for a ſeaſon he doth ſuffer us to be turmoiled in the turbulent tempeſts of temptation, and ſeemeth as in much anger to have given us over, and forgotten us? let not us for all that leave off to put our truſt in him, but let us with godly Job conclude in ourſelves and ſay, "Even though he kill me, yet will I put my truſt in him." Let us with the bleſſed Abraham in hope, even contrary to hope, by belief lean unto that our loving Lord, who though for our probation he ſuffereth us to be afflicted, yet "will he not be always chiding, ding, neither keepeth he his anger for ever: for he knoweth whereof we be made; he remembereth that we are but duſt. Wherefore, look how high the heaven is in compariſon of the earth, ſo great is his mercy towards them which fear him. Look how wide the Eaſt is from the Weſt, ſo far hath he ſet our ſins from us. Yea, like as a father pitieth his own children, even ſo is the Lord merciful unto them that fear him." Oh! what great cauſe of rejoicing have we in our moſt gracious God? We cannot but burſt forth in the praiſing of ſuch a bountiful benefactor, and ſay with the ſame Pſalmiſt, "Praiſe the Lord, O my ſoul, and all that is within me praiſe his holy name. Praiſe the Lord, O my ſoul, and forget not all his benefits."

Dear wife, riches I have none to leave behind me, wherewith to endow you after the worldly manner: but that treaſure of taſting how ſweet Chriſt is unto hungry conſciences, (whereof I thank my Chriſt, I do feel part, and would feel more) that I bequeath unto you, and to the reſt of my beloved in Chriſt, to retain the ſame in ſenſe of heart always. Pray, pray. I am merry, and I truſt I ſhall be merry, in ſpite of all the devils in hell. I utterly refuſe myſelf, and reſign myſelf unto my Chriſt, in whom I know I ſhall be ſtrong, as he ſeeth needful. Pray, pray, pray.

Laurence Saunders.

As the ſaid Mr. Saunders was in priſon, a ſtrict charge was given to the keeper that no perſon ſhould ſpeak with him. His wife yet came to the priſon gate with her young child in her arms, to viſit her huſband. The keeper, though for his charge he durſt not ſuffer her to come into the priſon, yet did he take the little babe out of her arms, and brought him unto his father: Laurence Saunders ſeeing him, rejoiced greatly, ſaying, that he rejoiced more to have ſuch a boy, than he ſhould if two thouſand pounds were given him. And unto the ſtanders by, which praiſed the goodlineſs of the child, he ſaid, What man fearing God, would not loſe this life preſent, rather than by prolonging it here, he ſhould adjudge this boy to be a baſtard, his wife a whore, and himſelf a whoremonger? yea, if there were no other cauſe, for which a man of my eſtate ſhould loſe his life, yet who would not give it, to vouch this child to be legitimate, and his marriage to be lawful and holy?

I do, good reader, recite this ſaying, not only to let thee ſee what he thought of prieſts marriage, but chiefly to let all married couples and parents learn to bear in their boſom true affections; natural, but yet ſeaſoned with the true ſalt of the Spirit, unfeignedly and throughly mortified to do the natural works and offices of married couples and parents, ſo long as with their doing they may keep Chriſt with a free confeſſing faith in a clear conſcience: otherwiſe both they and their own lives are ſo to be forſaken, as Chriſt required them to be denied, and given in his cauſe.

And now to come to the examination of this good man. After that the biſhops had kept him one whole year and a quarter in priſon, at length they called him, as they did the reſt of his fellows, openly to be examined. The effect and purport of his firſt examination here followeth.

The Examination of Mr. Saunders.

PRaiſed be our gracious God who preſerveth his from evil, and doth give them grace to avoid all ſuch offences as might hinder his honour, or hurt his church. Amen.

Being convened before the queen's moſt honourable council, ſundry biſhops being preſent, the lord chancellor began to ſpeak in ſuch form as followeth:

L. Chan. It is not unknown that you have been a priſoner, for ſuch abominable hereſies and falſe doctrine as hath been ſown by you; and now it is thought good that mercy be ſhowed to ſuch as ſeek for it. Wherefore if now you will ſhew yourſelf conformable, and come home again, mercy is ready. We muſt ſay that we have fallen in manner all; but now we be riſen again, and returned to the catholic church; you muſt riſe with us, and come home unto it. Give us forthwith a direct anſwer.

Saund. My lord, and my lords all, may it pleaſe your honours to give me leave to anſwer with deliberation.

Chan. Leave off your painting and pride of ſpeech: for ſuch is the faſhion of you all, to pleaſe yourſelves in your glorious words. Anſwer yea, or nay.

Saund. My lord, it is no time for me now to paint. And as for pride, there is no great cauſe why it ſhould be in me: my learning I confeſs to be but ſmall: and as for riches or worldly wealth I have none at all. Notwithſtanding, it ſtandeth me in hand to anſwer to your demand circumſpectly, conſidering that one of theſe two extreme perils are like to fall upon me: the loſing of a good conſcience, or the loſing of this my body and life. And I tell you truth, I love both life and liberty, if I could enjoy them without the hurt of my conſcience.

Chan. Conſcience? you have none at all, but pride and arrogancy, dividing yourſelves by ſingularity from the church.

Saund. The Lord is the knower of all men's conſciences. And where your lordſhip layeth to my charge this dividing myſelf from the church (as you do mean, and is now among you concluded upon, and I do underſtand) I do aſſure you that I live in the faith wherein I have been brought up ſince I was fourteen years old: being taught that the power of the biſhop of Rome is but uſurped, with many other abuſes ſpringing thereof. Yea, this I have received even at your hands that are here preſent, as a thing agreed upon by the catholic church and public authority.

Chan. Yea marry, but I pray you, have you received by conſent and authority all your hereſies of the bleſſed ſacrament of the altar?

Saund. My lord, it is leſs offence to cut off an arm, hand, or joint of man, than to cut off the head. For the man may live though he do lack an arm, hand, or joint, and ſo he cannot without his head. But you, all the whole ſort of you, have agreed to cut off the ſupremacy of the biſhop of Rome, whom now you will have to be head of the church again.

Biſhop of London. And if it like your lordſhip, I have his hand againſt the bleſſed ſacrament. How ſay you to that?

Saund. What I have written, that I have written, and farther I will not accuſe myſelf. Nothing have you to burthened me withal, for breaking of your laws ſince they were in force.

Chan. Well, you be obſtinate, and refuſe liberty.

Saund. My lord, I may not buy liberty at ſuch a price: but I beſeech your honours to be means to the queen's majeſty for ſuch a pardon for us, that we may live and keep our conſciences unclogged, and we ſhall live as moſt obedient ſubjects. Otherwiſe, I muſt ſay for myſelf, that by God's grace I will abide the moſt extremity that man may do againſt me, rather than do againſt my conſcience.

Chan. Ah ſirrah, you will live as you liſt. The Donatiſts did deſire to live in ſingularity; but indeed they were not meet to live on earth: no more be you, and that ſhall you underſtand within theſe ſeven days; and therefore away with him.

Saund. Welcome be it, whatſoever the will of God ſhall be, either life or death. And I tell you truly, I have learned to die. But I exhort you to beware of ſhedding of innocent blood. Truly it will cry. The Spirit of God reſt upon all your honours, Amen. This is the ſum and form of my firſt examination, Pray, &c.

This examination being ended, the officers led him out of the place, and ſtaid until the reſt of his fellows were likewiſe examined, that they might have them altogether gether in priſon. Laurence Saunders ſtanding among the officers, ſeeing there a great multitude of people, opened his mouth and ſpake freely, warning them all of that which by their falling from Chriſt to Antichriſt they deſerved; and therefore exhorting them by repentance to riſe again, and to embrace Chriſt with ſtronger faith, to confeſs him to the end, in the defiance of Antichriſt, ſin, death, and the devil: ſo ſhould they retain the Lord's favour and bleſſing.

The copies of his other examination and excommunication came to the hands of ſuch as do keep them ſtill in ſecret. But in them, as he defended Chriſt's cauſe ſtoutly, ſo warned he the phariſaical biſhops and papiſts of their hypocriſy and tyranny freely, and cleared himſelf of their unjuſt quarrellings truly. After he was excommunicated and delivered to the ſecular power, he was brought by the ſheriff of London to the priſon called the Compter, in his own pariſh in Bread-ſtreet: whereat he rejoiced greatly, both becauſe he found there a fellow-priſoner, Mr. Cardmaker, with whom he had chriſtian and comfortable conference, and alſo becauſe out of priſon, as before out of a pulpit, he might preach to his pariſhioners; as by his letter hereafter ſhall be declared.

The fourth day of February, the biſhop of London came to the priſon where he was, to degrade him: which when he had done, Laurence Saunders ſaid to him, I thank God I am none of your church.

The day following in the morning, the ſheriff of London delivered him to ſome of the queen's guard, who were appointed to carry him to the city of Coventry, there to be burned. The firſt night they came to St. Alban's, where Mr. Grimoald (a man who had more ſtore of good gifts, than of great conſtancy) did ſpeak with him.

After Mr. Saunders had given him a leſſon meet for his lightneſs, he took a cup in his hand, and aſked him if he would pledge him of that cup, of which he would begin to him. Grimoald, by his ſhrugging and ſhrinking ſhewing what he was, ſaid, Of that cup which is in your hand I will pledge you: but of that other which you mean, I will not promiſe you. Well, ſaid Mr. Saunders, my dear Lord Jeſus Chriſt hath begun to me of a more bitter cup than mine ſhall be, and ſhall I not pledge my moſt ſweet Saviour? yes, I hope.

After they were come to Coventry, the ſame night a poor ſhoemaker, who was wont to ſerve him with ſhoes, came to him after this manner, and ſaid: O my good maſter, God ſtrengthen and comfort you. Gramercies, good ſhoemaker, quoth Mr. Saunders, and I pray thee to pray for me; for I am the unmeeteſt man for this high office, that ever was appointed to it; but my gracious God and dear Father is able to make me ſtrong enough. That ſame night he was put in the common gaol among other priſoners, where he ſlept little, but ſpent the night in prayer, and inſtructing of others.

The next day, which was the eighth of February, he was led to the place of execution in the Park without the city, going in an old gown and a ſhirt, barefooted, and oftentimes fell flat on the ground and prayed. When he was come nigh to the place, the officer appointed to ſee the execution done, ſaid to Mr. Saunders, that he was one of them which corrupted the queen's realm with falſe doctrine and hereſy, for which, ſaid he, thou haſt deſerved death; but yet if thou wilt revoke thine hereſies, the queen hath pardoned thee; if not, yonder fire is prepared for thee. To whom Mr. Saunders anſwered, It is not I, nor my fellow-preachers of God's truth, that have hurt the queen's realm; but it is yourſelf, and ſuch as you are, which have always reſiſted God's holy word; it is you which have and do corrupt the queen's realm. I do hold no hereſies, but the doctrine of God, the bleſſed goſpel of Chriſt; that hold I, that believe I, that have I taught, and that will I never revoke. With that this tormentor cried, Away with him. And away from him Mr. Saunders went with a merry courage towards the fire. He fell to the ground, and prayed; he roſe up again, and took the ſtake to which he ſhould be chained in his arms, and kiſſed it, ſaying: Welcome the croſs of Chriſt, welcome everlaſting life: and being faſtened to the ſtake, and fire put to him, full ſweetly he ſlept in the Lord.

And thus have you the full hiſtory of Laurence Saunders, whom I may well compare to St. Laurence, or any other of the old martyrs of Chriſt's church; both in his fervent zeal for the truth and goſpel of Chriſt, and the moſt conſtant patience in his ſuffering, as alſo for the cruel torments that he in his patient body did ſuſtain in the flames. For his cruel enemies ſo handled him, that they burned him with green wood, and other ſmothering rather than burning fuel, which put him to much more pain, but that the grace and moſt plentiful conſolation of Chriſt, who never forſaketh his ſervants, and gave ſtrength to St. Laurence, gave alſo patience to this Laurence, above all that his torments could work againſt: which well appeared by his quiet ſtanding, and ſweet ſleeping in the fire, as is above declared.

And to the intent to give the reader to underſtand the better, what the grace of Chriſt worketh in his ſervants; and again, how feeble and weak man is of himſelf without this grace given from above, though otherwiſe he ſeem never ſo ſtout, we have here therefore added to the aforeſaid ſtory of Mr. Saunders, the communication between him and Dr. Pendleton, by the example whereof, ſuch as ſtand may learn to take heed with due fear, and not to brag; to rely on the grace of God, and not to preſume in themſelves.

A Communication between Mr. Saunders and Dr. Pendleton, in the Beginning of Queen Mary's Reign.

AT the change of religion in this realm, in the beginning of Queen Mary's reign, Dr. Pendleton and Mr. Saunders, men known to the world, not only to be learned, but alſo earneſt preachers of God's word in the time of bleſſed king Edward, met together in the country, where by occaſion they were at that time, and as the caſe required (by reaſon of the perſecution that was then at hand) fell to debate what was beſt for them to do in ſo dangerous a ſeaſon. Whereunto Mr. Saunders, whether through very frailty of his weak fleſh, that was loth to taſte the bitter cup, though his ſpirit were ready thereunto; or whether it were upon the miſtruſt of his own ſtrength, that he might receive the greater power from above: or whether it were not for any one of the ſaid cauſes alone, but for both together, or ſuch like; ſeemed ſo fearful and feeble ſpirited, that he ſhewed himſelf in appearance, like either to fall quite from God and his word, which he had taught, or at leaſt to betake him to his heels, and to fly the land, rather than to ſtick to his profeſſion and abide by his tackle; ſo as Dr. Pendleton (who on the contrary ſide appeared not ſo big of body, but as bold in courage, nor ſo earneſt before in pulpit, but as ready now to ſeal the ſame with his blood) took upon him to comfort Mr. Saunders all that he might, admoniſhing him, as he could do it very well, not to forſake cowardly his flock when he had moſt need to defend them from the wolf; neither having put his hand to God's plough, to ſtart now aſide and give it over, nor yet (that is worſt of all) having once forſaken Antichriſt, to fall either himſelf, or ſuffer others by his example to return to their vomit again.

After which and ſuch like perſuaſions bidding him be of good comfort, and to take a good heart unto him; What, man, quoth he, there is a great deal more cauſe in me to be afraid than in you, foraſmuch as you ſee, I carry a greater maſs of fleſh upon my back than you do, and being ſo laden with a heavier lump of this vile carcaſe, ought therefore of nature to be more frail than you: and yet, ſaid he, I will ſee the utmoſt drop of this greaſe of mine molten away, and the laſt gobbet of this fleſh conſumed to aſhes, before I will forſake God and his truth. Whereunto the other anſwered but little, wiſhing that Almighty God would give him more ſtrength than he preſently felt in himſelf, acknowledging his own weakneſs; but conſented notwithſtanding, though it were ſomewhat faintly, to join with him in the profeſſion of the goſpel, and to go up to London, and ſet forth the ſame; whereupon they gave each other their hands.

Naw when they were come to London, Lord, what a great change was there between theſe two perſons! The poor, feeble, faint-hearted Saunders, by the goodneſs of Almighty God, taking heart of grace to him, ſeeking the ſame in humility, boldly and ſtoutly confirmed his flock out of the pulpit, where his charge lay, mightily beating down Antichriſt, and zealouſly preaching Chriſt his maſter, for which he afterward ſuffered moſt willingly, as is before declared. Whereas, on the other ſide, Dr. Pendleton the proud (who, as it appeared by the ſequel, had been more ſtout in words than conſtant in deeds, and a greater bragger than a good warrior) followed Peter ſo juſtly in cracks, howſoever he did in repentance (which God only knoweth) that he no ſooner came to London but he changed his mind, and played the apoſtate, preaching inſtead of ſound doctrine nothing almoſt but errors and lyes, advancing Antichriſt, and overthrowing Chriſt with all his main: ſo his former boldneſs came to nothing, unleſs it were a contrary key, becoming of a faithful paſtor, a falſe runnagate: and of a true preacher, a ſworn enemy to God's everlaſting teſtament; to the great offence of his brethren, the hurt of his flock, and the utter undoing, without God's greater mercy, of his own ſoul. Wherein are eſpecially to be conſidered the deep and marvellous judgment of God, who as he can and doth make ſtrong whom he pleaſeth, when he ſeeth his time, and moſt commonly ſuch as appear moſt feeble: ſo on the other hand, he throweth down others, ſeem they never ſo ſtout, ſtand they never ſo much in their own conceits. Wherefore let him that ſtandeth take heed he fall not, and let us pray continually to Almighty God, though we have faith, that he will help and increaſe our faith, that in him it may be made ſtrong, which of itſelf is ſo weak, that it is ſoon overthrown.

While this good man was confined in priſon, he did not paſs all his time in unfruitful idleneſs, but ſtill from time to time did viſit his friends (as is ſaid) and eſpecially his wife, with many letters full of godly inſtruction and conſolation. Some of which letters we thought not improper here to inſert.

Mr. Saunders's Letter to Mr. Ferrar, Biſhop of St. David's, &c.

GRace, mercy, and peace in Jeſus Chriſt our Lord, &c. Good fathers, and dear brethren, be thankful unto our moſt gracious God, which hath preſerved us, and ſhall (I doubt not) from blaſpheming his bleſſed name. yea, not only that, but alſo "out of the mouths of very babes and ſucklings ſhall be ſet forth his praiſe." They offer us (forſooth) our liberty and pardon, ſo that we will riſe with them into that faith which we with them were fallen from. Yea, or no, muſt be anſwered in haſte. They will not admit any needful circumſtances, but all (as heretofore) moſt deteſtable and abominable. Riſe with them we muſt into the unity. And pardon, I ſay, of me muſt not ſo dearly be purchaſed. A pardon I deſire, to live with an unclogged conſcience. The Donatiſts, ſay they, ſought for ſuch ſingularity, but they were not meet to live in a commonwealth, no more be you, as you ſhall ſhortly underſtand. Wherefore away with him; yea, the time was named within this ſeven-night. There be twelve hours in the day. Death ſhall be welcome, ſay I, as being looked for long ſince, and yet do juſtice ye were beſt, for Abel's blood cried, ye wot what. The Spirit of God be upon you, and God ſave your honours. Thus departed I from them. Pray, pray. Ah, ah, I am a child, I cannot ſpeak. My brother P. ſhall ſhew you more herein. By him ſend me word what you have done. Fare ye well, and pray, pray. I would gladly meet with my good brother Bradford on the backſide about eleven of the clock. Before that time I cannot ſtart out, we have ſuch out-walkers, but then will they be at dinner.

Yours as you know, Laurence Saunders.

Mr. Saunders's Letter to his wife, and others of his flock, after his condemnation, written the laſt of January, 1555. out of the Compter in Bread-ſtreet.

THE grace of Chriſt, with the conſolation of the Holy Ghoſt, to the keeping of the faith and a good conſcience, confirm and keep you for ever veſſels to God's glory, Amen.

Oh! what worthy thanks can be given to our gracious God for his unmeaſurable mercies plentifully poured upon us? And I moſt unworthy wretch cannot but pour forth at this preſent, even from the bottom of my heart, the bewailing of my great ingratitude and unkindneſs towards ſo gracious a good God and loving Father. I beſeech you all, as for my other many ſins, ſo eſpecially for that ſin of my unthankfulneſs; crave pardon for me in your earneſt prayers, commending me to God's great mercies in Chriſt.

To number theſe mercies in particular, were to number the drops of water which are in the ſea, the ſands on the ſhore, the ſtars in the ſky. O my dear wife, and ye the reſt of my friends, rejoice with me, I ſay rejoice with thankſgiving for this my preſent promotion, in that I am made worthy to magnify my God, not only in my life, by my ſlow mouth and uncircumciſed lips, bearing witneſs unto his truth, but alſo by my blood to ſeal the ſame, to the glory of my God, and confirming of his true church: and as yet I teſtify unto you, that the comfort of my ſweet Chriſt doth drive from my fantaſy the fear of death. But if my dear huſband Chriſt doth for my trial leave me alone a little to myſelf, alas, I know in what caſe I ſhall be then: but if for my proof he do ſo, yet I am ſure he will not be long or far from me. Though he ſtand behind the wall and hide himſelf (as Solomon ſaith in his myſtical ballad) yet will he peep in by a creſt to ſee how I do. He is a very tender-hearted Joſeph; though he ſpeak roughly to his brethren, and handle them hardly, yea, threaten grievous bondage to his beſt beloved brother Benjamin; yet can he not contain himſelf from weeping with us and upon us, with falling on our necks, and ſweetly kiſſing us. Such, ſuch a brother is our Chriſt unto all. Wherefore haſten to go unto him as Jacob did with his ſons and family, leaving their country and acquaintance. Yea, this our Joſeph hath obtained for us, that Pharaoh the infidel ſhall miniſter unto us chariots, wherein at eaſe we may be carried to come unto him: as we have experience how our adverſaries do help us unto our everlaſting bliſs by their ſpeedy diſpatch: yea, and how all things have been helpings hereunto; bleſſed be our God. Be not afraid of fray-bugs which lie in the way. Fear rather the everlaſting fire: fear the ſerpent which hath that deadly ſting, of which by bodily death they ſhall be brought to taſte which are not grafted in Chriſt, wanting faith and a good conſcience, and ſo are not acquainted with Chriſt the killer of death. But oh my dear wife and friends! we, we whom God hath delivered from the power of darkneſs, and hath tranſlated us into the kingdom of his dear Son, by putting off the old man, and by faith putting on the new, even our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, his wiſdom, holineſs, righteouſneſs and redemption; we, I ſay, have to triumph againſt the terrible ſpiteful ſerpent the devil, ſin, hell, death, and damnation. For Chriſt our brazen ſerpent hath pulled away the ſting of this ſerpent, ſo that now we may boldly, in beholding it ſpoiled of ſting, triumph, and with our Chriſt, and all his elect, ſay, "Death, where is thy ſting? Hell, where is thy victory? Thanks be to God, who hath given (us) the victory, through our Lord Jeſus Chriſt."

Wherefore be merry, my dear wife, and all my dear fellow heirs of the everlaſting kingdom, always remember the Lord. Rejoice in hope, be patient in tribulation, continue in prayer, and pray for us now appointed to the ſlaughter, that we may be unto our heavenly Father a fat offering, and an acceptable ſacrifice. I may hardly write to you. Wherefore let theſe few words be a witneſs of my commendations to you and all them which love us in the faith; and namely, unto my flock, among whom I am reſident by God's providence, but as a priſoner.

And although I am not ſo among them, as I have been to preach to them out of a pulpit, yet doth God now preach unto them by me, by this my impriſonment and captivity which now I ſuffer among them for Chriſt's goſpel ſake, bidding them beware of the Romiſh antichriſtian religion and kingdom, requiring and charging them to abide in the truth of Chriſt, which is ſhortly to be ſealed with the blood of their paſtor; who though he be unworthy of ſuch a miniſtry, yet Chriſt their high paſtor is to be regarded, whoſe truth hath been taught them by me, is witneſſed by my chains, and ſhall be by my death, through the power of that high paſtor. Be not careful, good wife, caſt your care upon the Lord, and commend me unto him in repentant prayer, as I do you and our Samuel; whom, even at the ſtake, I will offer as myſelf unto God. Fare ye well all in Chriſt, in hope to be joined with you in joy everlaſting. This hope is put in my boſom, Amen, Amen, Amen, pray, pray.

Another Letter to Mrs. Lucy Harrington, a godly Gentlewoman, and friendly to him in his Troubles.

YOUR moſt gentle commendations, whereof this meſſenger made remembrance unto me, was for two cauſes very comfortable: Firſt, for that thereby I underſtood of the ſtate of your health and bodily welfare, for which I give thanks unto God, who grant the long continuance thereof to his honour and fatherly good will, whereunto I will daily ſay, Amen. And further, I was refreſhed by the expreſſing of your mindful friendſhip towards me far unworthy thereof. Wherein I take occaſion of much rejoicing in our ſo gracious a God and merciful Father, who as he hath in his immeaſurable mercy by faith hand-faſted us his choſen children unto his dear Son our Chriſt, as the ſpiritual ſpouſe of ſuch an heavenly huſband; ſo he linketh us by love one unto another, being by that bond compact together with charitable readineſs to do good one to another: ſo that firſt to the glory of our God and his Chriſt, then to our own joying in the teſtimony of a good conſcience, and laſt of all to the ſtopping of the mouths and confuſion of our adverſaries, we bear the badge as the right ſpouſe of our Chriſt, which himſelf noted in this ſaying; "Herein ſhall all men know that ye be my diſciples, if ye love one another." Then further, by this bond of mutual love is ſet forth the fatherly providence of God towards us his children; that though it be he that careth for us, in whom we live, move, and be, who feedeth all fleſh with bodily ſuſtenance, yet hath he appointed us in theſe preſent neceſſities to ſtand in his ſtead one unto another. Wherein is not only ſet forth our dignity, but alſo that unſpeakable accord and unity among us, the many members of his myſtical body. And though that either for lack of ability, or elſe through diſtance of place, power and opportunity of helping one another do fail; yet wonderful is the working of God's children through the ſpirit of prayer, as whereby they fetch all heavenly influence from Chriſt their celeſtial head by his Spirit, to be meaſured ſeverally, as may ſerve to the maintenance of the whole body.

Thus doth our faithful prayer, which we make one for another, diſtribute and ſcatter God's bountiful bleſſings, both ghoſtly and bodily, when ordinary ability lacketh, and when the arm may not reach forth ſuch riches of God. According hereunto I well perceive and underſtand your readineſs to do good unto all, and eſpecially I have experience of your ready good will towards me, in your hearty deſire to ſtretch out your helping hand, to relieve my lack: and of your help to be extended to me in the other ſpiritual ſort, by your good prayer, I doubt not; as alſo therein aſſure you of my help, being all that I may do, and yet the ſame not ſo much as I would do.

My need concerning bodily neceſſaries is as yet furniſhed by God's proviſion, ſo that I am not driven to any extremity, wherefore to be burdenſome to you, as your gentle benevolence provoketh me, the Lord reward you therefore. If God make me worthy to be his witneſs at this preſent, in giving this corruptible body to burn for the teſtimony of his truth, it is enough for me to ſay to you, that I have a poor wife and child, whom I love in the Lord, and whom I know for my ſake you will tender when I am departed hence, &c.

Another Letter to Mrs. Lucy Harrington.

GRace and mercy, &c. It happeneth oftentimes that abundance of matter bringeth with it much vehemency of friendly affection, maketh men dumb; and even then chiefly when there is moſt eager purpoſe of ſpeaking, ſilence doth ſuppreſs, and cauſeth the party ſo affected imperfectly to expreſs that he goeth about to utter. Such impediment by much matter, mingled with fervency of affection, feel I ſometimes in myſelf, hindering the utterance, either by tongue or writing, of the abundance of the heart. The love of our moſt gracious God and heavenly Father, beſtowed upon us in the merits of Chriſt our Saviour, who may by conceit of mind comprehend, paſſing indeed all underſtanding? Much leſs may the ſame by any means be expreſly uttered. And as ſuch heavenly bleſſings, which by faith we fetch from above, be inexplicable, ſo is it hard to utter, when the faithful are ſet on fire by love, their readineſs to reach forth, and to give by charity, as by faith they have received. "But (alas!) we carry this treaſure in earthen veſſels." Many times faith is feeble, and then love loſeth her favour. Pray we therefore, Lord, increaſe our faith, and love forthwith will be on fire. And immortal thanks be given unto our God, who in our Chriſt hath beſtowed upon us the firſt fruits of his Spirit, who crieth in our hearts, Abba, Father. And, as St. Paul ſaith, "Seeing we have the ſame ſpirit of faith, according as it is written; I believed, and therefore have I ſpoken. we alſo believe, and therefore we ſpeak." Yea, God knoweth, this Spirit putteth us in a mind to ſpeak; but in attempting thereof we are driven with Moſes to ſay; "O Lord, I am ſlow mouthed and of uncircumciſed lips;" and with Jeremy, "O Lord, I cannot ſpeak."

Albeit that this infancy reſtraineth the opening of ſuch abundance of heart, in my tender chriſtian duty to be declared towards you, yet I beſeech you, let this be ſettled in your underſtanding; that as St. Paul expreſſeth unto his Corinthians, they were in his heart either to live or to die, with many other ſuch ſayings uttered unto them and the Galatians, expreſſing his vehement affection towards them: ſo in ſome part I would be like affected towards all God's children; and eſpecially towards you whom I know in Chriſt, and to whom I will not ſay how much I am indebted. I thank you for your great friendſhip and tender good will towards my wife: yea, that good gracious God recompenſe you, which may worthily with the more countervail the ſame, and fulfil that which lacketh of thankful duty in us. And becauſe of that which heretofore I have conceived of you, and of your more than natural love towards me and mine; I make myſelf thus bold to lay this burden upon you, even the care and charge of my ſaid poor wife; I mean to be unto her a mother and miſtreſs to rule and direct her by your diſcreet counſel. I know ſhe conceiveth of you the ſame that I do, and is thankful unto God with me for ſuch a friend; and therefore I beſeech you even for Chriſt's ſake, put never from you this friendly charge over her, whether I live longer, or ſhortly depart. But to charge you otherwiſe, thanks be to God, neither I, neither ſhe have any ſuch extreme need: if we had, I would be as bold with you as mine own mother. I beſeech you give my hearty ſalutation unto Mr. Fitz-Williams, and my good lady, with thanks alſo for my poor wife and child; the Lord recompenſe them.

L. Saunders.

Furthermore, as touching his fatherly care and affection to his wife and his little child, the ſame is lively ſet forth in another letter which he did write to his wife: wherein he admoniſhed her that ſhe would not reſort much to the priſon where he was, for fear of trouble that might enſue, the tenor of whoſe letter here followeth.

Another Letter to his Wife, with a certain Remembrance to Mr. Harrington, and Mr. Hurland.

GRace and comfort, &c. Wife, you ſhall do beſt not to come often unto the grate where the porter may ſee you. Put not yourſelf in danger where it needs not; you ſhall, I think, ſhortly come far enough into danger by keeping faith and a good conſcience: which, dear wife, I truſt you do not ſlack to make reckoning and account upon, by exerciſing your inward man in meditation of God's moſt holy word, being the ſuſtenance of the ſoul, and alſo by giving yourſelf to humble prayer, for theſe two things be the very means how to be made members of our Chriſt, meet to inherit his kingdom.

Do this, dear wife, in earneſt, and not leaving off, and ſo we two ſhall, with our Chriſt and all his choſen children, enjoy the merry world in that everlaſting immortality, whereas here will nothing elſe be found but extreme miſery, even of them which moſt greedily ſeek this worldly wealth: and ſo, if we two continue God's children grafted in our Chriſt, the ſame God's bleſſing which we receive ſhall alſo ſettle upon our Samuel. Though we do ſhortly depart hence and leave the poor infant (to our ſeeming) at all adventures, yet ſhall he have our gracious God to be his God: for ſo hath he ſaid, and he cannot lye; I will be thy God, ſaith he, and the God of thy ſeed. Yea, if you leave him in the wilderneſs deſtitute of all help, being called of God to do his will, either to die for the confeſſion of Chriſt, either any work of obedience: that God which heard the cry of the little poor infant of Agar, Sarah's handmaiden, and did ſuccour it, will do the like to your child, or any other fearing him, and putting your truſt in him.

And if we lack faith, as we do indeed many times, let us call for it, and we ſhall have the increaſe both of it and alſo of any other good grace needful for us; and be merry in God, in whom alſo I am very merry and joyful. O Lord, what great cauſe of rejoicing have we, to think upon that kingdom, which he vouchſafeth for his Chriſt's ſake freely to give us, forſaking ourſelves and following him? Dear wife, this is truly to follow him, even to take up our croſs and follow him; and then as we ſuffer with him, ſo ſhall we reign with him everlaſtingly, ſhortly, Amen.

Another Letter to his Wife, to Mr. Robert Harrington, &c.

GRace and comfort, &c. Dear wife, rejoice in our gracious God, and his and our Chriſt; and give thanks moſt humbly and heartily to him for this day's work, that in any part I moſt unworthy wretch ſhould be made worthy to bear witneſs unto his everlaſting verity, which Antichriſt with his main force, I perceive, and by moſt impudent pride and boaſting, will go about to ſuppreſs. Remember God alway, my dear wife, and ſo ſhall God's bleſſing light upon you and your Samuel. O remember always my words for Chriſt's ſake; be merry, and grudge not againſt God, and pray, pray. We be all merry here, thanks be unto our God, who in his Chriſt hath given us great cauſe to be merry, by whom he hath prepared for us ſuch a kingdom, and doth and will give unto us ſome little taſte thereof, even in this life, and to all ſuch as are deſirous to take it. "Bleſſed (ſaith our Chriſt) be they which hunger and thirſt after righteouſneſs, for ſuch ſhall be ſatisfied." Let us go, yea, let us run to ſeek ſuch treaſure, and that with whole purpoſe of heart to cleave unto the Lord, to find ſuch riches in his heavenly word through his Spirit, obtained by prayer. My dear friends and brethren, Mr. Harrington and Mr. Hurland, pray, pray. "The ſpirit is ready, but the fleſh is weak." When I look upon myſelf, being aſtoniſhed and confounded, what have I elſe to ſay but thoſe words of Peter, "Lord, go from me, for I am a ſinful man?" But then feel I that ſweet comfort, "The word of the Lord is a lanthorn unto my feet, and a light unto my path;" and this is my comfort in my trouble. Then wax I bold with the ſame Peter to ſay, "Lord, to whom ſhall we go? thou haſt the words of everlaſting life." This comfort have I when the giver thereof doth give it. But I look for battles, which the root of unfaithfulneſs, which I feel in me, will moſt eagerly give unto my conſcience, when we come once to the combat. We be (I think) within the ſound of the trump of our enemies. Play ye that be abroad the part of Moſes, "Praying in all places, lifting up pure hands;" and God's people ſhall prevail: yea, our blood ſhall be their perdition who do moſt triumphantly ſpill it, and we then being in the hands of our God, ſhall ſhine in his kingdom, and ſhall ſtand in great ſtedfaſtneſs againſt them which have dealt extremely with us: and when theſe our enemies ſhall thus ſee us, they ſhall be vexed with horrible fear, and ſhall wonder at the haſtineſs of the ſudden health; and ſhall ſay with themſelves, having inward ſorrow and mourning for very anguiſh of mind: "Theſe are they whom we ſometime had in deriſion and jeſted upon; we fools thought their lives to be very madneſs, and their end to be without honour, but lo how are they accounted among the children of God!" The bleſſing of God be with you all, &c.

Laurence Saunders.

To his Wife, a little before his burning.

GRace and comfort in Chriſt, Amen. Dear wife, be merry in the mercies of our Chriſt, and alſo ye my dear friends. Pray, pray for us every body. We be ſhortly to be diſpatched hence unto our good Chriſt, Amen, Amen. Wife, I would have you ſend me my ſhirt, which you know whereunto it is conſecrated. Let it be ſewed down on both ſides, and not open. O my heavenly Father, look upon me in the face of thy Chriſt, or elſe I ſhall not be able to abide thy countenance; ſuch is my filthineſs. He will do ſo, and therefore I will not be afraid what ſin, death, hell and damnation can do againſt me. O wife, always remember the Lord. God bleſs you, yea, he will bleſs thee, good wife, and thy poor boy alſo, only cleave thou unto him, and he will give thee all things. Pray, pray, pray.

Another Letter to Mr. Robert and John Glover, written the ſame Morning that he was burnt.

being loved of you alſo in the Lord, be merry and rejoice for me, now ready to go up to that mine inheritance, which I myſelf indeed am moſt unworthy of, but my dear Chriſt is worthy, who hath purchaſed the ſame for me with ſo dear a price. Make haſte, my dear brethren, to come unto me, that we may be merry, with that joy which no man ſhall take from us. O wretched ſinner, that I am not thankful unto this my Father, who hath vouchſafed me worthy to be a veſſel unto his honour. But, O Lord, now accept my thanks, though they proceed out of a not enough circumciſed heart. Salute my good ſiſters your wives; and good ſiſters fear the Lord. Salute all others that love us in the truth. God's bleſſing be with you always, Amen. Even now towards the offering of a burnt ſacrifice. O may Chriſt help, or elſe I periſh.

Laurence Saunders.

We will now conclude Mr. Saunders's ſtory with two other letters, not written by Mr. Saunders the martyr, but by Mr. Ed. Saunders the juſtice, his brother, ſent to this our Saunders in priſon, altho' containing no great matter worthy to be known, yet to this intent, that the reader may ſee in theſe two brethren ſo joined in nature, and ſo divided in religion, that word of the Lord verified, truly ſaying, "Brother ſhall be againſt brother, &c." as may appear by the contents of the two following letters.

A Letter of Juſtice Saunders to his Brother Laurence.

AFTER my moſt hearty commendations, theſe be to aſcertain you, that I have ſpoke with Mr. Baſſet, who hath ſhewed me, that four pounds (all deductions being allowed) is the whole that hath come to his hands of the profit of the prebendary at York, which you ſhall have, although, as he thinketh, it was not due unto you by reaſon of your deprivation before it was due. As concerning your conſcience in religion, I beſeech God it may be lightened by the Holy Ghoſt, and that you may alſo have the grace of the Holy Ghoſt to follow the counſel of St. Paul to Timothy, "To handle rightly the word of truth." Wherein you diſſenting from many holy and catholic men, eſpecially in the ſacrament, it maketh me in my conſcience to condemn yours. For although I have not hitherto fanſied to read Peter Martyr, and other ſuch, &c. yet have I had great deſire to ſee Theophylact, and ſeveral others of this ſort and opinion, both notable and holy fathers (if any credit be to be given to the writings of our ancient fathers before us) and ſurely the ſentences and judgments of two or three of them have more confirmed my conſcience, than three hundred of the Zuinglians, or as many of the Lutherans can or ſhould do. Thus in haſte willing to relieve you, to the end you might convert, if you ſhould need towards your finding, if you ſhall require it of me, you ſhall unfeignedly find my money ready, as knoweth our Lord, who ſends us all things good for us. Scribbled this Thurſday by your brother and petitioner to God,

Ed. Saunders.

Another Letter of Juſtice Saunders to his Brother, wherein he ſeeketh to win him to Popery.

AS nature and brotherly love with godly charity requireth, I ſend you by theſe letters (quantum licet) moſt hearty commendation, being ſorry for your fault and your diſobedient handling of yourſelf towards my lord chancellor, who, I aſſure you, mindeth your good and preſervation, if you can ſo conſider and take it. I would be glad to know whether you have not had with you of late ſome learned men to talk with you by my lord chancellor's appointment, and how you can frame yourſelf to reform your error in the opinion of the moſt bleſſed and our moſt comfortable ſacrament of the altar. Wherein I aſſure you, I was never in all my life better affected than I am at this preſent, uſing to my great comfort hearing of maſs, and ſomewhat before the ſacring time, the meditation of St. Bernard, ſet forth in the third leaf of this preſent book. The accuſtomable uſing whereof I am fully profeſſed unto, during my life, and to give more faith unto that confeſſion of holy Bernard, than to Luther, &c. or Latimer, &c. for that the antiquity, the univerſality of the open church, and the conſent of all ſaints and doctors do confirm the ſame, aſcertaining you, that I have been earneſtly moved in mine own conſcience theſe ten or twelve days paſt, and alſo between God and myſelf, to move you to the ſame, moſt earneſtly deſiring you, and as you tender my natural, godly, and friendly love towards you, that you would read over this book this holy time, at my requeſt, although you have already ſeen it, and let me know wherein you cannot ſatisfy your own conſcience. Thus fare you well for this time.

By yours, from Serjeant's-Inn,
Ed. Saunders.

The Life and Martyrdom of Mr. John Hooper, Biſhop of Worceſter and Glouceſter, who was burnt at Glouceſter, Febr. 9, 1555.

JOHN HOOPER, ſtudent and graduate in the univerſity of Oxford, after the ſtudy of the ſciences, wherein he had abundantly profited and proceeded, through God's ſecret vocation was ſtirred with fervent deſire to the love and knowledge of the ſcriptures. In the reading and ſearching whereof, as there lacked in him no diligence joined with earneſt prayer; ſo neither wanted unto him the grace of the Holy Ghoſt to ſatisfy his deſire, and to open unto him the light of true divinity.

Thus Mr. Hooper growing more and more, by God's grace, in ripeneſs of ſpiritual underſtanding, and ſhewing withal ſome ſparkles of his fervent ſpirit, being then about the beginning of the ſix articles, in the time of king Henry VIII. quickly fell into diſpleaſure and hatred of certain Rabbins in Oxford, who by and by began to ſtir coals againſt him, whereby, and eſpecially by the procurement of Dr. Smith, he was compelled to quit the univerſity; and removing from thence, was retained in the houſe of Sir Thomas Arundel, and there was his ſteward, till the time that Sir Thomas Arundel, having intelligence of his opinions and religion, which he in no caſe did favour, but yet exceedingly pleaſed with the perſon and conditions of the man, found means to ſend him in a meſſage to the biſhop of Wincheſter, writing his letter privily to the biſhop, by conference of learning to do ſome good upon him, but requiring him in any caſe to ſend home his ſervant to him again.

The biſhop of Wincheſter, after long conference with Mr. Hooper, four or five days together, when he at length perceived, that he neither could do that good which he thought to him, nor that he would take any good at his hand, according to Mr. Arundel's requeſt, he ſent home his ſervant again, right well commending his learning and wit, but yet bearing a grudge againſt Mr. Hooper.

It followed not long after this, as malice is always working miſchief, that intelligence was given to Mr. Hooper to provide for himſelf, for danger that was working againſt him. Whereupon Mr. Hooper leaving Mr. Arundel's houſe, and borrowing an horſe of a certain friend (whoſe life he had ſaved a little before from the gallows) took his journey to the ſea ſide to go to France, ſending back the horſe again by one, who indeed did not deliver him to the owner. Mr. Hooper being at Paris, did not tarry there long, but in ſhort time returned into England again, and was retained of Mr. Sentlow, till the time that he was again moleſted and ſought for: whereby he was compelled (under the pretence of being captain of a ſhip going to Ireland) to take the ſeas, and ſo he eſcaped (although not without extreme peril of drowning) through France to the higher parts of Germany. Where he, entering acquaintance with the learned men, was by them friendly and lovingly entertained, both at Baſil, and eſpecially at Zurich by Mr. Bullinger his ſingular friend. Where alſo he married his wife, who was a Burgonian, and applied very ſtudiouſly the Hebrew tongue.

At length, when God ſaw it good to ſtay the bloody time of the ſix articles, and to give us king Edward to reign over this realm with ſome peace and reſt unto the goſpel, amongſt many other Engliſh exiles which then repaired homeward, Mr. Hooper alſo, moved in conſcience, thought not to abſent himſelf, but ſeeing ſuch a time and occaſion, offered to help forward the Lord's work, to the uttermoſt of his ability. And ſo coming to Mr. Bullinger, and others of his acquaintance in Zurich, (as duty required) to give them thanks for their ſingular kindneſs and humanity towards him many ways declared, with like humanity again purpoſed to take his leave of them at his departing, and ſo he did. Upon whom Mr. Bullinger (who had always a ſpecial favour to Mr. Hooper) ſpake on this wiſe; Mr. Hooper, ſaith he, although we are ſorry to part with your company for our own cauſe, ye tmuch greater cauſe have we to rejoice, both for your ſake, and eſpecially for the cauſe of Chriſt's true religion, that you ſhall now return out of long baniſhment into your native country again, where not only you may enjoy your own private liberty, but alſo the cauſe and ſtate of Chriſt's church by you may fare the better, as we doubt not but it ſhall. Another cauſe moreover why we rejoice with you and for you, is this; that you ſhall remove not only out of exile into liberty, but you ſhall leave here a barren, a ſour, and an unpleaſant country, rude and ſavage, and ſhall go into a land flowing with milk and honey, repleniſhed with all pleaſure and fertility. Notwithſtanding with this our rejoicing one fear and care we have, leſt you being abſent, and ſo far diſtant from us, or elſe coming to ſuch abundance of wealth and felicity, in your new welfare and plenty of all things, and in your flouriſhing honours, where ye ſhall come peradventure to be a biſhop, and where ye ſhall find ſo many new friends, you will forget us your old acquaintance and well-willers. Nevertheleſs, howſoever you ſhall forget and ſhake us off, yet this perſuade yourſelf, that we will not forget our old friend and fellow Mr. Hooper. And if you will pleaſe not to forget us, then I pray you let us hear from you.

Whereunto Mr. Hooper anſwering again, firſt gave to Mr. Bullinger and the reſt hearty thanks, for that their ſingular good will and undeſerved affection, appearing not only now, but at all times towards him; declaring moreover, that as the principal cauſe of his removing to his country was the matter of religion; ſo touching the unpleaſantneſs and barrenneſs of that country of theirs, there was no cauſe therein why he could not find in his heart to continue his life there, as ſoon as in any place in the world, and rather than in his own native country, if there were nothing elſe in his own conſcience that moved him ſo to do. And as touching the forgetting of his old friends, although, ſaid he, the remembrance of a man's country naturally doth delight him, neither could he deny but God had bleſſed his country of England with many great commodities; yet neither the nature of country, nor pleaſure of commodities, nor newneſs of friends, ſhould ever induce him to the oblivion of ſuch friends and benefactors, whom he was ſo intirely bound unto: and therefore you ſhall be ſure, ſaid he, from time to time to hear from me, and I will write unto you how it goeth with me. But the laſt news of all I ſhall not be able to write; for there, ſaid he, (taking Mr. Bullinger by the hand), where I ſhall take moſt pains, there ſhall you hear of me to be burned to aſhes; and that ſhall be the laſt news, which I ſhall not be able to write unto you, but you ſhall hear of me, &c.

To this alſo may be added another like prophetical demonſtration, foreſhewing before the manner of his martyrdom wherewith he ſhould glorify God, which was this: when Mr. Hooper being made biſhop of Worceſter and Glouceſter, ſhould have his arms given him by the herald, as the manner is here in England, every biſhop to have his arms aſſigned unto him (whether by the appointment of Mr. Hooper, or by the herald, I have not certainly to ſay), but the arms which were to him allotted was this, A lamb in a fiery buſh, and the ſunbeams from heaven deſcended down upon the lamb, rightly denoting, as it ſeemed, the order of his ſufferings, which afterward followed.

But to proceed in our ſtory. When Mr. Hooper had taken his farewel of Mr. Bullinger and his friends in Zurich, he made his repair again into England in the reign of king Edward VI. where coming to London he uſed continually to preach, moſt times twice, at leaſt once every day, and never failed.

In his ſermons, according to his accuſtomed manner, he corrected ſin, and ſharply inveighed againſt the iniquity of the world, and corrupt abuſes of the church; the people in great flocks and companies daily came to hear his voice, as the moſt melodious ſound and tune of Orpheus's harp, as the proverb ſaith; inſomuch that oftentimes when he was preaching, the church would be ſo full, that none could enter further than the doors thereof. In his doctrine he was earneſt, in tongue eloquent, in the ſcriptures perfect, in pains indefatigable.

Moreover, beſides his other gifts and qualities, this is in him to be marvelled, that even as he began, ſo he continued ſtill unto his life's end. For neither could his labour and pains-taking break him, neither promotion change him, neither dainty fare corrupt him. His life was ſo pure and good, that no kind of ſlander (although ſome went about to reprove it) could faſten any fault upon him. He was of body ſtrong, his health whole and ſound, his wit very pregnant, his invincible patience able to ſuſtain whatſoever ſiniſter fortune and adverſity could do. He was conſtant of judgment, a good juſtice, ſpare of diet, ſparer of words, and ſpareſt of time. In houſe-keeping very liberal, and ſometime more free than his living would extend unto. Briefly, of all thoſe virtues and qualities required of St. Paul in a good biſhop, in his epiſtle to Timothy, I know not one in this good biſhop lacking. He bare in countenance and talk always a certain reſerve and grave grace, which might peradventure be wiſhed ſome time to have been a little more popular and vulgar-like in him: but he knew what he had to do beſt himſelf.

This by the way I thought to note, for that there was once an honeſt citizen, and to me not unknown, which having in himſelf a certain conflict of conſcience, came to his door for counſel, but being abaſhed at his auſtere behaviour, durſt not come in, but departed, ſeeking remedy for his troubled mind at other mens hands, which he afterward, by the help of Almighty God, did find and obtain. Therefore, in my judgment, ſuch as are appointed and made governors over the flock of Chriſt, to teach and inſtruct them, ought ſo to frame their life, manners, countenance, and external behaviour, as neither they ſhew themſelves too familiar and light, whereby to be brought into contempt; nor on the other ſide again, that they appear not more lofty and rigorous, than appertaineth to the edifying of the ſimple flock of Chriſt. Nevertheleſs, as every man hath his peculiar gift wrought in him by nature, ſo this diſpoſition of fatherly gravity in this man neither was exceſſive, neither did he bear that perſonage that was in him, without great conſideration. For it ſeemed to him peradventure, that this licentious and unbridled life of the common ſort ought to be chaſtened, tened, not only with words and diſcipline, but alſo with the grave and ſevere countenance of good men.

After he had thus practiſed himſelf in this popular and common kind of preaching; at length, and that not without the great profit of many, he was called to preach before the king's majeſty, and ſoon after made biſhop of Glouceſter by the king's commandment. In that office he continued two years, and behaved himſelf ſo well, that his very enemies (except it were for his good doings, and ſharp correcting of ſin) could find no fault with him, and after that he was made biſhop of Worceſter.

But I cannot tell what ſiniſter and unlucky contention concerning the ordering and conſecration of biſhops, and of their apparel, with ſuch other like trifles, began to diſturb the good and lucky beginning of this good biſhop. For notwithſtanding that godly reformation of religion that began in the church of England, beſides other ceremonies more ambitious than profitable, or tending to edification, they uſed to wear ſuch garments and apparel as the popiſh biſhops were wont to do: firſt a chymere, and under that a white rochet, then a mathematical cap with four angles, dividing the whole world into four parts. Theſe trifles, tending more to ſuperſtition than otherwiſe, as he could never abide, ſo in no wiſe could he be perſuaded to wear them. For this cauſe he made ſupplication to the king's majeſty, moſt humbly deſiring his highneſs, either to diſcharge him of the biſhoprick, or elſe to diſpenſe with him for ſuch ceremonial orders. Whoſe petition the king granted immediately, writing his letter to the archbiſhop after this tenor.

The King's Letter to the Archbiſhop of Canterbury and other Biſhops.

RIGHT reverend father, and right truſty and well-beloved, we greet you well. Whereas we, by the advice of our council, have called and choſen our right well-beloved and well worthy, Mr. John Hooper, profeſſor of divinity, to be our biſhop of Glouceſter, as well for his great knowledge, deep judgment, and long ſtudy both in the ſcriptures, and prophane learning, as alſo for his good diſcretion, ready utterance, and honeſt life for that kind of vocation; to the intent all our loving ſubjects, which are in his ſaid charge, and elſewhere, might by his ſound and true doctrine learn the better their duty towards God, their obedience towards us, and love towards their neighbours: from conſecrating of whom we underſtand you do ſtay, becauſe he would have you omit and let paſs certain rites and ceremonies offenſive to his conſcience, whereby ye think ye ſhould fall in premunire of laws; we have thought good, by the advice aforeſaid, to diſpenſe and diſcharge you of all manner of dangers, penalties and forfeitures you ſhall run and be in any manner of way, by omitting any of the ſame. And theſe our letters ſhall be your ſufficient warrant and diſcharge therefore.

Given under our ſignet at our Caſtle of Windſor, the 5th of Auguſt, the 4th year of our reign.

Beſides this letter of the king's, the earl of Warwick alſo (who was afterward duke of Northumberland) adjoined his letter to the aforeſaid archbiſhop of Canterbury, to this purpoſe and effect, that Mr. Hooper might not be burdened with the oath uſed then commonly in the conſecration of biſhops, which was againſt his conſcience, as by the purport of the letter here is to be ſeen, as followeth.

AFTER my moſt hearty commendations to your grace, theſe may be to deſire the ſame, that in ſuch reaſonable things, wherein this bearer, my lord elect of Glouceſter, craveth to be borne withal at your hands, you would vouchſafe to ſhew him your grace's favour, the rather at this my inſtance: which thing partly, I have taken in hand by the king's majeſty's own motion. The matter is weighed by his highneſs, none other but that your grace may eaſily condeſcend unto. The principal cauſe is, that you would not charge this ſaid bearer with an oath burdenous to his conſcience. And ſo for lack of time I commit your grace to the tuition of Almighty God. From Weſtminſter, July 23. 1550. Your grace's moſt aſſured loving friend,

J. Warwick.

But notwithſtanding this grant of the king, and alſo the earl's letter aforeſaid, the biſhops ſtill ſtood earneſtly in the defence of the aforeſaid ceremonies, ſaying, It was but a ſmall matter, and that the fault was in the abuſe of the things, and not in the things themſelves; adding moreover, that he ought not to be ſo ſtubborn in ſo light a matter, and that his wilfulneſs therein was not to be ſuffered.

To be ſhort, whilſt both parties thus contended about this matter more than reaſon would, in the mean time occaſion was given, as to the true chriſtians to lament, ſo to the adverſaries to rejoice. In concluſion, this theological contention came to this end, that the biſhops having the upper hand, Mr. Hooper was fain to agree to this condition, that ſometimes he ſhould in his ſermon ſhew himſelf apparelled as the other biſhops were. Wherefore, appointed to preach before the king, as a new player in a ſtrange apparel, he cometh forth on the ſtage. His upper garment was a long ſcarlet chymere down to the foot, and under that a white linen rochet that covered all his ſhoulders. Upon his head he had a geometrical, that is, a four-ſquared cap, albeit that his head was round. What cauſe of ſhame the ſtrangeneſs hereof was that day to that good preacher, every man may eaſily judge. But this private contumely and reproach, in reſpect of the public profit of the church, which he only ſought, he bare and ſuffered patiently. And I would to God in like manner, they which took upon them the other part of that tragedy, had yielded their private cauſe, whatſoever it was, to the public concord and edifying of the church, for no man in all the city was one hair the better for that hot contention.

I will name no body, partly for that his oppoſers being afterwards joined in the moſt ſtrict bond of friendſhip with him, in one and for one cauſe ſuffered martyrdom; and partly for that I commonly uſe, according to my accuſtomed manner, to keep my pen from preſumptuous judging of any perſon, yet I thought to note the thing for this conſideration, to admoniſh the reader hereby, how wholeſome and neceſſary the croſs of Chriſt is ſometimes in the church of Chriſt, as by the ſequel hereof did afterward appear. For as in a civil government and commonwealth, nothing is more occaſion of war than overmuch peace; ſo in the church and among churchmen, as nothing is more pernicious than too much quietneſs, ſo nothing cauſeth private contentions often riſing amongſt them ſooner to ceaſe, than the public croſs of perſecution.

Furthermore, I perſuaded myſelf that it was very expedient to have the examples of theſe good men remain on record: for as it does greatly add to our public conſolation and comfort when we read in the ſcriptures of the great diſſention between Paul and Barnabas, of the fall of Peter, and of David's murder and adultery; ſo likewiſe it may be no leſs profitable to our poſterity, to hear and know the falls of theſe godly martyrs, whereby we may the leſs deſpair in our infirmities, conſidering the ſame or greater have happened to the holy ſaints of God, both prophets, apoſtles and martyrs.

And thus by the way thou haſt heard, good reader, the frailties of theſe good men (plainly and ſimply as the truth was) declared unto thee, to the end their fall may miniſter occaſion to us either of avoiding the like, or elſe to take heart and comfort in the frailties incident to us. Now again, on the other hand, it remaineth to record, after the aforeſaid diſpute, the godly reconciliations of theſe good men in time of perſecution, who afterwards were firmly reconciled when impriſoned for the truth's ſake, as appears by the following letter ſent by biſhop Ridley to the ſaid biſhop of Glouceſter. The copy whereof, as it was written with his own hand in Latin, here followeth tranſlated into Engliſh.

To my dear Brother and reverend fellow Elder in Chriſt, John Hooper, Grace and Peace.

MY dearly beloved brother and fellow-elder, whom I reverence in the Lord, pardon me, I beſeech you, that hitherto ſince your captivity and mine, I have not ſaluted you by my letters: whereas I do indeed confeſs, I have received from you (ſuch was your gentleneſs) two letters at ſundry times: but yet at ſuch time as I could not be ſuffered to write to you again; or if I might, yet was I in doubt how my letters might ſafely come into your hands. But now, my dear brother, foraſmuch as I underſtand by your works, which I have but ſuperficially ſeen, that we throughly agree and wholly conſent together in thoſe things which are the grounds and ſubſtantial points of our religion, againſt which the world ſo furiouſly rageth in theſe our days, howſoever in time paſt by certain by-matters and circumſtances of religion, your wiſdom and my ſimplicity (I grant) hath a little jarred, each of us following the abundance of his own ſenſe and judgment: now, I ſay, be you aſſured, that even with my whole heart, God is my witneſs, in the bowels of Chriſt, I love you in the truth and for the truth's ſake, which abideth in us, and, as I am perſuaded, ſhall, by the grace of God, abide in us for evermore.

And becauſe the world, as I perceive, brother, ceaſeth not to play his pageant, and buſily conſpireth againſt Chriſt our Saviour, with all poſſible force and power, exalting high things againſt the knowledge of God; let us join hands together in Chriſt, and if we cannot overthrow, yet to our power, and as much as in us lieth, let us ſhake thoſe high altitudes, not with carnal, but with ſpiritual weapons: and withal, brother, let us prepare ourſelves to the day of our diſſolution, by the which, after the ſhort time of this bodily affliction, by the grace of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, we ſhall triumph together with him in eternal glory.

I pray you, brother, ſalute in my name your reverend fellow priſoners, and venerable father D. C. by whom, ſince the firſt day that I heard of his moſt godly and fatherly conſtancy, in confeſſing the truth of the goſpel, I have conceived great conſolation and joy in the Lord. For the integrity and uprightneſs of that man, his gravity and innocency, all England, I think, hath known long ago. Bleſſed be God therefore, which in ſuch abundance of iniquity and decay of all godlineſs, hath given unto us, in this reverend old age, ſuch a witneſs for the truth of his goſpel. Miſerable and hard-hearted is he, whom the godlineſs and conſtant confeſſion of ſo worthy, ſo grave and innocent a man, will not move to acknowledge and confeſs the truth of God.

I do not now, brother, require you to write any thing to me again: for I ſtand much in fear, leſt your letters ſhould be intercepted before they can come to my hands. Nevertheleſs know you, that it ſhall be to me great joy to hear of your conſtancy and fortitude in the Lord's quarrel. And albeit I have not hitherto written unto you, yet have I twice, as I could, ſent you my mind touching the matter which in your letters you required to know. Neither can I yet, brother, be otherwiſe perſuaded: I ſee methinks ſo many perils, whereby I am earneſtly moved to counſel you not to haſten the publiſhing of your works, eſpecially under the title of your own name. For I fear greatly, leſt by this occaſion both your mouth ſhould be ſtopped hereafter, and all things taken away from the reſt of the priſoners, whereby otherwiſe, if it ſo pleaſe God, they may be able to do good to many. Farewel in the Lord, my moſt dear brother; and if there be any more in priſon with you for Chriſt's ſake, I beſeech you, as you may, ſalute them in my name. To whoſe prayers I do moſt humbly and heartily commend myſelf and my fellow priſoners and concaptives in the Lord, and yet once again, and for ever in Chriſt, my moſt dear brother, farewel.

N. Ridley.

Mr. Hooper, after he had ſuſtained all theſe troubles and vexations about his inveſting and princely veſtures, at length entered into his dioceſe, did employ his time under king Edward's reign with ſuch diligence, as may be a ſpectacle to all biſhops who ſhall ever hereafter ſucceed him, not only in that place, but in whatſoever dioceſe through the whole realm of England: ſo careful was he in his cure, that he left no pains untaken, nor ways unſought, how to train up the flock of Chriſt in the true word of ſalvation, continually labouring in the ſame. Other men commonly are wont, for lucre or promotion's ſake, to aſpire to biſhopricks, ſome hunting for them, and ſome purchaſing or buying them, as men uſe to purchaſe lordſhips; and when they have them are loth to leave them, and thereupon alſo loth to commit that thing by worldly laws, whereby to loſe them.

But Mr. Hooper was of a contrary mind, who abhorred nothing more than gain, labouring always to ſave and preſerve the ſouls of his flock. Who, being biſhop of two dioceſes, ſo ruled and guided either of them, and both together, as though he had in charge but one family. No father in his houſhold, no gardener in his garden, nor huſbandman in his vineyard, was more or better occupied, than he in his dioceſe amongſt his flock, going about his towns and villages in teaching and preaching to the people there.

The time that he had to ſpare from preaching, he beſtowed either in hearing public cauſes, or elſe in private ſtudy, prayer, and viſiting of ſchools: with his continual doctrine he adjoined due and diſcreet correction, not ſo much ſevere to any, as to them which for abundance of riches and wealthy ſtate thought they might do what they pleaſed. And doubtleſs he ſpared no kind of people, but was indifferent to all, as well rich as poor, to the great ſhame of many men now-a-days; whereof we ſee many ſo addicted to the pleaſing of great and rich men, that in the mean time they have no regard to the meaner ſort, whom Chriſt hath bought as dearly as the other.

But now again we will return to Mr. Hooper, all whoſe life, in fine, was ſuch, that to the church and all churchmen it might be a light and example, and to the reſt a perpetual leſſon and ſermon. Finally, how virtuous and good a biſhop he was, ye may conceive and know evidently by this, that even as he was hated by none but of them which were evil, yet the worſt of them all could not reprove his life in any one jot.

I have now declared his uſage and behaviour abroad in the public affairs of the church; and certainly there appeared in him at home no leſs example of a worthy prelate's life. For though he beſtowed and converted the moſt part of his care upon the public flock and congregation of Chriſt, for which alſo he ſpent his blood: yet nevertheleſs there was nothing wanting in him, to bring up his own children in learning and good manners; inſomuch that ye could not diſcern whether he deſerved more praiſe for his fatherly uſage at home, or for his biſhop-like doing abroad. For every where he kept one religion in one uniform doctrine and integrity. So that if you entered into the biſhop's palace, you would ſuppoſe yourſelf to have entered into ſome church or temple. In every corner thereof there was ſome ſmell of virtue, good example, example, honeſt converſation, and reading of the holy ſcriptures. There was not to be ſeen in his houſe any courtly rioting or idleneſs; no pomp at all, no diſhoneſt word, no ſwearing could there be heard.

As for the revenues of both his biſhopricks, although they did not greatly exceed, as the matter was handled, yet if any thing ſurmounted thereof, he ſaved nothing, but beſtowed it in hoſpitality. Twice I was, as I remember, in his houſe in Worceſter, where, in his common hall, I ſaw a table ſpread with good ſtore of meat, and beſet full of beggars and poor people: and I aſking his ſervants what this meant, they told me, that every day their lord and maſter's manner was, to have at dinner a certain number of poor folks of the ſaid city by courſe, who were ſerved by four at a meſs, with wholeſome meats: and when they were ſerved (being before examined by him or his deputies, of the Lord's prayer, the articles of their faith, and ten commandments), then he himſelf ſate down to dinner, and not before.

After this manner Mr. Hooper executed the office of a moſt careful and vigilant paſtor, for the ſpace of two years and more, ſo long as the ſtate of religion in king Edward's time did ſafely flouriſh and take place: and would God that all other biſhops would uſe the like diligence, care, and obſervance in their function. After this, king Edward being dead, and Mary being crowned queen of England, religion being ſubverted and changed, this good biſhop was one of the firſt that was ſent for by a purſuivant to be at London; and that for two cauſes.

Firſt, To anſwer to Dr. Heath, then appointed biſhop of that dioceſe, who was deprived thereof in king Edward's days for being a papiſt.

Secondly, To render an account to Dr. Bonner biſhop of London, for that he in king Edward's time was one of his accuſers, in that he ſhewed himſelf not conformable to ſuch ordinances as were preſcribed to him by the king and his council, openly at Paul's croſs. And although the ſaid Mr. Hooper was not ignorant of the evils that ſhould happen towards him (for he was admoniſhed by certain of his friends to get him away, and ſhift for himſelf), yet he would not prevent them, but tarried ſtill, ſaying: Once I did flee, and take me to my feet; but now, becauſe I am called to this place and vocation, I am thoroughly perſuaded to tarry, and to live and die with my ſheep.

And when at the day of his appearance, which was the firſt of September, he was come to London, before he could come to the aforeſaid Dr. Heath and Dr. Bonner, he was intercepted, and commanded violently againſt his will to appear before the queen and her council, to anſwer to certain bonds and obligations, wherein they ſaid he was bound unto her. And when he came before them, the biſhop of Wincheſter received him very opprobrioufly, railing and rating of him, and accuſed him of his religion. He again freely and boldly told his tale, and cleared himſelf. But in fine it came to this concluſion, that by them he was commanded to ward (it being declared unto him at his departure, that the cauſe of his impriſonment was only for certain ſums of money, for which he was indebted to the queen, and not for religion). This, how falſe and untrue it was, ſhall in its place more plainly appear.

The next year, being 1554. March 19. he was called again to appear before Wincheſter, and others of the queen's commiſſioners: where, what for the biſhop, and what for the unruly multitude, when he could not be permitted to plead his cauſe, he was deprived of his biſhopricks. Which how, and in what order it was done, here now followeth to be ſeen by the teſtimony and report of one, who, being preſent at the doing, committed the ſame to writing.

A Letter or Report of a certain good Man, declaring the Order of Mr. Hooper's Deprivation from his Biſhopricks. March 19. 1554.

FOraſmuch as a rumour is ſpread abroad of the talk had at my lord chancellor's, between him with other commiſſioners there appointed, and Mr. Hooper, quite contrary to the verity and truth thereof indeed, and therefore to be judged rather to be riſen of malice, for the diſcrediting of the truth by falſe ſuggeſtions and evil reports, than otherwiſe: I thought it my duty, being preſent thereat myſelf, in writing to ſet forth the whole effect of the ſame; partly that the verity thereof may be known to the doubtful people; and partly alſo to advertiſe them, how uncharitably Mr. Hooper was handled at their hands, who with all humility uſed himſelf towards them, deſiring, that with patience he might have been permitted to ſpeak; aſſuring all men, that where I ſtood in a mammering and doubt, which of theſe two religions to have credited, either that ſet forth by the king's majeſty that is dead, or elſe that now maintained by the queen's majeſty; their unreverend behaviour towards Mr. Hooper doth move me the rather to credit his doctrine, than that which they with railing and cruel words defended, conſidering that Chriſt was ſo handled before. And that this which I have written here, was the effect of their talk, as I acknowledge it to be true myſelf: ſo I appeal to all the hearers conſciences that were then preſent (ſo they put affection away) for the witneſs of the ſame.

The Biſhops of Wincheſter, of London, of Durham, of Landaff, of Chicheſter, ſate as Commiſſioners.

AT Mr. Hooper's coming in, the lord chancellor aſked, whether he was married.

Hooper. Yea, my lord, and will not be unmarried, till death unmarry me.

Durham. That is matter enough to deprive you.

Hooper. That it is not, my lord, except ye do againſt the law.

The matter concerning marriage was no more talked of then for a great ſpace: but as well the commiſſioners, as ſuch as ſtood by, began to make ſuch outcries, and laughed, and uſed ſuch geſture as was unſeemly for the place, and for ſuch a matter. Dr. Day biſhop of Chicheſter called Mr. Hooper hypocrite, with vehement words, and ſcornful countenance. Biſhop Tonſtal called him beaſt; ſo did Smith, one of the clerks of the council, and ſeveral others that ſtood by. At length the biſhop of Wincheſter ſaid, that all men might live chaſte that would, and brought in this text, "There be that have gelded themſelves for the kingdom of heaven." Matt. 19. 12.

Mr. Hooper ſaid, that text proved not that all men could live chaſte, but ſuch to whom it was given; and read that which goeth before in the text. But there was a clamour and cry, mocking and ſcorning, with calling him beaſt, that the text could not be examined. Then Mr. Hooper ſaid, that it did not appear by the old canons, that marriage was forbidden unto prieſts, and named the decrees. But the biſhop of Wincheſter ſent for another part, namely the Clementines, or the Extravagants. But Biſhop Hooper ſaid, that book was not it which he named.

Then the biſhop of Wincheſter ſaid, You ſhall not have any other, until ye be judged by this. And then began ſuch a noiſe, tumult, and ſpeaking together of a great many that favoured not the cauſe, that nothing was done or ſpoke orderly or charitably. Afterwards judge Morgan began to rail at Mr. Hooper a long time, with many opprobrious and foul words, of his doing at Glouceſter, in puniſhing of men, and ſaid, there was never ſuch a tyrant as he was. After that Dr. Day biſhop of Chicheſter ſaid, that the council of Ancyra, which was before the council of Nice, was againſt the marriage of prieſts.

Then the lord chancellor cried out, and many with him, that Mr. Hooper had never read the councils.

Yea, my lord, quoth Mr. Hooper, and my lord of Chicheſter, Dr. Day knoweth that the great council of Nice, by the means of one Paphnutius, decreed, That no miniſter ſhould be ſeparated from his wife. But ſuch clamours and cries were uſed, that the council of Nice was not ſeen.

After this long brutiſh talk, Tonſtal biſhop of Durham aſked Mr. Hooper, whether he believed the corporal preſence in the ſacrament. And Mr. Hooper ſaid plainly, that there was none ſuch, neither did he believe any ſuch thing.

Then the biſhop of Durham would have read out of a book, for his purpoſe belike (what book it was I cannot tell), but there was ſuch a noiſe and confuſed talk on every ſide, that he did not read it. Then the biſhop of Wincheſter aſked Mr. Hooper, What authority moved him not to believe the corporal preſence? He ſaid, the authority of God's word, and alledged this text, "Whom heaven muſt hold until the latter day."

Then the biſhop of Wincheſter would have made that text to ſerve nothing for his purpoſe, and ſaid, he might be in heaven, and in the ſacrament alſo.

Mr. Hooper would have ſaid more to have opened the text, but all thoſe that ſtood next about the biſhop, allowed his ſaying with clamour and cries, that Mr. Hooper was not permitted to ſay any more againſt the biſhop. Whereupon they bade the notaries write, That he was married, and ſaid that he would not go from his wife; and that he believed not the corporal preſence in the ſacrament; wherefore he was worthy to be deprived of his biſhoprick.

This is the truth of the matter (as far as I can truly remember) of the confuſed and troubleſome talk that was between them, and except it were haſty and uncharitable words, this is the whole of their diſcourſe at that time.

The true Report of Mr. Hooper's Entertainment in the Fleet, written with his own Hand, Jan. 7. 1554.

THE firſt of September 1553, I was committed unto the Fleet from Richmond, to have the liberty of the priſon; and within ſix days after I paid five pounds ſterling to the warden for fees, for my liberty; who immediately upon payment thereof, complained unto Stephen Gardiner biſhop of Wincheſter, and ſo I was committed to cloſe priſon one quarter of a year in the Tower-chamber of the Fleet, and uſed very extremely. Then by the means of a good gentlewoman, I had liberty to come down to dinner and ſupper, not ſuffered to ſpeak with any of my friends; but as ſoon as dinner and ſupper was done, to repair to my chamber again. Notwithſtanding whilſt I came down thus to dinner and ſupper, the warden and his wife picked quarrels with me, and complained untruly of me to their great friend the biſhop of Wincheſter.

After one quarter of a year and ſomewhat more, Babington the warden, and his wife, fell out with me for the wicked maſs: and thereupon the warden reſorted to the biſhop of Wincheſter, and obtained to put me into the wards, where I have continued a long time, having nothing appointed to me for my bed, but a little pad of ſtraw and a rotten covering, with a tick and a few feathers therein, the chamber being vile and ſtinking, until by God's means good people ſent me bedding to lie on. On one ſide of which priſon is the ſink and filth of the houſe, and on the other the town ditch, ſo that the ſtench of the houſe hath infected me with ſundry diſeaſes. During which time I have been ſick, and the doors, bars, haſps, and chains being all cloſed, and made faſt upon me, I have mourned, called and cried for help; but the warden, when he hath known me many times ready to die, when the poor men of the wards have called to help me, hath commanded the doors to be kept faſt, and charged that none of his men ſhould come at me, ſaying, Let him alone, it were a good riddance of him. And, amongſt many other times, he did thus October 18. 1553. as many can witneſs.

I paid always like a baron to the ſaid warden, as well in fees, as for my board, which was 20 ſhillings a week, beſides my man's table, until I was wrongfully deprived of my biſhopricks, and ſince that time I have paid him as the beſt gentleman doth in his houſe; yet hath he uſed me worſe, and more vilely, than the verieſt ſlave that ever came to the hall commons.

The ſaid warden hath alſo impriſoned my man William Downton, and ſtripped him out of his cloaths to ſearch for letters, and could find none only a little remembrance of good people's names, that gave me their alms to relieve me in priſon; and to undo them alſo, the warden delivered the ſame bill unto the ſaid Stephen Gardiner, God's enemy and mine.

I have ſuffered impriſonment almoſt eighteen months, my goods, livings, friends, and comfort taken from me; the queen owing me by juſt account fourſcore pounds or more. She hath put me in priſon, and giveth nothing to keep me, neither is there ſuffered any one to come at me, whereby I might have relief. I am with a wicked man and woman, ſo that I ſee no remedy (ſaving God's help) but I ſhall be caſt away in priſon before I come to judgment. But I commit my juſt cauſe to God, whoſe will be done, whether it be by life or death.

Thus much wrote he himſelf of this matter.

Another Examination of Mr. Hooper.

THE 22d of January, 1555. Babington the warden of the Fleet was commanded to bring Mr. Hooper before the biſhop of Wincheſter, with other biſhops and commiſſioners, at the ſaid Wincheſter's houſe at St. Mary Overy's: where the biſhop of Wincheſter, in the name of himſelf and the reſt, moved Mr. Hooper earneſtly to forſake the evil and corrupt doctrine (as he termed it) preached in the days of king Edward VI. and to return to the unity of the catholic church, and to acknowledge the pope's holineſs to be head of the ſame church, according to the determination of the whole parliament, promiſing, that as he himſelf, with other his brethren, had received the pope's bleſſing, and the queen's mercy; even ſo mercy was ready to be ſhewed to him and others, if he would ariſe with them, and condeſcend to the pope's holineſs.

Mr. Hooper anſwered, That foraſmuch as the pope taught doctrine altogether contrary to the doctrine of Chriſt, he was not worthy to be accounted as a member of Chriſt's church, much leſs to be head thereof; wherefore he would in no wiſe condeſcend to any ſuch uſurped juriſdiction, neither eſteemed he the church, whereof they call him head, to be the catholic church of Chriſt: for the church only heareth the voice of her ſpouſe Chriſt, and flieth the ſtrangers. Howbeit (ſaith he) if in any point to me unknown, I have offended the queen's majeſty, I ſhall moſt humbly ſubmit myſelf to her mercy, if mercy may be had with ſafety of conſcience, and without the diſpleaſure of God.

Anſwer was made, That the queen would ſhew no mercy to the pope's enemies. Whereupon Babington was commanded to carry him to the Fleet again: who did ſo, and ſhifted him from his former chamber into another, near to the warden's own chamber, where he remained ſix days: and in the mean time his former chamber was ſearched by Dr. Martin and others, for writings and books, which Mr. Hooper was thought to have made, but none was found.

Another

Another Examination of Mr. Hooper.

THE 28th of January, the biſhop of Wincheſter and other commiſſioners ſate in judgment at St. Mary Overy's, where Mr. Hooper appeared before them in the afternoon, and there, after much reaſoning and diſputation to and fro, he was commanded aſide, till Mr. Rogers (who was then come) had been likewiſe examined. Examinations being ended, the two ſheriffs of London were commanded, about four of the clock, to carry them to the Compter in Southwark, there to remain till the morrow at nine o'clock, to ſee whether they would relent and come home again to the catholic church. So Mr. Hooper went before with one of the ſheriffs, and Mr. Rogers came after with the other, and being out of the church door, Mr. Hooper looked back, and ſtayed a little till Mr. Rogers drew near, unto whom he ſaid, Come, brother Rogers, muſt we two take this matter firſt in hand, and begin to fry theſe faggots? Yea, Sir, ſaid Mr. Rogers, by God's grace. Doubt not, ſaid Mr. Hooper, but God will give ſtrength. So going forwards, there was ſuch a preſs of people in the ſtreets, who rejoiced at their conſtancy, that they had much ado to paſs.

By the way, the ſheriff ſaid to Mr. Hooper, I wonder that ye were ſo haſty and quick with my lord chancellor, and did uſe no more patience: he anſwered, Mr. Sheriff, I was nothing at all impatient, although I was earneſt in my maſter's cauſe, and it ſtandeth me ſo in hand, for it goeth upon life and death, not the life and death of this world only, but alſo of the world to come. Then were they committed to the keeper of the Compter, and appointed to ſeveral chambers, with command that they ſhould not be ſuffered to ſpeak one with another, neither any other permitted to come to them that night.

Upon the next day following, January 29. at the hour appointed they were brought again by the ſheriffs before the ſaid biſhop and commiſſioners in the church, where they were the day before. And after long and earneſt talk, when they perceived that Mr. Hooper would by no means condeſcend unto them, they condemned him to be degraded, and read unto him his condemnation. That done, Mr. Rogers was brought before them, and treated in like manner; and then were both delivered to the ſecular power, the two ſheriffs of London, who were ordered to carry them to the Clink, a priſon not far from the biſhop of Wincheſter's houſe, and there to remain till night.

When it was dark, Mr. Hooper was led by one of the ſheriffs, with many bills and weapons, through the biſhop of Wincheſter's houſe, and over London bridge, through the city to Newgate, and by the way ſome of the ſerjeants were ſent before, to put out the coſtermonger's candles, who uſed to ſit with lights in the ſtreets: either fearing, of likelihood, that the people would have made ſome attempt to have taken him away from them by force, if they had ſeen him go to that priſon, or elſe, being burdened with an evil conſcience, they thought darkneſs to be a moſt fit ſeaſon for ſuch a buſineſs.

But notwithſtanding this device, the people having ſome foreknowledge of his coming, many of them came forth of their doors with lights, and ſaluted him, praiſing God for his conſtancy in the true doctrine which he had taught them, and deſiring God to ſtrengthen him in the ſame to the end. Mr. Hooper paſſed by, and required the people to make their earneſt prayers to God for him, and ſo went through Cheapſide to the place appointed, and was delivered as cloſe priſoner to the keeper of Newgate, where he remained ſix days, no body being permitted to come to him, or talk with him, ſaving his keepers, and ſuch as ſhould be appointed thereto.

During this time, Bonner biſhop of London, and others at his appointment, as Fecknam, Chedſey and Harpsfield, &c. reſorted ſeveral times unto him, to try if by any means they could perſuade him to relent, and become a member of their antichriſtian church. All the ways they could deviſe, they attempted. For, beſides the diſputations and allegations of teſtimonies of the ſcriptures, and of ancient writers wreſted to a wrong ſenſe, according to their accuſtomed manner; they uſed alſo all outward gentleneſs and ſignifications of friendſhip, with many great promiſes of worldly wealth; not omitting alſo moſt grievous threatenings, if with gentleneſs they could not prevail; but they found him always the ſame man, ſtedfaſt and immoveable. When they perceived that they could by no means reclaim him to their purpoſe, with ſuch perſuaſions and offers as they uſed for his converſion, then went they by falſe rumours and reports of recantations (for it is well known that they and their ſervants did firſt ſpread it abroad) to bring him, and the doctrine of Chriſt which he profeſſed, in diſcredit with the people. Which being thus ſpread abroad, and believed by ſome of the weaker ſort, by reaſon of the often reſort of the biſhop of London and others, it increaſed more, and at laſt came to Mr. Hooper's ears, who was greatly grieved thereat, that the people ſhould give credit to ſuch falſe rumours, having ſo ſimple a ground; as may appear from the following letter, which he wrote upon that occaſion.

Mr. Hooper's Letter for preventing certain falſe Rumours ſpread abroad of his Recantation.

THE grace of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt be with all them that unfeignedly look for the coming of our Saviour Chriſt. Amen.

Dear brethren and ſiſters in the Lord, and my fellow-priſoners for the cauſe of God's goſpel, I do much rejoice and give thanks unto God for your conſtancy and perſeverance in affliction, unto whom I wiſh continuance unto the end. And as I do rejoice in your faith and conſtancy in afflictions that be in priſon; even ſo do I mourn and lament to hear of our dear brethren that yet have not felt ſuch dangers for God's truth, as we have and do feel, and be daily like to ſuffer more, yea, the very extreme and vile death of the fire: yet ſuch is the report abroad (as I am credibly informed) that I John Hooper, a condemned man for the cauſe of Chriſt, ſhould now after ſentence of death (being priſoner in Newgate, and looking daily for execution) recant and abjure that which heretofore I have preached. And this talk ariſeth from this, that the biſhop of London and his chaplains reſort unto me. Doubtleſs, if our brethren were as godly as I could wiſh them, they would think, that in caſe I did refuſe to talk with them, they might have juſt occaſion to ſay that I were unlearned, and durſt not ſpeak with learned men; or elſe proud, and diſdained to ſpeak with them. Therefore to avoid juſt ſuſpicion of both, I have, and do daily ſpeak with them when they come, not doubting but they report, that I am neither proud nor unlearned. And I would wiſh all men to do as I do in this point. For I fear not their arguments, neither is death terrible unto me, praying you to make true report of the ſame, as occaſion ſhall ſerve; and that I am more confirmed in the truth which I have heretofore preached, by their coming.

Therefore, ye that may ſend to the weak brethren, pray them that they trouble me not with ſuch reports of recantations as they do. For I have hitherto left all things of the world, and ſuffered great pains and impriſonment, and I thank God I am as ready to ſuffer death, as a mortal man can be. It were better for them to pray for us, than to credit or report ſuch rumours that be untrue. We have enemies enow of ſuch as know not God truly. But yet the falſe report of weak brethren is a double croſs. I wiſh you eternal ſalvation in Jeſus Chriſt, and alſo require your continual prayers, that he which hath begun in us, may continue it to the end.

I have taught the truth with my tongue, and with my pen heretofore, and hereafter ſhall ſhortly confirm the ſame by God's grace with my blood. From Newgate, February 2. 1555.

Your brother in Chriſt,

John Hooper.

Upon Monday morning the biſhop of London came to Newgate, and degraded Mr. Hooper; the ſentence of his degradation here followeth.

The Degradation of Mr. Hooper.

IN the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghoſt, Amen. Whereas by a definitive ſentence from the reverend father in Chriſt, Stephen, by divine permiſſion, lord biſhop of Wincheſter, againſt you John Hooper, preſbyter of his juriſdiction, on account of hereſy and offence notoriouſly committed within his dioceſe of Wincheſter, and of late juſtly and legally proved; it plainly appears to us, Edmund biſhop of London, that you the aforeſaid John Hooper have been and ſtill continue to be an open, obſtinate, and incorrigible heretic, and it alſo appears by the aforeſaid ſentence that you have been declared and pronounced an heretic of this ſort, and have likewiſe incurred the ſentence of the greater excommunication; and it plainly and fully appears that you are to be depoſed and degraded from your order, and for theſe your demerits are to be delivered to the ſecular power, according to the tenour of the aforeſaid ſentence to which we refer ourſelves in this affair. We therefore the aforeſaid Edmund biſhop of London, as it concerns us and the univerſity to do our alternate endeavours, in whoſe dioceſe you John Hooper have committed the ſame hereſy then and oftentimes both before and after; for theſe I ſay and the aforeſaid conſiderations, and that we may execute the aforeſaid ſentence in a better and more efficacious manner, have thought fit to proceed to the actual degradation of you the aforeſaid John Hooper (your crime and juſtice ſo requiring), and ſo we do really proceed according to the direction of the law, and the laudable cuſtom of former times, that we may rightly and legally deliver you to the ſecular power, who are unwilling to continue in the pale of the church; and that this ought to be done, we do by theſe preſents declare and pronounce in this our ſentence.

After the ſentence of degradation thus declared, now let us ſee the form and manner of their degrading, which here alſo followeth. But firſt here is to be noted, that they, degrading this bleſſed biſhop, did not proceed againſt him as a biſhop, but only as againſt a prieſt, as they termed him; for ſuch as he was, theſe Baalamites accounted no biſhop.

The form and manner uſed in the Degrading of Biſhop Hooper.

THE fourth day of February, the year abovementioned, in the chapel of Newgate, the biſhop of London there ſitting with his notary and ſeveral other witneſſes, Alexander Andrew the gaoler came in, bringing with him Mr. Hooper and Mr. Rogers, being condemned before by the lord chancellor, where the ſaid biſhop of London, at the requeſt of the aforeſaid biſhop of Wincheſter, proceeded to the degradation of Mr. Hooper and Mr. Rogers, after this form and manner: firſt, he put upon him all the veſtures and ornaments belonging to a prieſt, with all other things to the ſame order appertaining, as though (being reveſted) they ſhould ſolemnly execute their office. They being thus apparelled and reveſted, the biſhop beginneth to pluck off, firſt the uttermoſt veſture, and ſo by degree and order coming down to the loweſt veſture, which they had only in taking Benet and Collet; and ſo being ſtript and depoſed, he deprived them of all order, benefit, and privilege belonging to the clergy; and conſequently that being done, pronounced, decreed, and declared the ſaid parties ſo degraded, to be given perſonally to the ſecular power, as the ſheriffs being for that year, Mr. Davy Woodrooffe, and Mr. William Cheſter; who receiving firſt the ſaid Mr. Rogers at the hands of the biſhop, had him away with them, bringing him to the place of execution where he ſuffered. The witneſſes there preſent were Mr. Harpsfield archdeacon of London, Robert Coſin, and Robert Willerton, canons of Paul's, Thomas Mountague, and George How, clerks, Triſtram Swadock, and Richard Clumney, Sumner, &c.

The ſame Monday at night, February 4. his keeper gave him an inkling that he ſhould be ſent to Glouceſter to ſuffer death, whereat he rejoiced very much, lifting up his eyes and hands unto heaven, and praiſing God that he ſaw it good to ſend him amongſt the people over whom he was paſtor, there to confirm with his death the truth which he had before taught them; not doubting but the Lord would give him ſtrength to perform the ſame to his glory: and immediately he ſent to his ſervant's houſe for his boots, ſpurs, and cloak, that he might be in readineſs to ride when he ſhould be called.

The next day following, about four of the clock in the morning before day, the keeper with others came to him and ſearched him, and the bed wherein he lay, to ſee if he had written any thing, and then he was led by the ſheriffs of London, and their officers, from Newgate to a place appointed, not far from St. Dunſtan's church in Fleet-ſtreet, where ſix of the queen's guard were appointed to receive him, to carry him to Glouceſter, there to be delivered unto the ſheriff, who with the Lord Shandois, Mr. Wicks, and other commiſſioners, were appointed to ſee execution done. Which guard brought him to the Angel, where he brake his faſt with them, eating his meat at that time more liberal than he uſed to do a good while before. About break of day he went to horſe, and leapt chearfully on horſeback without help, having a hood upon his head under his hat that he ſhould not be known, and ſo he took his journey joyful towards Glouceſter, and by the way the guard enquired of him where he was accuſtomed to bait or lodge, but always carried him to another inn.

Upon Thurſday following, he came to a town in his dioceſe called Cirenceſter, 15 miles from Glouceſter, about eleven of the clock, and there dined at a woman's houſe who had always hated the truth, and ſpoken all evil ſhe could of Mr. Hooper. This woman, perceiving the cauſe of his coming, ſhewed him all the friendſhip ſhe could, and lamented his caſe with tears, confeſſing that ſhe before had often reported, that if he were put to the trial, he would not ſtand to his doctrine.

After dinner he rode forwards, and came to Glouceſter about five of the clock, and a mile without the town was much people aſſembled, who cried and lamented his eſtate; inſomuch that one of the guard rode poſt into the town, to require aid of the mayor and ſheriffs, fearing leſt he ſhould have been taken from them. The officers and their retinue repaired to the gate with weapons, and commanded the people to keep their houſes, &c. but there was no man that once gave any ſignification of any ſuch reſcue or violence. He lodged at one Ingram's houſe in Glouceſter, and that night (as he had done all the way) he did eat his meat quietly, and ſlept his firſt ſleep ſoundly, as it was reported by them of the guard and others. After his firſt ſleep he continued all that night in prayer until the morning, and then deſired that he might go into the next chamber (for the guard were alſo in the chamber where he lay), that there being ſolitary, he might pray and talk with God: ſo that all the day, ſaving a little at meat, and when he talked any time with ſuch as the guard licenſed to ſpeak with him, he beſtowed in prayer.

Amongſt others that ſpake with him, Sir Anthony Kingſton, knight, was one. Who, ſeeming in time paſt his true friend, was then appointed by the queen's letters to be one of the commiſſioners, to ſee execution done upon him. Mr. Kingſton being brought into the chamber, found him at his prayers: and as ſoon as he ſaw Mr. Hooper, he burſt forth in tears. Mr. Hooper at the firſt bluſh knew him not. Then ſaid Mr. Kingſton, Why, my lord, do you not know me an old friend of yours, Anthony Kingſton?

Yes, Mr. Kingſton, I do now know you well, and am glad to ſee you in health, and do praiſe God for the ſame.

But I am ſorry to ſee you in this caſe, ſaid Mr. Kingſton, for I underſtand you be come hither to die. But, alas, conſider that life is ſweet, and death is bitter. Therefore ſeeing life may be had, deſire to live; for life hereafter may do good.

Indeed it is true, Mr. Kingſton, I am come hither to end this life, and to ſuffer death here, becauſe I will not gainſay the former truth that I have heretofore taught amongſt you in this dioceſe, and elſewhere; and I thank you for your friendly counſel, although it be not ſo friendly as I could have wiſhed it. True it is, Mr. Kingſton, that death is bitter, and life is ſweet: but, alas, conſider that the death to come is more bitter, and the life to come is more ſweet. Therefore for the deſire and love I have to the one, and the terror and fear of the other, I do not ſo much regard this death, nor eſteem this life, but have ſettled myſelf, through the ſtrength of God's Holy Spirit, patiently to paſs through the torments and extremities of the fire now prepared for me, rather than to deny the truth of his word, deſiring you and others, in the mean time, to commend me to God's mercy in your prayers.

Well, my lord, then I perceive there is no remedy, and therefore I will take my leave of you: and I thank God that I ever knew you, for God did appoint you to call me, being a loſt child: and by your good inſtructions, where before I was both an adulterer and a fornicator, God hath brought me to the forſaking and deteſting of the ſame.

If you have had grace ſo to do, I do highly praiſe God for it: and if you have not, I pray God you may have, and that you may continually live in his fear. After theſe and many other words, the one took leave of the other, Mr. Kingſton with bitter tears, Mr. Hooper with tears alſo trickling down his cheeks. At his departure, Mr. Hooper told him, that all the troubles he had ſuſtained in priſon, had not cauſed him to utter ſo much ſorrow.

The ſame day in the afternoon, a blind boy, after long interceſſion made to the guard, obtained licenſe to be brought unto Mr. Hooper's ſpeech. The ſame boy not long before had ſuffered impriſonment at Glouceſter for confeſſing of the truth. Mr. Hooper, after he had examined him of his faith, and the cauſe of his impriſonment, beheld him ſtedfaſtly, and (the water appearing in his eyes) ſaid unto him, Ah poor boy, God hath taken from thee thy outward ſight, for what reaſon he beſt knoweth; but he hath given thee another ſight much more precious, for he hath endued thy ſoul with the eye of knowledge and faith. God give thee grace continually to pray unto him, that thou loſe not that ſight, for then ſhouldeſt thou be blind both in body and ſoul.

After that another came to him, whom he knew to be a papiſt, and a wicked man, who appeared to pity him, ſaying, Sir, I am ſorry to ſee you thus. To ſee me? Why, ſaid he, art thou ſorry? To ſee you, ſaid the other, in this caſe. For I hear ſay, you are come hither to die, for which I am ſorry. Be ſorry for thyſelf, man, ſaid Mr. Hooper, and lament thine own wickedneſs; for I am well, I thank God, and death to me for Chriſt's ſake, is welcome.

The ſame night he was committed by the guard, their commiſſion being then expired, unto the cuſtody of the ſheriffs of Glouceſter. The name of the one was Jenkins, the other Bond, who with the mayor and aldermen repaired to Mr. Hooper's lodging, and at the firſt meeting ſaluted him, and took him by the hand. Unto him Hooper ſpake on this manner. Mr. Mayor, I give moſt hearty thanks to you, and to the reſt of your brethren, that you have vouchſafed to take me a priſoner and condemned man by the hand; whereby to my rejoicing it is ſomewhat apparent that your old love and friendſhip towards me is not altogether extinguiſhed: and I truſt alſo that all the things I have taught you in times paſt are not utterly forgotten, when I was here, by the godly king that is dead, appointed to be your biſhop and paſtor. For which moſt true and ſincere doctrine, becauſe I will not now account it falſehood and hereſy, as many other men do, I am ſent hither (as I am ſure you know) by the queen's command, to die, and am come where I taught it, to confirm it with my blood. And now Mr. Sheriffs, I underſtand by theſe good men, and my very friends (meaning the guard) at whoſe hands I have found ſo much favour and gentleneſs by the way hitherward, as a priſoner could reaſonably require (for which alſo I moſt heartily thank them) that I am committed to your cuſtody, as unto them that muſt ſee me brought to-morrow to the place of execution. My requeſt therefore to you ſhall be only, that there may be a quick fire, ſhortly to make an end; and in the mean time I will be as obedient unto you, as yourſelves would wiſh. If you think I do amiſs in any thing, hold up your finger, and I have done. For I am not come hither as one inforced or compelled to die: for it is well known, I might have had my life with worldly gain; but as one willing to offer and give my life for the truth, rather than to conſent to the wicked papiſtical religion of the biſhop of Rome, received and ſet forth by the magiſtrates in England, to God's high diſpleaſure and diſhonour, and I truſt by God's grace tomorrow to die a faithful ſervant of God, and a true obedient ſubject to the queen.

Theſe and ſuch-like words in effect uſed Mr. Hooper to the mayor, ſheriffs, and aldermen, whereat many of them mourned and lamented. Notwithſtanding the two ſheriffs went aſide to conſult, and were determined to have lodged him in the common gaol of the town, called Northgate, if the guard had not made earneſt interceſſion for him: who declared at large, how quietly, mildly, and patiently he had behaved himſelf in the way, adding thereto, that any child might keep him well enough, and that they themſelves would rather take pains to watch with him, than that he ſhould be ſent to the common priſon. So it was determined at length that he ſhould ſtill remain in Robert Ingram's houſe; and the ſheriffs and ſerjeants and other officers did appoint to watch with him that night themſelves. His deſire was, that he might go to-bed that night betimes, ſaying, that he had many things to remember: and ſo he did at five of the clock, and ſlept one ſleep ſoundly, and beſtowed the reſt of the night in prayer. After he got up in the morning, he deſired that no man ſhould be ſuffered to come into the chamber, that he might be ſolitary till the hour of execution.

About eight of the clock came Sir John Bridges, lord Shandois, with a great band of men, Sir Anthony Kingſton, Sir Edmund Bridges, and other commiſſioners appointed to ſee execution done. At nine of the clock Mr. Hooper was ordered to prepare himſelf to be in a readineſs, for the time was at hand. Immediately he was brought down from his chamber by the ſheriffs, who were accompanied with bills, glieves, and weapons. When he ſaw the multitude of weapons, he ſpake to the ſheriffs on this wiſe; Mr. Sheriffs (ſaid he) I am no traytor, neither needed you to have made ſuch a buſineſs to bring me to the place where I muſt ſuffer; for if ye had deſired me, I would have gone alone to the ſtake, and have troubled none of you all. Afterward looking upon the multitude of people that were aſſembled, being by eſtimation to the number of 7000 (for it was market day, and many alſo came to ſee his behaviour towards death) he ſpake unto thoſe that were about him, ſaying; Alas, why be theſe people aſſembled and come together? peradventure they think to hear ſomething of me now, as they have in times paſt, but alas ſpeech is prohibited me. Notwithſtanding the cauſe of my death is well known unto them. When I was appointed here to be their paſtor, I preached unto them true and ſincere doctrine, and that out of the word of God: becauſe I will not now account the ſame to be hereſy and untruth, this kind of death is prepared for me.

So he went forward, led between the two ſheriffs (as a lamb to the place of ſlaughter) in a gown of his hoſt's, his hat upon his head, and a ſtaff in his hand to ſtay himſelf withal. For the grief of the ſciatica, which he had taken in priſon, cauſed him ſomewhat to halt. All the way, being ſtraitly charged not to ſpeak, he could not be perceived once to open his mouth: but beholding the people all the way, who mourned bitterly for him, he would ſometimes lift up his eyes towards heaven, and look very chearfully upon ſuch as he knew: and he was never known, during the time of his being amongſt them, to look with ſo chearful and ruddy a countenance as he did at that preſent. When he came to the place appointed where he ſhould die, he ſmilingly beheld the ſtake and preparation made for him, which was near unto the great elm-tree over againſt the college of prieſts, where he was wont to preach. The place round about the houſes, and the boughs of the tree were filled with ſpectators; and in the chamber over the college-gate ſtood the prieſts of the college. Then he kneeled down (foraſmuch as he could not be ſuffered to ſpeak unto the people) to prayer, and beckoned ſix or ſeven times unto one whom he knew well, to hear the ſaid prayer, to make report thereof in time to come (pouring tears upon his ſhoulders and in his boſom) who gave attentive ears unto the ſame: which prayer he made upon the whole creed, wherein he continued the ſpace of half an hour. Now after he was ſomewhat entered into his prayer, a box was brought and laid before him upon a ſtool, with his pardon (or at leaſt-wiſe it was feigned to be his pardon) from the queen if he would turn. At th ſight whereof he cried, If you love my ſoul, away with it. The box being taken away, the lord Shandois ſaid, Seeing there is no remedy, diſpatch him quickly. Mr. Hooper replied, Good my lord, I truſt your lordſhip will give me leave to make an end of my prayer.

Then the lord Shandois ſaid to Sir Edmund Bridges ſon, who gave ear before to Mr. Hooper's prayer at his requeſt: Edmund, take heed that he do nothing elſe but pray: if he do, tell me, and I ſhall quickly diſpatch him. While this talk was, there ſtepped one or two uncalled, who heard him ſpeak theſe words following;

LORD, ſaid he, I am hell, but thou art heaven; I am ſwill and a ſink of ſin, but thou art a gracious God and a merciful redeemer. Have mercy therefore upon me moſt miſerable and wretched offender, after thy great mercy, and according to thine ineſtimable goodneſs. Thou art aſcended into heaven, receive me hence to be partaker of thy joys, where thou ſitteſt in equal glory with thy Father. For well knoweſt thou, Lord, wherefore I am come hither to ſuffer, and why the wicked do perſecute this thy poor ſervant; not for my ſins and tranſgreſſions committed againſt thee, but becauſe I will not allow their wicked doings, to the contaminating of thy blood, and to the denial of the knowledge of thy truth, wherewith it did pleaſe thee by thy Holy Spirit to inſtruct me: which, with as much diligence as a poor wretch might (being thereto called) I have ſet forth to thy glory. And well ſeeſt thou, my Lord and God, what terrible pains and cruel torments be prepared for thy creature: ſuch, Lord, as without thy ſtrength none is able to bear, or patiently to paſs. But all things that are impoſſible with man, are poſſible with thee. Therefore ſtrengthen me of thy goodneſs, that in the fire, I break not the rules of patience; or elſe aſſuage the terror of the pains, as ſhall ſeem moſt to thy glory.

As ſoon as the mayor had eſpied theſe men who made report of the foregoing words, they were commanded away, and could not be ſuffered to hear any more. Prayer being done, he prepared himſelf for the ſtake, and put off his hoſt's gown, and delivered it to the ſheriffs, requiring them to ſee it reſtored unto the owner, and put off the reſt of his apparel, unto his doublet and hoſe, wherein he would have burned. But the ſheriffs would not permit that (ſuch was their greedineſs), unto whoſe pleaſures, good man, he very obediently ſubmitted himſelf; and his doublet, hoſe, and waiſtcoat were taken off. Then being in his ſhirt, he took a point from his hoſe himſelf, and truſſed his ſhirt between his legs, where he had a pound of gun-powder in a bladder, and under each arm the like quantity delivered him by the guard. So deſiring the people to ſay the Lord's prayer with him, and to pray for him (who performed it with tears, during the time of his pains) he went up to the ſtake. Now when he was at the ſtake, three irons, made to bind him to the ſtake, were brought: one for his neck, another for his middle, and the third for his legs. But herefuſing them ſaid, Ye have no need thus to trouble yourſelves. For I doubt not but God will give ſtrength ſufficient to abide the extremity of the fire, without bands: notwithſtanding, ſuſpecting the frailty and weakneſs of the fleſh, but having aſſured confidence in God's ſtrength, I am content to do as ye ſhall think good.

So the hoop of iron prepared for his middle was brought, which being made ſomewhat too ſhort (for his belly was ſwollen with impriſonment) he ſhrank and put in his belly with his hand, until it was faſtened: and when they offered to have bound his neck and legs with the other two hoops of iron, he utterly refuſed them, and would have none, ſaying, I am well aſſured I ſhall not trouble you.

Thus being ready, he looked upon the people, of whom he might be well ſeen (for he was both tall, and ſtood alſo on an high ſtool) and beheld round about him: and in every corner there was nothing to be ſeen but weeping and ſorrowful people. Then lifting up his eyes and hands to heaven, he prayed to himſelf. By-and-by, he that was appointed to make the fire, came to him, and did aſk him forgiveneſs. Of whom he aſked why he ſhould forgive him, ſaying, that he never knew any offence he had committed againſt him. O Sir, ſaid the man, I am appointed to make the fire. Therein, ſaid Mr. Hooper, thou doſt nothing offend me; God forgive thee thy ſins, and do thine office I pray thee. Then the reeds were caſt up, and he received two bundles of them in his own hands, embraced them, kiſſed them, and put one of them under each arm, and ſhewed with his hand how the reſt ſhould be beſtowed, and pointed to the place where any was wanting.

Then command was given that the fire ſhould be kindled, and ſo it was, but becauſe there were put to no fewer green faggots than two horſes could carry upon their backs, it kindled not ſpeedily, and was a pretty while alſo before it took the reeds upon the faggots. At length it burned about him, but the wind having full ſtrength in that place (it was a lowring and cold morning) it blew the flame from him, ſo that he was in manner little more than touched by the fire.

Within a ſpace after, a few dry faggots were brought, and a new fire kindled with faggots (for there were no more reeds) and that burned at the nether parts, but had ſmall power above, becauſe of the wind, ſaving that it did burn his hair, and ſcorch his ſkin a little. In the time of which fire, even as at the firſt flame, he prayed, ſaying mildly, and not very loud (but as one without pains), O Jeſus, the Son of David, have mercy upon me, and receive my ſoul. After the ſecond fire was ſpent, he wiped both his eyes with his hands, and beholding the people, he ſaid with an indifferent loud voice, For God's love, good people, let me have more fire: and all this while his nether parts did burn: for the faggots were ſo few, that the flame did not burn ſtrongly at his upper parts.

The third fire was kindled within a while after, which was more extreme than the other two: and then the bladders of gun-powder brake, which did him little good, they were ſo placed, and the wind had ſuch power. In which fire he prayed with a loud voice, Lord Jeſus have mercy upon me, Lord Jeſus have mercy upon me: Lord Jeſus receive my ſpirit. And theſe were the laſt words he was heard to utter. But when he was black in the mouth, and his tongue ſwolen, that he could not ſpeak, yet his lips went till they were ſhrunk to the gums: and he knocked his breaſt with his hands, until one of his arms fell off, and then knocked ſtill with the other, while the fat, water, and blood dropped out at his fingers ends, until by renewing of the fire his ſtrength was gone, and his hand did cleave faſt in knocking to the iron upon his breaſt. So immediately, bowing forwards, he yielded up his ſpirit.

Thus was he three quarters of an hour or more in the fire. Even as a lamb, patiently bearing the extremity thereof, neither moving forwards, backwards, or to any ſide; but having his nether parts burned, and his bowels fallen out, he died as quietly as a child in his bed; and he now reigneth as a bleſſed martyr in the joys of heaven, prepared for the faithful in Chriſt before the foundations of the world: for whoſe conſtancy all chriſtians are bound to praiſe God.

A Poem made by Conrade Geſner, on the Martyrdom of Mr. John Hooper.

HOOPER, unvanquiſh'd by Rome's cruelties,
(Confeſſing Chriſt in his laſt moments) dies:
Whilſt flames his body rack, his ſoul doth fly,
Inflam'd with faith, to immortality:
His conſtancy on earth hath rais'd his name,
And gave him entrance at the gates of fame;
Which neither ſtorms, nor the cold north-wind's blaſt,
Nor all-devouring-time ſhall ever waſte:
For he whom God protects ſhall ſure attain
That happineſs, which worldlings ſeek in vain.
Example take by him, you who profeſs
Chriſt's holy doctrines; ne'er the world careſs
In hopes of riches; or if fortune frown
With inauſpicious looks, be not caſt down;
For man ne'er ſaw, nor can his heart conceive,
What God beſtows on them that righteous live.

Mr. Hooper's Letter to ſome of his Friends when he was in Priſon.

THE grace of God be with you, Amen. I did write unto you of late, and told you what extremity the parliament had concluded upon concerning religion, ſuppreſſing the truth, and ſetting forth the untruth, intending to cauſe all men by extremity to forſwear themſelves, and to take again, for the head of the church, him that is neither the head nor member of it, but a very enemy, as the word of God and all ancient writers do record: and for lack of law and authority, they will uſe force and extremity, which have been the arguments to defend the pope and popery, ſince their authority firſt began in the world. But now is the time of trial, to ſee whether we fear more God or man. It was an eaſy thing to hold with Chriſt whilſt the prince and world held with him: but now the world hateth him, it is the true trial who be is.

Wherefore in the name, and in the virtue, ſtrength and power of His holy Spirit, prepare yourſelves in any caſe to adverſity and conſtancy. Let us not run away when it is moſt time to fight; remember none ſhall be crowned but ſuch as fight manfully: and he that endureth to the end ſhall be ſaved. Ye muſt now turn all your cogitations from the peril you ſee, and mark the felicity that followeth the peril; either victory in this world of your enemies, or elſe a ſurrender of this life to inherit the everlaſting kingdom. Beware of beholding too much the felicity or miſery of this world, for the conſideration and too earneſt love or fear of either of them draweth from God.

Wherefore think with yourſelves as touching the felicity of the world, it is good: but yet no otherwiſe than it ſtandeth with the favour of God. It is to be kept; but yet ſo far forth as by keeping of it, we loſe not God. It is good abiding and tarrying ſtill among our friends here: but yet ſo, that we tarry not therewithal in God's diſpleaſure, and hereafter dwell with the devils in fire everlaſting. There is nothing under God but may be kept, ſo that God, being above all things we have, be not loſt.

Of adverſity judge the ſame. Impriſonment is painful, but yet liberty upon evil conditions is more painful. The priſons ſtink; but yet not ſo much as ſweet houſes, where the fear and true honour of God lacketh. I muſt be alone and ſolitary: it is better ſo to be and have God with me, than to be in company with the wicked. Loſs of goods is great; but the loſs of God's grace and favour is greater. I am a poor ſimple creature, and cannot tell how to anſwer before ſuch a great ſort of noble, learned, and wiſe men: it is better to make anſwer before the pomp and pride of wicked men, than to ſtand naked in the ſight of all heaven and earth before the juſt God at the latter day. I ſhall die then by the hands of the cruel man: he is bleſſed that loſeth his life full of miſeries, and findeth the life of eternal joys. It is pain and grief to depart from goods and friends: but yet not ſo much, as to depart from grace and heaven itſelf. Wherefore there is neither felicity nor adverſity of this world, that can appear to be great, if it be weighed with the joys or pains in the world to come.

I can do no more but pray for you; do the ſame for me, for God's ſake. For my part (I thank the heavenly Father) I have made mine accounts, and appointed myſelf unto the will of the heavenly Father: as he will, ſo I will by his grace. For God's ſake, as ſoon as ye can, ſend my poor wife and children ſome letter from you, and my letter alſo which I ſent of late to D. As it was told me ſhe never had a letter from me ſince the coming of M. S. unto her, the more to blame the meſſengers, for I have written divers times. The Lord comfort them, and provide for them; for I am able to do nothing in worldly things. She is a godly and wiſe woman. If my meaning had been accompliſhed, ſhe ſhould have had neceſſary things: but what I meant, God can perform, to whom I commend both her and you all. I am a precious jewel, now and daintily kept, never ſo daintily; for neither mine own man, nor any of the ſervants of the houſe may come to me, but my keeper alone, a ſimple rude man, God knoweth; but I am nothing careful thereof. Fare you well. January 21. 1555.

Your bounden,
John Hooper.

Amongſt many other memorable acts worthy to be noted in the hiſtory of Mr. Hooper, this alſo is not to be forgotten which happened between him and a bragging frier, in the beginning of his impriſonment: the ſtory whereof here followeth.

A frier came from France to England with great boasting, and asked, who was the greatest heretic in England? thinking belike to do some great act upon him. To whom answer was made, that Mr. Hooper had then the greatest name to be the chiefest ringleader, who was then in the Fleet. The frier coming to him, asked, why he was committed to prison? He said, for debt. Nay, said he, it was for heresy; which when the other had denied, What sayst thou, quoth he, to "This is my body?" Mr. Hooper, being partly moved at the sudden question, desired that he might ask of him another question, which was this; What remained after the consecration in the sacrament, any bread, or no? No bread at all, saith he. And when ye break it, what do you break; whether bread, or the body? said Mr. Hooper. No bread, said the frier, but the body only. If ye do so, said Mr. Hooper, ye do great injury, not only to the body of Christ, but also ye break the scriptures, which say, "Ye shall not break of him one bone, &c." With that the frier, having nothing belike to answer, recoiled back, and with his circles and his crosses began to use exorcism against Mr. Hooper, as though, &c.

This and more Mr. Hooper wrote to Mrs. Wilkinson in a letter, which letter was read unto her by John Kelke.

When I see and behold the great patience of these blessed martyrs in our days, in their sufferings so quietly and constantly abiding the torments that are ministered unto them: methinks I may well and worthily compare them to the old martyrs of the primitive church. In the number of whom, if comparison be to be made between saint and saint, martyr and martyr; with whom might I better match this blessed martyr John Hooper, through the whole catalogue of the old martyrs, than with Polycarp, the ancient bishop of Smyrna, of whom Eusebius maketh mention in the ecclesiastical history? For as both agreed together in one kind of punishment, being both put to the fire, so which of them shewed more patience and constancy in the time of their sufferings, it is hard to be said.

And though Polycarp being set in the flame (as the story saith) was kept by miracle from the torment of the fire, till he was stricken down with a weapon, and so dispatched: yet Hooper by no less miracle, armed with patience and fervent spirit of God's comfort, so quietly despised the violence thereof, as though he had felt little more than Polycarp did the fire flaming round about him.

Moreover, as it is written of Polycarp, when he should have been tied to the stake, he required to stand untied, saying these words, "Let me alone, I pray you, for he that gave me strength to come to this fire, will also give me patience to abide in the same without your tying." So likewise Hooper, with the like spirit, when he should have been tied with three chains to the stake, requiring them to have no such mistrust of him, was tied but with one; who, if he had not been tied at all, yet, no doubt, would have no less answered to that great patience of Polycarp.

And as the end of them both was much agreeing, so the life of them both was such, as might seem not far different. In teaching, both alike diligent, in zeal fervent, in life unspotted, in manners and conversation inculpable, both bishops and both martyrs. Briefly, in teaching so pithy and fruitful, that as they both were joined together in one spirit, so might they be joined in one name together, Πολυκαρπος, to wit, much fruitful; to which name also Ὀπωρος is not much unlike. In this the martyrdom of Mr. Hooper may seem in suffering to go before, though in time it followed the martyrdom of Polycarp, for that he was both longer in prison, and there also so cruelly handled by the malice of his keepers, as I think none of the old martyrs ever suffered the like. To this also add, how he was degraded by bishop Bonner with such contumelies and reproaches, as I think in Polycarp's time was not used to any.

And as we have hitherto compared these two good martyrs together, so now if we should compare the enemies and authors of their death one with the other, we should find no inequality betwixt them both, but that the adversaries of Mr. Hooper seemed to be more cruel and unmerciful. For they that put Polycarp to death, yet ministered to him a quick dispatch, moved belike by some compassion not to have him stand in the torment: where the tormentors of Mr. Hooper suffered him without any compassiion to stand three quarters of an hour in the fire. And as touching the chief doers and authors of his martyrdom, what consul or proconsul was there to be compared with the lord chancellor here, who brought this martyr to the stake? Let this suffice.

This good bishop, when in prison, wrote several books and treatises, to the number of 24, whereof some he wrote to the parliament in Latin, and one to Dr. Day bishop of Chichester: besides he wrote of the sacraments, of the Lord's prayer, and of the ten commandments, with divers others.

As you have heard the whole story of the life and martyrdom of this good man declared; so now let us adjoin some part of his letters, written in the time of his imprisonment, most fruitful and worthy to be read, especially in these dangerous days, by all true christians, who by true mortification seek to serve and follow the Lord through all the storms and tempests of this malignant world, as by the reading of the said letters you shall better feel and understand.

A Letter of Mr. Hooper's to certain godly Professors and Lovers of the Truth, instructing them how to behave themselves in that woful Alteration and Change of Religion.

THE grace, mercy, and peace of God the Father, through our Lord Jesus Christ, be with you, my dear brethren, and with all those that unfeignedly love and embrace his holy gospel, Amen.

It is told me, that the wicked idol, the mass, is established again by law, and passed in the parliament-house. Learn the truth of it, I pray you, and what penalty is appointed in the act to such as speak against it: also whether there be any compulsion to constrain men to be at it. The statute thoroughly known, such as be abroad and at liberty may provide for themselves, and avoid the danger the better. Doubtless there hath not been seen before our time such a parliament as this is, that as many as were suspected to be favourers of God's word, should be banished out of both houses. But we must give God thanks for that truth he hath opened in the time of his blessed servant king Edward VI. and pray unto him that we deny it not, nor dishonour it with idolatry; but that we may have strength and patience rather to die ten times than deny him once. Blessed shall we be, if ever God make us worthy of that honour to shed our blood for his name's sake: and blessed then shall we think the parents which brought us into the world, that we should from this mortality be carried into immortality. If we follow the command of St. Paul, that saith, "If ye then be risen again with Christ, seek those things which are above, where Christ sitteth at the right hand of God;" we shall neither depart from the vain transitory goods of this world, nor from this wretched and mortal life, with so great pain as others do.

Let us pray to our heavenly Father, that we may know and love his blessed will, and the glorious joy prepared for us in time to come, and that we may know and hate all things contrary to his blessed will, and also the pain prepared for the wicked in the world to come. There is no no better way to be uſed in this troubleſome time for your conſolation, than many times to have aſſemblies together of ſuch men and women as be of your religion in Chriſt, and there to take and renew amongſt yourſelves the truth of your religion, to ſee what ye be by the word of God, and to remember what ye were before ye came to the knowledge thereof, to weigh and confer the dreams and falſe lyes of the preachers that now preach, with the word of God that retaineth all truth; and by ſuch talk and familiar reſorting together, ye ſhall the better find out all their lyes that now go about to deceive you, and alſo both know and love the truth that God hath opened to us. It is much requiſite that the members of Chriſt comfort one another, make prayers together, confer one with another; ſo ſhall ye be the ſtronger, and God's Spirit ſhall not be abſent from you, but in the midſt of you, to teach you, to comfort you, to make you wiſe in all godly things, patient in adverſity, and ſtrong in perſecution.

Ye ſee how the congregation of the wicked, by helping one another, make their wicked religion and themſelves ſtrong againſt God's truth and his people. If ye may have ſome learned man, that can out of the ſcriptures ſpeak unto you of faith, and true honouring of God, alſo that can ſhew you the deſcent of Chriſt's church from the beginning of it until this day, that ye may perceive by the life of our fore-fathers theſe two things: the one, that Chriſt's words, who ſaid that all his muſt ſuffer perſecution and trouble in the world, be true: the other, that none of all his, before our time, eſcaped trouble: then ſhall ye perceive, that it is but a folly for one that profeſſes Chriſt truly, to look for the love of the world.

Thus ſhall ye learn to bear trouble, and to exerciſe your religion, and feel indeed that Chriſt's words be true, "In the world ye ſhall ſuffer perſecution." And when ye ſhall feel your religion indeed, ſay, ye be no better than your fore-fathers; but be glad that ye may be counted ſoldiers for this war: and pray to God when ye come together, that he will uſe and order you and your doings in theſe three ends, which ye muſt take heed to: the firſt, that ye glorify God; the next, that ye edify the church and congregation; the third, that ye profit your own ſouls.

In all your doings beware ye be not deceived. For although this time be not ſo bloody and tyrannous as the time of our fore-fathers, that could not bear the name of Chriſt, without danger of life and goods; yet is our time more perilous both for body and ſoul. Therefore of us Chriſt ſaid, "Think ye when the Son of man cometh, he ſhall find faith upon the earth?" He ſaid not, Think ye, he ſhall find any man or woman chriſtened, and in name a chriſtian? but he ſpake of the faith that ſaved the chriſtian man in Chriſt: and doubtleſs the ſcarcity of faith is now more (and will, I fear, increaſe) than it was in the time of the greateſt tyrants that ever were; and no marvel why. Read the ſixth chapter of St. John's Revelation, and ye ſhall perceive amongſt other things, that at the opening of the fourth ſeal came out a pale horſe, and he that ſat upon him was called death, and hell followed him. This horſe is the time wherein hypocrites and diſſemblers entered into the church under the pretence of true religion, as monks, friers, nuns, maſſing-prieſts, with ſuch others, who have killed more ſouls with hereſy and ſuperſtition, than all the tyrants that ever were, killed bodies by fire, ſword, or baniſhment, as it appeareth by his name that ſitteth upon the horſe, who is called death: for all ſouls that love Chriſt, and truſt to theſe hypocrites, live to the devil in everlaſting pain, as is declared by him that followeth the pale horſe, which is hell.

Theſe pretended and pale hypocrites have ſtirred the earthquakes, that is to wit, the princes of the world, againſt Chriſt's church, and have alſo darkened the ſun, and made the moon bloody, and have cauſed the ſtars to fall from heaven, that is to ſay, have darkened with miſts, and daily do darken (as ye hear by their ſermons) the clear ſun of God's moſt pure word: the moon, which be God's true preachers, which fetch only light at the ſun of God's word, are turned into blood, priſons, and chains, that their light cannot ſhine unto the world as they would: whereupon it cometh to paſs, that the ſtars, that is to ſay, chriſtian people fall from heaven, that is to wit, God's moſt true word, to hypocriſy, moſt deviliſh ſuperſtition and idolatry. Let ſome learned man ſhew you all the articles of your belief and monument of chriſtian faith, from the time of Chriſt hitherto, and ye ſhall perceive that there was never mention of ſuch articles as theſe hypocrites teach. God bleſs you, and pray for me as I do for you. Out of the Fleet,

By your brother in Chriſt,
John Hooper.

To Mr. Ferrar, Biſhop of St. David's, Dr. Taylor, Mr. Bradford, and Mr. Philpot, Priſoners in the King's-Bench in Southwark.

THE grace of God be with you, Amen. I am advertiſed by divers, as well ſuch as love the truth, as alſo by ſuch as yet be not come unto it, that ye and I ſhall be carried ſhortly to Cambridge, there to diſpute for the faith, and for the religion of Chriſt (which is moſt true) that we have and do profeſs. I am (as I doubt not ye be) in Chriſt ready, not only to go to Cambridge, but alſo to ſuffer, by God's help, death itſelf in the maintenance thereof. Weſton and his accomplices have obtained forth the commiſſion already, and ſpeedily (moſt like) he will put it in execution. Wherefore, dear brethren, I do advertiſe you of the thing before for divers cauſes. The one, to comfort you in the Lord, that the time draweth near, and is at hand, that we ſhall teſtify before God's enemies, God's truth. The next, that ye ſhould prepare yourſelves the better for it. The third, to ſhew you what ways I think ourſelves were beſt to uſe in this matter, and alſo to hear of your better advice, if mine be not good. Ye know ſuch as ſhall be cenſors and judges over us, breathe and thirſt for our blood, and whether we, by God's help, overcome after the word of God, or by force and ſubtilty of our adverſaries be overcome, this will be the concluſion; our adverſaries will ſay, they overcome, and ye perceive how they report of thoſe great learned men and godly perſonages at Oxford.

Wherefore I mind never to anſwer them, except I have books preſent, becauſe they uſe not only falſe allegation of the doctors, but alſo a piece of the doctors againſt the whole courſe of the doctors mind. The next, that we may have ſworn notaries, to take things ſpoken indifferently: which will be very hard to have, for the adverſaries will have the overſight of all things, and then make theirs better than it was; and ours worſe than it was. Then if we ſee that two or three, or more will ſpeak together, or with ſcoffs and taunts illude and mock us: I ſuppoſe it were beſt to appeal, to be heard before the queen and the whole council, and that would much ſet forth the glory of God. For many of them know already the truth, many of them err rather of zeal than malice, and the others that be indurate ſhould be anſwered fully to their ſhame (I doubt not), although to our ſmart and blood-ſhedding. For of this I am aſſured, that the commiſſioners ap pointed to hear us and judge us mean nothing leſs than to hear the cauſe indifferently; for they be enemies unto us and our cauſe, and be at a point already to give ſentence againſt us: ſo that if it were poſſible with St. Stephen to ſpeak ſo that they could not reſiſt us, or to uſe ſuch ſilence and patience as Chriſt did, they will proceed to revenging.

Wherefore, my dear brethren, in the mercy of Jeſus Chriſt, I would be glad to know your advice this day or to-morrow: for ſhortly we ſhall be gone, and I verily ſuppoſe that we ſhall not company together, but be kept one abroad from another. They will deny our appeal, yet let us challenge the appeal, and take witneſs thereof of ſuch as be preſent, and require for indifferency of hearing and judgment, to be heard either before the queen and the council, or elſe before all the parliament, as they were uſed in king Edward's days. Further, for my part I will require both books and time to anſwer. We have been priſoners now three quarters of a year, and have lacked our books; and our memories, by cloſe keeping and ingratitude of their parts, be not ſo preſent and quick as theirs be. I truſt God will be with us, yea, I doubt not but he will, and teach us to do all things in his cauſe godly and conſtantly. If our adverſaries, that ſhall be our judges, may have their purpoſe, we ſhall diſpute one day, be condemned the next day, and ſuffer the third day. And yet there is no law to condemn us (as far as I know), and ſo one of the convocation-houſe ſaid this week to Dr. Weſton. To whom Weſton made this anſwer, It forceth not, quoth he, for a law, we have commiſſion to proceed with them; when they be diſpatched, let their friends ſue the law.

Now how ſoon a man may have ſuch a commiſſion at my lord chancellor's hand, you know. It is as eaſy to be obtained as an indictment for Chriſt at Caiaphas's hand. Beſides that the biſhops having the queen ſo upon their ſides, may do all things both without the advice and alſo the knowledge of the reſt of the lords of the temporality, who at this preſent have found out the mark that the biſhops ſhot at, and doubtleſs be not pleaſed with their doings. I pray you help, that our brother Saunders and the reſt in the Marſhalſea may underſtand theſe things, and ſend me your anſwer betime. Judas ſleepeth not; neither know we the day nor the hour. The Lord Jeſus Chriſt with his Holy Spirit comfort and ſtrengthen us all. Amen. May 6. 1554.

Yours, and with you unto death in Chriſt,
John Hooper.

Mr. Hooper's Letter to his Wife Anne Hooper: whereby all the true Members of Chriſt may take Comfort and Courage to ſuffer Trouble and Affliction for the Profeſſion of his holy Goſpel.

OUR Saviour Jeſus Chriſt (dearly beloved and my godly wife) in St. Matthew's goſpel ſaid to his diſciples, "That it was neceſſary ſcandals ſhould come;" and that they could not be avoided, he perceived as well by the condition of thoſe that ſhould periſh and be loſt for ever in the world to come, as alſo by their affliction that ſhould be ſaved. For he ſaw the greateſt part of the people would contemn and neglect whatſoever true doctrine or godly ways ſhould be ſhewed to them, or elſe receive and uſe it as they thought good to ſerve their pleaſures, without any profit to their ſouls at all, not caring whether they lived as they were commanded by God's word or not; but would think it ſufficient to be counted to have the name of a chriſtian man, with ſuch works and fruits of his profeſſion and chriſtianity, as his fathers and elders, after their cuſtom and manner, eſteem and take to be good fruits and faithful works, and will not try them by the word of God at all. Theſe men, by the juſt judgment of God, be delivered unto the craft and ſubtilty of the devil, that they may be kept by one ſcandalous ſtumbling-block or other, that they never come unto Chriſt, who came to ſave thoſe that were loſt; as ye may ſee how God delivereth wicked men up unto their own luſts to do one miſchief after another, careleſs, until they come into a reprobate mind, that forgetteth itſelf, and cannot know what is expedient to be done, or to be left undone, becauſe they cloſe their eyes, and will not ſee the light of God's word offered unto them; and being thus blinded, they prefer their own vanities before the truth of God's word. Where ſuch corrupt minds be, there is alſo corrupt election and choice of God's honour: ſo that the mind of man taketh falſhood for truth, ſuperſtition for true religion, death for life, damnation for ſalvation, hell for heaven, and perſecution of Chriſt's members for God's ſervice and honour. And as theſe men wilfully and voluntarily reject the word of God; even ſo God moſt juſtly delivereth them into the blindneſs of mind and hardneſs of heart, that they cannot underſtand, nor yet conſent to any thing that God would have preached, and ſet forth to his glory, after his own will and word: wherefore they hate it mortally, and of all things moſt deteſt God's holy word. And as the devil hath entered into their hearts, that they themſelves cannot nor will not come to Chriſt, to be inſtructed by his holy word: even ſo can they not abide any other man to be a chriſtian man, and to lead his life after the word of God, but hate him, perſecute him, rob him, impriſon him, yea, and kill him, whether he be man or woman, if God ſuffer it. And ſo much are theſe wicked men blinded, that they mind no law, whether it be God's or man's, but perſecute ſuch as never offended, yea do evil to thoſe that have prayed daily for them, and wiſh them God's grace.

In their pharaonical and blind fury they have no reſpect to nature. For the brother perſecuteth the brother, the father the ſon; and moſt dear friends, in deviliſh ſlander and offence, are become moſt mortal enemies. And no marvel; for when they have choſen ſundry maſters, the one the devil, the other God, the one ſhall agree with the other, as God and the devil agree between themſelves. For this cauſe (that the more part of the world doth uſe to ſerve the devil under cloaked hypocriſy of God's title) Chriſt ſaid, "It is expedient and neceſſary that ſcandals ſhould come," and many means be deviſed to keep the little babes of Chriſt from the heavenly Father. But Chriſt ſaith, "Wo be unto him by whom the offence cometh:" yet is there no remedy, man being of ſuch corruption and hatred towards God but that the evil ſhall be deceived, and perſecute the good; and the good ſhall underſtand the truth, and ſuffer perſecution for it unto the world's end. "For as he that was born after the fleſh, perſecuted in times paſt him that was born after the Spirit, even ſo it is now." Therefore forſomuch as we live in this life amongſt ſo many great perils and dangers, we muſt be well aſſured by God's word how to bear them, and how patiently to take them as they be ſent to us from God. We muſt alſo aſſure ourſelves, that there is no other remedy for chriſtians in the time of trouble, than Chriſt himſelf hath appointed us. In St. Luke he giveth us this commandment, "Ye ſhall poſſeſs your lives in patience," ſaith he. In which words he giveth us both commandment what to do, and alſo great comfort and conſolation in all troubles. He ſheweth what is to be done, and what is to be hoped for in troubles: and, when troubles happen, he biddeth us be patient: and in no caſe violently nor ſeditiouſly to reſiſt our perſecutors, becauſe God hath ſuch care and charge of us, that he will keep in the midſt of all troubles the very hairs of our head, ſo that one of them ſhall not fall away without the will and pleaſure of our heavenly Father. Whether the hair therefore tarry on the head, or fall from the head, it is the will of the Father. And ſeeing he hath ſuch care for the hairs of our head, how much more doth he care for our life itſelf? Wherefore let God's adverſaries do what they liſt, whether they take life or take it not, they can do us no hurt: for their cruelty hath no further power than God permitteth them; and that which cometh unto us by the will of our heavenly Father, can be no harm, no loſs, neither deſtruction unto us, but rather gain, wealth, and felicity. For all troubles and adverſity that happen to ſuch as be of God, by the will of the heavenly Father, can be none other but gain and advantage.

That the ſpirit of man may feel theſe conſolations, the Giver of them the heavenly father muſt be prayed unto for the merits of Chriſt's paſſion: for it is not the nature of of man that can be contented, until it be regenerated and poſſeſſed with God's Spirit, to bear patiently the troubles of the mind or of the body. When the mind and heart of a man ſeeth on every ſide ſorrow and heavineſs, and the worldly eye beholdeth nothing but ſuch things as be troubleſome and wholly bent to rob the poor of that he hath, and alſo to take from him his life: except the man weigh theſe brittle and uncertain treaſures that be taken from him, with the riches of the life to come, and this life of the body, with the life in Chriſt's blood, and ſo for the love and certainty of the heavenly joys contemn all things preſent, doubtleſs he ſhall never be able to bear the loſs of goods, life, or any other thing of this world.

Therefore St. Paul giveth a godly and neceſſary leſſon to all men in this ſhort and tranſitory life, and therein ſheweth how a man may beſt bear the iniquities and troubles of this world; "If ye be riſen again with Chriſt (ſaith he) ſeek the things which are above, where Chriſt ſitteth at the right hand of God the Father." Wherefore the chriſtian man's faith muſt be always upon the reſurrection of Chriſt, when he is in trouble; and in that glorious reſurrection he ſhall not only ſee continual and perpetual joys and conſolation, but alſo the victory and triumph over all perſecution, trouble, ſin, death, hell, the devil, and all other tyrants and perſecutors of Chriſt, and of Chriſt's people, the tears and weeping of the faithful dried up, their wounds healed, their bodies made immortal in joy, their ſouls for ever praiſing the Lord, in conjunction and ſociety everlaſting with the bleſſed company of God's elect in perpetual joy. But the words of St. Paul in that place, if they be not marked, ſhall do little profit to the reader or hearer, and give him no patience at all in this impatient and cruel world.

In this firſt part St. Paul commandeth us, "To think or ſet our affections on things that are above." When he biddeth us ſeek the things that are above, he requireth that our minds never ceaſe from prayer and ſtudy in God's word, until we ſee, know, and underſtand the vanities of this world, the ſhortneſs and miſery of this life, and the treaſures of the world to come, the immortality thereof, the joys of that life, and ſo never ceaſe ſeeking, until ſuch time as we know certainly and be perſuaded, what a bleſſed man he is, that ſeeketh the one and findeth it, and careth not for the other though he loſe it; and in ſeeking, to have right judgment between the life preſent and the life to come, we ſhall find how little the pains, impriſonment, ſlanders, lyes, and death itſelf is in this world, in reſpect of pains everlaſting, the priſon infernal, and dungeon of hell, the ſentence of God's juſt judgment, and everlaſting death.

When a man hath, by ſeeking the word of God, found out what the things above be: then muſt he (as St. Paul ſaith) ſet his affections upon them. And this commandment is more hard than the other. For man's knowledge many times ſeeth the beſt, and knoweth that there is a life to come, better than this life preſent (as you may ſee how daily men and women can praiſe and commend, yea, and wiſh for heaven, and to be at reſt there), yet they ſet not their affection upon it: they do more affect and love indeed a trifle of nothing in this world that pleaſeth their affection, than the treaſure of all treaſures in heaven, which their own judgment ſaith is better than all worldly things. "Wherefore we muſt ſet our affections on the things that be above;" that is to ſay, when any thing worſe than heaven, upon the earth, offereth itſelf to be ours, if we will give our good wills to it, and love it in our hearts, then ought we to ſee by the judgment of God's word, whether we may have the world without offence of God, and ſuch things as be for this worldly life without his diſpleaſure. If we cannot, St. Paul's commandment muſt take place, "Set your affections on things that are above." If the riches of this world may not be gotten nor kept by God's law, neither our lives be continued without the denial of his honour, we muſt ſet our affection upon the riches and life that is above, and not upon things that be on the earth. Therefore this ſecond commandment of St. Paul requireth, that our minds judge heavenly things to be better than things upon the earth, and the life to come better than the life preſent; ſo we ſhould chuſe them before the other, and prefer them, and have ſuch affection to the beſt, that in no caſe we ſet the worſt before it, as the moſt part of the world doth and hath done, for they chuſe the beſt and prove it, and yet follow the worſt.

But theſe things, my godly wife, require rather cogitation, meditation, and prayer, than words or talk. They be eaſy to be ſpoken of, but not ſo eaſy to be uſed and practiſed. Wherefore ſeeing they be God's gifts, and none of ours, to have as our own when we would, we muſt ſeek them at our heavenly Father's hand, who ſeeth, and is privy how poor and wretched we be, and how naked, how ſpoiled, and deſtitute of all his bleſſed gifts we be by reaſon of ſin. He did command therefore his diſciples, when he ſhewed them that they ſhould take patiently the ſtate of this preſent life full of troubles and perſecution, to pray that they might well eſcape thoſe troubles that were to come, and be able to ſtand before the Son of man. When you find yourſelf too much oppreſſed (as every man ſhall be ſometimes with the fear of God's judgment), uſe the 77th Pſalm that beginneth, "I will cry unto God with my voice, and he ſhall hearken unto me." In which Pſalm is both godly doctrine and great conſolation unto the man or woman that is in anguiſh of mind.

Uſe alſo in ſuch trouble the 88th Pſalm, wherein is contained the prayer of a man, that was brought into extreme anguiſh and miſery, and being vexed with adverſaries and perſecutions, ſaw nothing but death and hell. And although he felt in himſelf, that he had not only man, but alſo God angry towards him: yet he by prayer humbly reſorted unto God, as the only port of conſolation, and, in the midſt of his deſperate ſtate of trouble, put the hope of his ſalvation in him, whom he felt his enemy. Howbeit, no man of himſelf can do this, but the Spirit of God, that ſtriketh the man's heart with fear, prayeth for the man ſtricken and feared, with unſpeakable groanings. And when you feel yourſelf, or know any other oppreſſed after ſuch ſort, be glad; for after that God hath made you to know what you be of yourſelf, he will doubtleſs ſhew you comfort, and declare unto you what you be in Chriſt his only Son; and uſe prayer often, for he is the means whereby God will be ſought unto for his gifts. Theſe Pſalms be for the purpoſe, when the mind can take no underſtanding, nor the heart any joy of God's promiſes: and therefore were the Pſalms alſo made, 6, 22, 30, 31, 38, 69. from the which you ſhall learn both patience and conſolation. Remember, that "Although your life (as all chriſtian mens be) be hid, and appeareth not what it is, yet it is ſafe (as St. Paul ſaith) with God in Chriſt: and when Chriſt ſhall appear, then ſhall our lives be made open with him in glory." But in the mean time, with ſeeking and ſetting our affections upon the things that be above, we muſt patiently ſuffer whatſoever God ſhall ſend unto us in this mortal life. Notwithſtanding, it might fortune ſome would ſay, Who is ſo perfect, that can let all things paſs as they come, and have no care of them; ſuffer all things, and feel nothing, be tempted of the devil, the world, and the fleſh, and be not troubled? verily no man living. But this I ſay, that, in the ſtrength of Jeſus Chriſt things that come may paſs with care, for we be worldly, and yet are we not carried with them from Chriſt, for we be in him godly. We may ſuffer things, and feel them as mortal men, yet bear them and overcome them as chriſtian men. We may be tempted of the devil, the fleſh, and the world: but yet although thoſe things pinch, they do not pierce, and although they work ſin in us, yet in Chriſt no damnation to thoſe that be grafted in him. Hereof may the chriſtian man learn both conſolation and patience. Conſolation, in that he is compelled both in his body and goods to feel pain and loſs, and in the ſoul heavineſs heavineſs and anguiſh of mind: howbeit none of them both ſhall ſeparate him from the love that God beareth him in Chriſt. He may learn patience, foraſmuch as his enemies both of body and ſoul, and the pains alſo they vex us withal for the time, if they tarry with us as long as we live, yet when death cometh, they ſhall avoid, and give place to ſuch joys as be prepared for us in Chriſt: for no pains of the world be perpetual, and whether they ſhall afflict us for all the time of our mortal life, we know not; for they be ſervants of God to go and come, as he commandeth them. But we muſt take heed we meddle not forcibly nor ſeditiouſly to put away the perſecution appointed unto us by God: remember Chriſt's ſaying, "Poſſeſs yourſelves by your patience." And in this commandment God requireth of every man and woman this patient obedience. He ſaith not, It is ſufficient that other holy patriarchs, prophets, apoſtles, evangeliſts, and martyrs continued their lives in patience, and patient ſuffering the trouble of this world: but Chriſt ſaith to every one of his people, By your own patience ye ſhall continue your life: not that man hath patience in himſelf, but that he muſt have it for himſelf of God, the only giver of it, if he purpoſe to be a godly man. Now herefore as our profeſſion and religion requireth patience outwardly, without reſiſtance and force; ſo requireth it patience of the mind, and not to be angry with God, although he uſe us, that be his own creatures, as he pleaſeth.

We may not alſo murmur againſt God, but ſay always, his judgments be right and juſt, and rejoice that it pleaſeth him by troubles to uſe us, as he uſed heretofore ſuch as he moſt loved in this world, and have a ſingular care to this commandment: "Be glad and rejoice; for" he ſheweth great cauſe why, "Your reward (ſaith he) is great in heaven." Theſe promiſes of him, that is the truth itſelf, ſhall (by God's grace) work both conſolation and patience in the afflicted chriſtian perſon. And when our Saviour Chriſt hath willed men in trouble to be content and patient, becauſe God in the end of trouble in Chriſt hath ordained eternal conſolation; he uſeth alſo to take from us all ſhame and rebuke, as though it were not an honour to ſuffer for Chriſt, becauſe the wicked world doth curſe and abhor ſuch poor troubled chriſtians. Wherefore Chriſt placeth all his honourably, and ſaith, "Even ſo perſecuted they the prophets that were before you." We may alſo ſee with whom the afflicted for Chriſt's ſake be eſteemed by St. Paul to the Hebrews, where as the number of the bleſſed and glorious company of ſaints appear now to our faith in heaven, in joy: yet in the letter, for the time of this life, in ſuch pains and contempt as was never more. Let us therefore conſider both them and all other things of the world ſince the fall of man, and we ſhall perceive nothing to come to perfection, but with ſuch confuſion and diſorder to the eye of the world, as though things were rather loſt for ever, than like to come to any perfection at all. For of godly men, who ever came to heaven (no not Chriſt himſelf) until ſuch time as the world had thought verily, that both he and all his had been clean deſtroyed and caſt away: as the wiſe man ſaith of the wicked people, "We thought them to be fools. but they be in peace."

We may learn by things that nouriſh and maintain us, both meat and drink, what loathſomeneſs and (in a manner) abhorring they come unto, before they work their perfection in us. From life they are brought to the fire, and clean altered from what they were when they were alive; from the fire to the trencher and knife, and all hacked; from the trencher to the mouth, and as ſmall ground as the teeth can grind them; and from the mouth into the ſtomach, and there ſo boiled and digeſted before they nouriſh, that whoſoever ſaw the ſame, would loath and abhor his own nouriſhment, before it came to its perfection.

Is it then any marvel if ſuch chriſtians as God delighteth in, be ſo mangled and defaced in this world, which is the kitchen and mill to boil and grind the fleſh of God's people in, till they atchieve their perfection in the world to come? And as a man looketh for the nutriment of his meat when it is full digeſted, and not before: ſo muſt he look for his ſalvation when he hath paſſed this troublous world, and not before. Raw fleſh is not meat wholeſome for man: and unmortified men and women be not creatures meet for God. Therefore Chriſt ſaith, That his people muſt be broken, and all be torn in the mill of this world, and ſo ſhall they be moſt fine meal unto the heavenly Father. And it ſhall be a chriſtian man's part, and the duty of a mind repleniſhed with the Spirit of God, to mark the order of God in all his things, how he dealeth with them, and how they ſuffer, and be content to let God do his will upon them, as St. Paul ſaith, "They wait until the number of the elect be fulfilled, and never be at reſt, but look for the time when God's people ſhall appear in glory."

We muſt therefore patiently ſuffer, and willingly attend upon God's doings, although they ſeem clean contrary, after our judgment, to our wealth and ſalvation; as Abraham did, when he was bid to offer his ſon Iſaac, in whom God promiſed the bleſſing and multiplying of his ſeed. Joſeph at the laſt came to that which God promiſed him, although in the mean time, after the judgment of the world, he was never like to be (as God ſaid he ſhould be) lord over his brethren. When Chriſt would make the blind man to ſee, he put clay upon his eyes, which, after the judgment of man, was a means rather to make him double blind, than to give him his ſight; but he obeyed, and knew that God could work his deſire, what means ſoever he uſed contrary to man's reaſon: and as touching this world, he uſeth all his after the ſame ſort. If any ſmart, his people be the firſt; if any ſuffer ſhame, they begin; if any be ſubject to ſlander, it is thoſe that he loveth; ſo that he ſheweth no face or favour, nor love almoſt in this world outwardly to them, but layeth clay upon their ſore eyes that be ſorrowful: yet the patient man ſeeth (as St. Paul ſaith) life hid under theſe miſeries and adverſities, and ſight under foul clay; and in the mean time he hath the teſtimony of a good conſcience, and believeth God's promiſes to be his conſolation in the world to come, which is more worthy unto him, than all the world is worth beſides: and bleſſed is that man in whom God's Spirit beareth record that he is the ſon of God, whatſoever troubles he ſuffer in this troubleſome world.

And to judge things indifferently, my good wife, the troubles be not yet generally, as they were in our good fathers time, ſoon after the death and reſurrection of our Saviour Jeſus Chriſt, whereof he ſpake in St. Matthew. Of which place you and I have taken many times great conſolation, and eſpecially of the latter part of the chapter, wherein is contained the laſt day and end of all troubles (I doubt not) both for you and me, and for ſuch as love the coming of our Saviour Chriſt to judgment. Remember therefore that place, and mark it again, and ye ſhall in this time ſee this great conſolation, and alſo learn much patience. Was there ever ſuch troubles, as Chriſt threatened upon Jeruſalem? was there ſince the beginning of the world ſuch affliction? who was then beſt at eaſe? The apoſtles that ſuffered in body perſecution, and gathered of it eaſe and quietneſs in the promiſes of God. And no marvel, for Chriſt ſaith, "Lift up your heads, for your redemption is at hand," that is to ſay, your eternal reſt approacheth and draweth near. The world is ſtark blind, and more fooliſh than fooliſhneſs itſelf, and ſo be the people of the world. For when God ſaith, trouble ſhall come, they will have eaſe. And when God ſaith, be merry and rejoice in trouble, we lament and mourn, as though we were caſt-aways. But this our fleſh (which is never merry with virtue, nor ſorry with vice; never laughed with grace, nor ever weepeth with ſin) holdeth faſt with the world, and letteth God ſlip. But, my dearly beloved wife, you know how to perceive and to beware of the vanity and crafts of the devil well enough in Christ. And that ye may the better have patience in the Spirit of God, read again the 24th of St. Matthew, and mark what difference is between the destruction of Jerusalem, and the destruction of the whole world, and you shall see, that then here were left alive many offenders to repent: but at the latter day there shall be absolute judgment, and sentence (never to be revoked) of eternal life and eternal death upon all men: and yet towards the end of the world we have nothing so much extremity as they had then, but even as we be able to bear. So doth the merciful Father lay upon us now imprisonment (and I suppose for my part shortly, death) now spoil of goods, loss of friends, and the greatest loss of all, the knowledge of God's word. God's will be done. I wish in Christ Jesus our only Mediator and Saviour, your constancy and consolation, that you may live for ever and ever, whereof in Christ I doubt not; to whom, for his most blessed and painful passion, I commit you. Amen. Octob. 13. 1553.

Mr. Hooper's Letter to a pious Widow, how to behave herself in the time of her Widowhood.

THE grace of God, and the comfort of his Holy Spirit be with you, and all them that unfeignedly love his holy gospel, Amen. I thank you, dear sister, for your most loving remembrance: and although I cannot recompense the same, yet do I wish with all my heart, that God would do it, requiring you not to forget your duty towards God, in these perilous days, in the which the Lord will try us. I trust you do increase by reading of the scriptures, the knowledge you have of God, and that you diligently apply yourself to follow the same: for the knowledge helpeth not, except the life be according thereunto. Further, I do heartily pray you, to consider the state of your widowhood, and if God shall put in your mind to change it, remember the saying of St. Paul, 1 Cor. 7. "It is lawful for the widow or maiden to marry to whom they list, so it be in the Lord;" that is to say, to such an one as is of Christ's religion. Dearly beloved in Christ, remember these words, for you shall find thereby great joy and comfort, if you change your state. Whereof I will, when I have better leisure (as now I have none at all) further advertise you. In the mean time I commend you to God, and the guiding of his good Spirit, who establish and confirm you in all well-doing, and keep you blameless to the day of the Lord. Watch and pray, for this day is at hand.

Yours assured in Christ,
John Hooper.

To all my Brethren, my Relievers, and Helpers in the City of London.

THE grace of God be with you; Amen. I have received from you (dearly beloved in our Saviour Jesus Christ) by the hands of my servant William Downton, your liberality, for the which I most heartily thank you, and I praise God highly in you for you, who hath moved your hearts to shew this kindness towards me, praying him to preserve you from all famine, scarcity, and lack of the truth of his word, which is the lively food of your souls, as you preserve my body from hunger, and other necessities which should happen unto me; were it not cared for by the benevolence and charity of godly people. Such as have taken all worldly goods and lands from me, and spoiled me of all that I had, have imprisoned my body, and appointed not one half-penny to feed or relieve me withal: but I do forgive them and pray for them daily in my poor prayer unto God, and from my heart I wish their salvation, and quietly and patiently bear their injuries, wishing no farther extremity to be used towards us. Yet if the contrary seem best unto our heavenly Father, I have made my reckoning, and fully resolved myself to suffer the uttermost that they are able to do against me, yea, death itself, by the aid of Christ Jesus, who died the most vile death of the cross for us wretches and miserable sinners. But of this I am assured, that the wicked world, with all its force and power, shall not touch one of the hairs of our heads without leave and licence from our heavenly Father, whose will be done in all things. If he will life, life be it: if he will death, death be it. Only we pray, that our wills may be subject unto his will, and then although both we and all the world see none other thing but death, yet if he think life best, we shall not die, no, although the sword be drawn over our heads: as Abraham thought to kill his son Isaac, yet when God perceived that Abraham had surrendered his will to God's will, and was content to kill his son, God then saved his son.

Dearly beloved, if we be contented to obey God's will, and for his commandments sake to surrender our goods and our lives to be at his pleasure, it is no matter whether we keep goods and life, or lose them. Nothing can hurt us that is taken from us for God's cause, nor can any thing at length do us good, that is preserved contrary to God's commandment. Let us wholly suffer God to use us and ours after his holy wisdom, and beware we neither use nor govern ourselves contrary to his will by our own wisdom: for if we do, our wisdom will at length prove foolishness. It is kept to no good purpose, that we keep contrary unto his commandments. That can be by no means taken from us, which he would should tarry with us. He is no good christian that ruleth himself and his, as worldly means serveth: for he that so doth shall have as many changes as chanceth in the world. To day with the world he shall like and praise the truth of God, to-morrow as the world will, so will he like and praise the falshood of man; to-day with Christ, and to-morrow with Antichrist. Wherefore, dear brethren, as touching your behaviour towards God, use both your inward spirits and your outward bodies, your inward and your outward man, I say, not after the manners of men, but after the infallible word of God.

Restrain from evil in both; and glorify your heavenly Father in both. For if ye think ye can inwardly in the heart serve him, and yet outwardly serve with the world in external service the thing that is not God, ye deceive yourselves; for both the body and the soul must concur together in the honour of God, as St. Paul plainly teaches, 1 Cor. 6. For if an honest wife be bound to give both heart and body to faith and service in marriage, and if an honest wife's faith in the heart cannot stand with a whorish or defiled body outwardly; much less can the true faith of a christian, in the service of christianity, stand with the bodily service of external idolatry: for the mystery of marriage is not so honourable between man and wife, as it is between Christ and every christian man, as St. Paul saith.

Therefore, dear brethren, pray to the heavenly Father, that as he spared not the soul nor the body of his dearly beloved Son, but applied both of them with extreme pain to work our salvation both of body and soul; so he will give us all grace to apply our bodies and souls to be servants unto him: for doubtless he requireth as well the one as the other, and cannot be discontented with the one and well pleased with the other. Either he hateth both, or loveth both; he divideth not his love to one, and his hatred to the other. Let not us therefore, good brethren, divide ourselves, and say, our souls serve him, whatsoever our bodies do to the contrary for civil order and policy.

But, alas, I know by myself what troubleth you, that is, the great danger of the world, that will revenge (ye think) your service to God with sword and fire, with loss of goods and lands. But, dear brethren, weigh on the other side, that your enemies and God's enemies shall not do so much as they would, but as much as God shall suffer them, who can trap them in their own counsels, and destroy them in the midst of their furies. Remember ye be the workmen of the Lord, and called into his vineyard, there to labour till evening-tide, that you may receive your penny, which is more worth than all the kingdoms of the earth. But he that calleth us into his vineyard, hath not told us how ſore and how fervently the ſun ſhall trouble us in our labour: but hath bid us labour: and commit the bitterneſs thereof unto him; who can and will ſo moderate all afflictions, that no man ſhall have more laid upon him, than in Chriſt he ſhall be able to bear. Unto whoſe merciful tuition and defence I commend both your ſouls and bodies. Septemb. 2. 1554.

Yours with my poor prayer,
John Hooper.

To a Merchant of London, by whoſe means he had received much Comfort in his great Neceſſity in the Fleet.

GRACE, mercy, and peace in Chriſt Jeſus our Lord. I thank God and you for the great help and conſolation I have received in the time of adverſity by your charitable means; but moſt rejoice that you be not altered from truth, although falſhood cruelly ſeeketh to diſtain her. Judge not, my brother, truth by outward appearance; for truth now worſe appeareth, and more vilely is rejected than falſhood. Leave the outward ſhew, and ſee by the word of God what truth is, and accept truth, and diſlike her not, though man call her falſhood. As it is now, ſo it hath been heretofore, the truth rejected and falſhood received. Such as have profeſſed truth, for truth have ſmarted, and the friends of falſhood laughed them to ſcorn. The trial of both hath been by contrary ſucceſs: the one having the commendation of truth by man, but the condemnation of falſhood by God, flouriſhing for a time, with endleſs deſtruction; the other afflicted a little ſeaſon, but ending with immortal joys. Wherefore, dear brother, aſk and demand of your book, the teſtament of Jeſus Chriſt, in thoſe woful and wretched days, what you ſhould think, and what you ſhould ſtay upon for a certain truth, and whatſoever you hear taught, try it by your book, whether it be true or falſe. The days be dangerous and full of peril, not only for the world and worldly things, but for heaven and heavenly things. It is a trouble to loſe the treaſure of this life, but yet a very pain, if it be kept with the offence of God. Cry, call, pray, and in Chriſt daily require help, ſuccour, mercy, wiſdom, grace and defence, that the wickedneſs of this world prevail not againſt us. We began well, God preſerve us until the end. I would write more often unto you, but I do perceive you be at ſo much charges with me, that I fear you would think when I write, I crave. Send me nothing till I ſend to you for it; and ſo tell the good men your partners: and when I need, I will be bold with you. December 3. 1554.

Yours with my prayer,
John Hooper.

To Mrs. Wilkinſon, a Woman hearty in God's Cauſe, and comfortable to his afflicted Members.

THE grace of God, and the comfort of his Holy Spirit be with you. Amen.

I am very glad to hear of your health, and do thank you for your loving tokens. But I am a great deal more glad to hear how chriſtianly you avoid idolatry, and prepare yourſelf to ſuffer the extremity of the world, rather than to endanger yourſelf to God. You do as you ought to do in this behalf; and in ſuffering of tranſitory pains, you ſhall avoid permanent torments in the world to come. Uſe your life, and keep it with as much quietneſs as you can, ſo that you offend not God. The eaſe that cometh of his diſpleaſure, turneth at length to unſpeakable pains; and the gains of the world, with the loſs of his favour, is beggary and wretchedneſs. Reaſon is to be amended in this cauſe of religion: for it will chuſe and follow an error with the multitude, if it may be allowed, rather than turn to faith and follow the truth with the people of God. Moſes found the ſame fault in himſelf, and did amend it, chuſing rather to be afflicted with the people of God, than to uſe the liberty of the king's daughter, that accounted him as her ſon. Pray for contentation and peace of the Spirit, and rejoice in ſuch troubles as ſhall happen to you for the truth's ſake: for in that part Chriſt ſaith, you be happy. Pray alſo for me, I pray you, that I may do in all things the will of our heavenly Father: to whoſe tuition and defence I commend you.

To my dear Friends in God, Mr. John Hall, and his Wife.

THE grace of God be with you, Amen. I thank you for your loving and gentle friendſhip at all times, praying to God to ſhew unto you ſuch favour, that whatſoever trouble and adverſity happen, ye go not back from him. Theſe days be dangerous and full of peril; but yet let us comfort ourſelves in calling to remembrance the days of our forefathers, upon whom the Lord ſent ſuch troubles, that many hundreds, yea, many thouſands died for the teſtimony of Jeſus Chriſt, both men and women, ſuffering with patience and conſtancy as much cruelty as tyrants could deviſe, and ſo departed out of this miſerable world to the bliſs everlaſting, whereas now they remain for ever, looking always for the end of this ſinful world, when they ſhall receive their bodies again in immortality, and ſee the number of the elect aſſociated with them in full and conſummate joys: and as virtuous men ſuffering martyrdom, and tarrying a little while in this world with pains, by and by reſted in joys everlaſting; and as their pains ended their ſorrows, and began eaſe; ſo did their conſtancy and ſtedfaſtneſs animate and confirm all good people in the truth, and gave them encouragement and luſt to ſuffer the like, rather than to fall with the world to conſent unto wickedneſs and idolatry. Wherefore, my dear friends, ſeeing God of his part hath illuminated you with the ſame gift and knowledge of true faith, wherein the apoſtles and evangeliſts, and all martyrs ſuffered moſt cruel death; thank him for his grace in knowledge, and pray unto him for ſtrength and perſeverance, that through your own fault ye be not aſhamed or afraid to confeſs it. Yet ye be in the truth, and the gates of hell ſhall never prevail againſt it, nor Antichriſt with all his imps can prove it to be falſe. They may kill and perſecute, but never overcome. Be of good comfort, and fear God more than man. This life is ſhort and miſerable: happy be they that can ſpend it to the glory of God. Pray for me, as I do for you, and commend me to all good men and women. December 22. 1554.

Your brother in Chriſt,
John Hooper.

To my dearly beloved Siſter in the Lord, Mrs. Ann Warcop.

THE grace of God be with you, Amen, I thank you for your loving token. I pray you burthen not yourſelf too much. It were meet for me rather to bear a pain, than to be a hindrance to many. I did rejoice at the coming of this bearer, to underſtand of your conſtancy, and how that ye be fully reſolved, by God's grace, rather to ſuffer extremity, than to go from the truth of God which you have poſſeſſed. He that gave you grace to begin ſo infallible a truth, will follow you in the ſame unto the end. But, my loving ſiſter, as you be travelling this perilous journey, take this leſſon with you, practiſed by by wiſe men; whereof you may read in the ſecond of St. Matthew's goſpel. Such as travelled to find Chriſt, followed only the ſtar, and as long as they ſaw it, they were aſſured they were in the right way, and had great mirth in their journey. But when they entered into Jeruſalem, whereas the ſtar led them not thither, but unto Bethlehem, and there aſked the citizens the thing that the ſtar ſhewed before; as long as they tarried in Jeruſalem, and would be inſtructed where Chriſt was born, they were not only ignorant of Bethlehem, but alſo loſt the ſight of the ſtar that led them before. Whereof we learn, in any caſe, whilſt we be going in this life to ſeek Chriſt that is above, to beware that we loſe not the ſtar of God's word, that only is the mark that ſheweth us where Chriſt is, and which way we may come unto him. But as Jeruſalem ſtood in the way, and was an impediment to theſe wiſe men: ſo doth the ſynagogue of Antichriſt, that beareth the name of Jeruſalem, which by interpretation is called the viſion of peace, and amongſt the people now is called the catholic church, ſtand in the way that pilgrims muſt go by through this world to Bethlehem, the houſe of ſaturity and plentifulneſs, and is an impediment to all chriſtian travellers; yea, and except the more grace of God be, will keep the pilgrims ſtill in her, that they ſhall not come where Chriſt is at all. And to ſtay them indeed, they take away the ſtar of light, which is God's word, that it cannot be ſeen: as you may ſee how the celeſtial ſtar was hid from the wiſe men, when they aſked of the phariſees at Jeruſalem, where Chriſt was born. Ye may ſee what great dangers happened unto theſe wiſe men, whilſt they were learning of lyars, where Chriſt was. Firſt, they were out of their way, and next they loſt their guide and conductor, the heavenly ſtar. Chriſt is mounted from us into heaven, and there we ſeek him (as we ſay), and let us go thitherward by the ſtar of his word, beware we happen not to come into Jeruſalem, the church of men, and aſk for him. If we do, we go out of the way, and loſe alſo our conductor and guide that only leadeth us ſtraight thither.

The poets write in fables, that Jaſon, when he fought with the dragon in the iſle of Colchis, was preſerved by the medicines of Medea, and ſo wan the golden fleece. And they write alſo that Phaeton, whom they fain to be the ſon and heir of the high god Jupiter, would needs upon a day have the conduction of the ſun round about the world; but, as they feigned, he miſſed of the accuſtomed courſe: whereupon when he went too high, he burned heaven; and when he went too low, he burned the earth and the water. Theſe prophane hiſtories do ſhame us that be chriſtian men. Jaſon againſt the poiſon of the dragon uſed only the medicine of Medea. What a ſhame is it for a chriſtian man againſt the poiſon of the devil, hereſy, and ſin, to uſe any other remedy than Chriſt and his word? Phaeton, for lack of knowledge, was afraid of every ſign of the zodiac, that the ſun paſſeth by: wherefore he went now too low, and now too high, and at length fell down and drowned himſelf in the ſea. Chriſtian men for lack of knowledge, and for fear of ſuch dangers as chriſtian men muſt needs paſs by, go clean out of order, and at length fall into the pit of hell.

Siſter, take heed; you ſhall in your journey towards heaven meet with many a monſtrous beaſt: have ſalve of God's word therefore ready. You ſhall meet huſband, children, lovers, and friends, that ſhall, if God be not with them (as God be praiſed he is, I would it were with all other alike), be very lets and impediments to your purpoſe. You ſhall meet with ſlander and contempt of the world, and be accounted ungracious and ungodly; you ſhall hear and meet with cruel tyranny to do you all extremities; you ſhall now and then ſee the troubles of your own conſcience, and feel your own weakneſs; you ſhall hear that you be curſed by the ſentence of the catholic church, with ſuch like terrors: but pray to God, and follow the ſtar of his word, and you ſhall arrive at the port of eternal ſalvation, by the merits only of Jeſus Chriſt: to whom I commend you and all yours moſt heartily.

Yours in Chriſt, John Hooper.

Unto theſe letters of Mr. Hooper before recited, we thought not inconvenient to annex another epiſtle, written to him by a famous learned man Henry Bullinger, chief ſuperintendent of the city of Zurich. Of whoſe ſingular love and tender affection towards Mr. Hooper, ye heard before in the beginning of Mr. Hooper's life. Now how loving he writeth to him, ye ſhall hear by this preſent letter, as followeth.

To the moſt reverend Father Mr. John Hooper, Biſhop of Worceſter and Glouceſter, and now priſoner for the Goſpel of Jeſus Chriſt, my Fellow-Elder, and moſt dear Brother in England.

THE heavenly Father grant unto you, and to all thoſe which are in bands and captivity for his name's ſake, grace and peace through Jeſus Chriſt our Lord, with wiſdom, patience, and fortitude of the Holy Ghoſt.

I have received from you two letters, my moſt dear brother, the former in the month of September of the year paſt, the latter in the month of May in this preſent year, both written out of priſon. But I doubting leſt I ſhould make anſwer to you in vain, whilſt I feared that my letters ſhould never come into your hands, or elſe increaſe and double your ſorrow, did refrain from the duty of writing. In the which thing I doubt not but you will have me excuſed, eſpecially ſeeing you did not vouchſafe, no not once in a whole year, to anſwer to my whole libels rather than letters, whereas I continued ſtill notwithſtanding in writing unto you: as alſo at this preſent, after I heard you were caſt in priſon, I did not refrain from continual prayer, beſeeching our heavenly Father, through our only mediator Jeſus Chriſt, to grant unto you and to your fellow-priſoners faith and conſtancy unto the end. Now is that thing happened unto you, my brother, which we did oftentimes propheſy unto ourſelves, at your being with us, ſhould come to paſs, eſpecially when we did talk of the power of Antichriſt, and of his felicity and victories. For you know the ſaying of Daniel, His power ſhall be mighty, but not his ſtrength, and he ſhall wonderfully deſtroy and make havock of all things, and ſhall proſper and practiſe, and he ſhall deſtroy the mighty and the holy people after his own will. You know what the Lord warned us of beforehand by Matthew, in chap. 10. by John in chap. 15. 16. and alſo what that choſen veſſel St. Paul hath written in the ſecond of Timothy and third chapter. Wherefore I do nothing doubt (by God's grace) of your faith and patience, whilſt you know that thoſe things which you ſuffer are not looked for, or come by chance; but that you ſuffer them in the beſt, trueſt, and moſt holy quarrel: for what can be more true and holy than our doctrine, which the papiſts, thoſe worſhippers of Antichriſt, do perſecute? All things touching ſalvation we attribute unto Chriſt alone, and to his holy inſtitutions, as we have been taught of him and his diſciples: but they would have even the ſame things to be communicated as well to their Antichriſt, and to his inſtitutions. Such we ought no leſs to withſtand than we read that Elias withſtood the Baallites; for if Jeſus be Chriſt, then let them know, that he is the fulneſs of his church, and that perfectly: but if Antichriſt be king and prieſt, then let them exhibit unto him that honour. How long do they halt on both ſides? can they give unto us any one that is better than Chriſt? or who ſhall be equal with Chriſt, that may be compared with him, except it be he whom the apoſtle calleth the adverſary? But if Chriſt be ſufficient for his church, what needeth this patching and piecing? But I know well enough, I need not to uſe theſe diſputations with you which are ſincerely taught, and have taken root in Chriſt, being perſuaded that you have all things in him, and that we in him are made perfect.

and

Go forwards therefore conſtantly to confeſs Chriſt, and to defy Antichriſt, being mindful of this moſt holy and moſt true ſaying of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt; "He that overcometh ſhall poſſeſs all things, and I will be his God, and he ſhall be my ſon: but the fearful, and the unbelieving, and the murderers, and whoremongers, and ſorcerers, and idolaters, and all lyars, ſhall have their part in the lake which burneth with fire and brimſtone, which is the ſecond death." The firſt death is ſoon overcome, although a man muſt burn for the Lord's ſake: for they ſay well that do affirm this our fire to be ſcarcely a ſhadow of that which is prepared for unbelievers, and them that fall from the truth. Moreover, the Lord granteth unto us, that we may eaſily overcome by his power the firſt death, which he himſelf did taſte and overcome; promiſing withal ſuch joys as never ſhall have end, unſpeakable, and paſſing all underſtanding, which we ſhall poſſeſs ſo ſoon as ever we do depart hence. For ſo again ſaith the angel of the Lord: "If any man worſhip the beaſt and his image, and receive his mark in his forehead, or on his hand, the ſame ſhall drink of the wrath of God; yea, of the wine which is poured into the cup of his wrath, and he ſhall be tormented in fire and brimſtone before the holy angels, and before the Lamb: and the ſmoak of their torment ſhall aſcend evermore, and they ſhall have no reſt day nor night which worſhip the beaſt and his image, and whoſoever receiveth the print of his name." Here is the patience of ſaints; here are they that keep the commandments of God, and the faith of Jeſus. To this he addeth by and by; "I heard a voice ſaying to me, write, bleſſed are the dead that die in the Lord, from henceforth, or ſpeedily, they be bleſſed, John 5. even ſo ſaith the Spirit; for they reſt from their labours, but their works follow them: for our labour ſhall not be fruſtrate or in vain."

Therefore ſeeing you have ſuch a large promiſe, be ſtrong in the Lord, fight a good fight, be faithful to the Lord unto the end: conſider that Chriſt the Son of God is your captain, and fighteth for you, and that all the prophets, apoſtles, and martyrs, are your fellow-ſoldiers. They that perſecute and trouble us, are men ſinful and mortal, whoſe favour a wiſe man would not buy with the value of a farthing: and beſides that our life is frail, ſhort, brittle and tranſitory. Happy are we if we depart in the Lord, who grant unto you, and to all your fellow-priſoners, faith and conſtancy. Commend me to the moſt reverend fathers and holy confeſſors of Chriſt, Dr. Cranmer biſhop of Canterbury, Dr. Ridley biſhop of London, and the good old father Dr. Latimer. Them and all the reſt of the priſoners with you for the Lord's cauſe, ſalute in my name, and in the name of all my fellow miniſters, the which do ſpeak unto you the grace of God, and conſtancy in the truth.

Concerning the ſtate of our church, it remaineth even as it was when you departed from us into your country. God grant we may be thankful to him, and that we do not only profeſs the faith with words, but alſo expreſs the ſame effectually with good works, to the praiſe of our Lord. The word of God increaſeth daily in that part of Italy that is near unto us, and in France.

In the mean while the godly ſuſtain grievous perſecutions, and with great conſtancy and glory, through torments they go unto the Lord. I and all my houſhold, with my ſon-in-law and kinſmen, are in good health in the Lord. They do ſalute you, and pray for your conſtancy, being ſorrowful for you and the reſt of the priſoners. There came to us Engliſhmen ſtudents, both godly and learned. They be received of our magiſtrate. Ten of them dwell together, the reſt remain here and there with good men. Amongſt others, Mr. Thomas Lever is dear unto me, and familiar. If there be any thing wherein I may do any pleaſure to your wife and children, they ſhall have me wholly at commandment: whereof I will write alſo to your wife, for I underſtand ſhe abideth at Frankfort. Be ſtrong and merry in Chriſt, waiting for his deliverance, when, and in what ſort it ſhall ſeem good unto him. The Lord Jeſus ſhew pity upon the realm of England, and illuminate the ſame with his Holy Spirit, to the glory of his name, and the ſalvation of ſouls. The Lord Jeſus preſerve and deliver you from all evil, with all them that call upon his name. Farewel, and farewel eternally. October 10. 1554. From Zurich.

The Life and Acts of Dr. Rowland Taylor, who ſuffered Martyrdom February 9. 1555.

THE town of Hadley was one of the firſt that received the word of God in all England, at the preaching of Mr. Thomas Bilney; by whoſe induſtry the goſpel of Chriſt had ſuch good ſucceſs, and took ſuch root there, that a great number in that pariſh became exceeding well learned in the holy ſcriptures, as well women as men, ſo that a man might have found among them many, that had often read the whole Bible through, and that could have ſaid a great part of St. Paul's epiſtles by heart, and very well and readily have given a godly learned ſentence in any matter of controverſy. Their children and ſervants were alſo brought up and trained ſo diligently in the right knowledge of God's word, that the whole town ſeemed rather an univerſity of the learned, than a town of cloth-making or labouring people. And what is moſt to be commended, they were for the more part faithful followers of God's word in their living.

In this town Doctor Rowland Taylor, Doctor in both the civil and canon laws, and a right perfect divine, was miniſter. Who at his firſt entering into his benefice, did not, as the common ſort of beneficed men do, let out his benefice to a farmer, that ſhall gather up the profits, and ſet in an ignorant unlearned prieſt to ſerve the cure, and ſo they have the fleece, little or nothing care for feeding the flock: But on the contrary, he left Thomas Cranmer, archbiſhop of Canterbury, in whoſe family he before lived, and made his perſonal abode and dwelling in Hadley among the people committed to his charge. Where he, as a good ſhepherd, abiding and dwelling among his ſheep, gave himſelf wholly to the ſtudy of the holy ſcriptures, moſt faithfully endeavouring himſelf to fulfil that charge which the Lord gave unto Peter, ſaying; "Peter, loveſt thou me? Feed my lambs, feed my ſheep, feed my ſheep." This love of Chriſt ſo wrought in him, that no Sunday or Holy-day paſſed, nor other time when he might get the people together, but he preached to them the word of God, the doctrine of their ſalvation.

Not only was his word a preaching unto them, but all his life and converſation was an example of unfeigned chriſtian life and true holineſs. He was void of all pride, humble and meek as any child; ſo that none were ſo poor but they might boldly, as unto their father, reſort unto him: neither was his lowlineſs childiſh or fearful, but as occaſion, time and place required, he would be ſtout in rebuking the ſinful and evil doers; ſo that none was ſo rich but he would tell him plainly his fault, with ſuch earneſt and grave rebukes as became a good curate and paſtor. He was a man very mild, void of all rancour, grudge or evil will, ready to do good to all men, readily forgiving his enemies, and never ſought to do evil to any.

To the poor that were blind, lame, ſick, bed-rid, or that had many children, he was a very father, a careful patron and diligent provider; inſomuch that he cauſed the pariſhoners to make a general proviſion for them: and he himſelf (beſides the continual relief that they always found at his houſe) gave an honeſt portion yearly to the common alms-box. His wife alſo an honeſt, diſcreet creet, and ſober matron, and his children well nurtured, brought up in the fear of God and good learning.

To conclude, he was a right and lively image or patron of all thoſe virtuous qualities deſcribed by St. Paul in a true biſhop, a good ſalt of the earth, ſavourly, biting the corrupt manners of evil men; a light in God's houſe ſet upon a candleſtick for all good men to imitate and follow.

Thus continued this good ſhepherd among his flock, governing and leading them through the wilderneſs of this wicked world, all the days of the moſt innocent and pious king of bleſſed memory, Edward VI. But after it pleaſed God to take king Edward from this vale of miſery unto his moſt bleſſed reſt, the papiſts, who ever diſſembled, both with king Henry VIII. and king Edward his ſon, now ſeeing the time convenient for their purpoſe, uttered their falſe hypocriſy, openly refuſing all good reformation made by the ſaid two kings: and contrary to what they had in theſe two kings days preached, taught, written, and ſworn, they violently overthrew the true doctrine of the goſpel, and perſecuted with ſword and fire all thoſe that would not agree to receive again the Roman biſhop as ſupreme head of the univerſal church, and allow all the errors, ſuperſtitions, and idolatries, that before by God's word were diſproved, and juſtly condemned, as though now they were good doctrine, virtuous, and true religion.

In the beginning of this rage of Antichriſt, a certain petty gentleman, after the ſort of a lawyer, called Foſter, being a ſteward and keeper of courts, a man of no great ſkill, but a bitter perſecutor in thoſe days, with one John Clerk of Hadley, which Foſter had ever been a ſecret favourer of all Romiſh idolatry, conſpired with the ſaid Clerk, to bring in the pope and his idolatry again into Hadley church. For as yet Dr. Taylor, as a good ſhepherd, had retained and kept in his church the godly church-ſervice and reformation made by king Edward, and moſt faithfully and earneſtly preached againſt the popiſh corruptions, which had infected the whole country round about.

Therefore the aforeſaid Foſter and Clerk hired one John Averth, parſon of Aldam, a very money mammoniſt, a blind leader of the blind, a popiſh idolater, and an open whoremonger, a very fit miniſter for their purpoſe, to come to Hadley, and there to give the onſet to begin again the popiſh maſs.

To this purpoſe they built up the altar with all haſte poſſible, intending to bring in their maſs about Palm Monday. But this their device took no effect; for in the night the altar was beaten down. Wherefore they built it up again the ſecond time, and ſet a diligent watch leſt any ſhould again break it down.

On the day following came Foſter and John Clerk, bringing with them their popiſh ſacrificer, who brought with him all his implements and garments to play the popiſh pageant, whom they and their men guarded with ſwords and bucklers, leſt any man ſhould diſturb him in his miſſal ſacrifice.

When Dr. Taylor, who (according to his cuſtom) ſate at his book, ſtudying the word of God, heard the bells ring, he aroſe and went into the church, ſuppoſing ſomething had been there to be done, according to his paſtoral office: and coming to the church, he found the church doors ſhut and faſt barred, ſaving the chancel door, which was only latched. Where he entering in, and coming in the chancel, ſaw a popiſh ſacrificer in his robes, with a broad new ſhaven crown, ready to begin his popiſh ſacrifice, beſet round with drawn ſwords and bucklers, leſt any man ſhould approach to diſturb him.

Then ſaid Dr. Taylor, Thou devil, who made thee ſo bold to enter into this church of Chriſt, to prophane and defile it with this abominable idolatry? With that Foſter ſtarts up, and with an angry and furious countenance ſaid to Dr. Taylor; Thou traitor, what doeſt thou here, to hinder and diſturb the queen's proceedings? Dr. Taylor anſwered, I am no traitor, but I am the ſhepherd that God my Lord Chriſt hath appointed to feed this his flock; wherefore I have good authority to be here: and I command thee, thou popiſh wolf, in the name of God, to avoid hence, and not to preſume here with ſuch popiſh idolatry to poiſon Chriſt's flock.

Then ſaid Foſter, Wilt thou traiterouſly, heretic, make a commotion, and reſiſt violently the queen's proceedings?

Dr. Taylor anſwered, I make no commotion, but it is you papiſts that make commotions and tumults. I reſiſt only with God's word, againſt your popiſh idolatries, which are againſt God's word, the queen's honour, and tend to the utter ſubverſion of this realm of England. And further, thou doſt againſt the law, which commandeth, that no maſs be ſaid but at a conſecrate altar.

When the parſon of Aldam heard that, he began to ſhrink back, and would have left his ſaying of maſs: then ſtarts up John Clerk, and ſaid, Maſter Averth, be not afraid, you have a Super-altare, go forth with your buſineſs, man.

Then Foſter, with his armed men, took Dr. Taylor, and led him with ſtrong hand out of the church, and the popiſh prieſt proceeded in his Romiſh idolatry. Dr. Taylor's wife, who followed her huſband into the church, when ſhe ſaw her huſband thus violently thruſt out, kneeled down and held up her hands, and with a loud voice ſaid; "I beſeech God the righteous Judge to avenge the injury that this popiſh idolater this day doth to the blood of Chriſt." Then they thruſt her out of the church alſo, and ſhut the doors; for they feared that the people would have rent their ſacrificer in pieces. Notwithſtanding one or two threw in great ſtones at the windows, and miſſed very little the popiſh maſſer.

Thus you ſee, how without conſent of the people the popiſh maſs was again ſet up with battle array, with ſwords and bucklers, with violence and tyranny: which practice the papiſts have ever yet uſed. As for reaſon, law, or ſcripture, they have none on their part. Therefore they are the ſame that ſay: The law of unrighteouſneſs is our ſtrength: come, let us oppreſs the righteous without any fear, &c.

Within a day or two after, with all haſte poſſible, this Foſter and Clerk made a complaint of Dr. Taylor, by a letter written to Stephen Gardiner biſhop of Wincheſter, and lord chancellor.

When the biſhop heard this, he ſent a letter miſſive to Dr. Taylor, commanding him within certain days to come and to appear before him upon his allegiance, to anſwer ſuch complaints as were made againſt him.

When Dr. Taylor's friends heard of this, they were exceeding ſorry and grieved in mind: foreſeeing to what end the ſame matter would come, ſeeing that all truth and juſtice were trodden under foot, and falſhood with cruel tyranny were ſet aloft and bore the ſway: his friends, I ſay, came to him, and earneſtly counſelled him to depart and fly, alledging and declaring unto him, that he could neither be indifferently heard to ſpeak his conſcience and mind, nor yet look for juſtice or favour from the ſaid chancellor, who, as it is well known, was moſt fierce and cruel; but muſt needs (if he went up to him) wait for impriſonment and cruel death at his hands.

Then ſaid Dr. Taylor to his friends, Dear friends, I moſt heartily thank you, for that you have ſo tender a care over me. And although I know that there is neither juſtice nor truth to be looked for at my adverſaries hands, but rather impriſonment and cruel death; yet know I my cauſe to be ſo good and righteous, and the truth ſo ſtrong upon my ſide, that I will by God's grace go and appear before them, and to their beards reſiſt their falſe doing.

Then ſaid his friends, Maſter Doctor, we think it not beſt ſo to do. You have ſufficiently done your duty, and teſtified the truth both by your godly ſermons, and alſo in reſiſting the parſon of Aldam, with others that came hither to bring again the popiſh maſs. And foraſmuch as our Saviour Chriſt willeth and biddeth us, that when they perſecute us in one city, we ſhould fly into another; we think in flying at this time ye would do beſt, keeping yourſelf againſt another time, when the church ſhall have great need of ſuch diligent teachers, and godly paſtors.

Oh, quoth Dr. Taylor, what will ye have me to do? I am old, and have already lived too long to ſee theſe terrible and moſt wicked days. Fly you, and do as your conſcience leadeth you; I am fully determined, with God's grace, to go to the biſhop, and tell him to his face that he doth naught: God ſhall well hereafter raiſe up teachers of his people, who ſhall with much more diligence and fruit teach them than I have done. For God will not forſake his church, though now for a time he trieth and correcteth us, and not without a juſt cauſe. As for me, I believe before God, I ſhall be never able to do God ſo good ſervice, as I may do now; nor ſhall I ever have ſo glorious a calling as I now have, nor ſo great mercy of God proffered me, as is now at this preſent. For what chriſtian man would not gladly die againſt the pope and his adherents? I know that the papacy is the kingdom of Antichriſt, altogether full of lyes, altogether full of falſhood; ſo that all their doctrine, even from Chriſt's croſs be my ſpeed, and St. Nicholas unto the end of their apocalypſe, is nothing but idolatry, ſuperſtition, errors, hypocriſy, and lyes. Wherefore I beſeech you, and all other my friends, to pray for me, and I doubt not but God will give me ſtrength and his Holy Spirit, that all mine adverſaries ſhall have ſhame of their doings.

When his friends ſaw him ſo conſtant, and fully determined to go, they, with weeping eyes, commended him to God; and he within a day or two prepared himſelf to his journey, leaving his cure with a godly old prieſt, named Sir Richard Yeoman, who afterwards for God's truth was burnt at Norwich.

There was alſo in Hadley one Alcock, a very pious man, well learned in the holy ſcriptures, who after Sir Richard Yeoman was driven away, uſed daily to read a chapter, and to ſay the Engliſh Litany in Hadley church: but him they fetched up to London, and caſt him in priſon in Newgate; where after a year's impriſonment he died.

But let us return to Dr. Taylor again, who being accompanied with a ſervant of his own, named John Hull, took his journey towards London. By the way, this John Hull laboured to counſel and perſuade him very earneſtly to fly, and not come to the biſhop, and proffered himſelf to go with him to ſerve him, and in all perils to venture his life for him and with him.

But in no wiſe would Dr. Taylor conſent or agree thereunto, but ſaid, Oh John, ſhall I give place to this thy counſel and worldly perſuaſion, and leave my flock in this danger? Remember the good ſhepherd Chriſt, who not only fed his flock, but alſo died for his flock. Him muſt I follow, and with God's grace will do. Therefore good John, pray for me, and if thou ſeeſt me weak at any time, comfort me, and diſcourage me not in this my godly enterpriſe and purpoſe. Thus they came up to London, and ſhortly after Dr. Taylor preſented himſelf to Stephen Gardiner biſhop of Wincheſter, then lord chancellor of England.

For this hath been one great abuſe in England theſe many years, that ſuch offices as have been of moſt importance and weight have commonly been committed to biſhops and other ſpiritual men, whereby three deviliſh miſchiefs and inconveniencies have happened in this realm, to the great diſhonour of God, and utterly neglecting of the flock of Chriſt: which three be theſe:

Firſt, they have had ſmall leiſure to attend to their paſtoral cures, which thereby have been utterly neglected and undone.

Secondly, it hath alſo puft up many biſhops and other ſpiritual perſons, into ſuch haughtineſs and pride, that they have thought no nobleman in the realm worthy to be their equal and fellow.

Thirdly, where they by this means knew the very ſecrets of princes, they being in ſuch high offices, have cauſed the ſame to be known in Rome before the kings could accompliſh and bring their intents to paſs in England. By this means hath the papacy been ſo maintained, and things ordered after their wills and pleaſures, that much miſchief hath happened in this realm and others, ſometimes to the deſtruction of princes, and ſometimes to the utter undoing of many commonwealths.

Now when biſhop Gardiner ſaw Dr. Taylor, he, according to his common cuſtom, reviled him, calling him knave, traytor, heretic, with many other villainous reproaches, which Dr. Taylor heard patiently, and at laſt ſaid unto him:

My lord, quoth he, I am neither traitor nor heretic, but a true ſubject, and a faithful chriſtian man, and am come, according to your commandment, to know what is the cauſe that your lordſhip hath ſent for me.

Then, ſaid the biſhop, art thou come, thou villain? how dareſt thou look me in the face for ſhame? knoweſt thou not who I am?

Yes, quoth Dr. Taylor, I know who you are. Ye are Dr. Stephen Gardiner biſhop of Wincheſter, and lord chancellor, and yet but a mortal man I trow. But if I ſhould be afraid of your lordly looks, why fear you not God, the Lord of us all? how dare ye for ſhame look any chriſtian man in the face, ſeeing ye have forſaken the truth, denied our Saviour Chriſt and his word, and done contrary to your own oath and writing? with what countenance will ye appear before the judgment-ſeat of Chriſt, and anſwer to your oath made firſt unto king Henry VIII. and afterwards to king Edward VI. his ſon?

The biſhop anſwered, Tuſh, tuſh, that was Herod's oath, unlawful; and therefore worthy to be broken: I have done well in breaking it; and I thank God, I am come home again to our mother, the catholic church of Rome, and ſo I would thou ſhouldeſt do.

Dr. Taylor anſwered, ſhould I forſake the church of Chriſt, which is founded upon the true foundation of the apoſtles and prophets, to approve thoſe lyes, errors, ſuperſtition, and idolatries, that the popes and their company at this day ſo blaſphemouſly do approve? nay, God forbid. Let the pope and his return to our Saviour Chriſt and his word, and thruſt out of the church ſuch abominable idolatries as he maintaineth, and then will chriſtian men turn unto him. You wrote truly againſt him, and were ſworn againſt him.

I tell thee, quoth the biſhop of Wincheſter, it was Herod's oath, unlawful; and therefore ought to be broken, and not kept: and our holy father the pope hath diſcharged me of it.

Then ſaid Dr. Taylor, But you ſhall not ſo be diſcharged before Chriſt, who doubtleſs will require it at your hands, as a lawful oath made to our liege and ſovereign lord the king, from whoſe obedience no man can quit you, neither the pope nor any of his.

I ſee, quoth the biſhop, thou art an arrogant knave, and a very fool.

My lord, quoth Dr. Taylor, leave your unſeemly railing at me, which is not ſeemly for ſuch an one in authority as you are. For I am a chriſtian man, and you know, that "He that ſaith to his brother, Racha, is in danger of a council; and he that ſaith, Thou fool, is in danger of hell fire."

The biſhop anſwered, Ye are falſe, and lyars all the ſort of you. Nay, quoth Dr. Taylor, we are true men, and know that it is written, "The mouth that lyeth, ſlayeth the ſoul:" And again, "Lord God, thou ſhalt deſtroy all that ſpeak lyes." And therefore we abide by the truth of God's word, which ye, contrary to your own conſciences, deny and forſake.

Thou

Thou art married, ſaid the biſhop. Yea, quoth Dr. Taylor, that I thank God I am, and have had nine children, and all in lawful matrimony; and bleſſed be God that ordained matrimony, aud commanded that every man that hath not the gift of continency, ſhould marry a wife of his own, and not live in adultery or whoredom.

Then ſaid the biſhop, Thou haſt reſiſted the queen's proceedings, and wouldeſt not ſuffer the parſon of Aldam, a very virtuous and devout prieſt, to ſay maſs in Hadley. Dr. Taylor anſwered, My lord, I am parſon of Hadley, and it is againſt all right, conſcience, and laws, that any man ſhould come into my charge, and preſume to infect the flock committed unto me, with venom of the popiſh idolatrous maſs.

With that the biſhop waxed very angry, and ſaid, Thou art a blaſphemous heretic indeed, that blaſphemeſt the bleſſed ſacrament (and put off his cap) and ſpeakeſt againſt the holy maſs, which is made a ſacrifice for the quick and the dead. Dr. Taylor anſwered, Nay, I blaſpheme not the bleſſed ſacrament which Chriſt inſtituted, but I reverence it as a true chriſtian man ought to do, and confeſs, that Chriſt ordained the holy communion in the remembrance of his death and paſſion, which when we keep according to his ordinance, we, through faith, eat the body of Chriſt, and drink his blood, giving thanks for our redemption; and this is our ſacrifice for the quick and the dead, to give thanks for his merciful goodneſs ſhewed to us, in that he gave his Son Chriſt unto the death for us.

Thou ſayeſt well, ſaid the biſhop. It is all that thou haſt ſaid, and more too; for it is a propitiatory ſacrifice for the quick and the dead. Then anſwered Dr. Taylor, Chriſt gave himſelf to die for our redemption upon the croſs, whoſe body there offered was the propitiatory ſacrifice, full, perfect, and ſufficient unto ſalvation for all them that believe in him. And this ſacrifice did our Saviour Chriſt offer in his own perſon himſelf once for all, neither can any prieſt any more offer him, nor need we any more propitiatory ſacrifice: and therefore I ſay with Chryſoſtom, and all the doctors; Our ſacrifice is only memorative, in the remembrance of Chriſt's death and paſſion, a ſacrifice of thankſgiving; and therefore the fathers called it Euchariſtia: and no other ſacrifice hath the church of God.

It is true, quoth the biſhop, the ſacrament is called Euchariſtia, a thankſgiving, becauſe we there give thanks for our redemption, and it is alſo a ſacrifice propitiatory for the quick and the dead, which thou ſhalt confeſs ere thou and I have done. Then the biſhop called his men, and ſaid, Have this fellow hence, and carry him to the King's Bench, and charge the keeper he be ſtraitly kept.

Then Dr. Taylor kneeled down, and held up both his hands, and ſaid, Good Lord, I thank thee; and from the tyranny of the biſhop of Rome, and all his deteſtable errors, idolatries, and abominations, good Lord deliver us: and God be praiſed for good king Edward. So they carried him to priſon to the King's Bench, where he lay priſoner almoſt two years.

This is the ſum of their firſt talk, as I ſaw it mentioned in a letter that Dr. Taylor wrote to a friend of his, thanking God for his grace, that he had confeſſed his truth, and was found worthy for truth to ſuffer priſon and bands, beſeeching his friends to pray for him, that he might perſevere conſtant unto the end.

Being in priſon, Dr. Taylor ſpent all his time in prayer, reading the holy ſcriptures, writing, preaching, and exhorting the priſoners, and ſuch as reſorted to him, to repentance and amendment of life.

Within a few days after, ſeveral other learned and godly men in ſundry counties of England were committed to priſon for religion, that almoſt all the priſons in England were become right chriſtian ſchools and churches; ſo that there was no greater comfort for chriſtian hearts, than to come to the priſons to behold their virtuous converſation, and to hear their prayers, preachings, moſt godly exhortations, and conſolations.

Now were placed in churches blind and ignorant maſsmongers, with their Latin babblings and apiſh ceremonies; who like cruel wolves ſpared not to murder all ſuch as did but whiſper againſt their popery. As for the godly preachers who were in king Edward's time, they were either fled the realm, or elſe, as the prophets did in king Ahab's days, they were privily kept in corners. As many as the papiſts could lay hold on, they were ſent into priſon, there as lambs waiting when the butchers would call them to the ſlaughter.

When Dr. Taylor was come into the priſon of the King's Bench, he found therein the virtuous and vigilant preacher of God's word, Mr. Bradford; which man for his innocent and pious living, his devout and virtuous preaching, was worthily counted a miracle of our time, as even his adverſaries muſt needs confeſs. Finding this man in priſon, he began to exhort him to faith, ſtrength, and patience, and to perſevere conſtant unto the end. Mr. Bradford hearing this, thanked God that he had provided him ſuch a comfortable priſon-fellow; and ſo they both together praiſed God, and continued in prayer, reading, and exhorting one another: inſomuch that Dr. Taylor told his friends that came to viſit him, that God had moſt graciouſly provided for him, to ſend him to that priſon where he found ſuch an angel of God, to be in his company to comfort him.

After that Dr. Taylor had lain ſome time in priſon, he was cited to appear in the arches at Bow church, to anſwer unto ſuch matter as ſhould be there objected againſt him. At the day appointed he was led thither, his keeper waiting upon him. Where when he came, he ſtoutly and ſtrongly defended his marriage, affirming by the ſcriptures of God, by the doctors of the primitive church, by both laws civil and canon, that it is lawful for prieſts to marry, and that ſuch as have not the gift of continency are bound in pain of damnation to marry. This he did ſo plainly prove, that the judge could give no ſentence of divorce againſt him, but gave ſentence he ſhould be deprived of his benefice, becauſe he was married.

You do me wrong then, quoth Dr. Taylor, and alledged many laws and conſtitutions for himſelf; but all prevailed not. For he was again carried to priſon, and his livings taken away, and given to another. As for Hadley benefice, it was given or ſold, I know not which, to one Mr. Newealle, whoſe great virtues were altogether unlike to Dr. Taylor his predeceſſor, as the poor pariſhioners full well have found.

After a year and three quarters, or thereabouts, in which time the papiſts got certain old tyrannous laws which were put down by king Henry VIII. and by king Edward, to be again revived by parliament; ſo that now they might, Ex officio, cite whom they would, upon their own ſuſpicion, and charge him with what articles they pleaſed, and except they in all things agreed to their purpoſe, burn them: when theſe laws were once eſtabliſhed, they ſent for Dr. Taylor with ſeveral other priſoners, who were again convented before the chancellor and other commiſſioners about January. The purport and effect of which talk between them, becauſe it is ſufficiently deſcribed by himſelf in his own letter written to a friend of his, I have annexed the ſaid letter as followeth.

A Letter of Dr. Taylor, containing the Diſcourſe had between him and the Lord Chancellor, and other Commiſſioners, January 22.

WHereas you would have me to write the talk between the king and queen's moſt honourable council and me on Tueſday January 22. ſo far as I remember. Firſt my lord chancellor ſaid, You among others are at this this preſent time ſent for, to enjoy the king's and queen's majeſties favour and mercy, if you will now riſe again with us from the fall which we generally have received in this realm, from which (God be praiſed) we are now clearly delivered, miraculouſly. If you will not riſe with us now, and receive mercy now offered, you ſhall have judgment according to your demerit. To this I anſwered, That ſo to riſe, ſhould be the greateſt fall that ever I could receive; for I ſhould ſo fall from my dear Saviour Chriſt to Antichriſt: for I do believe, that the religion ſet forth in king Edward's days, was according to the vein of the holy ſcripture, which containeth fully all the rules of our chriſtian religion, from which I do not intend to decline ſo long as I live, by God's grace.

Then Mr. Secretary Bourne ſaid; Which of the religions mean ye of in king Edward's days? For ye know there were divers books of religion ſet forth in his days. There was a religion ſet forth in a catechiſm by my lord of Canterbury. Do you mean that you will ſtick to that?

I anſwered, My lord of Canterbury made a catechiſm to be tranſlated into Engliſh, which book was not of his own making; yet he ſet it forth in his own name: and truly that book for the time did much good. But there was after that ſet forth by the moſt innocent king Edward (for whom God be praiſed everlaſtingly) the whole church-ſervice, with great deliberation, and the advice of the beſt learned men in the realm, and authoriſed by the whole parliament, and received and publiſhed gladly by the whole realm: which book was never reformed but once, and yet by that one reformation it was ſo fully perfected, according to the rules of our chriſtian religion in every behalf, that no chriſtian conſcience could be offended with any thing therein contained; I mean of that book reformed.

Then my lord chancellor ſaid, Didſt thou never read the book that I ſet forth of the ſacrament?

I anſwered, that I had read it.

Then he ſaid, How likeſt thou that book? With that one of the council (whoſe name I know not) ſaid, My lord, that is a good queſtion; for I am ſure that book ſtoppeth all their mouths. Then ſaid I, My lord, I think many things be far wide from the truth of God's word in that book.

Then my lord ſaid, Thou art a very varlet. To that I anſwered, That is as ill as Racha, or Fool.

Then my lord ſaid, Thou art an ignorant beetle-brow. To that I anſwered, I have read over and over again the holy ſcriptures, and St. Auguſtine's works through, St. Cyprian, Euſebius, Origen, Gregory Nazianzen, with ſeveral other books through: once therefore, I thank God, I am not utterly ignorant. Beſides theſe, my lord, I profeſſed the civil laws, as your lordſhip did, and I have read over the canon law alſo.

Then my lord ſaid, With a corrupt judgment thou readeſt all things: touching my profeſſion, it is divinity, in which I have written ſeveral books. Then ſaid I, My lord, ye did write one book, De vera obedientia; I would you had been conſtant in that: for indeed you never did declare a good conſcience that I heard of but in that one book.

Then my lord ſaid, Tut, tut, tut, I wrote againſt Bucer in prieſts marriages: but ſuch books pleaſe not ſuch wretches as thou art, who haſt been married many years.

To that I anſwered, I am married indeed, and I have had nine children in holy matrimony, I thank God: and this I am ſure of, that your proceedings now at this time againſt prieſts marriages, is the maintenance of the doctrine of devils, againſt natural law, civil law, canon law, general councils, canons of the apoſtles, ancient doctors, and God's laws.

Then my lord of Durham ſpake, ſaying, You have profeſſed the civil law, as you ſay. Then you know that Juſtinian writeth, That prieſts ſhould at their taking of orders, ſwear that they were never married; and he bringeth in to prove that, Canones Apoſtolorum.

To that I anſwered, That I did not remember any ſuch law of Juſtinian. But I am ſure, that Juſtinian writeth in Titulo de indicta viduitate, in God. That if one would bequeath to his wife in his teſtament a legacy, under a condition that ſhe ſhould never marry again, and take an oath of her for accompliſhing the ſame, yet ſhe may marry again if he die, notwithſtanding the aforeſaid conditions, and oath taken and made againſt marriage: and an oath is another manner of obligation made to God, than is a papiſtical vow made to man.

Moreover, in the Pandects it is contained, that if a man doth ſet free his handmaid, under a condition that ſhe ſhall never marry; yet ſhe may marry, and her patron ſhall loſe Jus Patronatus, for his adding of the unnatural and unlawful condition againſt matrimony.

Then my lord chancellor ſaid, Thou ſayeſt that prieſts may be married by God's law. How proveſt thou that?

I anſwered, By the plain words and ſentences of St. Paul both to Timothy and to Titus, where he ſpeaks moſt evidently of the marriage of prieſts, deacons, and biſhops. And St. Chryſoſtom writing upon the epiſtle to Timothy, ſaith, It is an hereſy to ſay that a biſhop may not be married.

Then ſaid my lord chancellor, Thou lyeſt of Chryſoſtom. But thou doſt as all thy companions do, bely ever without ſhame both the ſcriptures and the doctors. Didſt thou not alſo ſay, that by the canon law, prieſts may be married? which is moſt untrue, and the contrary is moſt true.

I anſwered, We read in the decrees, that the four general councils, Nicene, Conſtantinopolitan, Epheſine, Chalcedon, have the ſame authority that the four evangeliſts have. And we read in the ſame decrees (which is one of the chief books of the canon law) that the council of Nice, by the means of one Paphnutius, did allow prieſts and biſhops marriages: therefore by the beſt part of the canon law prieſts may be married.

Then my lord chancellor ſaid, Thou falſifieſt the general council. For there is expreſs mention in the ſaid decree, That prieſts ſhould be divorced from their wives, which be married.

Then ſaid I, If thoſe words be there, as you ſay, then am I content to loſe this great head of mine; let the book be fetched.

Then ſpake my lord of Durham; Though they be not there, yet they may be in Eccleſiaſtica Hiſtoria, which Euſebius wrote, out of which book the decree was taken.

To that ſaid I, It is not like that the pope would leave out any ſuch ſentence, having ſuch authority, and making ſo much for his purpoſe.

Then my lord chancellor ſaid, Gratian was but a patcher, and thou art glad to ſnatch up ſuch a patch as maketh for thy purpoſe.

I anſwered, My lord, I cannot but marvel that you do call one of the chief papiſts that ever was, but a patcher.

Then my lord chancellor ſaid, Nay I call thee a ſnatcher and patcher. To make an end, wilt thou not return again with us to the catholic church? And with that he roſe.

And I ſaid, By God's grace I will never depart from Chriſt's church. Then I required that I might have ſome of my friends to come to me in priſon; and my lord chancellor ſaid, Thou ſhalt have judgment within this week: and ſo was I delivered again unto my keeper. My lord of Durham would that I ſhould believe as my father and my mother did. I alledged St. Auguſtine, that we ought to prefer God's word before all men.

And thus much was contained in the aforeſaid letter of Dr. Taylor for that matter.

Beſides this letter, he moreover directed another writing in like manner to another friend of his, concerning the cauſes wherefore he was condemned, which we thought proper here to inſert as followeth.

The Copy of another Letter to his Friend, touching his Aſſertions of the Marriage of Prieſts, and other Cauſes for which he was condemned.

IT is hereſy to defend any doctrine againſt the holy Scripture. Therefore the lord chancellor and biſhops conſenting to his ſentence againſt me, be heretics. For they have given ſentence againſt the marriage of prieſts, knowing that St. Paul to Timothy and Titus writeth plainly, that biſhops, prieſts, and deacons, may be married; knowing alſo that, by St. Paul's doctrine, it is the doctrine of devils to inhibit matrimony. And St. Paul willeth every faithful miniſter to teach the people ſo, leſt they be deceived by the marked merchants, 1 Tim. 4.

Theſe biſhops are not ignorant, that it is not only St. Paul's counſel, and lawful, but God's commandment alſo to marry, for ſuch as cannot otherwiſe live chaſte, neither avoid fornication.

They know that ſuch as do marry do not ſin.

They know that God, before ſin was, ordained matrimony, and that in paradiſe, between two of his principal creatures, man and woman.

They know what ſpirit they have, which ſay it is evil to marry (ſeeing God ſaid, It is not good for man to be alone without a wife), having no ſpecial gift, contrary to the general commandment and ordinance, divers times repeated in the book of Geneſis, which is, To increaſe and multiply.

They know that Abraham carried into the land of Canaan his old and yet barren wife, the virtuous woman Sarah, with him, leaving his father, mother, and country, at God's command. For though father and mother and other friends are dear and near, yet none are ſo dearly and nearly joined together, as man and wife in matrimony, which muſt needs be holy, for that is a figure and ſimilitude of Chriſt and his church.

They know that St. Paul giveth a great praiſe to matrimony, calling it honourable, and that not only to and among many, but to and among all men without exception, whoſoever have need of that God's remedy, for man's and woman's infirmity.

They know that if there were any ſin in matrimony, it were chiefly to be thought to be in the bed-company. But St. Paul ſaith, That the bed-company is undefiled.

They know that the having of a wife was not an impediment for Abraham, Moſes, Iſaac, Jacob, David, &c. to talk with God, neither to the levites, biſhops, and prieſts office in the time of the Old Teſtament or the New.

They know that Chriſt would not be conceived, or born of his bleſſed mother, the virgin Mary, before ſhe was eſpouſed in marriage, his own ordinance.

They know, by St. Cyprian and St. Auguſtine, that a vow is not an impediment ſufficient to hinder matrimony, or to divorce the ſame.

They know that St. Chryſoſtom ſaith, It is hereſy to affirm, that a biſhop may not have a wife.

They know that Ambroſe will have no commandment, but counſel only to be given, touching the obſerving of virginity.

They know that Chriſt with his bleſſed mother and the apoſtles were at a marriage, and beatified and honoured the ſame with his preſence, and firſt miracle.

To be ſhort, they know that all that I have here written touching the marriage of prieſts, is true: and they know that the papiſts themſelves do not obſerve, touching that matter, their own laws and canons, and yet they continue marked in conſcience with an hot iron, as deteſtable heretics in this behalf. The Lord give them grace to repent, if it be his good will, Amen.

My ſecond cauſe why I was condemned an heretic is, that I denied tranſubſtantiation and concomitation, two juggling words of the papiſts, by which they do believe, and will compel all others to believe, that Chriſt's natural body is made of bread, and the Godhead by and by to be joined thereunto, ſo that immediately after the words (called the words of conſecration) there is no more bread and wine in the ſacrament, but the ſubſtance only of the body and blood of Chriſt together with his Godhead: ſo that the ſame being now Chriſt, both God and man, ought to be worſhipped with godly honour, and to be offered to God, both for the quick and the dead, as a ſacrifice propitiatory and ſatisfactory for the ſame. This matter was not long debated in words; but becauſe I denied the foreſaid papiſtical doctrine (yea rather, plain, moſt wicked idolatry, blaſphemy, and hereſy), I was judged an heretic.

I did alſo affirm the pope to be Antichriſt, and popery antichriſtianity.

And I confeſſed the doctrine of the Bible to be ſufficient doctrine, touching all and ſingular matters of chriſtian religion, and of ſalvation.

I alſo alledged, that the oath againſt the ſupremacy of the biſhop of Rome, was a lawful oath, and ſo was the oath made by us all, touching the king's or queen's preheminence. For Chryſoſtom ſaith, That apoſtles, evangeliſts, and all men in every realm were ever, and ought to be ever, touching both body and goods, in ſubjection to the kingly authority, who hath the ſword in his hand, as God's principal officer and governor in every realm. I deſired the biſhops to repent for bringing the realm from Chriſt to Antichriſt, from lightneſs to darkneſs, from verity to vanity.

Thus you know the ſum of my laſt examination and condemnation. Pray for me, and I will pray for you.

God be praiſed, ſince my condemnation I was never afraid to die; God's will be done. If I ſhrink from God's truth, I am ſure of another manner of death than had judge Hales. But God be praiſed, even from the bottom of my heart, I am unmoveably ſettled upon the rock, nothing doubting, but that my dear God will perform and finiſh the work that he hath begun in me and others. To him be all honour both now and ever, thro' Chriſt our only and whole Saviour, Amen.

And thus much wrote Dr. Taylor, concerning this matter to his friend.

You heard in the former anſwers a little before, certain allegations out of St. Cyprian, Auguſtine, Chryſoſtom, and Ambroſe, mentioned by Dr. Taylor, touching the lawfulneſs of prieſts marriage. Now ye ſhall hear the places of the ſaid doctors cited and produced out of their own books, as here enſueth.

THIS queſtion was aſked of St. Cyprian, What ſhould be done with thoſe religious perſons, that could not keep their chaſtity as they had vowed? He anſwered thus, Thou doſt aſk what we do judge of virgins, which, after they had decreed to live chaſtely, are afterward found in bed with a man; of which thou ſayeſt, that one of them was a deacon? We do with great ſorrow ſee the great ruin of many perſons, which cometh by the reaſon of ſuch unlawful and perilous companying together. Wherefore, if they have dedicated themſelves unto Chriſt in faith, to live purely and chaſtely, then let them ſo remain without any fable, and ſtrongly and ſtedfaſtly abide the reward of virginity. But if they will not abide, or elſe cannot abide; then it is better to marry, than to fall into the fire of concupiſcence: and let them give to them, to the brethren and ſiſters, none occaſion of ſlander, &c. Cyprian in his eleventh epiſtle, lib. 1.

CErtain men do affirm, Thoſe men to be adulterers, that do marry after that they have vowed chaſtity. But I do affirm, That thoſe men do grievouſly ſin, which do ſeparate them, &c. Auguſtine in his book, De bono conjugali, ad Julianum.

CHaſtity of the body ought to be deſired of us: which thing I do give for a counſel, and do not command it imperiouſly. For virginity is a thing which only ought to be counſelled, but not to be commanded: it is rather a thing of voluntary will, and not a precept. Ambroſe, 32. Queſt. 1. cap. Integritas.

A brief Recapitulation out of Dr. Taylor's Cauſes beforementioned, for the Reader more evidently to ſee how the Papiſts act againſt their own Knowledge in forbidding Prieſts Marriage.

THE pope's clergy, forbidding eccleſiaſtical perſons to marry, do againſt their conſcience and knowledge, as may well be proved by theſe cauſes hereunder following.

1. They know that matrimony in the Old Teſtament, De jure inſtitutionis, is indifferently permitted to all men without any exception.

2. They know that in the Old Teſtament, De facto, both prieſts, levites, prophets, patriarchs, and all others, had their wives.

3. They know that matrimony was permitted and inſtituted by God for two principal ends; to wit, for procreation, and avoiding of ſin.

4. They know that in the Old Teſtament, God not only inſtituted and permitted matrimony to be free, but alſo induceth and appointeth men to marry and take wives, in theſe words, "It is not good for man to be alone," &c.

5. They know that in the New Teſtament St. Paul permitteth the ſtate of matrimony free to all men, having not the gift of continency, and forbiddeth none.

6. They know that in the New Teſtament the ſaid St. Paul not only permitteth, but alſo expreſly willeth and chargeth men, having not the gift, to marry, ſaying, "For avoiding fornication, let every man have his wife," &c.

7. They know that in the New Teſtament the ſaid St. Paul not only permitteth and commandeth, but alſo commendeth and praiſeth the ſtate of matrimony, calling it "honourable, and the bed-company to be undefiled," &c.

8. They know that in the New Teſtament Chriſt himſelf not only was not conceived nor born of the virgin before ſhe was eſpouſed in matrimony, but alſo that both he and his bleſſed mother did beatify and honour the ſtate of matrimony with their preſence: yea, in the ſame began his firſt miracle.

9. They know both by the Old Teſtament and New, that marriage is no impediment to walk in the obedience of God's commandments; for both Abraham carried into the land of Canaan his old, yea and barren wife, the virtuous woman Sarah, with him: and alſo to Iſaac, Jacob, Moſes, David, and others, their marriage was no impediment to them to talk with God; neither to other levites, biſhops, and prieſts, in the time of both the Old Teſtament, and of the New. Again, neither was it an hindrance to Peter, Philip, and others, both to have their wives with them, and alſo to ſupply the office of apoſtleſhip.

10. They know both by the Old Teſtament and New, that ſinful fornication and adultery depriveth man of God's favour and graces of the Holy Ghoſt, which graces eſpecially be requiſite in the men of the church.

11. They know in their own ſecret conſcience, and by experience, that neither they which enjoin this vow of chaſtity, nor they which take it, do obſerve the vow of chaſtity. Whereupon riſe inconveniences more than can be expreſſed: but the Lord above knoweth all, beſides the ſecret murders, peradventure, of many a poor infant, &c.

12. They know by St. Cyprian, Epiſt. 11. and St. Auguſtine, lib. De bono conjugali, ad Julianum, that a vow is no impediment ſufficient to hinder matrimony, or to divorce the ſame.

13. They know that Chryſoſtom affirmeth it to be an hereſy to ſay, that a biſhop may not have a wife.

14. They know that St. Ambroſe, 32. q. 1. Integritas, will have no commandment, but counſel only to be given touching the obſerving of virginity.

15 They know that before the time of pope Hildebrand, that is, during the time of 1000 years after Chriſt, marriage was never reſtrained, by any forcible neceſſity of vow, from men of the church.

16. They know that St. Paul calleth it the doctrine of devils, to forbid meats and marriage, which God hath left free, with thankſgiving, for neceſſity of man and woman.

After that Dr. Taylor had thus with great ſpirit and courage anſwered for himſelf, and ſtoutly rebuked his adverſaries for breaking their oath made before to king Henry, and to king Edward his ſon, and for betraying the realm into the power of the Roman biſhop: they perceiving that in no caſe he could be ſtirred to their wills and purpoſe, that is, to turn with them from Chriſt to Antichriſt, committed him thereupon to priſon again, where he remained till the laſt of January.

Dr. Taylor the fourth Time with Mr. Bradford and Mr. Saunders, brought before the Biſhop of Wincheſter and other Biſhops.

UPON which day and year aforeſaid, Dr. Taylor, Mr. Bradford, and Mr. Saunders, were again called to appear before the biſhop of Wincheſter, the biſhops of Norwich, London, Saliſbury, and Durham, and there were again charged with hereſy and ſchiſm, and therefore a determinate anſwer was required, Whether they would ſubmit themſelves to the Roman biſhop, and abjure their errors, or elſe they would according to their laws proceed to their condemnation.

When Dr. Taylor and his fellows, Mr. Bradford and Mr. Saunders, heard this, they anſwered ſtoutly and boldly, that they would not depart from the truth which they had preached in king Edward's days, neither would they ſubmit themſelves to the Romiſh Antichriſt; but they thanked God for ſo great mercy, that he would call them to be worthy to ſuffer for his word and truth.

When the biſhops ſaw them ſo boldly, conſtantly, and unmoveably fixed in the truth, they read the ſentence of death upon them, which when they had heard, they moſt joyfully gave God thanks, and ſtoutly ſaid unto the biſhops: "We doubt not but God the righteous judge will require our blood at your hands; and the proudeſt of you all ſhall repent this receiving again of Antichriſt, and your tyranny that ye now ſhew againſt the flock of Chriſt."

Dr. Taylor being condemned, was committed to the Clink, and the keepers were charged to keep him ſtraitly: for ye have now another manner of charge, quoth the lord chancellor, than ye had before; therefore look ye, take heed to it.

When the keeper brought him toward the priſon, the people flocked about to gaze upon him; unto whom he ſaid, God be praiſed, good people, I am come away from them undefiled, and will confirm the truth with my blood. He was confined in the Clink till it was towards night, and then he was removed to the Compter by the Poultry.

When

When Dr. Taylor had lain in the ſaid Compter in the Poultry a ſeven-night or thereabouts priſoner, the fourth of February 1555. Edmund Bonner biſhop of London, with others, came to the ſaid Compter to degrade him, bringing with them ſuch ornaments as do appertain to their maſſing-mummery. Now being come, he called for the ſaid Dr. Taylor to be brought unto him; the biſhop being then in the chamber where the keeper of the Compter and his wife lay. So Dr. Taylor was brought down from the chamber above that, to the ſaid Bonner. And at his coming the biſhop ſaid, Maſter Doctor, I wiſh you would remember yourſelf, and turn to your mother holy church, ſo may ye do well enough, and I will ſue for your pardon. Whereunto Dr. Taylor anſwered, I wiſh you and your fellows would turn to Chriſt. As for me, I will not turn to Antichriſt. Well, ſaid the biſhop, I am come to degrade you: wherefore put on theſe veſtures. No, ſaid Dr. Taylor, I will not. Wilt thou not, ſaid the biſhop? I ſhall make thee ere I go. Quoth Dr. Taylor, You ſhall not, by the grace of God. Then he charged him upon his obedience to do it, but he would not.

So he ordered another to put them upon his back, and when he was thoroughly furniſhed therewith, he ſet his hands to his ſide, walking up and down, and ſaid; How ſay you, my lord, am not I a goodly fool? How ſay you, my maſters? If I were in Cheapſide, ſhould I not have boys enow to laugh at theſe apiſh toys, and toying trumpery? So the biſhop ſcraped his fingers, thumbs, and the crown of his head, and did the reſt of ſuch like deviliſh obſervances.

At the laſt, when he ſhould have given Dr. Taylor a ſtroke on the breaſt with his croſier-ſtaff, the biſhop's chaplain ſaid, My lord, ſtrike him not, for he will ſure ſtrike again. Yea, by St. Peter will I, quoth Dr. Taylor. The cauſe is Chriſt's, and I were no good chriſtian, if I would not fight in my maſter's quarrel. So the biſhop laid his curſe upon him, but ſtruck him not. Then Dr. Taylor ſaid, Though you do curſe me, yet God doth bleſs me. I have the witneſs of my conſcience, that ye have done me wrong and violence, and yet I pray God, if it be his will, forgive you. But from the tyranny of the biſhop of Rome, and his deteſtable enormities, good Lord deliver us. And in going up to his chamber, he ſtill ſaid, God deliver me from you, God deliver me from you. And when he came up, he told Mr. Bradford (for they both lay in one chamber) that he had made the biſhop of London afraid; for, ſaith he, laughingly, his chaplain gave him counſel not to ſtrike me with his croſier-ſtaff, for that I would ſtrike again; and by my troth, ſaid he, rubbing his hands, I made him believe I would do ſo indeed.

The night after he was degraded, his wife and his ſon Thomas reſorted unto him, and were by the gentleneſs of the keepers permitted to ſup with him. For this difference was ever found between the keepers of the biſhops priſons, and the keepers of the king's priſons: that the biſhops keepers were ever cruel, blaſphemous, and tyrannous like their maſters; but the keepers of the king's priſons ſhewed, for the moſt part, as much favour as they poſſibly might.

So came Dr. Taylor's wife, his ſon, and John Hull his ſervant, to ſup with him: and at their coming in afore ſupper, they kneeled down and prayed, ſaying the Litany.

After ſupper walking up and down, he gave God thanks for his grace, that had ſo called him, and given him ſtrength to abide by his word: and turning to his ſon Thomas, "My dear ſon, ſaid he, Almighty God bleſs thee, and give thee his holy Spirit, to be a true ſervant of Chriſt, to learn his word, and conſtantly to ſtand by his truth all thy life long. And, my ſon, ſee that thou fear God always. Flee from all ſin, and wicked living: be virtuous, ſerve God with daily prayer, and apply thy book. In any wiſe ſee that thou be obedient to thy mother, love her and ſerve her: be ruled by her now in thy youth, and follow her good counſel in all things. Beware of lewd company of young men that fear not God; but follow their lewd luſts and vain appetites. Fly from whoredom, and hate all filthy living, remembering, that I thy father do die in the defence of holy marriage. Another day, when God ſhall bleſs thee, love and cheriſh the poor people, and count that thy chief riches is, to be rich in alms: and when thy mother is waxed old, forſake her not; but provide for her to thy power, and ſee that ſhe lack nothing: for ſo will God bleſs thee, and give thee long life upon earth and proſperity: which I pray God to grant thee."

Then turning to his wife, "My dear wife, quoth he, continue ſtedfaſt in the fear and love of God; keep yourſelf undefiled from their popiſh idolatries and ſuperſtitions. I have been unto you a faithful yoke-fellow, and ſo have you been unto me; for which I pray God to reward you, and doubt not, dear wife, but God will reward it. Now the time is come that I ſhall be taken from you, and you diſcharged of the wedlock bond towards me: therefore I will give you my counſel what I think moſt expedient for you. You are yet a child-bearing woman, and therefore it will be moſt convenient for you to marry. For doubtleſs you ſhall never be at a convenient ſtay for yourſelf and our poor children, nor out of trouble, till you be married. Therefore as ſoon as God will provide it, marry with ſome honeſt faithful man that feareth God. Doubt you not, God will provide an honeſt huſband for you, and he will be a merciful father to your and my children: whom I pray you bring up in the fear of God, and in learning, to the utmoſt of your power, and keep them from this Romiſh idolatry." When he had thus ſaid, they with weeping tears prayed together, and kiſſed one another: and he gave to his wife a book of the church-ſervice, ſet out by king Edward, which he in the time of his impriſonment daily uſed. And unto his ſon Thomas he gave a Latin book, containing the notable ſayings of the old martyrs, gathered out of the Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory; and in the end of that book he wrote his teſtament and laſt farewel, as hereafter followeth.

The laſt Will and Teſtament of Dr. Rowland Taylor, Parſon of Hadley.

I Say to my wife, and to my children; the Lord gave you unto me, and the Lord hath taken me from you, and you from me: bleſſed be the name of the Lord. I believe they are bleſſed which die in the Lord. God careth for ſparrows, and for the hairs of our heads. I have ever found him more faithful and favourable, than is any father or huſband. Truſt ye therefore in him by the means of our dear Saviour Chriſt's merits: believe, love, fear, and obey him: pray to him, for he hath promiſed to help. Count me not dead, for I ſhall certainly live, and never die. I go before, and you follow after, to our long home. I go to the reſt of my children, Suſan, George, Ellen, Robert, and Zachary: I have bequeathed you to the only Omnipotent.

I ſay to my dear friends of Hadley, and to all others which have heard me preach; that I depart hence with a quiet conſcience, as touching my doctrine, for which I pray you thank God with me. For I have after my little talent, declared to others thoſe leſſons that I gathered out of God's book, the bleſſed Bible. Therefore if I, or an angel from heaven ſhould preach to you any other goſpel than that ye have received, God's great curſe upon that preacher.

Beware for God's ſake that ye deny not God, neither decline from the word of faith, leſt God decline from you, and ſo ye do everlaſtingly periſh. For God's ſake beware of popery, for though it appear to have in it unity, yet the ſame is vanity and antichriſtianity, and not in Chriſt's faith and verity.

Beware

Beware of the ſin againſt the Holy Ghoſt, now after ſuch a light opened ſo plainly and ſimply, truly, thoroughly and generally to all England.

The Lord grant all men his good and Holy Spirit, increaſe of his wiſdom, contemning the wicked world, hearty deſire to be with God and the heavenly company, through Jeſus Chriſt, our only mediator, advocate, righteouſneſs, life, ſanctification, and hope, Amen, Amen. Pray, Pray.

Rowland Taylor departing hence in ſure hope, without all doubting of eternal ſalvation, I thank God my heavenly Father, through Jeſus Chriſt my certain Saviour, Amen.

"God is he that juſtifieth: who is he that can condemn? Rom. 8. 33, 34.

"In thee, O Lord, have I truſted, let me never be confounded. Pſalm 31. 1."

On the next morning, after that Dr. Taylor had ſupped with his wife in the Compter, as is before expreſſed, which was the fifth day of February, the ſheriff of London with his officers came to the Compter by two of the clock in the morning, and ſo brought forth Dr. Taylor, and without any light led him to the Woolpack, an inn without Aldgate. Dr. Taylor's wife, ſuſpecting that her huſband would that night be carried away, watched all night in St. Botolph's church-porch without Aldgate, having with her two children, the one named Elizabeth, of thirteen years of age (who being left without father or mother, Dr. Taylor had charitably brought up from three years old), the other named Mary, Dr. Taylor's own daughter.

Now when the ſheriff and his company came againſt St. Botolph's church, Elizabeth cried, ſaying, O my dear father; Mother, mother, here is my father led away. Then his wife ſaid, Rowland, Rowland, where art thou? For it was a very dark morning, that the one could not ſee the other. Dr. Taylor anſwered, Dear wife, I am here, and ſtaid. The ſheriffs men would have led him forth; but the ſheriff ſaid, Stay a little, maſters, I pray you, and let him ſpeak to his wife, and ſo they ſtaid.

Then ſhe came to him, and he took his daughter Mary in his arms; and he, his wife, and Elizabeth, kneeled down and ſaid the Lord's prayer. At which ſight the ſheriff wept apace, and ſo did ſeveral others of the company. After they had prayed, he roſe up and kiſſed his wife, and ſhook her by the hand, and ſaid, Farewel my dear wife, be of good comfort, for I am quiet in my conſcience. God ſhall ſtir up a father for my children. And then he kiſſed his daughter Mary, and ſaid, God bleſs thee, and make thee his ſervant: and kiſſing Elizabeth, he ſaid, God bleſs thee. I pray you all ſtand ſtrong and ſtedfaſt unto Chriſt and his word, and keep you from idolatry. Then ſaid his wife, God be with thee, dear Rowland, I will with God's grace meet thee at Hadley.

And ſo he was led forth to the Woolpack, and his wife followed him. As ſoon as they came to the Woolpack, he was put into a chamber, wherein he was kept with four yeomen of the guard, and the ſheriffs men. Dr. Taylor as ſoon as he was come into the chamber, fell down on his knees, and gave himſelf wholly to prayer. The ſheriff then ſeeing Dr. Taylor's wife there, would in no caſe grant her to ſpeak any more with her huſband, but gently deſired her to go to his houſe and take it as her own, and promiſed her ſhe ſhould lack nothing, and ſent two officers to conduct her thither. Notwithſtanding ſhe deſired to go to her mother's, whither the officers led her, and charged her mother to keep her there till they came again.

Dr. Taylor remained at the Woolpack, kept by the ſheriff and his company, till eleven of the clock; at which time the ſheriff of Eſſex was ready to receive him: and ſo they ſet him on horſeback within the inn, the gates being ſhut.

At coming out of the gates, John Hull before ſpoken of, ſtood at the rails with Thomas, Dr. Taylor's ſon. When Dr. Taylor ſaw them, he called them, ſaying, Come hither, my ſon Thomas. And John Hull lifted the child up, and ſet him on the horſe before his father: and Dr. Taylor put off his hat, and ſaid to the people that ſtood there looking on him, Good people, this is mine own ſon, begotten of my body in lawful matrimony; and God be bleſſed for lawful matrimony. Then he lifted up his eyes towards heaven and prayed for his ſon, laid his hat upon his child's head and bleſſed him, and ſo delivered the child to John Hull, whom he took by the hand, and ſaid, Farewel, John Hull, the faithfulleſt ſervant that ever man had. And ſo they rode forth, the ſheriff of Eſſex, with four yeomen of the guard, and the ſheriffs men leading them.

When they were come almoſt at Burntwood, one Arthur Fayſy, a man of Hadley, who before time had been Dr. Taylor's ſervant, met with them, and he, ſuppoſing him to have been at liberty, ſaid, Maſter Doctor, I am glad to ſee you again at liberty, and came to him, and took him by the hand. Soft Sir, quoth the ſheriff, he is a priſoner; what haſt thou to do with him? I cry you mercy, ſaid Arthur, I knew not ſo much, and I thought it no offence to talk to a true man. The ſheriff was very angry with this, and threatened to carry Arthur with him to priſon; notwithſtanding he bade him get quickly away, and ſo they rode forth to Burntwood: where they cauſed to be made for Dr. Taylor a cloſe hood, with two holes for his eyes to look out at, and a ſlit for his mouth to breathe at. This they did, that no man ſhould know him, nor he ſpeak to any man. Which practice they uſed alſo with others. Their own conſciences told them, that they led innocent lambs to the ſlaughter. Wherefore they feared, leſt if the people ſhould have heard them ſpeak, or have ſeen them, they might have been much more ſtrengthened by their pious exhortations, to ſtand ſtedfaſt in God's word, and to fly the ſuperſtitions and idolatries of the papacy.

All the way Dr. Taylor was joyful and merry, as one that accounted himſelf going to a moſt pleaſant banquet or marriage. He ſpake many notable things to the ſheriff and yeomen of the guard that conducted him, and often moved them to weep through his much earneſt calling upon them to repent, and to amend their evil and wicked living. Oftentimes alſo he cauſed them to wonder and rejoice, to ſee him ſo conſtant and ſtedfaſt, void of all fear, joyful in heart, and glad to die. Of theſe yeomen of the guard, three uſed Dr. Taylor friendly, but the fourth (whoſe name was Homes), uſed him very homely, unkindly, and churliſhly.

At Chelmsford the ſheriff of Suffolk met them, there to receive him, and to carry him forth into Suffolk. And being at ſupper, the ſheriff of Eſſex very earneſtly perſuaded him to return to the popiſh religion, thinking with fair words to perſuade him, and ſaid, Good maſter Doctor, we are right ſorry for you, conſidering what the loſs is of ſuch a one as ye might be, if ye would: God hath given you great learning and wiſdom, wherefore ye have been in great favour and reputation in times paſt with the council and higheſt of this realm. Beſides this, ye are a man of goodly perſonage, in your beſt ſtrength, and by nature like to live many years, and without doubt, ye ſhould in time to come be in as good reputation as ever ye were, or rather better: for ye are well beloved of all men, as well for your virtues as for your learning: and methinks it were great pity you ſhould caſt away yourſelf willingly, and ſo come to ſuch a painful and ſhameful death. Ye ſhould do much better to revoke your opinions, and return to the catholic univerſal church of Rome, acknowledge the pope's holineſs to be the ſupreme head of the church, and reconcile yourſelf to him. You may do well yet, if you will: doubt ye not but ye ſhall find favour at the queen's hands; I and all theſe your friends will be ſuitors for your pardon: which, no doubt, ye ſhall obtain. This counſel I give you, good Mr. Doctor, of a good heart, and good will towards you: and thereupon I drink to you. In like manner ſaid all the yeomen of the guard; Upon that condition, Mr. Doctor, we will all drink to you.

When they had all drank to him, and the cup was come to him, he ſtayed a little, as one ſtudying what anſwer he might give. At laſt he thus anſwered and ſaid, Mr. Sheriff, and my maſters all, I heartily thank you for your good will; I have hearkened to your words, and marked well your counſels. And to be plain with you, I do perceive that I have been deceived myſelf, and am like to deceive a great many of Hadley of their expectation. With that word they all rejoiced. Yea, good maſter Doctor, quoth the ſheriff, God's bleſſing on your heart: hold you there ſtill. It is the comfortableſt word that we heard you ſpeak yet. What ſhould ye caſt away yourſelf in vain? Play a wiſe man's part, and I dare warrant it, ye ſhall find favour. Thus they rejoiced very much at the word, and were very merry.

At laſt, Good Mr. Doctor, quoth the ſheriff, what meant ye by this, that ye ſay ye think ye have been deceived yourſelf, and think ye ſhall deceive many one in Hadley? Would ye know my meaning plainly, quoth he? Yea, quoth the ſheriff, good Mr. Doctor, tell it us plainly.

Then ſaid Dr. Taylor, I will tell you how I have been deceived, and, as I think, I ſhall deceive a great many. I am, as you ſee, a man that hath a very great carcaſe, which I thought ſhould have been buried in Hadley church-yard, if I had died in my bed, as I well hoped I ſhould have done; but herein I ſee I was deceived: and there are a great number of worms in Hadley church-yard, which ſhould have had jolly feeding upon this carrion, which they have looked for many a day. But now I know we be deceived, both I and they; for this carcaſe muſt be burnt to aſhes, and ſo ſhall they loſe their bait and feeding, that they looked to have had of it.

When the ſheriff and his company heard him ſay ſo, they were amazed and looked at one another, marvelling at the man's conſtant mind, that thus without all fear made but a jeſt at the cruel torment and death now at hand prepared for him. Thus was their expectation clean diſappointed. And in this appeareth what was his meditation in his chiefeſt wealth and proſperity; namely, that he ſhould ſhortly die, and feed worms in his grave: which meditation if all biſhops and ſpiritual men had uſed, they had not for a little worldly glory forſaken the word of God and truth, which they in king Edward's days had preached and ſet forth; nor yet, to maintain the biſhop of Rome's authority, have committed ſo many to the fire as they did.

But let us return to Dr. Taylor, who at Chelmsford was delivered to the ſheriff of Suffolk, and by him conducted to Hadley, where he ſuffered. When they were come to Lanham, the ſheriff ſtaid there two days; and thither came to him a great number of gentlemen and juſtices upon great horſes, which all were appointed to aid the ſheriff. Theſe gentlemen laboured earneſtly with Dr. Taylor, to reduce him to the Romiſh religion, promiſing him his pardon, which, ſaid they, we have here for you. They promiſed him great promotions, yea, a biſhoprick, if he would take it: but all their labour and flattering words were in vain. For he had not built his houſe upon the ſand in peril of falling at every puff of wind, but upon the ſure and unmoveable rock Chriſt. Wherefore he abode conſtant and unmoveable unto the end.

After two days, the ſheriff and his company led Dr. Taylor towards Hadley, and coming within two miles of Hadley, he deſired to alight off his horſe to make water; which done, he leapt, and ſet a friſk or twain, as men commonly do in dancing. Why maſter Doctor, quoth the ſheriff, how do you now? He anſwered, Well, God be praiſed, good maſter Sheriff. Never better: for now I know I am almoſt at home. I lack not paſt two ſtiles to go over, and I am even at my father's houſe. But maſter Sheriff, ſaid he, ſhall we not go through Hadley? Yes, ſaid the ſheriff, you ſhall go through Hadley. Then ſaid he, O good Lord, I thank thee, I ſhall yet once ere I die ſee my flock, whom thou, Lord, knoweſt I have moſt heartily loved, and truly taught. Good Lord, bleſs them, and keep them ſtedfaſt in thy word and truth.

When they were now come to Hadley, and came riding over the bridge, at the bridge-foot waited a poor man with five ſmall children; who when he ſaw Dr. Taylor, he and his children fell down upon their knees, and held up their hands, and cried with a loud voice, and ſaid, O dear father and good ſhepherd, Dr. Taylor, God help and ſuccour thee, as thou haſt many a time ſuccoured me and my poor children. Such witneſs had this ſervant of God of his virtuous and charitable alms given in his life time. For God would now the poor ſhould teſtify of his good deeds to his ſingular comfort, to the example of others, and confuſion of his perſecutors and tyrannous adverſaries. For the ſheriff and others that led him to death, were wonderfully aſtoniſhed at this: and the ſheriff rebuked the poor man for ſo crying. The ſtreets of Hadley were beſet on both ſides the way with men and women of the town and country, who waited to ſee him: whom when they beheld ſo led to death, with weeping eyes and lamentable voices they cried, ſaying one to another, Ah good Lord! there goeth our good ſhepherd from us, that ſo faithfully hath taught us, ſo fatherly hath cared for us, and ſo godly hath governed us: O merciful God! what ſhall we poor ſcattered lambs do? What ſhall come of this moſt wicked world? Good Lord ſtrengthen him, and comfort him: with ſuch other moſt lamentable and piteous voices. Wherefore the people were ſore rebuked by the ſheriff and catchpoles his men, that led him. And Dr. Taylor always ſaid to the people; I have preached to you God's word and truth, and am come this day to ſeal it with my blood.

Coming againſt the alms-houſes, which he well knew, he caſt money to the poor people, which remained of what had been given him in the time of his impriſonment: as for his living, they took it from him at his firſt going to priſon, ſo that he was ſuſtained all the time of his impriſonment by the charitable alms of good people that viſited him.

Therefore the money that now remained he put in a glove, ready for the ſame purpoſe, and as is ſaid gave it to the poor almſmen ſtanding at their doors to ſee him. And coming to the laſt of the alms-houſes, and not ſeeing the poor that dwelt there, ready at their doors, as the others were, he aſked; Is the blind man and blind woman that dwelt here, alive? It was anſwered, Yea, they are within. Then he threw the glove and all in at the window, and ſo rode forth.

Thus this good father and provider for the poor now took his leave of thoſe, for whom all his life he had a ſingular care and ſtudy. For this was his cuſtom, once in a fortnight at leaſt, to call upon Sir Anthony Doyl, and others of the rich cloth-makers, to go with him to the alms-houſes, and there to ſee how the poor lived; what they lacked in meat, drink, clothing, bedding, or any other neceſſaries. The like did he alſo to other poor men that had many children, or were ſick. Then would he exhort and comfort them, and, where he found cauſe, rebuke the unruly; and what they wanted, that gave he after his power: and what he was not able, he cauſed the rich and wealthy men to miniſter unto them. Thus ſhewed he himſelf in all things an example to his flock, worthy to be followed; and taught by his deeds, what a great treaſure alms is to all ſuch as chearfully for Chriſt's ſake do it.

At laſt, coming to Aldham Common, the place aſſigned where he ſhould ſuffer, and ſeeing a great multitude of people gathered thither, he aſked, What place is this, and what meaneth it that ſo much people are gathered hither? It was anſwered, It is Aldham Common, the place where you muſt ſuffer: and the people are come to look upon you. Then ſaid he, Thanked be God, I am even at home, and ſo alighted from his horſe, and with both his hands rent the hood from his head.

Now was his head knotted evil favourably, and clipped much like a man would clip a fool's head; which coſt the good biſhop Bonner had beſtowed upon him, when he degraded him. But when the people ſaw his reverend and ancient face, with a long white beard, they burſt out with weeping tears, and cried, ſaying, God ſave thee, good Dr. Taylor; Jeſus Chriſt ſtrengthen thee, and help thee; the Holy Ghoſt comfort thee; with ſuch other like good wiſhes. Then would he have ſpoken to the people; but the yeomen of the guard were ſo buſy about him, that as ſoon as he opened his mouth, one or other thruſt a tipſtaff into his mouth, and would in no wiſe permit him to ſpeak.

Then he deſired licence of the ſheriff to ſpeak; but the ſheriff denied it to him, and bad him remember his promiſe to the council.

Well, quoth Dr. Taylor, promiſe muſt be kept. What this promiſe was, is unknown: but the common fame was, that after he and others were condemned, the council ſent for them, and threatened them they would cut their tongues out of their heads, except they would promiſe, that at their deaths they would keep ſilence, and not ſpeak to the people. Wherefore they, deſirous to have the uſe of their tongues, to call upon God as long as they might live, promiſed ſilence. For the papiſts feared much, leſt this change of religion, from truth to lyes, from Chriſt's ordinance to the popiſh traditions, ſhould not ſo quietly have been received as it was, eſpecially this burning of the preachers: but they, meaſuring others minds by their own, feared leſt any tumult or uproar might have been ſtirred, the people having ſo juſt a cauſe not to be contented with their doings, or elſe (as they moſt feared) that the people ſhould more have been confirmed by their pious exhortations to ſtand ſtedfaſt againſt their vain popiſh doctrine and idolatry. But thanks be to God, which gave to his witneſſes faith and patience, with ſtout and manly hearts to deſpiſe all torments: neither was there ſo much as any one man that once ſhewed any ſign of diſobedience towards the magiſtrates. They ſhed their blood gladly in the defence of the truth, ſo leaving example unto all men of true and perfect obedience: which is to obey God more than men, and, if need require it, to ſhed their own blood rather than to depart from God's truth.

Dr. Taylor perceiving that he could not be ſuffered to ſpeak, ſat down, and ſeeing one named Soyce, he called him, and ſaid, Soyce, I pray thee come and pull off my boots, and take them for thy labour: thou haſt long looked for them, now take them. Then he roſe up, and put off his clothes unto his ſhirt, and gave them away. Which done, he ſaid with a loud voice, Good people, I have taught you nothing but God's holy word, and thoſe leſſons that I have taken out of God's bleſſed book, the Holy Bible: and I am come hither this day to ſeal it with my blood. With that word, Homes, yeoman of the guard aforeſaid, who had uſed Dr. Taylor very cruelly all the way, gave him a great ſtroke upon the head with a waſter, and ſaid, Is that the keeping of thy promiſe, thou heretic? Then he, ſeeing they would not permit him to ſpeak, kneeled down and prayed, and a poor woman that was among the people ſtepped in and prayed with him; but her they thruſt away, and threatened to tread her down with their horſes: notwithſtanding ſhe would not remove, but abode and prayed with him. When he had prayed, he went to the ſtake, and kiſſed it, and ſet himſelf into a pitch-barrel, which they had ſet for him to ſtand in, and ſo ſtood with his back upright againſt the ſtake, with his hands folded together, and his eyes towards heaven, and ſo he continually prayed.

Then they bound him with chains, and the ſheriff called one Richard Donningham a butcher, and commanded him to ſet up the faggots: but he refuſed to do it, and ſaid, I am lame, Sir, and not able to lift a faggot. The ſheriff threatened to ſend him to priſon; notwithſtanding he would not do it.

Then he appointed one Molleine of Carſey, a man for his virtues fit to be a hangman, and Soyce a very drunkard, and Warwick, who in the commotion-time in king Edward's days, loſt one of his ears for his ſeditious talk; amongſt whom alſo was one Robert King, a deviſer of interludes, who was there preſent and had doing there with the gunpowder; what he meant and did therein (he himſelf ſaid he did it for the beſt and for quick diſpatch) the Lord knoweth, who ſhall judge all; more of this I have not to ſay.

Theſe four were appointed to ſet up the faggots, and to make the fire, which they moſt diligently did; and this Warwick cruelly caſt a faggot at him, which ſtruck him on his head, and brake his face, that the blood ran down. Then ſaid Dr. Taylor, O friend, I have harm enough, what needed that?

Furthermore, Sir John Shelton there ſtanding by as Dr. Taylor was ſpeaking, and ſaying the Pſalm Miſerere in Engliſh, ſtruck him on the lips; Ye knave, ſaid he, ſpeak Latin, I will make thee. At laſt they kindled the fire; and Dr. Taylor, holding up both his hands, called upon God, and ſaid, Merciful Father of heaven, for Jeſus Chriſt my Saviour's ſake, receive my ſoul into thy hands. So ſtood he ſtill without either crying or moving, with his hands folded together, till Soyce with an halberd ſtruck him on the head that the brains fell out, and the corps fell down into the fire.

Thus rendered the man of God his bleſſed ſoul into the hands of his merciful Father, and to his moſt dear and certain Saviour Jeſus Chriſt, whom he moſt intirely loved, faithfully and earneſtly preached, obediently followed in living, and conſtantly glorified in death.

They that were preſent and familiarly converſant with this Dr. Taylor, reported of him, that they never did ſee in him any fear of death, but eſpecially and above all the reſt which beſides him ſuffered at the ſame time, always ſhewed himſelf merry and chearful in the time of his impriſonment, as well before his condemnation, as after: he kept one countenance and like behaviour. Whereunto he was the rather confirmed by the company and preſence of Mr. John Bradford, who was in the ſame priſon and chamber with him.

The morning when he was called up by the ſheriff to his burning, being ſuddenly awaked out of his ſound ſleep, he ſat up in his bed, and putting on his ſhirt, had theſe words, ſpeaking ſomewhat thick after his accuſtomed manner, Ah horſon thieves, ah horſon thieves, rob God of his honour, rob God of his honour? Afterwards being riſen and tying his points, he caſt his arms about a great beam which was in the chamber between Mr. Bradford's bed and his; and there hanging by the hands, ſaid to Mr. Bradford, O Mr. Bradford, quoth he, what a notable ſway ſhould I give if I were hanged? meaning for that he was a corpulent and big man. Theſe things I thought good here to note, to ſet forth and declare to thoſe that ſhall read this hiſtory, what a notable and ſingular gift of ſpirit and courage God had given to this bleſſed martyr.

About the time Dr. Taylor was deprived of his benefice of Hadley, there was one called Sir Robert Bracher, a pretended proteſtant in king Edward's days, and afterwards a deadly enemy to the ſame religion; who was alſo one of them that ſo unmercifully thruſt Dr. Taylor's wife and children out of the doors, as ſhe herſelf yet can teſtify: and notwithſtanding the ſame now ſince became a proteſtant again. This Sir Robert Bracher aforeſaid, coming to Hadley to the burial of a certain friend of his, and God's great enemy, one Walter Clark, albeit he came ſomewhat too late to the market, as he ſaid, yet deſirous to utter ſuch popiſh pelf and pack-ware as he brought with him, he opened there his baggage of peſtilent doctrine, preaching in the ſame town of Hadley againſt juſtification by faith, of the corporal preſence, of praying for the dead, and auricular confeſſion. Whereof Dr. Taylor having underſtanding by letters, writeth again to them of Hadley, directing his letter to his wife, in confutation of the ſaid popiſh poiſoned ſermon; the copy of which letter we thought not unworthy here to annex in the end of this ſtory.

Dr. Taylor's Letter to his Wife.

DEAR wife, I pray God be ever with us, through Chriſt our only Mediator, Amen.

I thank you for my cap; I am ſomewhat proud of it; for it is one ſtep from the clergy in theſe days. I thank God, my heart is clean divided from their proceedings: for I know that no man can ſerve two maſters, eſpecially if they agree no better than Chriſt and Antichriſt do. I am glad that Hadley can ſkill of ſuch packing-ware as was brought thither the firſt day of May laſt. Chriſt's ſheep can diſcern Chriſt's voice from the voice of ſtrangers, thieves, or hirelings. The pack-bringer was ſorry that he came too late to the funeral market of his faithful friend. But here I will leave them both to God's judgment, and ſomething touch the matter whereof the packer made mention on his opening day. At firſt he called the ſcripture, as I hear, full of dark ſentences, but indeed it is called by David, "A candle to our feet, and a light to our paths." Our Saviour Chriſt calleth his word, the light which evil doers do flee from and hate, leſt their deeds ſhould be reproved thereby. St. Paul would have us to walk as children of light, and in any wiſe not to continue in ignorance or darkneſs. But all we in the world pertain to two princes, either to the Father of light and truth, or elſe to the prince of darkneſs and lyes.

In theſe days preachers declare evidently by whom they are ſent, and with what ſpirit they ſpeak, and to what prince they belong. For they cry out againſt God's lights, ſun, moon, ſtars, torches, lamps, lanthorns, creſſets and candles in the Holy Bible, provided by God's great goodneſs and mercy to avoid all foul darkneſs, clouds and miſts, or dangerous doubtful ways in this our journey to our heavenly Father, long home, manſion houſes, and dearly purchaſed heritage. Iſaiah, God's faithful meſſenger, ſaith, "Wo be unto them that call ſweet ſour, good evil, and light darkneſs. Therefore cometh my people into captivity, becauſe they have no underſtanding." Our Saviour Chriſt pronounceth error and hereſies to remain among the people, ſo long as ignorance of the ſcriptures remaineth. And hereby it appeareth to all good conſciences what they mean, which defame or accuſe God's bleſſed word being full of light, as though it were full of darkneſs. Theſe owls would have all day lights ſcraped out of books, hearts and churches. O Lord, turn their hearts and tongues; bow them from the way of darkneſs, leſt they go to the prince of darkneſs, and be caſt into the pit of utter darkneſs, where is weeping and gnaſhing of teeth.

Now touching the packs of wool, and the packs of cloth, I fear they were as all other wares be, tranſubſtantiate into flocks, even his very fineſt packing ſtuff againſt only faith juſtifying, and for the corporal preſence of Chriſt's body in the ſacrament, for praying for ſouls departed, and for auricular confeſſion. Abraham's juſtification by faith, by grace, by promiſe, and not by works, is plainly ſet forth both in the epiſtle to the Romans, chap. 4. and to the Galatians, chap. 3. and Abraham's works of obedience, in offering up his ſon ſo long after his juſtification, muſt needs be taken as a fruit of a good tree juſtifying before men, and not of juſtification before God; for then had man to glory in, then did Chriſt die in vain.

And whereas the ſixth chapter of John was alledged, to prove that Chriſt did give his body corporally in his ſupper, even as he had promiſed in the ſaid chapter, it is moſt untrue. For he only gave his body ſacramentally, ſpiritually, and effectually in his ſupper to the faithful apoſtles, and corporally he gave it in a bloody ſacrifice for the life of the world upon the croſs once for all. There in his own perſon, in his own natural body, he bare our ſins. By whoſe ſtripes we are healed, as St. Peter proceedeth, 1 Pet. 2. and Iſaiah 53. Indeed receiving Chriſt's ſacrament according as it was inſtituted, we receive Chriſt's body and his blood, even as I ſaid before the apoſtles did.

But the popiſh maſs is another matter. The maſs, as it is now, is but one of Antichriſt's youngeſt daughters, in which the devil is rather preſent and received, than our Saviour, the ſecond perſon in the Trinity, God and man. O Lord God, heavenly Father, for Chriſt's ſake, we beſeech thee to turn England again to the right way it was in king Edward's time, from this babylonical, Jewiſh, ſpiritual whoredom, conſpiracy, tyranny, deteſtable enormities, falſe doctrine, hereſy, hardneſs of heart, and contempt of thy word and commandments, from this evident and open idolatry, ſacrilege, ſimony, blaſphemy, ſuperſtition, hypocriſy, tranſubſtantiate angel of light, and day-devil, kingdom of lyes, foul vain ſchiſms, ſects, ſedition, apoſtacy, gay ſweet poiſon, honied and ſugared viperous venom, wily wolfiſhneſs, ſatanical ſubtilty, and abomination in the ſight of God, and all ſuch as put on the true ſpectacles of the holy ſcripture. I am the more plain now in this matter, becauſe I fear greatly, that many will be too ready to go from Chriſt to Antichriſt, from the Bible, God's true ſervice and religion, to Latin lying legends, maſs books, and ſuperſtition. They ſay their church cannot err in any point, when indeed they be not of God's church, and therefore they can do nothing but err, even as they do almoſt in all caſes of true faith.

But to come again to the packer rather than preacher, he bringeth St. Chryſoſtom, writing to the people of Antioch, where he maketh a compariſon between Chriſt's fleſh and Elias cloak caſt down to Elizeus, when Elias was taken up in the fiery chariot; at length he ſaith, that Chriſt, aſcending up to heaven, took his fleſh with him, and alſo left his fleſh behind him in earth.

The meaning of it is, he did aſcend with his fleſh, and left a memorial cloak of the ſame body and fleſh, which he calleth his fleſh, as he in the ſacramental phraſe calleth bread his body, becauſe it repreſenteth his body: and as in like manner of ſacramental ſpeech, a lamb was called the paſſover, the circumciſion, God's covenant. He took up his fleſh corporally, and left his fleſh in myſtery and ſacrament ſpiritually. Or it may be ſaid, that he left his fleſh upon earth, that is, his myſtical body, his faithful people; whom St. Paul calleth the members of his body, of his fleſh, of his bones, Epheſ. 5. In the forty-ninth chapter of Geneſis, there is no word of Chriſt's ſacrament, but there is a prophecy of Chriſt's paſſion wherein his foal was bound, that is, his body. And where he ſpeaketh there of grapes and wine, it is as that is ſpoken of Chriſt in another place, where he ſaith, I alone did tread the wine-preſs, meaning thereby, that Chriſt alone ſuffered painful paſſion for the remiſſion of ſins, and for the conſolation of his faithful ſoldiers.

It is not true that the packer ſaid, that Chriſt's infinite power may make his body to be in a thouſand places at once, as a loaf to be in a thouſand bellies; for then may Chriſt divide the parts of his body, as a loaf is divided, and ſo conſumed, and then might ſcripture be falſe, appointing Chriſt's body to be but in one place. Acts 3. Phil. 3. Heb. 3. The articles of our faith tell us ſufficiently ciently where Chriſt's body is. It was never in two places at once, neither ever ſhall be, neither ever can be corporally and naturally, neither ever was, is, can, or ſhall be eaten ſo with any corporal mouths, as the Capernaites and the papiſts moſt erroneouſly and heretically do judge. If our Saviour Jeſus Chriſt hath no other body natural than is made of the ſubſtance of bread, and is in a thouſand places at once, as I have often ſaid in Hadley, we are not yet redeemed, neither ſhall our bodies riſe again, and be made like unto his glorious body. We are ſure that our Saviour Chriſt's body is made of none other ſubſtance than of his mother the bleſſed virgin Mary's ſubſtance. We are ſure that he taketh not the nature of angels, much leſs of bread. Only he taketh on him the ſeed of Abraham, Heb. 2. In all things like unto us, ſin only excepted. And this is a comfortable doctrine to us chriſtians, believing ſtedfaſtly, as the true catholic faith is, that Chriſt hath but two natures; perfect God, and perfect man. Upon this rock, Chriſt's church is built, and the gates of hell ſhall never prevail againſt it, Matt. 16.

I ſpeak nothing now of auricular confeſſion, and praying for ſouls departed, becauſe I do not hear what authors the packer brought in for this purpoſe. Sure I am that he can bring no authentical and canonical warrant for ſuch his pack-ware. He may ſay what he will of Hebricians and Grecians, and fleſh under forms, and not above forms, or above the board. He may conjure and convey, paſs and repaſs, even what he will in ſuch clouds and miſts. He reproved the ſcriptures as full of darkneſs, and yet is full of darkneſs himſelf. He did wittily, to bring proofs out of Jewry, Turkey, and other ſtrange places for his round white cake, for that ſuch his pedlary pelf-pack is contrary to the plain ſimplicity of Chriſt's ſupper. He glanced at prieſts marriage. He might againſt that have brought as ancient a doctor as any be alledged out of Hebrew, for his maſs and water cake, that is Dr. Devil, 1 Tim. 4.

I marvel that he did not confute and confound St. Paul for the ſentences written above the altar, of which he made mention in the pulpit. For he and his fellows of Oxford be ſo profound, ſo excellent, ſo glorious, and triumphant clerks, that they can eaſily prove a man an aſs, and writers in the Bible, ignorant, ſimple, full of errors, full of hereſies, and beggarly fools. Yet they will be called catholics, faithful and true chriſtian people, defenders of the holy mother the church; but truly they take part with the prince of darkneſs, with Antichriſt, with Jezebel, Rev. 2. They will not be called Papiſts, Phariſees, Jews, Turks, Heretics, and ſo forth; but whatſoever they will be called, God's religion had never more evident adverſaries, and that in all the chief points of it; no not then, when our Saviour Chriſt whipt ſuch merchants out of the temple, calling them a company of thieves, Matt. 21. God give them grace to repent. God be thanked that the nobility ſomething of late hath eſpied and ſtopped their tyranny. O unhappy England! O more ungrateful people! ſooner bewitched than the fooliſh Galatians. We have now no excuſe.

We have undoubtedly ſeen the true trace of the prophetical, apoſtolical, primitive catholic church. We are warned to beware, leſt we be led out of that way. ſociety, and rule of religion. Now we ſhall ſhew what countrymen we be, whether ſpiritual and heavenly, or carnal and worldly. We had as true knowledge as ever was in any country, or at any time, ſince the beginning of the world, God be praiſed therefore. If Hadley, being ſo many years perſuaded in ſuch truth, will now willingly and wittingly forſake the ſame, and defile itſelf with the cake-god, idolatry, and other antichriſtianity thereunto belonging, let it ſurely look for many and wonderful plagues of God ſhortly. Though another have the benefice, yet as God knoweth, I cannot but be careful for my dear Hadley. And therefore as I could not but ſpeak, after the firſt abominable maſs begun there, I being preſent no more, I cannot but write now being abſent, hearing of the wicked prophanation of my late pulpit by ſuch a wily wolf. God's love, mercy, goodneſs, and favour hath been unſpeakable, in teaching us the right way of ſalvation and juſtification; let us all have ſome zeal, ſome care how to ſerve him according to his good will written. The God of love and peace be ever in Hadley, through Chriſt our only advocate. Amen.

Rowland Taylor.

After that Stephen Gardiner biſhop of Wincheſter had got the laws, and the ſecular arm on his ſide, as ye have heard, with full power and authority to reign and rule as he pleaſed, and had brought theſe pious biſhops and reverend preachers aforeſaid under foot, namely, the archbiſhop of Canterbury, Dr. Ridley biſhop of London, Mr. Latimer, Mr. Hooper biſhop of Worceſter and Glouceſter, Mr. Rogers, Mr. Saunders, Dr. Taylor, and Mr. Bradford, all which he had now preſently condemned, and ſome alſo burned; he ſuppoſed now all had been cock-ſure, and that Chriſt had been conquered for ever, ſo that the people, being terrified with the example of theſe great learned men condemned, never would, nor durſt once ſpeak againſt their violent religion: not much unlike in this behalf, to the manner of the Turks, who when they cannot maintain their ſect by good learning and truth of God's word, think by violence of ſword to force whom they can to their belief; and that done, afterward make laws, no man under pain of hereſy to diſpute, or once to call in queſtion any of their proceedings. Even ſo Stephen Gardiner and his fellows, when they ſee they cannot prevail by trial of God's word, and diſcourſe of learning, neither are diſpoſed ſimply to ſeek for truth where it is to be found, they take exception againſt God's word, affirming it to be intricate, obſcure, and inſufficient to be its own judge, and therefore that of neceſſity it muſt be judged by the pope's church; and ſo having kings and queens on their ſide, they ſeek not to perſuade by the word of God, nor to win by charity, but inſtead of the law of God, they compel men by death, fire, and ſword (as the Turks do), to believe that in very deed they think not. And indeed after fleſh and blood this ſeemeth to be a ſure way. Neither peradventure are they ignorant how this way thriveth with the Turks: and therefore they think to practiſe the ſame, at leaſtwiſe ſo they do, upon what example ſoever they do it. And thus condemned they theſe pious learned preachers and biſhops aforeſaid, ſuppoſing, as I ſaid, that all the reſt would ſoon be quelled by their example. But they were deceived: for within eight or nine days after that Stephen Gardiner had given ſentence againſt Mr. Hooper, Mr. Rogers, Mr. Saunders, Dr. Taylor, and Mr. Bradford, being the eighth of February, ſix other good men were brought likewiſe before the biſhops for the ſame cauſe of religion, to be examined, whoſe names were, William Pigot butcher, Stephen Knight barber, Thomas Tomkins weaver, Thomas Haukes gentleman, John Laurence prieſt, William Hunter apprentice.

Stephen Gardiner ſeeing thus his device diſappointed, and that cruelty in this caſe would not ſerve to his expectation, gave over the matter as utterly diſcouraged, and from that day meddled no more in ſuch kind of condemnations, but referred the whole doing thereof to Bonner biſhop of London; who cruelly ſupplied that part, as in the further proceſs of this hiſtory will evidently appear. Thus biſhop Bonner, taking the matter in hand, called before him in his conſiſtory at St. Paul's (the lord mayor, and ſeveral aldermen ſitting with him) the ſix perſons aforenamed, upon the eighth day of February in the year aforeſaid, and on the next day, being the ninth of February, read the ſentence of condemnation upon them, as appeareth in Bonner's own regiſters; ſuch quick ſpeed theſe men could make in diſpatching their buſineſs at once. Notwithſtanding, becauſe the death of theſe condemned martyrs did not follow incontinently before the next month of March, I will defer the profecution of this matter, till I come to the time and day of their ſuffering.

In the mean time, what was the cauſe that their execution was ſo long deferred after their condemnation, I have not preciſely to ſay, unleſs peradventure the ſermon of Alphonſus the Spaniſh frier, and the king's confeſſor, did ſome good. For ſo I find, that when thoſe ſix perſons aforeſaid were caſt upon Saturday the ninth of February, upon Sunday following, which was the tenth of February, the ſaid Alphonſus, a grey frier, preached before the king; in which ſermon he did earneſtly inveigh againſt the biſhops for burning of men, ſaying that they learned it not in ſcripture, to burn any for his conſcience; but the contrary, that they ſhould live and be converted: with many other things more to the ſame purport. But touching the lingering of theſe mens deaths, as I have not certainly to affirm, ſo let it paſs.

Upon February 14. Mr. Robert Ferrar, biſhop of St. David's, was ſent towards St. David's, there to be condemned and executed. Touching whoſe martyrdom, foraſmuch as it fell not before the month of March, we will defer the hiſtory thereof till we come to the day and time of his ſuffering.

Furthermore the 14th day of February aforeſaid, the lord chancellor, and other biſhops, cauſed the image of Thomas Becket, the old Romiſh traytor, to be ſet up over the Mercers chapel door in Cheapſide in London, in the form and ſhape of a biſhop, with mitre and croſier. Howbeit within two days after his erection, his two bleſſing fingers were firſt broken away, and on the next day (being the 17th of February) his head alſo was ſtricken off: whereupon aroſe great trouble, and many were ſuſpected: among whom one John Barnes mercer, dwelling over againſt the ſame chapel, was vehemently by the lord chancellor charged withal, as the doer thereof, and the rather, for that he was a profeſſor of the truth. Wherefore he and three of his ſervants were committed to priſon; and at his delivery (although it could not be proved upon him) he was bound in a great ſum of money, as well to build it up again as often as it ſhould be broke down, as alſo to watch and keep the ſame. And therefore at this his compelled charges the image was again ſet up the ſecond day of March then next enſuing; but (for lack belike of careful watching) the 14th day of the ſame month in the night, the head was again the ſecond time broke off: which thing was ſo heinouſly taken, that the next day, being the 15th day, there was a proclamation made in London, that whoſoever would tell who did ſtrike off his head (though he were of counſel, and not the principal doer) he ſhould have not only his pardon, but alſo one hundred crowns of gold, with hearty thanks. But it was not known who did it.

The 18th of February, queen Mary at length, after long delay, made full anſwer to the king of Denmark's letters, who had written before two letters to the ſaid queen, in the behalf of Mr. Coverdale for his deliverance, who at that time went under ſureties, and was in great danger, had he not been refcued by the great ſuit and letters of the ſaid king of Denmark.

The matter and copy of which his ſuit and letters, as they came to our hands, we have here ſet forth and expreſt, whereby the ſingular love of this good king, towards the truth of God's word, and the profeſſors thereof, might the better appear to the world.

Firſt, This virtuous and pious king Chriſtianus, hearing of the captivity of Miles Coverdale, of whom he had had ſome knowledge before (being there in Denmark in king Henry the eighth's time), and lamenting his dangerous caſe, and partly through the interceſſion of Mr. Machabæus, ſuperintendant in Denmark, who was partly kin to Mr. Coverdale's wife, made interceſſion by letters to queen Mary, deſiring and requeſting the ſaid Miles Coverdale to be ſent unto him. The date of which his letters was about the kalends of May, 1554. The copy whereof, now tranſlated into Engliſh, here followeth.

Christianus by the Grace of God King of Denmark, Norway, &c. To the moſt noble and moſt mighty Princeſs and Lady Mary, Queen of England, France, and Ireland, our moſt dearly beloved Couſin, wiſheth Proſperity.

MOST noble Princeſs, and dearly beloved Couſin, conſidering the mutual affinity and alliance, not only of our royal name, but alſo of our kindred, eſpecially for that it has for a long continuance of time been propagated and preſerved on both ſides in theſe our realms, as well as for the mutual commerce and faithfulneſs which has been kept up by us in all kind offices; We cannot but write to your majeſty in regard to the piety and excellent literature of the truly reverend Mr. John Machabæus, doctor and egregious profeſſor of divinity, our well-beloved ſubject and miniſter, being moved hereto by his humble ſupplications and intreaties; who has declared to us, that in the late diſorder and commotion of the kingdom of England (which that it has happened we are heartily ſorry, and now hope it will prove for the better) one Miles Coverdale, late of the dioceſe of Exon, of pious and laudable memory, conſtituted biſhop by the authority of the laſt King your Majeſty's Brother, and our dearly beloved Couſin, that he [the ſaid Miles Coverdale] is now involved in moſt dreadful calamity, in priſon, and danger of his life, for no heinous offence committed, but by reaſon of the fatal deſtruction of the times. Which things this our truly ſubject Machabæus, being akin to him, and (which is more grievous) like him in piety, learning and morality, as a kind brother, reckons to appertain to himſelf. And therefore he implores our aſſiſtance to beſtow upon him that favour and kindneſs he deſerves, by endeavouring to rid him from his afflictions, becauſe he is innocent. We are indeed (and not without reaſon) moved with compaſſion on the man, whom for his merit we greatly reſpect, and chiefly for the teſtimony he gives of the innocence and integrity of the impriſoned prelate: Of which indeed there's ſo much the more reaſon to hope, becauſe though many guilty perſons have ſuffered death, you have ſtill preſerved him alive. Wherefore we have been eaſily perſuaded earneſtly to beſeech your Majeſty for our ſake to deal gently with your priſoner Mr. Coverdale, and that it may pleaſe you to deliver him as well from the imputation of villainy, as from the fierceneſs of puniſhment; and that the offences of the times, whereat it's likely he is alſo troubled, through our intreaty, eſpecially this being the firſt time, may be by you graciouſly forgiven: ſo far at leaſt, that if peradventure in this ſtate of affairs his preſence ſeem grievous to you, he may with his friends be ſafely diſmiſſed to our dominions. The granting of which will be taken as a very great favour by us, and will redound to the praiſe of your Majeſty's clemency throughout your flouriſhing kingdoms: which that they may be always proſperous, and profitable to your Majeſty, we heartily pray: and will do our endeavour, when we have underſtood what regard you pay to our royal amity and friendſhip, the more earneſtly to labour to retaliate thoſe favours, by expreſſing our gratitude in all kind offices to your Majeſty and your whole realm.

God grant that for his glory and the public ſafety, your Majeſty may be crowned with proſperous ſucceſs in all things, and may yourſelf be in perpetual ſecurity.

Your Couſin, Brother and Friend,

Christianus R.

To this letter of the king, queen Mary anſwered again, declaring that the ſaid Miles Coverdale was not impriſoned for religion, but for a certain debt; ſo neither plainly granting, or expreſly denying his requeſt, but uſing a colourable excuſe for ſhifting off the matter, as appeareth by his ſecond letter ſent to the queen, dated September 24, as followeth.

CHRISTIANUS by the Grace of God King of Denmark, Norway, &c. To the moſt noble Princeſs and Lady MARY, Queen of England, France, and Ireland, our moſt dearly beloved Siſter and Couſin, wiſheth Proſperity, with good and lucky Succeſs of all things.

WE have received your Majeſty's letter, whereby anſwer is rendered, and that very graciouſly, unto our petition which we made for the ſafeguard of Mr. Coverdale, late called biſhop of Exon. So that we perceive, though he be in danger for another cauſe than was ſignified unto us before, yet your Majeſty will ſo regard our interceſſion, that Coverdale himſelf ſhall underſtand it to have done him good. To which real promiſe, ſeeing we (as reaſon would we ſhould do) attribute ſo much, that truſting unto the ſame, we doubt not, whereas he being in captivity, his friends, whom we ſpecially tender, are therefore in heavineſs and care, your good promiſe doth call them from ſuch ſorrow and ſolicitude, to the hope and expectation of his aſſured welfare: we could not do otherwiſe, but render thanks unto your Majeſty for ſuch your ready and gracious good will, not only in reſpect of this benefit, but alſo of the converſation and keeping of perpetual amity between us and our realms, and ſo, as much as in us lieth, to omit nothing that might conduce to the nouriſhing and continuance of theſe fortunate beginnings. Neither had we ever any doubt concerning the clemency and moderation of your goodneſs, whom we heartily beſeech Almighty God ever more and more to proſper, unto the glory of his name, and profit of the commonwealth. Wherefore ſeeing your Majeſty writeth, that Mr. Coverdale is in danger for certain accompts of money, and not for any other more grievous offence, we have cauſe on his behalf to rejoice: and therefore we doubt ſo much the leſs, that at our requeſt he ſhall graciouſly have his deliverance given him, and be out of danger. For as touching the biſhoprick, by reaſon whereof he came in debt, we underſtand he yielded it up, that no payment might thereof be required, ſpecially ſeeing he is reputed neither to have enjoyed it long, neither to have had at any time ſo great commodity of it. Moreover, though it be poſſible to find ſome perplexity in the account, or haply ſome other cauſe, yet your Majeſty's letters, offering ſuch favour and benignity, have taken from us all carefulneſs and doubt: inſomuch that we think your Majeſty, as much as may be, will have more reſpect unto our honour, than to that which might of him be required. And therefore we purpoſe not to trouble your Majeſty by repeating of our petition, but to declare how greatly we eſteem it, that your Majeſty would gratify us herein: whereof we plainly hope for an end, that Coverdale himſelf ſhall ſhortly in our preſence make declaration concerning the benefit of his welfare obtained of your Majeſty. And of this we deſire your Majeſty to be ſpecially aſſured again, that we will not only omit no occaſion or opportunity to requite this benefit, but alſo to eſtabliſh and amplify our mutual love and amity between us and our realms on either ſide. Almighty God preſerve your Majeſty in proſperous health and felicity.

Given at our City of Otton, Sept. 24. 1554.
Your Brother and Couſin,
CHRISTIANUS R.

It was a great while before the queen made anſwer to theſe letters. At length after great ſuit made, the next year, February 18. ſhe anſwered again in this wiſe.

To the moſt ſerene Prince CHRISTIAN, by the Grace of God King of Denmark, &c. Duke of Sleſwick, &c. Earl of Oldenburgh, &c. our moſt dear Brother and Friend.

MARY, by the grace of God, queen of England, France, Naples, Jeruſalem, and Ireland, &c. To the moſt ſerene prince CHRISTIAN by the ſame grace of God, king of Denmark, Norway, and of the Vandals; duke of Sleſwick, Holſton, Stormar, and Detmarſh; earl of Oldenburgh and Delmenhorſt, &c. our moſt dear friend and brother, wiſheth health and increaſe of proſperity. When we underſtood by your letters (which this meſſenger has brought us) your deſire of obtaining leave of Mr. Coverdale to depart from our kingdom into yours, we readily granted your deſire; and although he is our born ſubject, and is not as yet diſcharged from a debt which he lawfully owes to our Exchequer, yet we have regarded your deſire before our own debt, and ſhall for our mutual friendſhip at all times when opportunity ſerves, endeavour to gratify your Majeſty; may God long preſerve your ſerene highneſs in health.

Given at our Court at Weſtminſter, Feb. 18. 1555.

On February 19. there was a certain intimation ſet forth and printed in the name of biſhop Bonner, wherein was contained a general monition, and ſtrict charge given to every man and woman within his dioceſe, to prepare themſelves againſt Lent then near approaching, to receive the glad tidings of peace and reconciliation ſent from the pope Julius III. by Poole, his cardinal and legate de Latere, and to receive alſo the joyful benefit of abſolution, being ſent firſt from the cardinal to Bonner, and from him to every of his archdeacons, to be miniſtered to every private perſon within his dioceſe, that would come the ſaid holy time of Lent to his paſtor or curate to be confeſſed, and to receive of him wholeſome counſel, penance, and abſolution: ſignifying moreover, that as he was authoriſed by the aforeſaid cardinal, ſo he for the ſame purpoſe had indued with the like authority all and ſingular paſtors and curates within his dioceſe, to reconcile and abſoil from their former hereſy and ſchiſm, and from the cenſures of the church, ſuch as would reſort unto them. And leſt any ſcruple or doubt, riſing peradventure in their conſciences, ſhould be any ſtay or hindrance in this behalf, he hath aſſigned and deputed therefore through his dioceſe certain learned men, to whom they might reſort, or elſe might open their griefs to any of his archdeacons, or elſe come to his own perſon, and ſo ſhould be reſolved.

And therefore all manner of doubts and obſtacles ſet aſide, he ſtraitly willed and commanded every man and woman to come to confeſſion, and to enjoy this benefit of reconciliation, and abſolution, againſt the firſt Sunday next after Eaſter enſuing, and not to fail. For which purpoſe he had ſpecially commanded the paſtors and curates of every pariſh to certify up in writing the names of every man and woman ſo reconciled, and ſo forth. The copy of which intimation here followeth.

The declaration of the Biſhop of London to be publiſhed to the Lay People of his Dioceſe, concerning their Reconciliation.

EDMUND, by the permiſſion of God, biſhop of London, unto all and ſingular the lay people of his dioceſe, doth ſend greeting in our Saviour Jeſus Chriſt.

Whereas this noble realm of England, dividing itſelf from the unity of the catholic church, and from the agreement in religion with all other chriſtian realms, hath been, beſides many other miſeries and plagues, which God's indignation hath poured upon it, grievouſly alſo vexed, and ſore

fore infected with many and ſundry ſorts of ſects of heretics, as Arians, Anabaptiſts, Libertines, Zuinglians, Lutherans, and many others, all which ſects be moſt repugnant and contrary one againſt another, and all againſt God's truth, and Chriſt's catholic faith; whereupon hath grown ſuch ſlander to the realm, ſuch malice and diſagreement among ourſelves, the inhabitants thereof, ſuch treaſons, tumults, and inſurrections againſt our prince, ſuch blaſphemy and diſhonour unto God, as no man's tongue or pen is able to expreſs: it hath pleaſed the goodneſs of God to caſt his eye of mercy and clemency upon us, and to move the pope's holineſs to ſend his moſt godly meſſenger, the moſt reverend father in God, the lord cardinal Poole, legate de Latere, to bring us the glad tidings of peace and reconciliation, and to reduce and bring home unto the fold the loſt ſheep that were gone aſtray: whoſe meſſage, as it hath been honourably received of the king and queen's majeſties, even ſo the lords ſpiritual and temporal, and commons at the laſt parliament have received it, revoking all laws which in the time of ſchiſm were promulgate againſt the authority of the pope's holineſs, and reſtoring the ſame, and the church of Rome to all that power which they had in this realm before the ſaid ſchiſm, which reconciliation was alſo moſt gladly and joyfully embraced, as well of all the clergy and convocation of the province of Canterbury, as alſo of many other perſons, and being ſo great and neceſſary to be extended to every perſon of the realm, it hath pleaſed the ſaid lord legate's grace to give and impart unto me the ſaid biſhop of London, for my ſaid dioceſe, and to all ſuch as I ſhall appoint in that behalf, power and authority to abſolve and reconcile all and every perſon thereof, as well of the clergy as of the laity, and as well men as women, who will renounce their errors, and, being penitent, will humbly require to be reſtored to the unity of the catholic church, as by the letters of the ſaid lord legate's grace ſent unto me, and from me ſent unto every of the archdeacons within my dioceſe, more at large may and doth appear. And foraſmuch as in mine own perſon, as well for the multitude of people, as diſtance of places, I cannot miniſter this benefit unto every private perſon myſelf, and for that alſo the holy time of Lent is now at hand, in which every true chriſtian man ought to come unto his own paſtor and curate, to be of him confeſſed, and to receive at his hand wholeſome counſel, penance, and abſolution; theſe are therefore as well to give knowledge unto every one of you, as alſo to ſignify and declare, that for that purpoſe, I have by the ſaid authority choſen, named, and deputed, and ſo by theſe preſents do chuſe and depute all and ſingular paſtors and curates, having cure of ſouls within my dioceſe, and being themſelves reconciled herein, that they and every of them by authority hereof, ſhall have full power and authority to abſolve all ſuch as be lay-perſons of their pariſhes from hereſy and ſchiſm, and from the cenſures of the church, into which they be fallen by occaſion thereof alſo, and to reconcile to the church all ſuch who ſhall declare themſelves penitent, and deſirous to enjoy the benefit of the ſaid reconciliation. And whereas divers paſtors and curates in ſundry pariſhes peradventure be not able to ſatisfy the minds, and to appeaſe the conſciences of ſome of their pariſhioners in caſes that ſhall trouble them, I have therefore given alſo authority to every archdeacon of my dioceſe with his archdeaconry, to name and appoint certain of the beſt learned in every deanery of their archdeaconry, to ſupply that lack, ſo that every man ſo troubled may repair to any one of them within the ſaid deanery, whom he ſhall like beſt, to be inſtructed and appeaſed in that behalf. And alſo I have appointed, that if this being done, there ſhall yet remain any ſcruple in the party's conſcience, and himſelf not ſatisfied, then the ſaid party ſhall repair unto one of mine archdeacons or chaplains, unto whom his mind ſhall be moſt inclined, or elſe to repair unto mine own ſelf, to be reſolved in his ſaid ſcruple or doubt, and to receive and take ſuch order therein, as to one of the ſaid archdeacons, or unto me, ſhall therein appear to be moſt expedient.

Further certifying and declaring unto you, that I have given commandment herein to all my archdeacons, that they admoniſh and command every paſtor and curate within their archdeaconries, that they, having knowledge hereof, do on the firſt holiday next then following, at the maſs-time, when the multitude of people is preſent, declare all theſe things unto their pariſhioners, and exhort them that they eſteem this grace accordingly, and reconcile themſelves to the church before the firſt Sunday after Eaſter next enſuing: which thing I alſo do command by the tenor hereof, with intimation that the ſaid time being once paſt, and they not reconciled, every one of them ſhall have proceſs made againſt him, according to the canons, as the cauſe ſhall require: for which purpoſe the paſtors and curates of every pariſh ſhall be commanded by their archdeacon, to certify me in writing of every man and woman's name that is not ſo reconciled.

Further, herewith I do ſignify and declare unto you, that our holy father the pope Julius III. of that name, like a moſt tender and natural father, hearing of the return and recovery of his prodigal child, this realm of England, hath himſelf made joy and gladneſs hereat, and alſo all other true chriſtian realms have done the like. Exhorting you therefore in our Lord not to be unthankful yourſelves, or negligent in this behalf, but diligently to ſeek for it, joyfully to embrace it, and fruitfully to uſe it, remembering withal the monition and charge which came from me the laſt year, concerning your coming to confeſſion in Lent, and receiving the ſacrament at Eaſter: which monition to all effects and purpoſes I have now here repeated and renewed, charging you, and alſo all your curates therewith. And becauſe all our duties is earneſtly and devoutly to pray for the proſperous eſtate of our ſovereigns, the king and the queen of this realm, I do finally require and pray you, as heartily as I can, to pray for their majeſties accordingly; and eſpecially that it may pleaſe Almighty God to ſend unto her grace a good time, and to make her a glad mother, which cannot be but unto us all great joy, much comfort and ineſtimable profit.

Given at London the nineteenth day of February, in the year of our Lord God, after the computation of the church of England, 1554. and of my tranſlation the ſixteenth.

The Form of Abſolution to be kept by the Paſtors and Curates in private Confeſſions, concerning this Reconciliation.

OUR Lord Jeſus Chriſt abſolve you, and by the apoſtolic authority to me granted and committed, I abſolve you from the ſentences of excommunication, and from all other cenſures and pains, into which you be fallen by reaſon of hereſy, or ſchiſm, or any other ways: and I reſtore you unto the unity of our holy mother the church, and the communion of all ſacraments, diſpenſing with you for all manner of irregularity; and by the ſame authority I abſolve you from all your ſins, in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghoſt. Amen.

The lamentable Hiſtory of Mr. James Hales, Judge.

IN the life of Mr. Hooper mention was made of judge Hales, of whom we will more particularly ſpeak in this place; beginning with the communication between the biſhop of Wincheſter and him, declaring withal how falſe and untrue the excuſe is of the papiſts, who ſo preciſely by the law defend themſelves, and ſay, that in all their

their doings they did nothing but by the law, to bear them out. Which if it be ſo, how did they then to Anne Aſkew? What law had they, when they had condemned her firſt for a dead woman, then afterwards to rack her? By what law did they call up Mr. Hooper, and impriſon him for the queen's debt, when the queen in very deed did owe him fourſcore pounds, and kept him a year and a half in priſon, and gave him never a penny? By what law did biſhop Bonner condemn and burn Richard Mekins, a lad of 15 years, when the firſt jury had acquitted him, and he at the ſtake revoked all hereſies, and praiſed the ſaid Bonner to be a good man: and alſo having him in priſon, would not ſuffer his father and mother to come to him, to comfort their own child? What law had they to put Mr. Rogers in priſon, when he did neither preach nor read lecture after the time of the queen's inhibition, and when they had kept him in his own houſe half a year, being not deprived of his living, yet would not let him have an half penny of his own livings to relieve him, his wife, and eleven children? By what law was Thomas Tomkins's hand burnt, and afterwards his body conſumed to aſhes? What good law or honeſty was there to burn the three poor women at Guernſey, with the infant child falling out of the mother's womb, when as they all before their death recanted their words and opinions, and were never abjured before? So here likewiſe in this caſe, what order or right of laws did Stephen Gardiner follow in troubling and impriſoning judge Hales, when he had done nothing neither againſt God's law nor man's, in proceeding by order of law againſt certain preſumptuous perſons, who both before the law, and againſt the law then in force, took upon them to ſay their maſs? as ye ſhall hear in theſe his anſwers and communication had with Stephen Gardiner hereunder enſuing.

The Communication between the Lord Chancellor and Judge Hales, in Weſtminſter-Hall, being there among other Judges, to take his Oath, Oct. 6. 1553.

Lord Chan. MR. Hales, ye ſhall underſtand, that like as the queen's highneſs hath heretofore conceived good opinion of you, eſpecially for that ye ſtood both faithfully and lawfully in her cauſe of juſt ſucceſſion, refuſing to ſet your hand to the book among others that were againſt her grace in that behalf; ſo now, through your own late deſerts againſt ſome of her highneſs's proceedings, ye ſtand not well in her grace's favour; and therefore before you take any oath it will be neceſſary for you to clear yourſelf.

Hales. I pray you, my lord, for what cauſe?

L. Chan. Information is given, that ye have indicted ſeveral prieſts in Kent for ſaying maſs.

Hales. My lord, it is not ſo, I indicted none; but indeed certain indictments of the like nature were brought before me at the laſt aſſizes there held, and I gave order therein as the law required. For I have profeſſed the law, againſt which, in caſes of juſtice, I will never, God willing, proceed, nor in any wiſe diſſemble, but with the ſame ſhew forth my conſcience; and if it were to do again, I would do no leſs than I did.

L. Chan. Yea, Mr. Hales, your conſcience is known well enough, I know you lack no conſcience.

Hales. My lord, you may do well to ſearch your own conſcience, for mine is better known to myſelf than to you: and to be plain, I did as well uſe juſtice in your ſaid maſs-caſe by my conſcience, as by law, wherein I am fully bent to ſtand in trial to the uttermoſt that can be objected. And if I have therein done any injury or wrong, let me be judged by the law; for I will ſeek no better defence, conſidering chiefly that it is my profeſſion.

L. Chan. Why Mr. Hales, although you had the rigour of the law on your ſide, yet ye might have had regard to the queen's highneſs' preſent doings in that caſe. And further, although ye ſeem to be more than preciſe in the law, yet I think ye would be very loth to yield to the extremity of ſuch advantage as might be gathered againſt your proceedings in the law, as ye have ſome time taken upon you in place of juſtice; and if it were well tried, I believe ye ſhould not well be able to ſtand honeſtly thereto.

Hales. My lord, I am not ſo perfect, but I may err for lack of knowledge. But both in conſcience, and ſuch knowledge of the law as God hath given me, I will do nothing but I will maintain it, and abide in it: and if my goods and all that I have be not able to counterpoiſe the caſe, my body ſhall be ready to ſerve the turn; for they be all at the queen's highneſs's pleaſure.

Chan. Ah Sir, ye be very quick and ſtout in your anſwers. But as it ſhould ſeem, that which you did was more of a will favouring the opinion of your religion againſt the ſervice now uſed, than for any occaſion or zeal for juſtice, ſeeing the queen's highneſs doth ſet it forth as yet, wiſhing all her faithful ſubjects to embrace it accordingly: and where you offer both body and goods in your trial, there is no ſuch matter required at your hands, and yet ye ſhall not have your own will neither.

Hales. My lord, I ſeek not wilful will, but to ſhew myſelf as I am bound in love to God and obedience to the queen's majeſty, in whoſe cauſe willingly for juſtice ſake, all other reſpects ſet apart, I did of late, as your lordſhip knoweth, adventure as much as I had. And as for my religion, I truſt it be ſuch as pleaſeth God, wherein I am ready to adventure as well my life as my ſubſtance, if I be called thereunto. And ſo in lack of mine own power and will, the Lord's will be fulfilled.

Chan. Seeing you be at this point, Mr. Hales, I will preſently make an end with you. The queen's highneſs ſhall be informed of your opinion and declaration. And as her grace ſhall thereupon determine, ye ſhall have knowledge. Until ſuch time ye may depart as ye came, without your oath, for as it appeareth, ye are ſcarce worthy the place appointed.

Hales. I thank your lordſhip: and as for my vocation, being both a burden and a charge more than ever I deſired to take upon me; whenſoever it ſhall pleaſe the queen's highneſs to eaſe me thereof, I ſhall moſt humbly with due contentation obey the ſame; and ſo he departed from the bar.

A few days after this communication in Weſtminſter-hall, which was Oct. 6. 1553. Mr. Hales, at the command of the biſhop, was committed to the King's Bench, where he remained conſtant until Lent; then he was removed to the Compter in Breadſtreet, and from thence to the Fleet.

Being in the Fleet, what it was that he had granted to the biſhops, by their fraudulent aſſaults and perſuaſions (namely, of Dr. Day biſhop of Chicheſter, and of judge Portman, as it is thought, overcome at laſt) I have not to ſay.

This is certain, that ſhortly after, calling himſelf better to remembrance, he was brought to great repentance and terror of conſcience: inſomuch, that for very anguiſh of heart he was ready to kill himſelf with his penkniſe when he was in priſon, and, doubtleſs, had done ſo, had not the merciful providence of God miraculouſly prevented him, as ye ſhall hear.

It happened when ſupper-time came that he ſhould be called down, but he having little or no ſtomach to eat or drink, went immediately to bed, where he lay all night ſobbing and groaning, and took (God knoweth) little reſt or ſleep. At length when morning came, about ſix of the clock he ſent his ſervant for a cup of beer, under pretence as though he were thirſty and deſirous to drink; whether this cauſe were true or feigned it is unknown; but this followed, his man was ſcarce got out of the chamber, when he with his penknife had wounded himſelf in divers places of his body, and, no doubt, intended to deſtroy himſelf, had not the goodneſs of God given preſent help in time of opportunity. Whereby it is evident for all men to underſtand, that God's favour was not abſent from him, although he thought himſelf utterly forſaken for his denial, as by the ſequel may appear.

For as ſoon as he had ſent his man out of his chamber (ſee what God would have done) even before the chamber door the butler met him; who being deſired to fill the drink, and taking the cup, the other returned again unto his maſter, at the very time when he was working his own deſtruction; whereby Mr. Hales at that time was hindered of his purpoſe. When the biſhop of Wincheſter had knowledge of it, he ſtraitway took occaſion thereby to blaſpheme the doctrine of the goſpel, which he openly in the ſtar-chamber called doctrine of deſperation. Mr. Hales being within a while after recovered of thoſe wounds, and delivered out of priſon, returned home to his houſe; where, he either for the greatneſs of his ſorrow, or want of good counſel, or for that he would avoid the neceſſity of hearing maſs, having all things ſet in order, a good while before that, pertaining to his laſt will and teſtament, caſting himſelf into a ſhallow river, was drowned therein.

The unhappy chance of this worthy judge was the cauſe of great ſorrow and grief to all good men, and it likewiſe gave occaſion to ſome divines to doubt with themſelves, whether he were reprobate or ſaved, about which matter it is not for me to determine; for he that is our judge, the ſame ſhall be his judge; and he it is that will lay all things open when the time cometh. This in the mean time is certain, that the deed of the man in my mind ought in no wiſe to be allowed: which if he did wittingly, then do I diſcommend the man's reaſon; but if he did it in frenzy, and as being out of his ſenſes, then do I greatly pity his caſe.

Yet notwithſtanding, ſeeing God's judgments be ſecret, and we likewiſe in doubt upon what intent he did thus puniſh himſelf; neither again is any man certain, whether he did repent or no before the laſt breath went out of his body; I think their opinion is more indifferent herein, who do rather diſallow the example of the deed, than deſpair of his ſalvation.

Otherwiſe, if we will judge all thoſe to hell that have departed the world after this ſort, how many examples have we in the firſt perſecutions of the church, of thoſe men and women, who being regiſtered in the works of worthy writers, have notwithſtanding their praiſe and commendation? For what ſhall I think of thoſe young men, who being ſought for to do ſacrifice to idols, did caſt themſelves down headlong, and break their own necks, to avoid ſuch horrible pollution of themſelves? What ſhall I ſay of thoſe virgins of Antioch, who, to the end they might not defile themſelves with uncleanneſs and idolatry, through the perſuaſion of their mother, caſting themſelves headlong into a river together with their mother, did foredo themſelves, although not in the ſame water, yet after the ſame manner of drowning as this Mr. Hales did? What ſhall I ſay of the other two ſiſters, who for the ſame reaſon did violently throw themſelves into the ſea, as Euſebius doth record? In whom though perchance there was no leſs confidence to bear out the pains which ſhould be miniſtered unto them by the wicked, yet that their good deſire to keep their faith and religion unſpotted was commended and praiſed.

Another like example is mentioned by Nicephorus, and that in another virgin likewiſe, whoſe name is expreſſed in Jerom to be Braſilia Dyrrachina, who, to keep her virginity, feigned herſelf to be a witch, telling the young man who went about to raviſh her, that ſhe would give him an herb which ſhould preſerve him from all kind of weapons; and ſo to prove it in herſelf, laid the herb upon her own throat, bidding him ſmite, whereby ſhe was ſlain, and ſo with the loſs of her life her virginity was ſaved.

No. 12.

Hereunto may be joined the like death of Sophronia, a matron of Rome, who when ſhe was required of Maxentius the tyrant to be defiled, and ſaw her huſband more ſlack than he ought to have been in ſaving her honeſty, ſhe bade them that were ſent for her to tarry while ſhe made herſelf ready, and going into her chamber, ſhe with a weapon thruſt herſelf through the breaſt, and died. Now who is he that would reprehend the worthy act of Achetes, who biting off his own tongue ſpit it out into the harlot's face?

Theſe examples I do not here infer, as going about either to excuſe, or to maintain the heinous act of Mr. Hales, which I would rather by ſilence might be drowned in oblivion; but yet notwithſtanding as touching the perſon of the man, whatſoever his fact was, becauſe we are not ſure whether he at the laſt breath repented: again, becauſe we do not know, nor are able to comprehend the bottomleſs depth of the graces and mercies which are in Chriſt Jeſus our Saviour, we will leave therefore the final judgment of him to the determination of him who is appointed judge both of the quick and dead.

A VERSE on J. Hales.

HAD Faith with Piety ſincere conjoin'd,
Adorn'd the moral virtues of thy mind,
The body ſound and ſtrong would yet remain,
And thou 'mongſt ſaints the chiefeſt place would gain.
But who ſo leads his life from ſin ſo free,
That all his actions unpolluted be?
Then ſeeing blemiſhes deform the beſt,
Thy own endeavour do, commit to God the reſt.

The Hiſtory of Thomas Tomkins, who having firſt his Hand burned by Biſhop Bonner, was afterwards burnt in Smithfield.

MEntion was made before of ſix priſoners, brought and examined before biſhop Bonner, the eighth of February, whoſe names were, Tomkins, Pigot, Knight, Haukes, Laurence, and Hunter. All which, though they received their condemnation together the ninth of February, yet becauſe the time of their execution was put off from February till the month of March, I did therefore refer the ſtory of them to this place, wherein now remaineth particularly to treat of the martyrdom of theſe ſix perſons, as the order and time of their ſufferings do require. Of which ſix, Thomas Tomkins was burned in Smithfield, the ſixteenth of March 1555.

This Thomas Tomkins, a weaver by his occupation, dwelling in Shoreditch, and of the dioceſe of London, was of ſuch a pious converſation and diſpoſition, that if any woman had come to him with her web, as ſometimes they did three or four in a day, he would always begin with prayer. Or if any other had come to talk of any matter, he would likewiſe firſt begin with prayer. And if any had fought unto him to borrow money, he would ſhew what money he had in his purſe, and bid him take it. And when they came to repay it again, ſo far was he from ſeeking any uſury at their hand, or from ſtrict exaction of his due, that he would bid them keep it longer till they were better able to pay. And theſe were the conditions of Thomas Tomkins, teſtified yet to this preſent day by moſt of his neighbours, and almoſt all his pariſh which knew him, as Mr. Skinner, Mr. Leeke, and ſeveral others. Of whom more than half a dozen at once came to me, diſcreet and ſubſtantial men, recording moreover as followeth: That Dr. Bonner biſhop of London, kept the ſaid Tomkins with him in priſon half a year, during which time the ſaid biſhop was ſo rigorous to him, that he beat him bitterly about the face, whereby his face was ſwelled. Whereupon the biſhop cauſed his beard to be ſhaven, and gave the barber twelve-pence.

Touching which ſhaving of Thomas Tomkins's beard, this is more to be added: biſhop Bonner having Tomkins priſoner at Fulham, in the month of July, did ſet him with his other work-folks to make hay. And ſeeing him to labour hard, the biſhop ſitting down, ſaid, Well, I like thee well, for thou laboureſt well: I truſt thou wilt be a good catholic. My lord, ſaid he, St. Paul ſaith, "He that doth not labour, is not worthy to eat." Bonner ſaid, Ah, St. Paul is a great man with thee. And ſo after ſuch other talk, the biſhop wiſhed that Tomkins's beard was off, ſaying, That ſo he would look like a catholic. My Lord, ſaid Tomkins, before my beard grew, I was, I truſt, a good chriſtian, and ſo I truſt to be, my beard being on. But Bonner in fine ſent for the barber, and cauſed his beard to be ſhaved off. The very cauſe was, becauſe Bonner had plucked off a piece of his beard before.

The rage of this biſhop was not ſo great againſt him, but his conſtancy was much greater with patience to bear it: who although he had not the learning as others have, yet he was ſo indued with God's mighty Spirit, and ſo conſtantly planted in the perfect knowledge of God's truth, that by no means could he be removed from the confeſſion of truth to impiety and error. Whereupon biſhop Bonner being greatly vexed againſt the poor man, when he ſaw that by no perſuaſions he could prevail with him, deviſed another practice not ſo ſtrange as cruel, further to try his conſtancy, to the intent that, ſeeing he could not by argument convince him, yet he might overcome him by ſome fore-feeling and terror of death. So having with him Mr. Harpsfield, Mr. Pembleton, Dr. Chedſey, Mr. Willerton, and others ſtanding by, he called for Thomas Tomkins, who coming before the biſhop, and ſtanding as he was wont in defence of his faith, the biſhop fell from beating to burning. Who having there a taper or wax candle of three or four wicks ſtanding upon the table, thought there to repreſent unto us as it were the old image of king Porſenna; for as he burned the hand of Scævola, ſo this catholic biſhop took Tomkins by the fingers, and held his hand directly over the flame, ſuppoſing that being terrified by the ſmart and pain of the fire he would leave off the defence of the doctrine which he had received.

Tomkins thinking no otherwiſe, but there preſently to die, began to commend himſelf unto the Lord, ſaying, O Lord, into thy hands I commend my ſpirit, &c. In the mean time that his hand was burning, the ſame Tomkins afterward reported to one James Hinſe, that his ſpirit was ſo wrapt, that he felt no pain. In which burning he never ſhrunk, till the veins ſhrunk, and the ſinews burſt, and the water did ſpirt in Mr. Harpsfield's face: inſomuch that the ſaid Mr. Harpsfield, moved with pity, deſired the biſhop to ſtay, ſaying, that he had tried him enough. This burning was in the hall at Fulham.

And where the biſhop thought by that means to drive him from his opinions, it proved much otherwiſe: for this chriſtian Scævola ſo valiantly did deſpiſe, abide, and endure that burning, that we have leſs cauſe hereafter to marvel at the manfulneſs of the Roman Scævola: I would to God the other had as well followed the example of that Hetruſcan tyrant. For he, after the left hand of Scævola was half burned, either ſatisfied with his puniſhment, or overcome by his manhood, or driven away by fear, ſent him home ſafe unto his people: whereas Bonner, not contented with the burning of his hand, reſted not until he had conſumed his whole body into aſhes in Smithfield.

But before we come to his ſuffering, we will firſt treat of ſome part of his examination and articles, with his anſwers and confeſſion thereunto annexed, as it is credibly recorded in regiſter.

The firſt Examination of Thomas Tomkins.

AFTER that Thomas Tomkins had been half a year in priſon, about the eighth of February he was brought with ſeveral others before biſhop Bonner ſitting in his conſiſtory, to be examined. To whom firſt was brought forth a certain bill or ſchedule ſubſcribed (as appeareth) with his own hand, the fifth day of the ſame month, containing theſe words following:

"Thomas Tomkins of Shoreditch, and of the dioceſe of London, hath believed and doth believe, that in the ſacrament of the altar, under the forms of bread and wine, there is not the very body and blood of our Saviour Jeſus Chriſt in ſubſtance, but only a token and remembrance thereof, the very body and blood of Chriſt being only in heaven, and no where elſe.

By me Thomas Tomkins."

Whereupon he was aſked, whether he did acknowledge the ſame ſubſcription to be of his own hand. To which he granted, confeſſing it ſo to be. This being done, the biſhop went about to perſuade him, with words, rather than with reaſons, to relinquiſh his opinions, and to return again to the unity of the catholic church, promiſing if he would do ſo, to remit all that was paſt. But he conſtantly denied ſo to do. When the biſhop ſaw he could not ſo convince him, he brought forth and read to him another writing, containing articles and interrogatories, whereunto he ſhould come the next day and anſwer; in the mean time he ſhould deliberate with himſelf what to do: and ſo the next day, being the ninth day of February, at eight of the clock in the morning, to be preſent in the ſame place again, to give his determinate anſwer what he would do in the premiſes, and then either to revoke and reclaim himſelf, or elſe in the afternoon the ſame day to come again and have juſtice (as he called it) adminiſtered unto him. The copy of which articles here followeth.

Articles objected and adminiſtered the eighth Day of February againſt Thomas Tomkins, with his own Hand ſubſcribing to the ſame.

THOU doſt believe, that in the ſacrament of the altar, under the forms of bread and wine, there is not, by the omnipotent power of Almighty God, and his holy word, really, truly, and in very deed, the very true and natural body of our Saviour Jeſus Chriſt, as touching the ſubſtance thereof, which was conceived in the womb of the virgin Mary, and hanged upon the croſs, ſuffering paſſion and death there for the life of the world.

I do ſo believe.

Thou doſt believe, that after the conſecration of the bread and wine prepared for the uſe of the ſacrament of the altar, there doth remain the ſubſtance of material bread and material wine, not changed nor altered in ſubſtance by the power of Almighty God, but remaining as it did before.

I do ſo believe.

Thou doſt believe, that it is an untrue doctrine, and a falſe belief, to think or ſay, that in the ſacrament of the altar there is, after conſecration of the bread and wine, the ſubſtance of Chriſt's natural body and blood, by the omnipotent power of Almighty God, and his holy word.

I do ſo believe.

Thou doſt believe, that thy parents, kinsfolks, friends, and

The ſecond Examination of Thomas Tomkins.

THE next day, being the ninth of February, at eight of the clock before noon, the ſaid Thomas Tomkins (according to the former commandment) was brought again into the place aforenamed, before the biſhop and his other aſſiſtants, where the aforeſaid articles were propounded unto him: whereunto he anſwered as followeth:

To the firſt he ſaid, that he did ſo believe, as in the ſame is contained.

To the ſecond he ſaid, that it was only bread and a participation of Chriſt's death and paſſion, and ſo do the ſcriptures teach.

To the third he ſaid and did believe, it was a falſe doctrine, to believe and think as is contained in this article.

To the fourth, he did alſo believe the ſame.

After this anſwer, he did alſo ſubſcribe his name to the ſaid articles. Whereupon, the biſhop drawing out of his boſom another confeſſion ſubſcribed with Tomkins's own hand, and alſo that article that was the firſt day objected againſt him, cauſed the ſame to be openly read, and then willed him to revoke and deny his ſaid opinions; which he utterly refuſed to do; and therefore he was commanded to appear before the biſhop again in the ſame place at two of the clock in the afternoon.

The Biſhop repeateth again the Confeſſion of Thomas Tomkins, written before the ſaid Biſhop of London, and ſubſcribed by the ſaid Tomkins, September 26. 1554. which is this.

I Thomas Tomkins, of the pariſh of Shoreditch, in the dioceſe of London, having confeſſed and declared openly heretofore to Edmund biſhop of London mine ordinary, that my belief hath been many years paſt, and is at this preſent, that the body of our Saviour Jeſus Chriſt is not truly and in very deeed in the ſacrament of the altar, but only in heaven, and ſo in heaven, that it cannot now indeed be really and truly in the ſacrament of the altar.

And moreover, having likewiſe confeſſed and declared to my ſaid ordinary openly many times, that although the church, called the catholic church, hath allowed, and doth allow the maſs and ſacrifice made and done therein, as a wholeſome, profitable, and a godly thing; yet my belief hath been many years paſt, and is at preſent, that the ſaid maſs is full of ſuperſtition, plain idolatry, and unprofitable for my ſoul, and ſo have I called it many times, and take it at this preſent.

Having alſo likewiſe confeſſed and declared to my ſaid ordinary, that the ſacrament of baptiſm ought to be only in the vulgar tongue, and not otherwiſe miniſtered, and alſo without any ſuch ceremonies as accuſtomably are uſed in the Latin church, and otherwiſe not to be allowed.

Finally, being many times and oft called openly before my ſaid ordinary, and talked withal touching all my ſaid confeſſions and declarations, both by the ſaid mine ordinary and divers other learned men, as well his chaplains as others, and counſelled by all them to embrace the truth, and to recant mine error in the premiſes, which they told me was plain hereſy and manifeſt error; do teſtify and declare hereby, that I do and will continually ſtand to my ſaid confeſſion, declaration and belief, in all the premiſes, and every part thereof, and in no wiſe recant or go from any part of the ſame. In witneſs whereof I have ſubſcribed and paſſed this writing, the 26th day of September, the year aforeſaid.

By me Thomas Tomkins.

The names of them that ſate upon Thomas Tomkins at this ſeſſion were theſe; Edmund Bonner biſhop of London, John Fecknam dean of St. Paul's, John Harpſfield archdeacon of London, John Morven Maſter of Arts, Thomas Morton Parſon of Fulham, Triſtram Swadell, Thomas More, Thomas Bekinſaw, James Cline, Clerks.

The Laſt Appearance of Thomas Tomkins before Biſhop Bonner and the Commiſſioners.

THE ſame day and place, at two of the clock in the afternoon, he was the laſt time brought before the biſhops of London, Bath, and St. David's, with others; where he was earneſtly exhorted by the ſaid biſhop of Bath to revoke and leave off his opinions. Unto whom he anſwered, My lord, I was born and brought up in ignorance until now of late years, and now I know the truth I will continue therein unto death.

Then Bonner cauſed all his articles and confeſſion to be again openly read, and ſo in his accuſtomed manner perſuaded him to recant. To whom he finally ſaid, My lord, I cannot ſee but that you would have me forſake the truth, and to fall into error and hereſy. The biſhop ſeeing he would not recant, did proceed in his law, and ſo gave ſentence of condemnation upon him.

Then he delivered him to the ſheriff of London, who ſtraightway carried him to Newgate, where he remained moſt joyful and conſtant until the 16th of March following: on which day he was conveyed by the ſaid ſheriff into Smithfield, and there ſealed up his faith in the flaming fire, to the glory of God's holy name, and confirmation of the weak.

The Hiſtory of William Hunter, a young Man of Nineteen Years, worthy to be read by all young Men and Parents.

THE 26th of March, the year aforeſaid, followed the martyrdom of William Hunter, a pious young man, nineteen years of age, born of good parents; by whom he was not only inſtructed in true religion and piety, but alſo confirmed by them unto death, after a rare and ſtrange example, worthy to be noted and had in admiration by all parents. Wherein may appear a ſingular ſpectacle, not only of marvellous fortitude in the party ſo young, but alſo in his parents, to behold nature in them ſtriving with religion, and overcome of the ſame. Whereby chriſtian parents may learn what is to be done not only in their children, but alſo in themſelves, if need at any time do require, or piety ſhould demand the duty of a chriſtian man againſt natural affection. Example whereof in the ſequel of this hiſtory we have here preſented before our eyes. Which hiſtory, as it was faithfully drawn out by Robert Hunter his own brother (who being preſent with his brother William, and never left him till his death, ſent the true report unto us); we have here with like faithfulneſs placed and recorded the ſame, as followeth.

William Hunter, being an apprentice in London in the firſt year of queen Mary, was commanded at the Eaſter next following to receive the communion at a maſs, by the prieſt of the pariſh where he dwelt, called Coleman-ſtreet; which becauſe he refuſed to do, he was very much much threatened that he ſhould be therefore brought before the biſhop of London. Wherefore William Hunter's maſter, one Thomas Taylor a ſilk-weaver, required William Hunter to go and depart from him, leſt that he ſhould come in danger becauſe of him, if he continued in his houſe. For which cauſe, William Hunter took leave of his ſaid maſter, and went to Burntwood where his father dwelt, with whom he afterward remained about the ſpace of half a quarter of a year.

After this it happened within five or ſix weeks, that William going into the chapel of Burntwood, and finding there a Bible lying on a deſk, did read therein. In the mean time there came in one father Atwell, a ſumner, who hearing William read in the Bible, ſaid to him, Why meddleſt thou with the Bible? Knoweſt thou what thou readeſt? and canſt thou expound the ſcriptures?

To whom William anſwered and ſaid, Father Atwell, I take not upon me to expound the ſcriptures, except I were diſpenſed withal; but I, finding the Bible here when I came, read in it to my comfort. To whom father Atwell ſaid, It was never merry world ſince the Bible came abroad in Engliſh.

To which words William anſwered, ſaying, Father Atwell, ſay not ſo for God's ſake: for it is God's book, out of which every one that hath grace may learn to know both what things pleaſe God, and alſo what diſpleaſeth him. Then ſaid father Atwell, Could we not tell before this time as well as now, how God was ſerved? William anſwered, No, father Atwell, nothing ſo well, as we may now, if that we might have his bleſſed word amongſt us ſtill as we have had. It is true, ſaid father Atwell, if it be as you ſay.

Well, ſaid William Hunter, it pleaſeth me very well, and I pray God that we may have the bleſſed Bible amongſt us continually. To which words father Atwell ſaid, I perceive your mind well enough, you are one of them that miſliketh the queen's laws; and therefore you came from London, I hear ſay: you learned theſe ways at London. But for all that, ſaid father Atwell, you muſt turn another leaf, or elſe you, and a great many more heretics will broil for it, I warrant you. To which words William ſaid, God give me grace, that I may believe his word, and confeſs his name, whatſoever come thereof. Confeſs his name! quoth old Atwell; No, no, ye will go to the devil all of you, and confeſs his name.

What! ſaid William, you ſay not well, father Atwell: at which words he went out of the chapel in a great fury, ſaying, I am not able to reaſon with thee: but I will fetch one ſtraightway ſhall talk with thee, I warrant thee, thou heretic. And he leaving William Hunter reading in the Bible, immediately brought one Thomas Wood, who was then vicar of Southwell, which was at an alehouſe over-againſt the ſaid chapel; who hearing old Atwell ſay, that William Hunter was reading of the Bible in the chapel, came by and by to him, and finding him reading in the Bible, took the matter very heinouſly, ſaying; Sirrah, who gave thee leave to read in the Bible, and to expound it?

Then William anſwered, I expound not the ſcriptures, Sir, but read them for my comfort. What meddleſt thou with them at all, ſaid the vicar; It becometh not thee, nor none ſuch, to meddle with the ſcriptures.

But William anſwered, I will read the ſcriptures, God willing, while I live; and you ought, maſter Vicar, not to diſcourage any man for that matter, but rather exhort men diligently to read the ſcriptures for your diſcharge and their own.

Unto which the vicar replied, It becometh thee well to tell me what I have to do. I ſee thou art an heretic by thy words. William ſaid, I am no heretic for ſpeaking the truth. But the vicar ſaid, It is a merry world when ſuch as thou art ſhall teach us what is the truth. Thou art meddling, father Atwell tells me, with the ſixth of John, wherein thou mayeſt perceive how Chriſt ſaith, "Except that ye eat the fleſh of Chriſt, and drink his blood, ye have no life in you." William ſaid, I read the ſixth of John indeed; howbeit, I made no expoſition on it.

Then ſaid father Atwell, When you read it, I ſaid, that you there might underſtand how that in the ſacrament of the altar is Chriſt's very natural body and blood; unto which you anſwered, how that you would take the ſcriptures as they are, and that you would meddle with no great expoſition, except that ye were diſpenſed withal.

Ah, ſaid the vicar, What ſay you to the bleſſed ſacrament of the altar? Believeſt thou not in it, and that the bread and wine is tranſubſtantiated into the very body and blood of Chriſt? William anſwered, I learn no ſuch thing in the ſixth of John, as you ſpeak of. Why, ſaid the vicar, doſt thou not believe in the ſacrament of the altar? I believe, ſaid William Hunter, all that God's word teacheth. Why, ſaid the vicar, thou mayeſt learn this which I ſay, plainly in the ſixth of John.

Then ſaid William, You underſtand Chriſt's words much like the carnal Capernaites, which thought, that Chriſt would have given them his fleſh to feed upon: which opinion our Saviour Chriſt corrected, when he ſaid, "The words which I ſpeak to you, are ſpirit and life."

Now, quoth the vicar, I have found you out: now I ſee that thou art an heretic indeed, and that thou doſt not believe in the ſacrament of the altar.

Then ſaid William Hunter, whereas you doubt my belief, I would it were tried whether that you or I would ſtand faſter in our faith. Yea, thou heretic, ſaid the vicar, wouldeſt thou have it ſo tried? William Hunter anſwered, That which you call hereſy, I ſerve my Lord God withal.

Then ſaid the vicar, Canſt thou ſerve God with hereſy? But William anſwered, I would that you and I were even now faſt tied to a ſtake, to prove whether that I or you would ſtand ſtrongeſt to our faith. But the vicar anſwered, It ſhall not be ſo tried. No, quoth William, I think ſo; for if I might, I think I know who would ſooneſt recant; for I durſt ſet my foot againſt yours, even to death. That we ſhall ſee, quoth the vicar; and ſo they departed; the vicar threatening William much, how that he would complain of him; with other communication which they had together.

Immediately after, this vicar of Welde told Mr. Brown of the communication which William Hunter and he had together. Which when Mr. Brown underſtood, immediately he ſent for William's father and the conſtable, one Robert Salmon. For immediately after William Hunter and the vicar had reaſoned together, he took his leave of his father and fled, becauſe Wood the vicar threatened him. Now when the conſtable and William's father were come, and were before Mr. Brown, he aſked where William Hunter was. His father anſwered, ſaying, If it pleaſe you, Sir, I know not where he is gone. No, quoth maſter Brown? I will make thee tell where he is, and fetch him forth alſo ere I have done with thee. Sir, ſaid William's father, I know not where he is, nor where to ſeek for him.

Then ſaid Mr. Brown, Why didſt thou not bring him when thou hadſt him? I promiſe thee if thou wilt not fetch him, I will ſend thee to priſon, till I ſhall get him. Wherefore ſee that thou promiſe me to fetch him, or elſe it is not beſt to look me in the face any more, nor ye to reſt in Burntwood. Well, quoth Mr. Brown to William's father, ſee that thou ſeek him forth, and bring him to me.

William's father anſwered, Sir, would you have me ſeek my ſon to be burned? If thou bring him to me, quoth Mr. Brown, I will deal well enough for that matter, thou ſhalt not need to care for the matter. Fetch him, and thou ſhalt ſee what I will do for him. Moreover, if thou lackeſt money, quoth he, thou ſhalt have ſome, and bade the conſtable Mr. Salmon to give him a crown, but William's father would not take it. Howbeit Mr. Brown would never reſt, till William's father had promiſed him to ſeek out his ſon. And thus Mr. Brown ſent the conſtable home again, and William's father, commanding him to ſeek out his ſon, and then come again and bring him to him.

After that old father Hunter had rode two or three days journey to ſatisfy Mr. Brown's expectations, it happened that William met with his father on the highway as he travelled; and he ſeeing his father firſt, came to him and ſpake to him, and told him, that he thought he ſought for him: and then his father confeſſing it, wept ſore, and ſaid, that Mr. Brown charged him to ſeek him, and bring him to him; howbeit, ſaid he, I will return home again, and ſay I cannot find you. But William ſaid, Father, I will go home with you, and ſave you harmleſs, whatſoever cometh of it.

And thus they came home together; but William, as ſoon as he was come home, was taken by the ſaid conſtable, and laid in the ſtocks till the day. Mr. Brown hearing that William Hunter was come home, ſent for him to the conſtable, who brought him immediately to Mr. Brown.

Now when William was come, Mr. Brown ſaid to him, Ah ſirrah, are ye come? and then by and by he commanded the Bible to be brought, and opened it, and then began to reaſon with William on this manner, ſaying, I hear ſay you are a ſcripture-man, and can reaſon much of the ſixth of John, and expound as pleaſeth you; and turned the Bible to the ſixth of St. John, and then he laid to his charge what an expoſition he made, when the vicar and he talked together. And William ſaid, He urged me to ſay ſo much as I did.

Well, quoth Mr. Brown, becauſe you can expound that place ſo well, how ſay you to another place, turning to the 22d of St. Luke? and Mr. Brown ſaid, Look here, for Chriſt ſaith, that the bread is his body.

To which William anſwered, The text ſaith, how Chriſt took bread, but not that he changed it into another ſubſtance, but gave that which he took, and brake that which he gave, which was bread, as is evident by the text: for elſe he ſhould have had two bodies, which to affirm I ſee no reaſon, ſaid William.

At which anſwer Mr. Brown was very angry, and took up the Bible, and turned the leaves, and then flung it down again in ſuch a fury, that William could not well find the place again whereof they reaſoned.

Then Mr. Brown ſaid, Thou naughty boy, wilt thou not take things as they are, but expound them as thou wilt? Doth not Chriſt call the bread his body plainly, and thou wilt not believe, that the bread is his body after the conſecration? Thou goeſt about to make Chriſt a lyar.

But William Hunter anſwered, I mean not ſo, Sir, but rather more earneſtly to ſearch what the mind of Chriſt is in that holy inſtitution, wherein he commendeth unto us the remembrance of his death, paſſion, reſurrection, and coming again, ſaying, "This do in the remembrance of me." And alſo though Chriſt call the bread his body, as he doth alſo ſay that he is a vine, a door, &c. yet is not his body turned into bread, no more than he is turned into a door or vine. Wherefore Chriſt called the bread his body by a figure.

At that word Mr. Brown ſaid, Thou art a villain indeed. Wilt thou make Chriſt a lyar yet ſtill? And was in ſuch a fury with William, and raged ſo, that William could not ſpeak a word, but he croſſed him, and ſcoffed at every word. Wherefore William ſeeing him in ſuch fury, deſired him that he would either hear him quietly, and ſuffer him to anſwer for himſelf, or elſe ſend him away. To which Mr. Brown anſwered, Indeed I will ſend thee to-morrow to my lord of London, and he ſhall have thee under examination: and thus left off the talk, and wrote a letter immediately, and ſent William Hunter with the conſtable to Bonner biſhop of London, who received William.

After that he had read the letter, and the conſtable returned home again, the biſhop cauſed William to be brought into a chamber, where he began to reaſon with him in this manner: I underſtand, William Hunter, quoth he, by Mr. Brown's letter, how that you have had certain communication with the vicar of Welde, about the bleſſed ſacrament of the altar, and how that ye could not agree; whereupon Mr. Brown ſent for thee to bring thee to the catholic faith, from which, he ſaith, that thou art gone. Howbeit, if thou wilt be ruled by me, thou ſhalt have no harm for any thing that thou haſt ſaid or done in this matter.

William anſwered, ſaying, I am not fallen from the catholic faith of Chriſt, I am ſure, but do believe it, and confeſs it with all my heart.

Why, quoth the biſhop, how ſayeſt thou to the bleſſed ſacrament of the altar? Wilt thou not recant thy ſaying, which thou confeſſedſt before Mr. Brown, how that Chriſt's body is not in the ſacrament of the altar, the ſame that was born of the virgin Mary?

To which William anſwered, ſaying, My lord, I underſtand that Mr. Brown hath certified you of the talk which he and I had together, and thereby ye know what I ſaid to him, which I will not recant by God's help. Then ſaid the biſhop, I think thou art aſhamed to bear a faggot, and recant openly; but if thou wilt recant thy ſayings, I will promiſe thee that thou ſhalt not be put to open ſhame: but ſpeak the word here now between me and thee, and I will promiſe thee it ſhall go no further, and thou ſhalt go home again without any hurt.

William anſwered and ſaid, My lord, if you will let me alone, and leave me to my conſcience, I will go to my father and dwell with him, or elſe with my maſter again, and ſo if nobody will diſquiet nor trouble my conſcience, I will keep my conſcience to myſelf.

Then ſaid the biſhop, I am content, ſo that thou wilt go to the church, and receive, and go to confeſſion, and ſo continue a good catholic chriſtian. No, quoth William, I will not do ſo for all the good in the world.

Then, quoth the biſhop, if you will not do ſo, I will make you ſure enough, I warrant you. Well, quoth William, you can do no more than God will permit you. Well, quoth the biſhop, wilt thou not recant indeed by no means? No, quoth William, never while I live, God willing.

Then the biſhop (this talk ended) commanded his men to put William in the ſtocks in his gate-houſe, where he ſate two days and nights, only with a cruſt of brown bread and a cup of water.

At the two days end the biſhop came to him, and finding the cup of water and the cruſt of bread ſtill by him upon the ſtocks, ſaid to his men, Take him out of the ſtocks, and let him break his faſt with you. Then they let him forth of the ſtocks, but would not ſuffer him to eat with them, but called him heretic. And he ſaid, he was as loth to be in their company, as they were to be in his.

After breakfaſt the biſhop ſent for William, and demanded whether he would recant or no? But William made him anſwer, how that he would never recant that which he had confeſſed before men, as concerning his faith in Chriſt.

Then the biſhop ſaid that he was no chriſtian, but he denied the faith in which he was baptized. But William anſwered, I was baptized in the faith of the holy Trinity, which I will not go from, God aſſiſting me with his grace.

Then the biſhop ſent him to the convict priſon, and commanded the keeper to lay irons upon him as many as he could bear; and moreover aſked him, how old he was; and William ſaid, that he was nineteen years of age.

Well, ſaid the biſhop, you will be burned ere you be twenty years old, if you will not yield yourſelf better than you have done yet. William anſwered, God ſtrengthen me in his truth: and then he parted, and the biſhop allowed him a half-penny a day to live on in bread or drink.

Thus he continued in priſon three quarters of a year. In which time he had been before the biſhop five times, beſides the time when he was condemned in the conſiſtory in St. Paul's the 9th day of February; at which time his brother Robert Hunter was preſent, when and where I heard the biſhop condemn him, and five others.

And then the biſhop calling William, aſked him if he would recant, and ſo read to him his examination and confeſſion, as is above rehearſed; and then rehearſed how that William confeſſed that he did believe, that he received Chriſt's body ſpiritually, when he did receive the communion. Doſt thou mean, quoth the biſhop, that the bread is Chriſt's body ſpiritually?

William anſwered, I mean not ſo, but rather when I receive the holy communion rightly and worthily, I do feed upon Chriſt ſpiritually through faith in my ſoul, and am made partaker of all the benefits which Chriſt hath brought unto all faithful believers through his precious death, paſſion, and reſurrection; and not that the bread is his body, either ſpiritually or corporally.

Then ſaid the biſhop to William, Doſt thou not think (holding up his cap) that for example here of my cap, thou mayſt ſee the ſquareneſs and colour of it, and yet that not to be the ſubſtance, which thou judgeſt by the accidents?

William anſwered, If you can ſeparate the accidents from the ſubſtance, and ſhew me the ſubſtance without the accidents, I could believe. Then ſaid the biſhop, Thou wilt not believe that God can do any thing above man's capacity. Yes, ſaid William, I muſt needs believe that; for daily experience teacheth all men that thing plainly: but our queſtion is not what God can do, but what he will have us to learn in his holy ſupper.

Then the biſhop ſaid, I always have found thee at this point, and I ſee no hope in thee to reclaim thee unto the catholic faith, but thou wilt continue a corrupt member; and then pronounced ſentence upon him, how that he ſhould go from that place to Newgate for a time, and ſo from thence to Burntwood, where, ſaid he, thou ſhalt be burned.

Then the biſhop called for another, and ſo when he had condemned them all, he called for William Hunter, and reaſoned with him, ſaying, If thou wilt yet recant, I will make thee a free man in the city, and give thee forty pounds in good money to ſet up thine occupation withal; or I will make thee ſteward of my houſe, and ſet thee in office; for I like thee well, thou haſt wit enough, and I will prefer thee if thou recant.

But William anſwered, I thank you for your great offers: Notwithſtanding, my lord, ſaid he, if you cannot perſuade my conſcience with ſcriptures, I cannot find in my heart to turn from God for the love of the world; for I count all worldly things but loſs and dung, in reſpect of the love of Chriſt.

Then ſaid the biſhop, If thou dieſt in this mind, thou art condemned for ever. William anſwered, God judgeth righteouſly, and juſtifieth them whom man condemneth unjuſtly.

Thus William and the biſhop departed, William and the reſt to Newgate, where they remained about a month, who afterwards were ſent down, William to Burntwood, and the others into divers places of the country. Now when William was come down to Burntwood, which was the Saturday before the annunciation of the virgin Mary that followed on the Monday after, William remained till the Tueſday after, becauſe they would not put him to death then, for the holineſs of the day.

In the mean time William's father and mother came to him, and deſired heartily of God that he might continue to the end in that good way which he had begun; and his mother ſaid to him, that ſhe was glad that ever ſhe was ſo happy to bear ſuch a child, which could find in his heart to loſe his life for Chriſt's name's ſake.

Then William ſaid to his mother, For my little pain I ſhall ſuffer, which will ſoon be at an end, Chriſt hath promiſed me, mother, ſaid he, a crown of joy; may you not be glad of that? With that his mother kneeled down on her knees, ſaying, I pray God ſtrengthen thee, my ſon, to the end: yea, I think thee as well beſtowed as any child that ever I bare.

At which words Mr. Higbed took her in his arms, ſaying, I rejoice (and ſo ſaid the others) to ſee you in this mind, and you have a good cauſe to rejoice. And his father and mother both ſaid, that they always were of that mind, and praying for him, that as he had begun to confeſs Chriſt before men, he might likewiſe continue ſo to the end. William's father ſaid, I was afraid of nothing but that my ſon ſhould have been killed in the priſon by hunger and cold, the biſhop was ſo hard to him. But William confeſſed, after a month that his father was charged with his board, that he lacked nothing, but had meat and cloathing enough, yea even out of the court, both money, meat, cloaths, wood and coals, and all things neceſſary.

Thus they continued in their inn, being the Swan in Burntwood, whither reſorted many people of the country to ſee thoſe good men which were there; and many of William's acquaintance came to him, and reaſoned with him, and he with them, exhorting them to come away from the abomination of popiſh ſuperſtition and idolatry.

Thus paſſing away Saturday, Sunday and Monday, on Monday at night it happened, that William had a dream, which was this: That he was at the place where the ſtake was pitched, where he ſhould be burned, which (as he thought in his dream) was at the town's end where the butts ſtood, which was ſo indeed; and alſo he dreamed, that he met with his father as he went to the ſtake, and alſo that there was a prieſt at the ſtake, who went about to have him recant. To whom he ſaid (as he thought in his dream) Away, falſe prophet; that he exhorted the people to beware of him, and ſuch as he was: which things came to paſs indeed. It happened that William made a noiſe to himſelf in his dream, which cauſed Mr. Higbed and the others to awake him out of his ſleep, to know what he wanted. When he awaked, he told them his dream in order as is ſaid.

Next morning the ſheriff Mr. Brocket called to ſet forward to the burning of William Hunter; and the ſheriff's ſon came to him, and embraced him in his right arm, ſaying, William, be not afraid of theſe men which are here preſent with bows, bills and weapons, ready prepared to bring you to the place where you ſhall be burned. To whom he replied, I thank God I am not afraid; for I have reckoned what it will coſt me already. Then the ſheriff's ſon could ſpeak no more to him for weeping.

Will. Hunter then pluck'd up his gown, and went forward chearfully, the ſheriff's ſervant taking him by one arm, and his brother by another: and going along he met with his father according to his dream, and he ſpake to his ſon weeping, God be with thee, ſon William. And William ſaid, God be with you, good father, and be of good comfort; for I hope we ſhall meet again when we ſhall be merry. His father ſaid, I hope ſo, William; and ſo departed. He then went to the place where the ſtake ſtood, even according to his dream, where all things were not ready; and taking a wet broom faggot, he kneeled down thereon, and read the fifty firſt Pſalm, till he came to theſe words, "The ſacrifice of God is a contrite ſpirit: a contrite and a broken heart, O God, thou wilt not deſpiſe."

Then ſaid Mr. Tyrill of the Braches, called William Tyrill, Thou lyeſt, ſaid he, thou readeſt falſe; for the words are an humble ſpirit. But William ſaid, The tranſlation ſaith a contrite heart. Yea, quoth Mr. Tyrill, the tranſlation

tranſlation is falſe, ye tranſlate books as ye pleaſe yourſelves, like heretics. Well, quoth William, there is no great difference in thoſe words. Then ſaid the ſheriff, Here is a letter from the queen: if thou wilt recant, thou ſhalt live; if not, thou ſhalt be burned. No, quoth William, I will not recant, God willing. William then roſe up and went to the ſtake, and ſtood upright to it. When came one Richard Ponde a bailiff, and made the chain faſt about William.

Then ſaid Mr. Brown, Here is not wood enough to burn a leg of him: then ſaid William, Good people, pray for me; and make ſpeed, and diſpatch me quickly: and pray for me while you ſee me alive, good people, and I will pray for you likewiſe.

No, quoth Mr. Brown, pray for thee, I will pray no more for thee, than I will pray for a dog. To whom William anſwered, Mr. Brown, now you have that which you ſought for, and I pray God it be not laid to your charge in the laſt day; howbeit I forgive you. Then Mr. Brown ſaid, I aſk no forgiveneſs of thee. Well, ſaid William, if God forgive you, I ſhall not require my blood at your hands.

Then ſaid William, Son of God, ſhine upon me; and immediately the ſun in the element ſhone out of a dark cloud ſo full in his face, that he was conſtrained to look another way; whereat the people muſed, becauſe it was ſo dark a little time afore. Then William took up a faggot of broom, and embraced it in his arms.

Then the prieſt, which William dreamed of, came to his brother Robert with a popiſh book to carry to William, that he might recant, which book his brother would not meddle withal.

William then ſeeing the prieſt, and perceiving how he would have ſhewed him the book, ſaid, Away, thou falſe prophet. Beware of them, good people, and come away from their abominations, leſt that you be partakers of their plagues. Then the prieſt ſaid, Look how thou burneſt here, ſo ſhalt thou burn in hell. William anſwered, Thou lyeſt, thou falſe prophet; away thou falſe prophet, away.

There was a gentleman preſent which ſaid, I pray God have mercy upon his ſoul. The people ſaid, Amen, Amen. Immediately the fire was made.

Then William caſt his pſalter into his brother's hand, who ſaid, William, think on the holy paſſion of Chriſt, and be not afraid of death.

And William anſwered, I am not afraid. Then lift he up his hands to heaven, and ſaid, Lord, Lord, Lord, receive my ſpirit; and caſting down his head again into the ſmothering ſmoke, he yielded up his life for the truth, ſealing it with his blood to the praiſe of God.

Some time after, Mr. Brown commanded one Mr. Hunt to take his brother Robert Hunter, and ſet him in the ſtocks till he returned from the burning of Mr. Higbed at Hornden on the Hill, the ſame day. Which thing old Hunt did. Then Mr. Brown (when Robert Hunter came before him) aſked, if he would do as his brother had done. But Robert Hunter anſwered, If I do as my brother hath done, I ſhall have as he hath had. Marry, quoth Mr. Brown, thou may'ſt be ſure of it.

Then Mr. Brown ſaid, I marvel that thy brother ſtood ſo to his tackling: and moreover, he aſked Robert, if William's maſter of London were not at his burning. But Robert ſaid, that he was not there; but Mr. Brown bare him in hand that his maſter was there, and how that he did ſee him there, but Robert denied it. Then Mr. Brown commanded the conſtable and Robert Hunter to go their ways home, and ſo had no further talk with them.

The Hiſtory of Mr. Higbed and Mr. Cauſton, two worthy Gentlemen of Eſſex, who were burned in Eſſex, March 26. 1555.

ALthough the condemnation of Mr. Higbed and Mr. Cauſton followed after the condemnation of thoſe martyrs who were condemned with Tomkins and Hunter above-mentioned, yet becauſe the time of their execution was before the burning of the aforeſaid four martyrs, ſuffering the ſame day that William Hunter did, which was the twenty ſixth of March, I thought therefore next after the ſtory of the ſaid William Hunter, following the order of time, here to place the ſame.

This Mr. Higbed and Mr. Cauſton, two worſhipful gentlemen in the county of Eſſex, the one at Hornden on the hill, the other of the pariſh of Thundurſt, being zealous and religious in the true ſervice of God; as they could not diſſemble with the Lord their God, nor flatter with the world, ſo in time of blind ſuperſtition and wretched idolatry, they could not long lie hid and obſcure in ſuch a number of malignant adverſaries, accuſers, and ſervants of this world, but at length they were perceived, and diſcovered to the aforeſaid Edmund Bonner biſhop of London, by whoſe command they were committed to the officers of Colcheſter, to be ſafely kept, and with them alſo a ſervant of Thomas Cauſton, who was nothing inferior to his maſter in true piety.

Biſhop Bonner perceiving theſe two gentlemen to be of good eſtate, and of great eſtimation in that country, leſt any tumult ſhould thereby ariſe, came thither himſelf, accompanied with Mr. Fecknam and ſeveral others, thinking to reclaim them to his religion; ſo that great labour and diligence was taken therein, as well by terrors and threatenings, as by large promiſes and flatterings, and all fair means, to reduce them again to the unity (as they termed it) of the mother church.

In fine, when nothing could prevail to make them aſſent to their doings, at length they came to this point, that they required certain reſpite to conſult with themſelves what was beſt to do. Which time of deliberation being expired, and they remaining ſtill conſtant and unmoveable in their profeſſed doctrine, and ſetting out alſo their confeſſion in writing, the biſhop ſeeing no good to be done in tarrying any longer there, departed thence, and carried them both with him to London, and with them certain other priſoners alſo, who about the ſame time were apprehended in thoſe parts.

It was not long after this, but theſe priſoners being at London committed to ſtrait priſon, and there attempted ſundry ways by the biſhop and his chaplains to revoke their opinions; at length when no perſuaſions would ſerve, they were brought forth to open examination at the conſiſtory in St. Paul's, February 17, 1555. where they were demanded as well by the ſaid biſhop, as alſo by the biſhop of Bath and others, whether they would recant their errors and perverſe doctrine, as they termed it, and ſo come to the unity of the popiſh church. But on their refuſing ſo to do, the biſhop aſſigned them to appear again the next day, being the 18th of February.

On which day, among many other things there ſaid and paſſed, he read unto them ſeverally certain articles, and gave them reſpite until the next day to anſwer unto the ſame, and ſo committed them again to priſon. The copy of which articles hereunder followeth.

Articles objected and miniſtered by Biſhop Bonner, againſt Thomas Cauſton and Thomas Higbed.

FIRST, That thou Thomas Cauſton (or Thomas Higbed) haſt been and art of the dioceſe of London, and alſo of the juriſdiction now of me Edmund biſhop of London.

Item,

Item, That thou waſt in time paſt, according to the order of the church of England, baptized and chriſtened.

Item, That thou hadſt Godfathers and Godmother, according to the ſaid order.

Item, That the ſaid Godfathers and Godmother did then promiſe for thee, and in thy name, the faith and religion that then was uſed in the realm of England.

Item, That that faith and religion which they did profeſs and make for thee, was accounted and taken to be the faith and religion of the church, and of the chriſtian people: and ſo it was in very deed.

Item, Thou coming to the age of diſcretion, that is to ſay, to the age of fourteen years, didſt not miſlike nor diſallow that faith, that religion, or promiſe then uſed and approved, and promiſed by the ſaid Godfathers and Godmother, but for a time didſt continue in it, as others (taking themſelves for chriſtian people) did likewiſe.

Item, That at that time, and alſo before, it was taken for a doctrine of the church, catholic and true, and every where in Chriſtendom then allowed for catholic and true, and to be the profeſſion of chriſtian men, to believe, that in the ſacrament of the altar, under the forms of bread and wine, after the conſecration, there was and is by the omnipotent power and will of Almighty God, and his word, without any ſubſtance of bread and wine there remaining, the true and natural body and blood of our Saviour Jeſus Chriſt in ſubſtance, which was born of the virgin Mary, and ſuffered upon the croſs, really, truly, and in very deed.

Item, That at that time thy father and mother, all thine anceſtors, all thy kindred, acquaintance and friends, and thy ſaid Godfathers and Godmother, did then ſo believe, and think in all the ſame as the ſaid church did therein believe.

Item, That thyſelf haſt had no juſt cauſe or lawful ground to depart or ſwerve from the ſaid religion or faith, nor any occaſion at all, except thou wilt follow and believe the erroneous opinion or belief that hath been, againſt the common order of the church, brought in by certain diſordered perſons of late, at the uttermoſt within theſe thirty or forty years laſt paſt.

Item, That thou doſt know, or credibly haſt heard, and doſt believe, that Dr. Robert Barnes, John Frith, Thomas Gerrard, Hierome Laſſels, Anne Aſkew, John Hooper late biſhop of Glouceſter, Sir Laurence Saunders prieſt, John Bradford, Sir John Rogers prieſt, Sir Rowland Taylor prieſt, Sir John Laurence prieſt, William Pygot, Stephen Knight, William Hunter, Thomas Tomkins, and Thomas Haukes, have been heretofore reputed, taken, and accounted as heretics, and alſo condemned as heretics, and ſo pronounced openly and manifeſtly; eſpecially in holding and believing certain damnable opinions, againſt the verity of Chriſt's body and blood in the ſacrament of the altar, and all the ſame perſons, ſaving John Bradford, Sir John Laurence, William Pygot, Stephen Knight, William Hunter, Thomas Tomkins, and Thomas Haukes, have ſuffered pains of death by fire, for the maintenance and defence of their ſaid opinions and miſbelief.

Item, That thou doſt know, or credibly haſt heard, and doſt believe, that Thomas Cranmer late archbiſhop of Canterbury, and Nicholas Ridley, naming himſelf biſhop of London, Robert Ferrar late biſhop of St. David's, and Hugh Latimer ſome time biſhop of Worceſter, have been, and are at this preſent reputed, accounted, and taken as heretics and miſbelievers, in maintaining and holding certain damnable opinions againſt the verity of Chriſt's body and blood in the ſacrament of the altar.

Item, That thou haſt commended and praiſed all the ſaid perſons ſo erring and believing (or at leaſt wiſe ſome of them) ſecretly and alſo openly, taking and believing them to be faithful and catholic people, and their ſaid opinions to be good and true, and the ſame to the beſt and uttermoſt of thy power thou haſt allowed, maintained and defended at ſundry times.

Item, That thou having heard, known and underſtood all the premiſſes thus to be as is aforeſaid, haſt not regarded all or any part thereof, but, contrary to the ſame and every part thereof, haſt attempted and done, condemning, tranſgreſſing, and breaking the promiſe, faith, religion, order and cuſtom aforeſaid, and haſt become, and art an heretic and miſbeliever in the premiſſes, denying the verity of Chriſt's body and blood in the ſacrament of the altar, and obſtinately affirming, that the ſubſtance of the material bread and wine are there remaining, and that the ſubſtance of Chriſt's body and blood, taken of the virgin Mary, are not there in the ſaid ſacrament really and truly being.

Item, That all the premiſſes be true, notorious, famous and manifeſt, and that upon all the ſame, there have and be amongſt the ſaid good people of the city of London, and dioceſe of the ſame, in great multitude, commonly and publicly, a common and public fame and opinion, and alſo in all places where thou haſt been, within the ſaid dioceſe of London.

Theſe articles being given to them in writing by the biſhop, the next day following was aſſigned to them to give up and exhibit their anſwers unto the ſame.

On the firſt day of March the ſaid Thomas Cauſton and Thomas Higbed, gentlemen, being brought before the biſhop in the conſiſtory, they there exhibited their anſwers to the articles aforeſaid; the tenor of which anſwers here followeth.

The Anſwers of Thomas Cauſton and Thomas Higbed, to the aforeſaid Articles.

TO the firſt, they anſwer and confeſs the ſame to be true.

To the ſecond, they anſwer and believe the ſame to be true.

To the third, they anſwer and believe the ſame to be true.

To the fourth, they anſwer and think the ſame to be true.

To the fifth, until this clauſe [and ſo was it in very deed] they anſwer and believe the ſame to be true. And unto that clauſe [and ſo was it in very deed] they anſwer negatively, and believe that it was not in very deed.

To the ſixth, ſeventh, and eighth, they anſwer and believe the ſame to be true.

To the ninth, they anſwer and ſay, that they think they have a juſt and lawful cauſe and ground to ſwerve and go from the ſaid faith and religion, becauſe they have now read more ſcripture, than either themſelves, or their parents and kinsfolk, Godfathers or Godmothers have read or ſeen heretofore in that behalf.

To the tenth, they anſwer, ſay, and believe, that the ſaid perſons articulate have been named, taken, and counted for heretics, and ſo condemned for heretics; yet about three years paſt, they were taken for good chriſtian perſons. And foraſmuch as theſe reſpondents did never hear them preach concerning the ſacrament of the altar, they ſay that they preached well, in that they ſaid and preached that Chriſt is not preſent really and truly in the ſacrament, but that there is remaining the ſubſtance of bread and wine.

To the eleventh, they anſwer and ſay, that howſoever other folks do repute and take the ſaid perſons articulate, yet theſe reſpondents themſelves did never, nor yet do ſo account and take them. And further they ſay, that in caſe the ſaid perſons articulate named in this article have preached, that in the ſacrament of the altar is very material wine, and not the ſubſtance of Chriſt's body and blood under the forms of bread and wine, then they preached preached well and truly, and theſe reſpondents themſelves do ſo believe.

To the twelfth, they anſwer and ſay, that where other folk have diſpraiſed the ſaid perſons articulate, and diſallowed their opinions, theſe reſpondents (for aught that they at any time have heard) did like and allow the ſaid perſons, and their ſayings.

To the thirteenth, they anſwer and ſay, that they have not broken or condemned any promiſe made by their Godfathers and Godmothers for them at their baptiſm, and that they are no heretics nor miſbelievers, in that they believe that there remaineth only bread and wine in the ſacrament of the altar, and that Chriſt's natural body is not there, but in heaven; for they ſay, that the ſcriptures ſo teach them.

To the fourteenth, they anſwer and believe, that the premiſſes before by them confeſſed be true, notorious, and manifeſt.

After theſe anſwers exhibited and peruſed, the biſhop ſpake unto them after this ſort, beginning firſt (as he did before) with Thomas Cauſton: Becauſe ye ſhall not be ſuddenly trapped, and that men ſhall not ſay that I go about to ſeek ſnares to put you away, I have hitherto reſpited you, that you ſhould weigh and conſider with yourſelf your ſtate and condition; and that you ſhould, while ye have time and ſpace, acknowledge the truth, and return to the unity of the catholic church. Then the biſhop, reading their former articles and anſwers to the ſame, aſked them if they would recant: which when they denied, they were again diſmiſſed, and commanded to appear the Wedneſday after, at two of the clock in the afternoon, there to receive their definitive ſentence: which (as it ſeemeth) was yet deferred.

Another Examination of Mr. Cauſton and Mr. Higbed.

THE next Friday, being the eighth day of March, the ſaid Thomas Cauſton was firſt called to examination before the biſhop, Mr. Fecknam and Dr. Stempe being in his palace, and there had read unto him his foreſaid articles with his anſwers thereunto; and after ſome exhortations to recant his former profeſſion, and to be conformable to the unity of their church, they promiſed him (ſo doing) willingly to receive him again thereunto. To whom he anſwered, You go about to catch us in ſnares and gins. But mark, by what meaſure ye meaſure us, look you to be meaſured with the ſame again at God's hands. The biſhop ſtill perſuaded him to recant. To whom he anſwered, No, I will not abjure. Ye ſaid, that the biſhops that were lately burned be heretics: but I pray God make me ſuch an heretic as they were.

The biſhop then leaving Mr. Cauſton, calleth for Mr. Higbed: uſing with him the like perſuaſions that he did with the other: but he anſwered, I will not abjure. For I have been of this mind and opinion that I am now, theſe ſixteen years, and do what ye can, ye ſhall do no more than God will permit you to do; and with what meaſure you meaſure us, look for the ſame again at God's hands.

There Fecknam aſked him his opinion in the ſacrament of the altar. To whom he anſwered, I do not believe that Chriſt is in the ſacrament as ye will have him, which is of man's making. Both their anſwers thus ſeverally made, they were again commanded to depart for that time, and to appear the next day in the conſiſtory at St. Paul's, between the hours of one and three of the clock at afternoon.

The laſt appearance of Mr. Cauſton and Mr. Higbed before Bonner.

THE ninth day of March, they were both brought thither: where the biſhop cauſed Mr. Thomas Cauſton's articles and anſwers firſt to be read openly, and after perſuaded him to recant and abjure his heretical opinions, and to come home now at the laſt to their mother the catholic church, and ſave himſelf.

But Mr. Thomas Cauſton anſwered again, and ſaid, No, I will not abjure; for I came not hither for that purpoſe: and therewithal did exhibit in writing unto the biſhop (as well in his own name, as alſo in Thomas Higbed's name) a confeſſion of their faith, to which they would ſtand: and required leave to read the ſame, which after great ſuit) was obtained, and ſo he read it openly in the hearing of the people, as followeth.

The Confeſſion and Faith of Thomas Cauſton and Thomas Higbed, which they delivered to the Biſhop of London, before the Mayor and Sheriffs, and in the Preſence of all the People there aſſembled, March 9. 1555.

FIRST, we believe and profeſs in baptiſm, to forſake the devil and all his works and pomps, and the vanities of the wicked world, with all the ſinful luſts of the fleſh.

2. We believe all the articles of our chriſtian faith.

3. We believe, that we are bound to keep God's holy will and commandments, and to walk in the ſame all the days of our life.

4. We believe, that there is contained in the Lord's Prayer all things neceſſary both for body and ſoul, and that we are taught thereby to pray to our heavenly Father, and to no ſaint or angel.

5. We believe, that there is a catholic church, even the communion of ſaints, "Built upon the foundation of the prophets and apoſtles (as St. Paul ſaith) Chriſt being the head corner-ſtone. For which church Chriſt gave himſelf, to make it to himſelf a glorious congregation without fault in his ſight."

6. We believe, that his church of herſelf, and by her own merits is ſinful, and muſt needs ſay, Father, forgive us our ſins: but through Chriſt and his merits, ſhe is freely forgiven: "For he, in his own perſon (ſaith St. Paul) hath purged her ſins, and made her faultleſs in his ſight. Beſides whom, there is no Saviour, ſaith the prophet: Neither is there ſalvation, ſaith St. Peter, in any other name."

7. We believe as he is our only Saviour, ſo he is our only Mediator. For the apoſtle St. Paul ſaith, "There is one God, one Mediator betwe n God and man, even the man Jeſus Chriſt." Wherefore ſeeing none hath this name God and Man but Jeſus Chriſt, therefore there is no mediator but Jeſus Chriſt.

8. We believe, that this church of Chriſt is and hath been perſecuted, by the words of Chriſt, ſaying, "As they have perſecuted me, ſo ſhall they perſecute you: for the diſciple is not above his maſter. For it is not only given unto you to believe in Chriſt, ſaith St. Paul, but alſo to ſuffer for his ſake. For all that will live godly in Chriſt Jeſus, muſt ſuffer perſecution."

9. We believe, that the church of Chriſt teacheth the word of God truly and ſincerely, putting nothing to, nor taking any thing from: and alſo doth miniſter the ſacraments according to the primitive church.

10. We believe, that this church of Chriſt ſuffereth all men to read the ſcriptures, according to Chriſt's commandment, ſaying, "Search the ſcriptures, for they teſtify of me." We read alſo in the Acts, that when St. Paul preached, the audience daily ſearched the ſcriptures, tures, whether he preached truly or no. Alſo the prophet David teacheth all men to pray with underſtanding: "For how ſhall the unlearned, ſaith St. Paul, ſay Amen, at the giving of thanks, when they underſtand not what is ſaid?" And what is more allowed than true faith, which, St. Paul ſaith, "cometh by hearing of the word of God?"

11. We believe, that the church of Chriſt teacheth that God ought to be worſhipped according to his word, and not after the doctrine of men. "For in vain, ſaith Chriſt, ye worſhip me, teaching nothing but the doctrine of men." Alſo we are commanded of God by his prophet, ſaying, "Walk not in the traditions and precepts of your elders; but walk, ſaith he, in my precepts: do that I command you: put nothing thereunto, neither take any thing from it." Likewiſe ſaith Chriſt, "You ſhall forſake father and mother, and follow me." Whereby we learn, that if our elders teach otherwiſe than God commanded, in that point we muſt forſake them.

12. We believe, that the ſupper of the Lord ought not to be altered and changed, foraſmuch as Chriſt himſelf, being the Wiſdom of the Father, did inſtitute it. For it is written, "Curſed is he that changeth my ordinances, and departeth from my commandments, or taketh any thing from them."

Now we find by the ſcriptures, that his holy ſupper is ſore abuſed.

Firſt, In that it is given in one kind, where Chriſt gave it in both.

Secondly, In that it is made a private maſs, where Chriſt made it a communion: for he gave it not to one alone, but to all the apoſtles in the name of the whole church.

Thirdly, In that it is made a ſacrifice for the quick and the dead, whereas Chriſt ordained it for a remembrance of the everlaſting ſacrifice which was in his own body offered on the altar of the croſs once for all, as the holy apoſtle ſaith, "Even the full and perfect price of our redemption: and where there is remiſſion of ſin, ſaith he, there is no more ſacrifice for ſin."

Fourthly, In that it is worſhipped contrary to the commandment, ſaying, "Thou ſhalt worſhip nothing that is made with hands."

Firthly, In that it is given in an unknown tongue, whereby the people are ignorant of the right uſe thereof, how Chriſt died for our ſins, and roſe again for our juſtification, by whom we be ſet at peace with God, and received to his favour and mercy by his promiſe, whereof this ſacrament is a ſure ſeal and witneſs.

Beſides this, it is hanged up, and ſhut in a box; yea, many times ſo long, that worms breed in it, and ſo it putrifieth: whereby the rude people have occaſion to ſpeak unreverently thereof, which otherwiſe would ſpeak reverently.

Therefore they that thus abuſe it, bring up the ſlander, and not we, which pray daily to God to reſtore it to the right uſe, according to Chriſt's inſtitution.

Now concerning Chriſt's words, "This is my body," we deny them not; but we ſay, that the mind of Chriſt in them muſt be ſearched out by other open ſcriptures, whereby we may come to the ſpiritual underſtanding of them, which ſhall be moſt to the glory of God: for as the holy apoſtle ſaith, "There is no ſcripture that hath any private interpretation." Beſides this, the ſcriptures are full of the like figurative ſpeeches: as for example: Chriſt ſaith, "This cup is the New Teſtament in my blood. The rock is Chriſt, ſaith St. Paul. Whoſoever receiveth a child in my name, ſaith our Saviour Jeſus Chriſt, receiveth me." Which ſentences muſt not be underſtood after the letter, leſt we do err as the Capernaites did, which thought that Chriſt's body ſhould be eaten with their teeth, when he ſpake of the eating thereof. Unto whom Chriſt ſaid, "Such a fleſhly eating of my body profiteth nothing: it is the Spirit that quickeneth; the fleſh profiteth nothing: for my words are ſpirit and life."

Thus we ſee that Chriſt's words muſt be underſtood ſpiritually, and not literally. Therefore he that cometh to this worthy ſupper of the Lord, muſt not prepare his jaw, but his heart, neither tooth nor belly; but, "Believe, ſaith St. Auguſtine, and thou haſt eaten it;" ſo that we muſt bring with us a ſpiritual hunger, and, as the apoſtle ſaith, "Try and examine ourſelves, whether our conſcience do teſtify unto us, that we do truly believe in Chriſt, according to the ſcriptures;" whereof if we be truly certified, being new born from our old converſation in heart, mind, will, and deed, then may we boldly with this marriage-garment of our faith come to the feaſt.

In conſideration whereof we have invincible ſcriptures, as of Chriſt himſelf; "This do in remembrance of me." And St. Paul; "As often, ſaith he, as ye eat of this bread, and drink of this cup, ye ſhall remember the Lord's death until he come." Here is no change, but bread ſtill. And St. Luke affirmeth the ſame. Alſo Chriſt hath made a juſt promiſe, ſaying; "Me you ſhall not have always with you, I leave the world, and go to my Father; for if I ſhould not depart, the Comforter, which I will ſend, cannot come unto you." So according to his promiſe he aſcended as the evangeliſts teſtify. Alſo St. Peter ſaith, "That heaven ſhall keep him until the laſt day alſo."

Now as touching his omnipotent power, we confeſs and ſay with St. Auguſtine, that Chriſt is both God and man. In that he is God, he is every where; but in that he is man, he is in heaven, and can occupy but one place: whereunto the ſcriptures do agree. For his body was not in all places at once when he was here; for it was not in the grave, when the woman ſought it, as the angel ſaith: neither was it at Bethany where Lazarus died, by Chriſt's own words, ſaying, "I am glad I was not there." And thus we conclude with the ſcriptures, that Chriſt is in his holy ſupper ſacramentally and ſpiritually in all them that worthily receive it, and corporally in heaven, both God and man.

And further, we make here our proteſtation before God (whom we call to record in this matter) that this which we have ſaid, is neither of ſtubbornneſs, nor wilful mind, as ſome judge of us; but even of very conſcience, truly (we truſt) grounded on God's holy word. For before we took this matter in hand, we beſought God from the bottom of our hearts, that we might do nothing contrary to his holy and bleſſed word. And in that he hath thus ſhewed his power in our weakneſs, we cannot worthily praiſe him, unto whom we give hearty thanks, through Jeſus Chriſt our Lord, Amen.

When they had thus delivered and read their confeſſion, the biſhop ſtill perſiſting ſometimes in fair promiſes, ſometimes threatening to pronounce judgment, aſked them whether they would ſtand to this their confeſſion, and other anſwers? To whom Cauſton ſaid, Yea, we will ſtand to our anſwers written with our hands, and to our belief therein contained. After which anſwer the biſhop began to pronounce ſentence againſt him.

Then he ſaid, that it was much raſhneſs, and without all love and mercy, to give judgment without anſwering to their confeſſion by the truth of God's word, whereunto they ſubmitted themſelves moſt willingly. And therefore I, ſaid Cauſton (becauſe I cannot have juſtice at your hand, but that ye will thus raſhly condemn me), do appeal from you to my lord cardinal.

Then Dr. Smith ſaid, that he would anſwer their confeſſion. But the biſhop not ſuffering him to ſpeak, ordered Mr. Harpsfield to ſpeak his mind for the ſtay of the people; who taking their confeſſion in his hand, neither touched nor anſwered one ſentence thereof.

Which done, the biſhop pronounced ſentence, firſt againſt the ſaid Thomas Cauſton; and then calling Thomas Higbed, cauſed his articles and anſwers likewiſe to be read. In the reading whereof Mr. Higbed ſaid, Ye ſpeak blaſphemy againſt Chriſt's paſſion, and ye go about to trap us with your ſubtilties and ſnares. And though my father, mother, and kinsfolk did believe as you ſay, yet they were deceived in ſo believing.

And further, where you ſay, that my lord, named Cranmer, late archbiſhop of Canterbury, and others ſpecified in the ſaid articles, be heretics, I do wiſh that I were ſuch an heretic as they were and be. Then the biſhop aſked him again, whether he would turn from his error, and come to the unity of their church: to whom he ſaid, No, I would ye ſhould recant: for I am in the truth, and you in error.

Well, quoth the biſhop, if ye will return, I will gladly receive you.

No, ſaid Mr. Higbed, I will not return as you will have me, to believe in the ſacrament of the altar your God.

Whereupon the biſhop proceeded, and gave judgment upon him, as he had done before upon Thomas Cauſton. When this was ended, they were both delivered to the ſheriffs, and by them ſent to Newgate, where they remained for the ſpace of fourteen days, praiſed be God, not ſo much in afflictions as in conſolations. For the increaſe whereof they earneſtly deſired all their good brethren and ſiſters in Chriſt to pray, that God for his Son's ſake would go forth with that great mercy which already he had begun in them, ſo that they might perſevere unto the end, to the praiſe of the eternal God, and comfort of all their brethren.

Theſe fourteen days after the condemnation being expired, they were the twenty-third day of March fetched from Newgate at four of the clock in the morning, and ſo led through the city to Aldgate, where they were delivered unto the ſheriff of Eſſex, and there being faſt bound in a cart, were ſhortly after brought to their ſeveral appointed places of burning; that is to ſay, Thomas Higbed to Hornden on the hill, and Thomas Cauſton to Rayly (both in the county of Eſſex), where they did moſt conſtantly, the twenty-ſixth day of the ſame month, ſeal their faith with ſhedding of their blood by moſt cruel fire, to the glory of God, and great rejoicing of all good men.

At the burning of Mr. Higbed, juſtice Brown was alſo preſent, as is above ſpecified, and divers gentlemen in the ſhire were alſo commanded to be there, for fear belike they ſhould be taken from them.

William Pygot, Stephen Knight, and John Laurence, with their Examinations and Martyrdom.

IN the ſtory of Thomas Tomkins and his fellows, we made mention of ſix who were examined, and condemned together by biſhop Bonner, the ninth day of February: of which ſix condemned perſons, two, which were Tomkins and William Hunter (as ye heard) were executed, the one upon the twenty-ſixth of February, and the other upon the twenty-ſixth of March. The other three, to wit, William Pygot and Stephen Knight, ſuffered upon the twenty-eighth day, and John Laurence the twenty-ninth of the ſaid month of March.

Concerning which three martyrs, we have now ſomething to ſay of their examinations: it was firſt demanded of them, what their opinion was of the ſacrament of the altar. Whereunto they ſeverally anſwered, and alſo ſubſcribed, that in the ſacrament of the altar, under the forms of bread and wine, there is not the very ſubſtance of the body and blood of our Saviour Jeſus Chriſt; but a ſpecial partaking of the body and blood of Chriſt; the very body and blood of Chriſt being only in heaven, and no where elſe. This anſwer thus made; the biſhop cauſed certain articles to be read unto them, tending to the ſame effect, as did the articles before of Tomkins and of Mr. Cauſton. The tenor whereof here followeth.

Articles or Interrogatories objected by the Biſhop of London, to William Pygot, Stephen Knight, and John Laurence, Feb. 8. 1555.

WHether do you think, and ſtedfaſtly believe, that it is a catholic, faithful, chriſtian, and true doctrine, to teach, preach, and ſay, that in the ſacrament of the altar, under the forms of bread and wine, there is without any ſubſtance of bread and wine there remaining, by the omnipotent power of Almighty God, and his holy word, really, truly, and in very deed, the true and natural body and blood of our Saviour Jeſus Chriſt, the ſelf-ſame in ſubſtance (though not in outward form and appearance) which was born of the virgin Mary, and ſuffered upon the croſs, yea, or nay?

Whether do you think, and ſtedfaſtly believe, that your parents, kinsfolk, friends, and acquaintance, here in this preſent realm of England, before your birth a great while, and alſo after your birth, profeſſing and believing the ſaid doctrine and faith, concerning the ſaid ſacrament of the altar, had a true chriſtian faith, and were faithful and true chriſtian people, or no?

Whether do you think, and ſtedfaſtly believe, that your godfathers and godmother, profeſſing and believing the ſaid doctrine and faith, concerning the ſaid ſacrament of the altar, had a true chriſtian faith, and were faithful and true chriſtian people, or no?

Whether do you think, and ſtedfaſtly believe, that your ownſelf in times paſt, being of the age of fourteen years and above, did think and believe concerning the ſaid ſacrament of the altar in all points, as your ſaid parents, kinsfolks, friends, acquaintance, godfathers and godmothers, did then think and believe them, or no?

Whether do you think, and ſtedfaſtly believe, that our ſovereigns the king and the queen of this realm of England, and all the nobility, clergy, and laity of this realm, profeſſing and believing the ſaid doctrine and faith, as other chriſtian realms do, concerning the ſaid ſacrament of the altar, have a true chriſtian faith, and believe as the catholic and the true church of Chriſt hath always believed, preached, and taught, or no?

Whether do you think, and ſtedfaſtly believe, that our Saviour Chriſt and his holy Spirit hath been, is, and ſhall be with his catholic church, even to the world's end, governing and ruling the ſame in all things, eſpecially in the neceſſary points of chriſtian religion, not ſuffering the ſame to err, or be deceived therein?

Whether is it true that you being ſuſpected, or infamed to be culpable and faulty in ſpeaking againſt the ſacrament of the altar, and againſt the very true preſence of Chriſt's natural body, and the ſubſtance thereof in the ſaid ſacrament, and thereupon called before me upon complaint made to me againſt you, have not been a good ſpace in my houſe, having freely meat and drink, and alſo divers times inſtructed and informed, as well by one being our ordinary, as alſo by my chaplains, and divers other learned men, ſome whereof were biſhops, ſome deans, and ſome archdeacons, and every one of them learned in divinity, and minding well unto you, and deſiring the ſafeguard of your ſoul, and that you ſhould follow and believe the doctrine of the catholic church as afore concerning the ſaid ſacrament of the altar, and whether you did not at all times ſince your ſaid coming to me, utterly refuſe to follow and believe the ſaid doctrine concerning the ſaid ſacrament?

Whether can you now find in your heart and conſcience, to conform yourſelf in all points to the ſaid faith and catholic church concerning the ſaid ſacrament of the altar, faithfully, truly, and plainly, without any diſſimulation, believing therein, as our ſaid ſovereigns, with the nobility, clergy, and laity of this realm, and other chriſtian realms: and other perſons aforeſaid, and alſo the ſaid catholic church, have and do ſo believe in that behalf?

In caſe you ſo cannot, what ground have you to maintain your opinion, and who is of the ſame opinion with you, and what conference have you had therein with any, what comfort and what relief have you had therein by any of them, and what are their names, ſurnames, and their dwelling places?

Their anſwers to theſe articles were not much different from Tomkins's, and other martyrs before mentioned, as here followeth to be ſeen.

The Anſwers of Stephen Knight and William Pygot, to the aforeſaid Articles.

TO the firſt article, they believe, that the contents of this article is not agreeable to ſcripture.

To the ſecond, they anſwer and believe, that their parents and others expreſſed in the ſaid article, and ſo believing as is contained in the ſame, were deceived.

To the third, they anſwer, that they ſo believed, but they were deceived therein, as they now believe.

To the fourth, they ſay, that they have heretofore believed as is contained in the ſaid article, but now they do not ſo believe.

To the fifth, they ſay, that if they ſo believe, they are deceived.

To the ſixth, they believe the ſame to be true.

To the ſeventh, they anſwer and believe the contents of the ſame to be true.

To the eighth, they anſwer, that they can in no whit conform themſelves to the faith and doctrine contained and ſpecified in this article, until it be proved by ſcripture.

To the ninth, they ſay, that they have no ground to maintain their ſaid opinions, but the truth, which (as they ſaid) hath been perſuaded by learned men, as Dr. Taylor of Hadley, and ſuch other.

Theſe anſwers being made and exhibited, they were commanded to appear again the next day, at eight of the clock in the morning, and in the mean while to bethink themſelves what they would do.

Another appearance of the ſaid Priſoners before Biſhop Bonner.

THE next morning, being the ninth of February, before their open appearance, the biſhop ſent for William Pygot and Stephen Knight into his great chamber in his palace, where he exhorted them to recant, and deny their former profeſſion.

Who anſwered, that they were perſuaded in their conſciences not to return and abjure their opinions, whereunto they had ſubſcribed. Within a while after, they were all three (with Thomas Tomkins and William Hunter beforenamed) brought openly into the conſiſtory, the ninth day of February aforeſaid, and there had the ſame articles propounded unto them, which were before propounded unto the aforeſaid Thomas Tomkins (as appeareth in the diſcourſe of his hiſtory) and thereto alſo ſubſcribed theſe words; I do ſo believe.

The biſhop alſo diſcourſed with John Laurence only; whereunto he anſwered in this manner: That he was a prieſt, and was conſecrated and made a prieſt about eighteen years paſt, and that he was ſome time a black frier profeſſed; that alſo he was aſſured unto a maid, whom he intended to have married.

And being again demanded his opinion upon the ſacrament, he ſaid, That it was a remembrance of Chriſt's body, and that many had been deceived in believing the true body of Chriſt to be in the ſacrament of the altar, and all ſuch as do not believe as he doth, do err. And after this talk and other fair words and threatenings, they were all of them commanded to appear again in the afternoon.

At which hour they came thither again, and there after the accuſtomed manner, were exhorted to recant and revoke their doctrine, and receive the faith. To which they conſtantly anſwered they would not, but would ſtick to that faith that they had declared and ſubſcribed to, for that they did believe it was no error which they believed; but that the contrary thereof was very hereſy.

When the biſhop ſaw that neither his fair flatterings, nor yet his cruel threatenings would prevail, he gave them ſeverally their judgments. And becauſe John Laurence had been one of their anointed prieſts, he was by the biſhop there (according to their order) ſolemnly degraded, the manner whereof you may ſee in the hiſtory of Mr. Hooper before-mentioned.

Their ſentence of condemnation, and this degradation once ended, they were committed to the cuſtody of the ſheriffs of London, who ſent them to Newgate, where they remained with joy together, until they were carried down into Eſſex, and there the twenty eighth day of March, the ſaid William Pygot was burned at Braintree, and Stephen Knight at Mauldon, who at the ſtake, kneeling upon the ground, ſaid this prayer which here followeth.

O Lord Jeſus Chriſt, for whoſe love I leave willingly this life, and deſire rather the bitter death of thy croſs, with the loſs of all earthly things, than to abide the blaſphemy of thy moſt holy name, or to obey men in breaking the holy commandment: thou ſeeſt, O Lord, that where I might live in worldly wealth to worſhip a falſe God, and honour thine enemy, I chooſe rather the torment of the body, and the loſs of this life, and have counted all things but vile duſt, and dung, that I might win thee; which death is dearer to me, than thouſands of gold and ſilver. Such love, O Lord, haſt thou laid up in my breaſt, that I hunger for thee, as the deer that is wounded deſireth the ſoil. Send thy holy Comforter, O Lord, to aid, comfort, and ſtrengthen this weak piece of earth, which is empty of all ſtrength of itſelf. Thou remembereſt, O Lord, that I am but duſt, and able to do nothing that is good; therefore, O Lord, as of thine accuſtomed goodneſs and love thou haſt invited me to this banquet, and accounted me worthy to drink of thine own cup amongſt thine elect; even ſo give me ſtrength, O Lord, againſt this thine element, which as to my ſight it is moſt irkſome and terrible, ſo to my mind it may at thy commandment (as an obedient ſervant) be ſweet and pleaſant; that through the ſtrength of thy holy Spirit, I may paſs through the rage of this fire into thy boſom, according to thy promiſe, and for this mortal receive an immortal, and for this corruptible put on incorruption: accept this burnt ſacrifice and offering, O Lord, not for the ſacrifice, but for thy dear Son's ſake my Saviour, for whoſe teſtimony I offer this free will offering with all my heart and with all my ſoul. O heavenly Father, forgive me my ſins, as I forgive all the world. O ſweet Son of God my Saviour, ſpread thy wings over me. O bleſſed and Holy Ghoſt, through whoſe merciful inſpiration I am come hither, conduct me into everlaſting life. Lord, into thy hands I commend my ſpirit. Amen.

The next day, being the twenty-ninth day of March, the ſaid John Laurence was brought to Colcheſter, and there being not able to go (for his legs were much worn with heavy irons in priſon, and alſo his body weakened with evil keeping) was borne to the fire in a chair, and ſo ſitting, was in his conſtant faith conſumed with fire.

When he was burning the young children came about the fire, and cried, as well as young children could ſpeak, ſaying, Lord ſtrengthen thy ſervant, and keep thy promiſe; Lord ſtrengthen thy ſervant, and keep thy promiſe; miſe: which thing, as it is rare, ſo it is no ſmall manifeſtation of the glory of God, which wrought this in the hearts of theſe little ones; nor yet a little commendation to their parents, which from their youth brought them up in the knowledge of God and his truth.

The Hiſtory of Dr. Robert Farrar, Biſhop of St. David's, who ſuffered March 30. 1555.

THE next day after, which was the 30th day of March, Dr. Robert Farrar, Biſhop of St. David's in Wales, was the next biſhop that ſuffered after Mr. Hooper; who was firſt called and promoted to that dignity by the favour and good will of the duke of Somerſet, the lord protector in king Edward's time. This man I may well call twice a martyr, not only for the cruel death of the fire, which he moſt conſtantly ſuffered in the days of queen Mary, but alſo for ſeveral other injuries and moleſtations in king Edward's time, which he no leſs firmly than unworthily ſuſtained at the hands of his enemies after the fall of the duke of Somerſet. Of theſe his vexations and troubles, with the wrangling articles and informations laid againſt him, to the number of fifty ſix; and of the malice conceived againſt him by certain covetous canons of the church of Carmarthen, and what were the proceedings of both parties, as well of the innocent, as of the crafty adverſaries, and what were their names, in their articles againſt him, here followeth in order.

GEorge Conſtantine, David Walter his ſervant, Thomas Young chaunter of the cathedral church, who was afterward archbiſhop of York, Rowland Meyrick doctor of law, who was afterward biſhop of Bangor, Thomas Lee, and Hugh Rawlins, &c.

Through the procurement and inſtance of theſe his adverſaries, joining and confederating together, one Hugh Rawlins prieſt, and Thomas Lee brother-in-law to the ſaid George Conſtantine, did exhibit to the king's moſt honourable council certain articles and informations, conceived and deviſed by the perſons before named, to the intent to blemiſh the biſhop's credit, and utterly (as they thought and made their boaſt) to pull him from his biſhoprick, and to bring him in a premunire. The copy of which articles we thought here good to expreſs, and ſo after them to ſet his anſwers to the ſame.

Articles and Informations to the King's Honourable Council, put up and exhibited by Hugh Rawlins and Thomas Lee, againſt Dr. Farrar, Biſhop of St. David's.

1. IMprimis, When the ſaid biſhop firſt came to his dioceſe, he appointed his chancellor by his letters of commiſſion, omitting the king's majeſty's ſtile and authority, and grounded his ſaid commiſſion upon foreign uſurped laws and authority; by force of which authority his ſaid chancellor did viſit certain deaneries of his ſaid dioceſe, and moniſhed the chaunter and chapter of the cathedral church of St. David's aforeſaid, againſt a certain day and place, for like intent and purpoſe, contrary to the king's highneſs's laws and ſtatutes, and in derogation of his highneſs's ſupremacy.

2. Item, That the ſaid chaunter and chapter, perceiving the fault of the ſaid commiſſion, took the ſame from the regiſter into their cuſtody, refuſing to appear by virtue thereof, and by ſecret and charitable ways and means did admoniſh the ſaid biſhop of the unlawfulneſs and faults of the ſaid commiſſion, and of the danger that he had incurred for granting and executing the ſame; opening alſo unto him the effect of the ſtatute made in the 28th year of our late ſovereign lord Henry VIII. Which monitions notwithſtanding, the ſaid biſhop neglecting the ſame, and continuing in his malicious doing, or inexcuſable ignorance, about the 20th day of Auguſt, in the fourth year of the reign of our ſovereign lord that now is, did confer upon one John Evans the vicarage of Penbrin, inſtituting him by authority of the old foreign uſurped law, making no mention of the king's highneſs's authority, in contempt and derogation of the ſame.

3. Item, Whereas the chancellor and vicar general to the ſaid biſhop did, upon a lawful title, and by the king's highneſs's ſupreme authority, admit and inſtitute one John Gough into the rectory of Haſkard with the appurtenances, and gave out in the king's name under his highneſs's ſeal eccleſiaſtical appointed for that office, with the Teſte of the ſaid biſhop, and ſubſcription of the ſaid chancellor, a mandate to induct accordingly; by virtue whereof the ſaid John Gough was inducted by the official there, into the real poſſeſſion of the ſame rectory, with the rights and appurtenances to the ſame belonging; whereupon the regiſter of the ſaid dioceſe, at the requeſt of the aforeſaid chancellor, did ſignify the premiſſes, with all the circumſtances, before divers perſons to the forenamed biſhop: who notwithſtanding did inſtitute and cauſe to be inducted one Harry Goddard unto the ſame parſonage, making no mention of the king's majeſty's authority nor ſupremacy; in contempt and derogation of the ſame his highneſs's crown and dignity, and in extolling the foreign uſurped authority, contrary to the form of the ſtatute, &c.

4. Item, The ſaid biſhop, immediately after the unlawful inſtitution and induction of Goddard aforeſaid, moleſted the ſaid John Gough, lawfully inſtituted and inducted as before, citing him from place to place, objecting no matter unto him of long ſeaſon, till at length he articled. Among which articles was contained, Item, Interrogatur quo titulo tenet Rectoriam de Haſkard: ſo taking upon him the cognition of the title of the whole fruits and patronage, in contempt of the king's highneſs's regal crown and dignity, and in derogation of the laws and ſtatutes of this realm.

5. Item, He hath commonly made his collations and inſtitutions, as he did his firſt commiſſion, in his own name and authority, without expreſſing the king's ſupremacy.

6. Item, He made under his ſeal one collation, two inſtitutions, and three mandates to induct, in one vacation of one benefice, three ſeveral perſons, without order of law, or revocation of any of them, giving to every one like authority, title, and right. Whereby except good foreſight, as well of juſtices of the peace, as of the friends had not been, there had inſued much inconvenience amongſt the partakers of the intituled incumbents in that behalf.

7. Item, The ſaid biſhop decreeing caveats to be made in benefices, thereby knowing the titles litigious, inſtituted and cauſed to be inducted without trial of any title or due order of law.

8. Item, He directeth his mandates of induction unto private men, and not to the archdeacons nor their officials; contrary to the law and cuſtom uſed in that behalf. Notwithſtanding he hath been counſelled to the contrary by men that be learned.

9. Item, Having no manner of knowledge nor practice in the law, he ſitteth every day in harveſt, and other times, upon cauſes, without aſſiſtance of learned in the law, having with him only an unlearned boy, who is no notary, to his ſcribe, neither obſerving the law, nor yet reaſonable order. And therefore doth no good, but trifleth the time, as may appear by his acts, if ye have them to be ſhewed.

10. Item, He and his officers, by his knowledge, uſeth to diſpenſe with marriages, to be ſolemnized without banes, contrary to the laws and ordinances in that behalf.

11. Item, Whereas one Thomas Pritchard, a chaplain of his, ſolemnized matrimony in a private houſe without banes, and that betwixt a prieſt, and a ſiſter of hers that was appointed to be married with the ſaid prieſt that day; he alſo being a parſon, and leaving his cure unſerved that day being Sunday: and notwithſtanding that one of the king's council in the Marches of Wales informed the ſaid biſhop of the ſame miſdemeanors, requiring due reformation thereof, he hath done nothing therein but put the ſame chaplain in office, and made him his commiſſary general ſince that time, bearing a ſpecial favour to the reſt of the offenders.

12. Item, Whereas one Meredith ap Thomas, his houſhold-ſervant, was accuſed by one Sage Hughs, to have been father of her child; the ſaid biſhop, without purgation of his ſervant, cauſed him to ſue the parents of the ſaid Sage of infamy, firſt in his principal conſiſtory, and from thence before a commiſſary of his, being his houſhold chaplain, and at laſt took the matter before himſelf, ſo railing againſt all his officers, becauſe they proceeded not after his partial affection, and againſt the law, that honeſt men of Carmarthen, where he ſate upon the cauſe, judge him to be, or at the leaſt to have been, diſtract of his wit, and by this partial handling the cauſe remaineth unfiniſhed, and the child without father.

13. Item, Whereas one Jenkin Ph. accuſed William Chambers, a ſervant of the biſhop's, that found this William in adulterous manner with his wife, by reaſon whereof the biſhop expelled the wife out of his houſe, the ſaid infamy not purged, the parties have been both again in the biſhop's houſe and ſervice ſince that time, to the evil example of others.

14. Item, By this unlawful ſequeſtration of the fruits of the benefices of Langattock and Lanvihangel, by the undiſcreet handling of the ſame, there were raiſed the number of four hundred people or more, who bickered ſundry times together, to the great danger of the inhabitants thereabout, had it not been pacified by the diſcreet means of Sir John Vaughan knight.

15. Item, By his unlawful collation of the prebend of Lanbiſter to one Stephen Green, a chaplain of his, by covenant and promiſe to maintain the ſuit, by whoſe crafty and undiſcreet handling of the ſame there was raiſed in the county of Radnor, the 19th day of Auguſt laſt paſt, about three or four hundred men to like danger, but that the matter was ſtayed by John Bradſhaw, Rice ap Glin, and Stephen ap Rice, juſtices of the ſame county; who, with great danger to themſelves and theirs, pacified the matter, committing an hundred of the offenders to ward.

16. Item, Such as he owes diſpleaſure unto, he citeth from place to place, and day to day, only for their vexation, laying no matter againſt them; and being divers times required the copy of his proceedings againſt them, to the intent they might anſwer accordingly, and be at their lawful defence, he denied to all ſuch perſons the copies of his proceedings.

17. Item, He and his officers wink at the manifeſt and open crimes of his favourers and adherents, to the evil example of the whole dioceſe, and abuſeth the cenſures of excommunication and ſuſpenſion, making it an inſtrument of revenge againſt ſuch as they do not favour.

18. Item, Having received payment of the king's majeſty's ſubſidy, due in October, the fourth year of his grace's reign, of the aforeſaid chaunter of the cathedral church of St. David's, and Rowland Meyrick, two of the reſidentiaries there, before Chriſtmas laſt, he unjuſtly of a premeditated mind and purpoſe afterward certified them for recuſants, to their ruin, if they had not been admoniſhed of his cruel purpoſe, and provided lawful defence for the ſame.

19. Item, The ſaid biſhop celebrating matrimony in his own perſon, diſpenſed, contrary to the book of ordinance, with the parties married, for not receiving the holy communion; the parties both being young and luſty perſons, having no reaſonable cauſe wherefore they ſhould abſtain. At which celebration the biſhop communicated not himſelf. And further, the communion was celebrated by a chaplain of his, with ſuperſtitious bowings, kneeling, and knockings both by the chaplain that miniſtered, and by all the company, only one other prieſt communicating for the manner.

20. Item, Where the official of the archdeacon of Carmarthen, in his viſitation within Carmarthen, found, contrary unto the ſaid ordinance, an altar ſet up in the body of the church, for celebration of the communion, and cauſed the ſaid altar to be taken away, and a table to be ſet in the middle of the church; the biſhop after the ſame commanded the vicar of Carmarthen to ſet the table without the chancel again for the miniſtration of the communion.

21. Item, He being often in Carmarthen, and other places in the chancel at the time of holy communion, not only tarried there himſelf, neither communicating nor miniſtering bareheaded and uncoiffed, reverently kneeling; but alſo permitteth the people there to continue, the chancel and quire full, kneeling and knocking their breaſts. Which manner is yet uſed in all the dioceſe, without any reformation or gainſay of him or any of his officers.

22. Item, Whether ſuperſtitious praying upon beads is not only ungodly, but reproved in the king's majeſty's injunctions; the ſaid biſhop meeting many with beads in their hands never rebuked any of them.

23. Item, The ſaid biſhop being in the pulpit, and ſeeing divers corpſes within the church, with a great number of lights upon them, never ſpake againſt any of them.

24. Item, Whereas the ordinance willeth, that no children be baptized but upon the Sunday, or Holy-day (only caſe of neceſſity excepted), he, having two children himſelf born without danger, cauſed one of them to be baptized on the week-day. And by his example, without any contradiction or motion of reformation, it is uſed as it hath been accuſtomed, in all the dioceſe commonly, contrary to the book of ordinance in that behalf.

25. Item, From his firſt coming into the dioceſe, he hath had, and yet hath his only ſtudy, labour, and practice, to ſurvey land, and to look for mines, &c. neglecting his own bounden duty to apply to his book and preaching.

26. Item, He keepeth no manner of hoſpitality, but hath his ſervants table in one parlour with him, leſt any ſtrangers ſhould approach his ſervants being at their meat.

27. Item, He is commonly talking not of godlineſs, but of worldly matters, as baking, brewing, incloſing, ploughing, mining of miil-ſtones, diſcharging of tenants, and ſuch like, not only at his table, but alſo moſt commonly at other places.

28. Item, He hath warned divers tenants out of their lands, which they and their elders have enjoyed for their rents theſe hundred years and more, and occupied with tillage, which he ſaith he will incloſe; and being ſued to by poor men, becauſe of quietneſs, he anſwered, The crows ſhall eat the corn, rather than ye ſhall have any profit thereof.

29. Item, When the vicars choral of St. David's, for relief of their hoſpitality, had an iſland of his called the Biſhop's-Iſle, for 40s. rent, he hath let it to a chaplain of his for 5l. by year. And where, at the ſuit of the ſaid vicars, it was granted by the biſhop in the whole chapter, that the vicars ſhould have it for years at 40s. rent, and pay 20l. entry; he now covetouſly, and againſt his promiſe openly made, denieth the ſame, except the vicars would give 50l.

30. Item, He cauſed the curate of St. David's to warn their tenants out of their ſaid lands in the pulpit, to the great offence of the people who were wont to have God's word preached there; and ſo they ſaid to the curate at that time.

31. Item, To the ploughing of a paſture not above ten days work, in Lent, Anno 1549, he had 32 ploughs in one day, and thoſe ploughs the prieſt bade in the church, contrary to the ſtatute of Gomortha in that behalf provided, and to the evil example of gentlemen in that country.

32. Item, Where the king's majeſty, of godly remembrance, Henry the eighth, appointed at Brecknock a ſchool-maſter, uſher, reader of divinity, a miniſter, and certain ſcholars, and for the maintenance thereof appointed 40l. and 12l. of the penſions and revenues of Brecknock; the biſhop finding it ſo furniſhed, hath neither reader nor miniſter there, covetouſly converting their ſtipends to his own uſe.

33. Item, The biſhop was twice in one day preſented in the great court, held in the court of Carmarthen, for incloſing and covetouſly incroaching of the king's highway.

34. Item, He covetouſly occupieth purchaſing of lands, buying of cattle, merchandiſe, and other things, being indebted a notable ſum to the king's majeſty, as may appear by his accounts in the court of tenths and firſt fruits.

35. Item, Whereas one Lewis John Tho. Bool, putting from him his lawful wedded wife, upon Chriſtmas Eve laſt, without banes had marriage ſolemnized with a concubine of his in a church within three miles of the biſhop's abode at that time. The biſhop ſince knowing the premiſſes, hath not only of a covetous mind entered familiarity with the ſaid Lewis, and bought a piece of land of him, but alſo ever ſince hath (to have his lands good cheap) left both the parties and prieſt unpuniſhed, uſing him ſo familiarly, that whereas a ſumner cited the parties to appear among other criminals for the ſame fact, the biſhop commanded the ſaid ſumner to let him alone, and ſo they all remain unpuniſhed.

36. Item, Whereas the whole chapter of St. David's (as it was thought) was in aſſured amity with the biſhop, they all being his officers or chaplains, he procured them to be impleaded with a writ of Quo Warranto in the King's Bench, keeping the writ with him ſecretly, at leaſt three months, not delivering it but only ten days before the day of their appearance, the parties being ſeven days journey from London.

37. Item, He is a wilful wrong doer, and troubler of men in their rights, entering upon their lawful poſſeſſions, ſtirring thereby much contention, and ſo notably known, to the offence of the country.

38. Item, Whereas the biſhop aforeſaid was appointed in Auguſt 1547, and conſecrated in September following, he never came into the dioceſe himſelf, nor ſent or appointed any officer there before the month of April 1548, to the great diſorder of the king's majeſty's ſubjects, lack of reformation, and miniſtration of juſtice.

39. Item, During his viſitation, the ſaid biſhop did not endeavour himſelf to ſee reformation, but rode ſurveying of lands, appointing vain incloſures, and ſuch other things: which are no part of the office to him committed, nor yet convenient, namely at that time.

40. Item, The viſitation finiſhed, he neither appointed his officers to examine the clergy of the places of ſcripture to them appointed to be ſtudied in the ſame viſitation, nor hath hitherto effectually gone about any good reformation, according to the ordinance of this realm.

41. Item, The biſhop, ſince his coming to the dioceſe, never adminiſtered the communion, ſaving only at two times that he ordered certain deacons; but in every thing (ſave that he otherwhiles preacheth) ordereth himſelf like no miniſter, nor man of his vocation.

42. He hath ſo alienated himſelf from ſtudy, that he preacheth undiſcreetly, diſcrediting the office, not only untruly reporting the ſcriptures, but alſo preaching the ten commandments in one place in declaration of the eighth of them, for lack of ſtuff, the pith of his matter was matrimony of prieſts.

43. Item, The 13th day of September laſt, he ordained certain deacons, and making his exhortation, he taught that a man was not bound to forgive, but him that aſketh forgiveneſs; and being admoniſhed by a letter better to declare the ſame, becauſe that divers were offended with that doctrine; he hath hitherto deferred ſo to do, to the maintenance of malicious hearts in theſe parts.

44. Item, Since the firſt day of Auguſt, 1549, unto the feaſt of Candlemas laſt, he hath preached but two or three ſermons, of which one was preached at Aberguilly upon St. Stephen's day laſt, to a great audience that underſtood no Engliſh, being but a mile from Carmarthen an Engliſh town, and chief of his dioceſe.

45. Item, Since his ordinary viſitation, which was finiſhed in July 1548, he hath neither preached, nor cauſed to be preached, in the towns of Tinby, Pembroke, nor Haverford, being Engliſh towns, not much diſtant from the place of his moſt continuance.

46. Item, The churches appropriate to the biſhop have no paraphraſes in Engliſh, and few of them Bibles.

47. Item, The churches of the dioceſe for the moſt part, and the clergy almoſt every one, lack paraphraſes, notwithſtanding there hath been theſe two years, and yet be, a great number of them to be ſold in the dioceſe.

48. Item, To declare his folly in riding, he uſeth bridle with white ſtuds and ſnaffle, white Scottiſh ſtirrops, with ſpurs, a Scottiſh pad with a little ſtaff of three quarters long, which he hath not only uſed ſuperſtitiouſly theſe four or five years, in communication oftentimes boaſting what countries he hath compaſſed and meaſured with the ſame ſtaff.

49. Item, He hath made a vow, that he will never wear a cap; for he ſaith, it is comely wearing of a hat, and ſo cometh in his long gown and hat, both into the cathedral church, and to the beſt town of his dioceſe, ſitting in that ſort in the king's great ſeſſions, and in his conſiſtories, making himſelf a mock to the people.

50. Item, He ſaid that he would go to the parliament on foot: and to his friends that diſſuaded him, alledging that it is not meet for a man in his place; he anſwered, I care not for that, it is no ſin.

51. Item, Having a ſon, he went before the midwife to the church, preſenting the child to the prieſt, and giving his name Samuel, with a ſolemn interpretation of the name, appointing alſo two Godfathers and two Godmothers, contrary to the ordinance, making his ſon a monſter, and himſelf a laughing-ſtock throughout all the country.

52. Item, He daily uſeth whiſtling to his child, and ſaith, that he underſtood his whiſtle, when he was but three days old. And being advertiſed by his friends, that men laughed at his folly, he anſwered; They whiſtle their horſes and dogs, and I am contented; they might alſo be contented that I whiſtle my child, and ſo whiſtleth him daily, all friendly admonition neglected.

53. Item, In his ordinary viſitation among other his ſurveys, he ſurveyed Milford Haven, where he eſpied a ſeal-fiſh tumbling. And he crept down to the water-ſide, and continued there whiſtling by the ſpace of an hour, perſuading the company that laughed at him, that by his whiſtling he made the fiſh to tarry there.

54. Item, Speaking of ſcarcity of herrings, he laid the fault to the covetouſneſs of fiſhers, who in the time of plenty took ſo many, that they deſtroyed the breeders.

55. Item, Speaking of the alteration of the coin, he wiſhed that what metal ſoever it were of, the penny ſhould be in weight worth a penny of the ſame metal.

56. For a concluſion, the ſaid biſhop, in all his doings ſince he came to his dioceſe, hath behaved himſelf moſt unmeet for a man of his vocation, being for a miniſter of juſtice, juſtice, an abuſer of the authority to him committed; for a teacher of the truth, and reformer of ſuperſtition, a maintainer of ſuperſtition without any doctrine of reformation; for a liberal and hoſpitable, an unſatiable covetous man; for a diligent overſeer, wilful and negligent; for an example of godly wiſdom, given wholly to folly; for merciful, a cruel revenger; and further, for a peacemaker, a ſower of diſcord. And ſo in all his behaviour, a diſcrediter and ſlanderer of his vocation, and a deceiver of all men, that had hope that he ſhould do any reformation. For he yet hath neither brought into his dioceſe, nor hath belonging unto him, any learned preacher. But ſuch learned preachers as he found in the dioceſe at his entry, he ſo vexeth and diſquieteth, that they cannot attend to apply their preaching for the defence of their livings, againſt his quarrellous inventions and unjuſt certificates.

After theſe wrangling articles and informations were given up, then the biſhop was called for to anſwer, the hearing whereof was committed unto Dr. Wotton, and Sir John Maſon knight, who likewiſe received the biſhop's anſwers to the aforeſaid articles, the copy and effect of which anſwers hereafter follow.

The Anſwer of Robert Biſhop of St. David's, to the Articles miniſtered unto him.

TO the firſt article he ſaith, that after lawful monition in the king's majeſty's name and authority, from the ſaid biſhop (being then at London) given to the chaunter and chapter of St. David's, for viſitation at a certain day there to be entered; the ſaid biſhop himſelf for ſuch purpoſe coming into the dioceſe, knowing alſo that the chaunter, and one of the canons of that church, and late before commiſſaries in that dioceſe, had not only by their own evil examples and winking at the faults of others, or neglecting to correct the ſame, left there among prieſts and others, much deteſtable whoredom; but had alſo ſpoiled the cathedral church of croſſes, chalices, and cenſers, with other plate, jewels, and ornaments of the church, to the value of four or five hundred marks or more, for their own private lucre (the church remaining even yet very vile, and in great decay), and had alſo made further under their chapter ſeal many blanks, to the number of twelve or more, Sede vacante, without the king's majeſty's licence or knowledge; therefore he brought with him one Edmund Farlee, bachelor of law, commended by Dr. Young and Dr. Neviſon to him, as a man ſufficient in faithful truth and learning, to be his chancellor. To whom he granted and ſealed a commiſſion for that purpoſe, giving credit to him in his faculty, concerning the draught and form thereof. But the king's majeſty's ſtile of ſupremacy was fully ſet forth in the ſame commiſſion. Whether there were any default of formal words in ſetting forth of the king's authority therein, he is not certain; for he committed the doing thereof to his chancellor, who was commended to him for a learned man. And the biſhop ſaith, that he did never ground the commiſſion upon any foreign uſurped laws or authority: neither did his ſaid chancellor by force of ſuch authority viſit any deanery of the ſaid dioceſe, nor gave any monition to the chaunter and chapter there, by force of that commiſſion, for any like intent or purpoſe, but only offered in the king's majeſty's name and authority (to the ſaid biſhop committed) to enter viſitation of the chaunter and chapter of the cathedral church, at another day to be executed by the biſhop himſelf, for reformation of the chapter church, and miniſters there, according to the king's gracious ordinances and injunctions in that behalf. But the aforeſaid chaunter and canon of the church, before the ſight of any commiſſion, ſtubbornly anſwered the ſaid chancellor, that they would not receive him, nor any other to viſit them, except he were one of their chapter. And further, deſiring to ſee his commiſſion, he delivered the ſame into their hands, who would not deliver it him again. And ſo it may appear that he did nothing by force of that commiſſion.

2. To the ſecond article he ſaith, that they opened not unto him the danger of any ſtatute, to his knowledge and remembrance. Nevertheleſs, he not knowing any default in the ſaid commiſſion, and certainly minding with all diligence the faithful execution of his office of preaching, and viſiting the whole dioceſe in his own perſon, by the king's majeſty's authority, for the conſervation of God's peace and the king's, in that dangerous time of rebellion, then beginning to ariſe in other places, did neglect and lay apart the ſtubborn behaviour and wicked doings of the ſaid chaunter and canon, and agreed with them, omitting all contempts and reproaches towards him and his ſaid chancellor, and all manner of contention by them done, fearing elſe that through their unquietneſs ſome tumult might have riſen among the people there; and did alſo make the ſaid chaunter his chancellor, and canon his commiſſary, according to their ambitious deſires, to appeaſe their malice in that dangerous time. And further, he ſaith, that he made collation to Sir John Evans of the vicarage of Penbrin, what day or time he remembereth not, not by any old foreign uſurped authority, but by the king's authority only, making full mention of the king's ſtile and authority in the ſame collation.

3, and 4. To the third and fourth he ſaith, that whereas he had granted to George Conſtantine the office of a regiſter, who brought unto him a commiſſion for the chancellorſhip, to be ſealed and delivered to the aforeſaid chaunter of St. David's, deſiring the ſaid biſhop to ſeal it, he utterly refuſed ſo to do, becauſe the ſaid George had put therein a clauſe of admitting clerks into benefices: which authority the ſaid biſhop would not in any wiſe grant, reſerving the examination and admiſſion of clerks only to himſelf, for the avoiding of wicked bribery and partiality. Whereupon the ſaid George and the chaunter promiſed the ſaid biſhop, by their faith and truth, before three or four honeſt witneſſes, not to execute that clauſe of inſtitution into benefices, but only to thoſe clerks whom the biſhop did firſt examine and admit, and ſend unto them to be inſtituted and inducted; upon which promiſe the biſhop ſealed the ſaid commiſſion. And after that time the parſonage of Haſkard being void, and by reaſon of lapſe devolved to the biſhop's gift for that time, he conferred it on one Sir Henry Goddard, with a collation of inſtitution by the king's authority, not extolling any foreign uſurped authority. In which collation or inſtitution is fully mentioned the renunciation of the biſhop of Rome, and all foreign power and authority, with the full ſtile of his majeſty's ſupremacy. And this collation of the church of Haſkard he gave, before he underſtood or knew that his chancellor had given out the like, and he ſurely thinketh his collation was the firſt. That notwithſtanding, the ſaid George Conſtantine, and the ſaid chaunter having a vowſon determined by reaſon of lapſe, admitted and inſtituted one John Gough to the ſaid parſonage of Haſkard, by virtue of their expired vowſon, and ſealed his inſtitution with a wrong ſeal (becauſe they had not the right ſeal of office to that purpoſe) contrary to their former earneſt promiſe, and the biſhop's right, and without any manner of warning or fore-knowledge thereof to him given; which thing by them untruly done, the ſaid George Conſtantine nevertheleſs came to the biſhop's houſe, and there did write with his own hand the letters of induction for the ſaid Sir Henry Goddard prieſt, compriſing in the ſame the whole ſum of the inſtitution or collation which the ſaid biſhop had made, and the ſame George did ſeal the ſaid letters of induction with his own hand, finding no manner of fault therein, nor making any word or mention of his and the chaunter's former wrong doing, but ſo departed for that time. And afterward he came again, and ſhewed the the biſhop what they had done before concerning the parſonage aforeſaid. And further, the ſaid defendant ſaith, that he did not moleſt the ſaid John Gough, but lawfully did call him in the king's majeſty's name, not for any title of patronage, but to know whether he were parſon of Haſkard, and how he was thereto admitted, and inſtituted, and inducted, and by what authority he preſumed to preach there, without the king's majeſty's licence, with other like lawful demands, whereunto he ſturdily refuſed to give anſwer; and ſaith, that the article contained in his accuſation, ſaying thus: Item, Interrogatur quo titulo tenet Rectoriam de Haſkard, was not miniſtered unto the party in that ſort, ſo far as he knoweth, but in theſe words or like, Quomodo intravit in Rectoriam, &c.

5. To the fifth he ſaith, that albeit George Conſtantine regiſter, did wilfully withdraw his bounden ſervice due to the king's highneſs, and to the ſaid defendant in the king's name, refuſing to attend either by himſelf, or his ſufficient deputy for writing of records and other inſtruments, yet the ſaid defendant made his collations and inſtitutions in his own name, not by his own authority, nor by another, ſave only the king's authority, according as he hath declared in his anſwer to the firſt article, expreſſing in them the king's ſupremacy with the biſhop's own name and ſeal of office, as he ought to do, according to the proviſion of the king's ſtatute in ſuch a caſe.

6. To the ſixth he ſaith, that the vicarage of Penbrin being void, he, as right patron thereof to his knowledge, conferred it to John Evans clerk, with letters of inſtitution and induction; and after, when the king's preſentation came to him for one David Jenkin clerk, he deſired fourteen days reſpite at that time, either to ſhew ancient record for his right, and then the matter to ſtand to the determination of the law, or elſe if he ſhewed not, both he and his clerk to give place to the king's clerk, which condition was by Sir Thomas Jones knight, Dr. Meyrick and the ſaid David Jenkin received, and an inſtitution with an induction was made conditionally to be put in the hands of Sir Thomas Jones knight, for ſafe cuſtody of the king's clerks behoof, after the fourteen days to be executed at the hands of the ſaid defendant, if he failed to ſhew. Within which time the ſaid defendant did ſhew an old ancient record, declaring the full right of patronage on the ſaid defendant's behalf, and ſo that inſtitution and induction was never by the ſaid defendant put in execution. Nevertheleſs, the ſaid David Jenkin (contrary to his promiſe and oath, giving thereupon his right hand to the ſaid Sir Thomas Jones knight) took advantage by the ſaid writing, without knowledge of the ſaid defendant. After which time the lord chancellor, by his letters written to the ſaid defendant, advertiſed him, to admit one John ap Powell clerk, preſented by virtue of a vowſon which the lord chancellor judged to be good, and ſo to be admitted notwithſtanding his former preſentation, whereby he would not bar the other man's right. And ſo this defendant made one collation, two inſtitutions, and three mandates, doing no wrong thereby to his knowledge. And further he ſaith, that there was no buſineſs nor unquietneſs about the poſſeſſion of the ſaid vicarage, but this defendant giving place, was content to loſe his right for that time.

7. To the ſeventh he ſaith, that as he now remembereth, he never decreed any caveats to be made in benefices, neither did inſtitute nor cauſe to be inducted any into benefices, being known to him litigious.

8. To the eighth he ſaith, that becauſe the archdeacons be abſent from their offices, and have not had faithful diligent officials, he hath directed his mandates to them or their officials, or to other lawful perſons in that behalf, ſo far as he knoweth.

9, and 10. The ninth and tenth articles he denieth as very untrue.

11. To the eleventh he ſaith, that whereas Sir Thomas Jones knight advertiſed him, that Thomas Prichard had celebrated matrimony in a private houſe, betwixt a certain prieſt and a woman, whoſe ſiſter had refuſed the ſame, the ſaid Prichard leaving his own cure unſerved on that Sunday, this defendant did put the ſame Thomas Prichard to penance for ſo doing, marrying them without banes. And whereas he made the ſaid Thomas Prichard, who is a bachelor of law, his commiſſary; it was for the reſpect of learning in the law, thereby faithfully to execute his office according to juſtice. And the ſaid defendant did never favour nor bear with any man wittingly in his wrong doings. He confeſſeth that the matrimony was ſolemnized in a private church, and that the cure was that day unſerved.

12. To the twelfth he ſaith, that it is ſlanderous and utterly untrue. And that one Sir John Hughes prieſt, made Sage Hughes (daughter to his ſtep-mother) an harlot at eleven years of age, and after married openly to another man, being miniſter thereof himſelf. After which doing he took her away from her huſband again, and kept her, alledging a former contract. And when the ſaid John Hughes was lawfully convicted before the ſaid biſhop, in open court at Carmarthen, of that his abominable adultery, claiming the king's pardon thereof, yet the ſaid Sage confeſſed, that he had to do with her the night before that day of appearance. Which latter crime he denied. Nevertheleſs ſhe proved with child, affirming, both before the birth and after, the child to be his, the midwife and others being witneſſes thereof. Yet notwithſtanding, George Conſtantine, as a wicked ſupporter of the ſaid prieſt in his naughty doings, with the help of the aforeſaid chaunter, firſt uttered that Meredith Thomas was father of the ſaid child: which matter was ordered in the eccleſiaſtical court according to juſtice, without any partial affection of the ſaid biſhop, or of any other to his knowledge.

13. To the 13th he ſaith, it is utterly falſe ſo far as he knoweth.

14. To the 14th he ſaith, that by lawful ſequeſtration in the king's majeſty's name, he committed the cuſtody of the fruits of Langattock and Lanvihangel to two honeſt men, for the behoof of the king's firſt fruits and tenths, and of the next incumbent, and further he did not meddle nor miniſter any cauſe of unquietneſs in that behalf.

15. To the 15th he ſaith, that he made a collation, lawful (as he ſuppoſeth) of the prebend of Lanbiſter, to Stephen Greene his chaplain, without any covenant or colour, and further he did not meddle in that behalf.

16. To the 16th he ſaith, all is untrue as far as he knoweth.

17. To the 17th he ſaith, it is untrue for his own part, and his officers, as far as he knoweth.

18. To the 18th he ſaith, it is untrue as far as he knoweth, and that he did certify the recuſants juſtly, as he thinketh, becauſe they refuſed wilfully to pay the king's whole ſubſidy of their whole dividends, as it ſtandeth in the king's book, pertaining to the canons reſident.

19. To the 19th he ſaith, that after travel of fourteen miles, being not able faſting to celebrate the communion, in a chapel within the houſe of Sir Thomas Jones knight, one of the king's majeſty's honourable council of the Marches of Wales, this defendant celebrated matrimony without receiving the communion for the cauſe aboveſaid, betwixt Mr. Griffith Rice, and the daughter of the ſaid Sir Thomas Jones, according to the king's ordinances. And Thomas Prichard prieſt, adminiſtered the holy communion there without any ſuperſtition to this defendant's knowledge: and the married perſons not diſpoſed to receive the holy communion, he could not compel them againſt their conſciences, and ſaith, that he did not diſpenſe with them, as it is contained in the article.

To the ſlanderous and untrue title of maintenance of ſuperſtition, &c. he ſaith, that he did not maintain any ſuperſtition, contrary to the king's ordinances and injunctions, but abhorring in his heart all ſuperſtition, hath travailed and doth travail to aboliſh the ſame by true doctrine, and doing as much as he can, with the king's peace, among his people there.

20. To the 20th he ſaith, that George Conſtantine, in the third year of the king's majeſty's reign, not regarding the dangerous time of rebellion in other places, raſhly cauſed to be pulled down, without any authority known to this defendant, the communion altar in Carmarthen church, by his own preſumptuous mind, appointing the uſe thereof in another place of the church, not without grudge of the people. Wherefore the biſhop, fearing tumult, commanded the vicar to ſet up the communion table (for the time) near to the place where it was before.

21. To the 21ſt he ſaith, that he hath been divers times in the quire of Carmarthen, and hath tarried there in the communion time, not communicating himſelf, and that in every church where he cometh on the holy day to preach, or to pray, he kneeleth in the quire bareheaded, as well at Mattins before the communion, as at Evenſong after, without any ſuperſtition: he thinketh it not neceſſary for the communion's ſake to leave kneeling to Chriſt. But he hath diligently taught the people not to kneel nor knock to the viſible ſhew or external ſhew of the ſacrament. And the quires of Carmarthen and other places there, are not cloſe at the ſides, ſo that the people may come in and out at their pleaſure. Moreover the king's ordinances do not authorize him to rebuke the people for knocking on their breaſts, in token of repentance of their ſins; nor for kneeling, in token of ſubmiſſion to God for mercy in Chriſt.

22. To the 22d he ſaith, that in the time of rebellion in Devonſhire and Cornwall, threatening to come into Wales, he teaching the people the true form of prayer, according to God's holy word, and declaring the prayer upon beads to be vain and ſuperſtitious, yet durſt not, for fear of tumult forcibly take from any man his beads, without authority. And touching the not reproving of ſuch as he ſhould meet wearing beads, he remembereth not that he hath ſo done, unleſs it were in the rebellion time, at which time he durſt not rebuke ſuch offenders.

23. To the 23d he ſaith, that he being in the pulpit, his face towards the people, did not ſee the lights, if any were ſet up about the corpſe behind his back, till after that he came down from the pulpit. But he, with George Conſtantine and the aforeſaid chaunter, ſitting in the church in Carmarthen to hear cauſes, and ſeeing the vicar with other prieſts, with ſong and lights, bringing a corpſe up to the church, called forthwith the vicar and prieſts, and rebuked them in open court, as cormorants and ravens, flying about the dead carcaſe for lucre ſake.

24. To the 24th he ſaith, that he cauſed the one child, being born with great peril of death to the mother, and itſelf lying for dead a certain ſpace after, to be chriſtened on the working-day; the other child was chriſtened on the working-day, becauſe both father and mother, and all other people there, were in peril of death by reaſon of the ſudden ſweat, which all men feared at that time. And touching the reſt of the accuſation, which is, that by that example it is uſed after the old accuſtomed faſhion, he knoweth no ſuch thing.

To the title of covetouſneſs, he ſaith; his doings prove the contrary, as his neighbours know.

25. And the 25th article he utterly denieth.

26. To the 26th he ſaith, That his hall at Aberguily being ruinous, he uſeth for his hall a great chamber adjoining, for himſelf and his ſervants, and all manner of ſtrangers, and beſides twenty perſons in houſe daily. What other hoſpitality he keepeth, honeſt neighbours can teſtify.

27. To the 27th he ſaith, that his talk is according to his hearers, that is to ſay, reverently and truly of faith, love, and honeſt life, according to the ſcripture, to like auditors; and to other unreverend and raſh turmoilers of ſcriptures and holy doctrine, he doth talk of honeſt worldly things with good intent; and that he doth not moſt commonly talk of ſuch things as are expreſſed in this article, but when he hath honeſt occaſion ſo to do.

28. The 28th he ſaith is untrue, and that he hath warned no man out of their lands; but where he is deſtitute of neceſſary proviſion, and would have part of his own demain from certain freeholders, having it only from year to year at pleaſure, he cannot obtain it without brawling. Wherefore he ſuffereth them to keep it even yet ſtill, againſt right and reaſon. And touching the reſt, that he had rather the crows ſhould eat it, &c. he never ſpake any ſuch word.

29. To the 29th he ſaith, that whereas his predeceſſor biſhop Barlow did let to farm the iſle of Ramſey to one William Brown, after whoſe hands this defendant received it into his own poſſeſſion, the vicars of St. David's being diſpoſſeſſed of it long before; he did let it over to Stephen Green for forty ſhillings the ground, as it was before, and three pounds more for feals, coneys, and fowls there; and he knoweth of no right the vicars choral had therein, who did refuſe when this defendant did diligently upon reaſonable conditions offer the ſame unto them; and this defendant made no promiſe unto them, as is contained in the article.

30. To the 30th he ſaith, he knoweth not but that he advertiſed his bailiff to warn the freeholders, and others having his demain in rent, during pleaſure, to leave it a lawful day to this defendant's neceſſary uſe; and did not cauſe the curate to do as is contained in the article to his remembrance.

31. To the 31ſt he ſaith, that he knoweth not what the prieſt bade in the church, nor how many ploughs there came, undeſired of this defendant. But he knoweth certainly, that he deſired no man's labour but for his money.

32. To the 32d he ſaith, that he knoweth not any ſuch appointment of ſchools and revenues there, but he found there (after the departing of biſhop Barlow) a ſchoolmaſter, and uſher being a prieſt, and twenty ſcholars, which he hath hitherto maintained better than he found it, to his knowledge: he did never convert any penny thereof to his own uſe, albeit he might lawfully have done the ſame.

33. To the 33d he ſaith, all is untrue, ſo far as he knoweth.

34. To the 34th article he ſaith, he never purchaſed more than three parcels, whereof one was two ſhillings eight pence by the year; the ſecond, three ſhillings four pence; and the third, ſix and twenty ſhillings and eight pence, or thereabouts, by the year; the reſt he denieth.

35. To the 35th he ſaith, that he never bought of Lewis John Thomas his land good cheap, but after forty years purchaſe, not knowing at that time any ſuch thing as is contained in the article againſt the ſaid Lewis John. Neither bade he the ſumner to let him alone; but as ſoon as he heard any thing of it, commanded the ſumner to cite him; and ſo he was cited in this defendant's houſe, occaſioning him to break his bargain: to the which Lewis this defendant ſaid theſe words, If you would give me your land with an houſe full of gold, I cannot, nor will I ſuffer you to keep a leman. Then the ſaid Lewis affirming the latter woman to be his wife, and the firſt unknown to this defendant, he cauſed the ſaid Lewis to be called to the conſiſtory for trial, where it hangeth yet: and alſo by lawful proceſs excommunicated the firſt woman, for that ſhe would not by any means appear in the court to claim or to confeſs marriage with the ſaid Lewis, and ſo ſhe ſtandeth this day at the point of Significabit.

36. To the 36th he ſaith, that whereas the chaunter and Rowland Meyrick, with other canons there, would not obey the king's godly injunctions, concerning the finding of a ſchool for poor men's children, a lecture of divinity, ſermons on the Sundays, repairing of their church and and manſion houſes, decent order and miniſtration there; but ſtubbornly counted themſelves (with the chaunter) to be a body politic, without regard of the biſhop and his lawful monitions, being himſelf named in their ſhire ſtatutes, Decanus & quaſi Decanus, having alſo their deanſtall in the quire with a prebend thereunto annexed, and the chief place in the chapter-houſe, with a key of their chapter-ſeal, being alſo by the king's majeſty's commiſſion appointed their ordinary: yet would they not in any wiſe deliver unto him a book of their ſtatutes, for the better knowledge of his and their duties, nor ſhew unto him their records and monuments, for declaration of the king's right and his. For which cauſe this defendant, by writ of Quo warranto, lawfully called them to anſwer; which yet lieth aſleep, to the loſs of the king's majeſty's right. The time of delivery of the ſaid writ, he remembereth not.

37. The 37th he ſaith is all falſe, as far as he knoweth.

To the title of wilful negligence; he ſaith, that he hath uſed to his power willing diligence.

38. To the 38th he ſaith, that he being attendant (according to his bounden duty) to ſerve the king's highneſs during the time of the parliament, from the firſt unto the laſt day: then immediately after repaired into his dioceſe, and he might not truſt Rowland Meyrick the chaunter, and George Conſtantine, to execute faithfully the juriſdiction, becauſe they had before through their ſlanderous life (and not puniſhing miſdoers), left the country in great enormity of filthy whoredom. And ſaith farther, that one cauſe why he appointed not an officer, &c. was, for that he lacked his letters of authority of juriſdiction.

39 and 40. The 39th and 40th, he ſaith are untrue.

41. To the 41ſt he ſaith, that how often he did miniſter the communion he doth not remember; but in all other things, ſo far as he knoweth, he hath ſtudied to order himſelf according to his vocation; as far as he believeth, he goeth like a miniſter.

42. To the 42d he ſaith, that he hath not alienated himſelf from ſtudy, neither preached undiſcreetly, nor reported the ſcriptures untruly to his knowledge (but he hath been very much hindered both from ſtudy and preaching, by the malicious, crafty, and covetous behaviour of the forenamed perſons). And that he did ſet forth the doctrine of honeſt marriage, as well of all other men as of prieſts, even as the ſcripture then rehearſed did miniſter occaſion.

43. To the 43d he ſaith, that reciting the words of Luke, "If thy brother have offended againſt thee, blame him, and if he repent forgive him; and if he had offended againſt thee ſeven times in one day, and ſeven times in the day be converted unto thee, ſaying, I am ſorry, forgive him:" He ſaid farther theſe words in effect, It appeareth by this place of ſcripture, that we are not bound (except he repent) to forgive him; but we are bounden to pray God to forgive him, to give him grace to repent, that he may forgive him.

44. To the 44th he ſaith, that he hath preached right often at Carmarthen, as well as at other places; and, he ſaith, that a great number at Aberguily do underſtand Engliſh very well.

45. To the 45th he ſaith, That after he had preached firſt at Brecknock, Carmarthen, Swanzy, Laugharne, Tinby, Pembroke, Hereford, St. David's, Cardigan, with other notable towns; he hath ſince that time preached to a great many other poor churches, but not in Tinby nor Pembroke: but for Hereford he ſtandeth in doubt. And whereas he brought with him at the firſt a learned preacher, of godly life, the ungodly and ſtubborn behaviour of the perſons before-named wearied him away. And whereas he had waged another learned man to come into his dioceſe to preach, George Conſtantine by his diſcouragement adviſed him from this defendant.

46. To the 46th he ſaith, that in all his churches appropriated, there is both Bible and paraphraſes, ſo far as he knoweth: and if the prieſts there would not ſhew him the lack thereof, yet ſhould the officials declare it unto him, that it might be amended (by his will) without delay.

47. To the 47th he ſaith, That George Conſtantine covetouſly ingroſſed into his hands a great number of paraphraſes; and this defendant hath admoniſhed the clergy to buy every one, for his diſcharge: and if the ſaid George being official of two archdeaconries, and other officials in their office, would declare unto him what churches do lack Bibles and paraphraſes, he would cauſe it to be amended as much as in him lieth.

To the title of folly, he ſaith, that his deſire is in true ſimple manner of his words, deeds, and other honeſt behaviour, through God's grace, to ſhew godly wiſdom.

48. To the 48th he ſaith, that he thinketh no folly in the decent colour or faſhion with honeſt uſe of ſaddle, bridle, ſtirrups, ſtaff, and other like neceſſary or convenient things; and ſaith, that he uſed a ſaddle made after the Scottiſh faſhion, with ſtirrups of iron unvarniſhed and like ſpurs: and black bridle without ſtuds, the bit and ſnaffle white as other mens be.

49. To the 49th he ſaith, that when he goeth abroad in winter, he weareth a hat to bear off rain and ſnow, and in ſummer to ſhadow him from the ſun, without any vow of ſuperſtition or offence to the people.

50. To the 50th he ſaith, that all is one to him, to ride or walk, as cauſe requireth; and whether he ſaid as is contained in the article or not, he remembereth not. Howbeit he doth uſe to go a-foot.

51. To the 51ſt he ſaith, that after lawful prayer it pleaſed God to give him a ſon begotten and born in honeſt marriage; whom he therefore cauſed to be named Samuel, preſenting him to the miniſter to be received into Chriſt's church as a poor member of Chriſt: by the holy ſacrament of baptiſm was this done openly in the cathedral church, with earneſt gravity, and without offending any man; and alſo two wives, being before at variance, deſired both to be Godmothers, which were both received to make unity between them, not knowing any law to the contrary, nor any offence thereby conceived of the people.

52. To the 52d he ſaith, that he doth uſe with gravity all honeſt loving entertainment of his child, to encourage him hereafter willingly at his father's mouth, to receive wholeſom doctrine of the true fear and love of God; and ſaith, that he hath whiſtled to his child, but ſaid not that the child underſtood it, and that he anſwered to one that found fault with it, as is contained in the article.

53. To the 53d he ſaith, that he was never ſurveyor, but went to ſee Milford Haven for honeſt purpoſe, and not to ſurvey it; and for that he at the ſight of a ſeal whiſtled in his fiſt, ſuch as meant folly might turn it to their purpoſe. And it is not true that he ſtood whiſtling an hour to the fiſh, nor that any fault was found with it, nor any ſuch anſwer made by him to his knowledge.

54. To the 54th he ſaith, that if he did ſay, the deſtroying of the fry hindereth plenty of fiſh, he thinketh the ſame not againſt reaſon: but he remembereth not to have ſaid, as is contained in the article.

55. To the 55th he ſaith, that he remembereth not that ever he ſaid as they alledge.

56. To the ſlanderous, untrue, and ungodly concluſion he ſaith, that George Conſtantine with other his adverſaries before-named, and their adherents, not regarding the fear of God, and their bounden duty of loving obedience towards God and the king, and his true miniſters, have too much ſlanderouſly with falſe tongues, contumelious words, and ſpiteful deeds, laboured by all means to diſcredit and deface the king's gracious authority to him committed. Who, ever ſince he came to the dioceſe, hath endeavoured himſelf to ſhew his faithful miniſtry by his true honeſt doing, and to uſe his authority according to his vocation, to God's glory and the king's honour. And that he hath been diligent in teaching of truth, reforming of ſuperſtition, free of hoſpitality, diligent in overſeeing with godly wiſdom, peace, and mercifulneſs, as he truſteth in God, may be truly approved. And he is able juſtly to charge his adverſaries with all faults herein by them moſt unjuſtly and ſlanderouſly againſt him objected. And he doth marvel greatly, that George Conſtantine, with other his adherents, are not aſhamed maliciouſly to object (for the intent to ſlander him) moleſting of preachers found there. For truth it is that he hath moleſted none, but hath juſtly brought under Significabit, one Morice, a preacher living lewdly, for his ſtubborn behaviour and malicious contempts, even yet continuing in his wilful contempt and irregularity. And he hath (to his knowledge) juſtly certified Hugh Rawlins, parſon of Tinby, for his wilful recuſancy of two other parſonages, ſhamefully deceiving the king's majeſty by colour of commiſſion, as appeareth by the ſame. And as for the railing, contemptuous preaching of Rowland Meyrick, and the unlearned arrogant preaching of the chaunter, he referreth to diſcreet hearers, which were offended thereat, as they ſhewed this defendant. And this deponent brought into his dioceſe both learned preachers, and learned men in the law, to his very great charges, which men George Conſtantine with his adherents hath wearied away.

After theſe anſwers were exhibited by the virtuous and good biſhop againſt the quarrelling and frivolous articles of his aforeſaid adverſaries, Hugh Rawlins and Thomas Lee: then came in for witneſs, upon the ſaid articles and informations, George Conſtantine, and the chaunter of St. David's: againſt whom the biſhop firſt laid exceptions, then alſo exhibited matter juſtificatory, the tenor and proceſs whereof here followeth.

General exceptions, laid and propoſed on the behalf of Robert Biſhop of St. David's, againſt all and ſingular the pretended witneſſes, produced on the behalf of Hugh Rawlins clerk, and Thomas Lee, upon their untrue ſurmiſed articles by them exhibited unto and before the king's moſt honourable council, by the device and procurement of the chaunter, and George Conſtantine, with Rowland Meyrick clerk, againſt the ſaid biſhop.

FIRST, the ſaid biſhop ſaith and alledgeth, that by law there ought no faith or credence to be given unto the depoſitions and ſayings of the ſaid witneſſes, or any part thereof, becauſe they are infamous, falſe, perjured, and in ſome part of their depoſitions diſcording, partial, conducted, ſubornate, inſtructed, and for favour of the informers and their bolſterers, have depoſed of malice more than the articles whereupon they were producted to contain; and beſide, and without the compaſs of the ſame articles, and in divers other parts of their depoſitions, they depoſe Unum & eundem præmeditatum ſermonem, as by their ſaid depoſitions doth appear, unto which the ſaid biſhop referreth himſelf as much as it ſhall be expedient for him, and none otherwiſe. And further for other cauſes particularly and ſpecially, as is declared in the book of exceptions.

Exceptions againſt the unlawful proceedings of Hugh Rawlins clerk, and Thomas Lee, promoters of the aforeſaid untrue articles, in executing of their commiſſion for proof of the ſame.

ITEM, The ſaid Thomas Lee for himſelf and the other promoter did contrary to juſtice, at the execution of their commiſſion, examine certain of the witneſſes himſelf, in the houſe of his brother-in-law George Conſtantine; and the ſaid Lee, and David Walter the biſhop's mortal enemy, and ſervant to the ſaid George Conſtantine, did write theſe depoſitions upon the articles at their own pleaſures, and alſo after the device of the ſaid George Conſtantine, and the chaunter and Rowland Meyrick, the biſhop's mortal enemies, and the very deviſers and procurers of the informations, and bolſterers and bearers of the promoters in ſuit thereof. Theſe are the names of the witneſſes ſo examined, which are already known: David ap Sir Richard of Gettus, a perjured and an adulterous perſon, ſtanding in the number for two witneſſes, written in two places of the book.

Item, Ap Ruddz of Kennarthe, Griffith ap Howel, Guyne of Kennarthe, Lewis David clerk, David ap Harvey clerk, Sir Gough alias Morgan, &c.

Item, One John Draper of Carmarthen, and an adherent of the aforeſaid adverſaries and enemies to the ſaid biſhop, did alſo, contrary to the tenor of their commiſſion, examine certain witneſſes, and had to his clerk one William Davids, ſervant in livery unto the aforeſaid Griffith Donne, the biſhop's utter enemy: by which ſhameful partiality, they have written more matter, more words, other terms and ſentences, than ſome of the deponents have depoſed or could depoſe. Humphry Toy the 5th deponent, Rice Gough the 14th deponent, William ap Jenkins the 50th deponent, John Bengy the 48th deponent, Richard parſon the 39th, which are already known what manner of men the promoters are.

Item, The ſaid Hugh Rawlins was not preſent at the biſhop's ſermon, whereof his information maketh mention, neither yet at their cutting off the commiſſion for the proof thereof: for the aforeſaid adverſaries did deviſe the ſame and gave it unto the ſaid Rawlins to promote, chuſing him for the ſame purpoſe, knowing him to be a man willing (and ſetting his whole delight) to work miſchief, both with word and deed, who abuſeth his tongue moſt ſhamefully, with moſt unfitting words, ever railing upon the ſaid biſhop to every man that will hear him, without either reſpect or reverence of the king's majeſty's authority to the ſaid biſhop committed. And the ſaid Rawlins hath four or five benefices, about the value of 200 marks a year, and is reſident upon none of them, but ſpendeth his living to the hindrance of other men, going about here and there, wandering to and fro without either man or boy waiting on him, more like a light perſon, than a man of ſuch livelihood and of his vocation, being a preacher. And indeed he is taken for a lewd fellow by all that know his behaviour; inſomuch that when a certain man objected unto the adverſaries, That it was ill done to put ſo lewd a fellow as Rawlins to promote their cauſe: they anſwered and reported his honeſty with theſe words, We know Rawlins to be a very knave, and none ſo fit to ſet forward ſuch a matter as he is; of which report there is a ſufficient witneſs. And it is thought that he hath done much ill with his ſpiteful tongue: for he ſpeaketh as boldly in this ſurmiſed matter to all the council, as though it were true, and much for the king's profit.

Item, The other promoter Thomas Lee is a merchant, who hath ſold his ware and ſpent his money, and now for want of other buſineſs is become a promoter of the aforeſaid articles, having his coſts and charges borne by the ſaid principal adverſaries as it is alledged in the biſhop's exceptions, which ſhall be proved, if commiſſion, might be awarded for the purpoſe.

And thus much concerning the exceptions againſt his pretended accuſers: next followeth the matter juſtificatory exhibited by the ſaid biſhop in defence of his own cauſe, as by the effect here appeareth.

Certain articles miniſtered by Robert biſhop of St. David's, againſt a ſurmiſed information exhibited by Thomas Lee, to the king's moſt honourable council againſt the ſaid biſhop.

IMprimis, That no advantage ought to be taken againſt the ſaid biſhop, of the contents of the ſaid pretended information, for the cauſes particularly following. And firſt, firſt, whereas it is objected againſt the ſaid biſhop, in the 1ſt, 2d, and 5th articles of the ſame information, that he, contrary to the king's highneſs's laws and ſtatutes, and in the derogation of his highneſs's ſupremacy, paſſed a certain commiſſion, inſtitutions, and collations to benefices, in his own name, making no mention of the king's highneſs's authority; whereas in truth the ſaid biſhop, if he had paſſed out the commiſſion, inſtitutions and collations in his own name, and without the king's majeſty's ſtile, as is ſurmiſed (as he did not), yet had he offended neither the laws nor ſtatutes of this realm, as doth and may appear evidently in the ſame ſtatutes and laws, to which he referreth himſelf.

Item, Whereas it is deduced in the third article of the ſaid pretended information, that the chancellor of the ſaid biſhop did admit and inſtitute J. Gough into the rectory of Haſkard, and gave a mandate for the induction of the ſaid John, under the king's majeſty's ſeal eccleſiaſtical, for the dioceſe of St. David's, with the Teſte of the ſaid biſhop, and ſubſcription of the ſaid chancellor; which thing ſo deduced, if it be true, yet the ſaid biſhop cannot be worthily blamed thereof. But the chaunter (then his chancellor unworthy) ſhewed himſelf therein very ignorant of the king's ſtatutes of parliament, wherein it is expreſly provided, that in ſuch caſes the ordinary ought to paſs all ſuch inſtitutions and inductions in his own name, and under his own ſeal, and not in the king's majeſty's name, nor under his ſeal. And further, of a very truth, the ſaid chancellor, in admitting and inſtituting the ſaid clerk to the ſaid benefice, without the knowledge and conſent of the ſaid biſhop, did exceed his commiſſion, foraſmuch as the ſaid biſhop, at the granting of his commiſſion of his chancellorſhip unto the ſaid chaunter, had reſtrained him expreſly from the admitting and inſtituting of any clerk to any benefice within the ſaid dioceſe, except the ſame clerk were firſt examined, found worthy, and admitted by the ſaid biſhop himſelf to the ſame benefice.

Item, Whereas in the fourth article of the ſaid information it is contained, the ſaid biſhop, after the admitting and inſtituting of the ſaid John Gough, as is aforeſaid, objected articles againſt him, amongſt which it was contained in effect: Item Interrogatur quo titulo tenet Rectoriam de Haſkard. True it is that the ſaid biſhop, without moleſtation of the ſaid Gough, otherwiſe than law did permit, and without taking upon him the cognition of the title of the ſaid fruits and patronage of the ſaid benefice, in contempt of the king's majeſty's regal crown and dignity, and without any derogation of the king's majeſty's laws and ſtatutes of this realm, did interrogate the ſaid John Gough, how he held the ſame benefice, being admitted and inſtituted to the ſame without his knowledge or conſent, as he might lawfully do, and as it is meet every ordinary ſhould know how paſtors are admitted to any cure within their dioceſe.

Item, Touching the contents of the ſixth article of the ſaid information, the ſaid biſhop alledgeth that the vicarage of Penbrin, in the dioceſe of St. David's, being void, he as patron thereof, to his knowledge, conferred it to John Evans clerk, with letters of inſtitution and induction; and afterwards, when the king's preſentation came to him for one David Jenkin clerk, he deſired fourteen days reſpite at that day either to ſhew ancient record for his right, and then the matter to ſtand to the determination of the law, or elſe if he ſhewed not, both he and his clerk to give place to the king's clerk: which condition was by Sir Thomas Jones knight, Dr. Meyrick, and the ſaid David Jenkin received: and an inſtitution with an induction was made conditionally, to be put into the hands of Sir Thomas Jones knight, for ſafe cuſtody for the king's clerk his behoof, after 14 days to be executed at the hands of the ſaid biſhop, if he failed to ſhew; within which time the biſhop did ſhew him an old ancient record, declaring the full right of patronage on the ſaid biſhop's behalf, and ſo that inſtitution and induction was never put in execution by the ſaid biſhop.

Nevertheleſs the ſaid David Jenkin (contrary to his promiſe and oath, giving thereupon his right hand to Sir Thomas Jones knight) took advantage by the ſaid writing without knowledge of the ſaid biſhop; after which time the lord chancellor, by his letters written to the ſaid biſhop, advertiſed him to admit one John ap Howel clerk, preſented by virtue of a vowſon, which the lord chancellor adjudged to be good, and ſo to be admitted, notwithſtanding his former preſentation, whereby he would not abar the other man's right. And ſo the ſaid biſhop made one collation, two inſtitutions, and three mandates, doing no wrong thereby to his knowledge. And further, there was no buſineſs nor unquietneſs about the poſſeſſion of the ſaid vicarage. But the ſaid biſhop giving place, was content to loſe his right for that time.

Item, Whereas Sir Thomas Jones advertiſed the ſaid biſhop, that Thomas Prichard clerk had celebrated matrimony in a private houſe, betwixt a certain prieſt and a woman whoſe ſiſter had refuſed the ſame (as it is deduced in the 11th article of the ſurmiſed articles laid in againſt the ſaid biſhop) the ſaid Prichard leaving his own cure unſerved that Sunday, he did put the ſaid Thomas Prichard to penance for ſuch his miſdoings, and the ſaid Prichard did ſuch penance as was enjoined him to do. And whereas the ſaid biſhop made the ſaid Thomas Prichard (who is bachelor of law) his commiſſary, it was for the reſpect of his learning in the law, thereby faithfully to execute his office, according to juſtice, and none otherwiſe.

Item, In the 14th article of the ſaid ſurmiſed information, it is untruly declared, that through the unlawful ſequeſtration of the fruits of the benefices of Langattock and Lanvihangel Cundy, and the undiſcreet handling of the ſaid biſhop, there were raiſed a great number of people, to the great danger of the inhabitants thereabouts. Truth it is, that the ſaid biſhop, upon good and lawful conſiderations, and ſpecially for that the king's majeſty ſhould be truly anſwered of his firſt fruits and tenths of the ſaid benefices, did lawfully (and as he was bound to do) ſequeſter the ſaid fruits in the king's majeſty's name, and by his authority, and committed the cuſtody thereof for a time unto two honeſt men, to the effect aforeſaid, and none otherwiſe, without any occaſion of tumult or gathering the people through his default or folly.

Item, Whereas it is alledged in the 19th article of the information, that the biſhop did celebrate matrimony in his own perſon, without receiving or miniſtering the communion to the perſons married, it is true, for that the ſaid biſhop had travelled fourteen long Welſh miles, and not able to celebrate the holy communion faſting, and for other reaſonable and lawful cauſes him moving, did in a chapel within the houſe of Sir Thomas Jones knight (one of the king's honourable council of the Marches of Wales) ſolemnize matrimony betwixt Mr. Griffith Rice, and the daughter of the ſaid Sir Thomas Jones, without either receiving the holy communion himſelf, or miniſtering the ſame to the perſons married, being as then not diſpoſed ſo to do it lawful and godly, without any ſuperſtitious knockings or bleſſings, or other uncomely geſtures, as is deduced in that article.

Item, Touching the contents of the reſidue of all the ſaid articles, contained in the ſaid information, the ſaid biſhop, partly for the avoiding of tediouſneſs, and partly for that ſome of them be untrue and mere falſe, ſome other general, obſcure, frivolous, vain, and of none effect, but of malice and evil-will, contrary to truth conceived, leaveth them particularly unanſwered to.

Item, The ſaid biſhop alledgeth, that he hath not by all the time that he hath been biſhop, uſed any ſuperſtitions or papiſtry, as it is untruly ſurmiſed againſt him, but hath and doth to the uttermoſt of his power, wit and cunning, ſet forth, maintain, teach, and preach the true doctrine of the goſpel, and ſuch laudable doctrine as he ought to do by the king's laws, injunctions, and proceedings, and for ſuch a teacher he hath been and is commonly known, named, reputed, taken, and accepted notoriouſly.

And where the ſaid chaunter and George perceived their depoſitions to be inſufficient, they required, and had commiſſion into the country to examine further witneſſes, which they executed very partially and unlawfully, as is alledged in the biſhop's exceptions, abovementioned. And whereas the ſaid Rawlins and Lee were awarded two ſeveral commiſſions, they by favour of the officers, and for ſparing of coſts, conjoined both in one, and had three months to make return.

During all this time of the examination of the witneſſes, the ſaid biſhop was ſtayed at London upon the allegation of the ſaid adverſaries, which was, That if the ſaid biſhop ſhould depart into his dioceſe, he would hinder them of their proofs. And at the return of their commiſſion it was ſignified unto the council what a great number of witneſſes they had examined, viz. Six-ſcore and ſeven, which ſounded very heinous in the council's ears.

And about three weeks after, publication of their witneſſes was granted, and after that it was a fortnight ere the biſhop could get a copy written of their depoſitions, becauſe the book thereof is ſo huge and monſtrous.

Then the biſhop deſired time, firſt, to enquire of what condition the perſons were that had witneſſed againſt him, and to make exceptions and matters to juſtify direct contrary, and to have a commiſſion for the proof thereof, which was then granted. And now it is objected, That the biſhop was appointed ſo to travel with the expedition of his matter, that he ſhould have ſued out his commiſſion, and have made return thereof at All-hallow-tide; but there was no ſuch decree put in writing. And it was not poſſible for the biſhop to do it in ſo ſhort a time, theſe cauſes conſidered which he could not avoid, as followeth.

1ſt, It was the latter end of July ere he came home to St. David's, where he began his viſitation, which before was appointed.

2dly, He was by force of law conſtrained to anſwer at the bar daily, during all the time of the great ſeſſions at Carmarthen, in defence of his juſt cauſe againſt the pretended matter of Præmunire, which his adverſaries of mere malice have procured againſt him.

3dly, The ſaid adverſaries, to moleſt him further, did privily pack a queſt of ignorant perſons of no reputation, and indicted him upon the words of Rawlins's information, as appeareth by a copy of the indictment, intending thereby to make the matter ſound more heinous, notwithſtanding that the ſame cauſe dependeth before the king's high council undetermined.

5thly, The book of their depoſitions is ſo great, that it requireth a long time to peruſe. And alſo the greateſt part of their witneſſes were utterly unknown by the biſhop and all his; and alſo dwelling in ſo many ſundry places of the dioceſe among the mountains and elſewhere ſcarcely within the circuit of 200 miles.

Item, Another great ſeſſions held at Carmarthen in the month of October laſt, during which time he was attendant there, as is aforeſaid. All which cauſes conſidered, being alſo in the time of his ordinary viſitation, which he did execute himſelf, he could not make ready his exceptions in ſhorter time.

The ſaid biſhop diſpatched his man towards London October 23, who ever ſince hath been and is attendant in the ſame ſuit, for the obtaining the commiſſion for proof of this matter againſt his adverſaries.

A Copy of a Letter writ by Dr. Farrar.

MOST humbly ſheweth unto your honour, your poor orator Robert biſhop of St. David's, That whereas one Thomas Lee (by the procurement of Thomas Young and Rowland Meyrick, being both canons of St. David's, and George Conſtantine regiſter to the ſaid biſhop) hath exhibited unto your honour againſt him certain articles, in which are mentioned many trifling things, unworthy to be declared in your honourable audience, and alſo their pretenſed weighty articles (as they have alledged there) are utterly untrue: for proof whereof the ſaid Thomas Lee hath had his commiſſions into the country. Therefore may it pleaſe your honour of your favourable goodneſs to grant unto your ſaid orator a like commiſſion for the examination of witneſſes, in defence of his truth and honeſty againſt the ſaid Thomas Lee, George Conſtantine, and the beforenamed Rowland Meyrick, and all other perſons, with their unjuſt articles, atteſtations and ſayings, who have depoſed againſt him, And in tender conſideration that your ſaid orator ſtandeth bounden and ſureties with him, in the ſum of one thouſand marks, to appear before the king's juſtice in the ſeſſions at Carmarthen in July next coming, to anſwer to a forged matter of Præmunire, by the procurement and counſel of his forenamed adverſaries, maliciouſly ſurmiſed againſt him to his utter undoing. And furthermore, your orator being in debt to the king's majeſty, by reaſon of the malicious vexation of his aforeſaid adverſaries, cannot (if he remains here) ſatisfy the ſame: for whereas there be arrearages to a great ſum (as well of the king's money as of his own rents), he can receive none thereof, his adverſaries have made ſuch ill report to his diſcredit, bearing the people in hand that he ſhall come no more thither. By reaſon of which report, neither his own tenants will pay their rents and arrearages, nor the prieſts their arrearages due to the king's majeſty, as well for the ſecond and third year, as for the fourth and fifth. In conſideration of all which things, may it pleaſe your honourable goodneſs to licenſe your ſaid orator to depart into the dioceſe, for theſe and other affairs. And he is ready at all times at your honourable commandment and pleaſure, to repair again, and ever to pray to the Lord Jeſus for the perpetual conſervation of your honour, to his glory.

Another Letter written by Dr. Farrar.

RIGHT honourable, and my very ſpecial good lord with humble ſervice and hearty thanks to God, and to you for your godly favour towards me at all times, as right plainly appeareth by your fatherly letters, moſt lovingly to admoniſh me to incline unto that which is very neceſſary, as charitable concord and unity; this is, further to beſeech your lordſhip for the Lord's ſake not to be grieved, but benignly to hear, and gravely to ponder that weighty matter, which, appearing (to other) but a light grief to me, is in very deed a right grievous offence to God, with no little hindrance of his holy word, and diſturbance of the king's pious proceedings, and may be a great occaſion of much inobedience and diſorder of good life. Wherefore I am ſtraitly bounden for the true zeal zeal I ought to bear unto God's word of life, chriſtian religion, the king's majeſty's honour, and godly quiet ſtate of his people, not faintly to let fall the burthen of diligent redreſs to be ſought at his majeſty's hands by the wiſdom of his moſt honourable and upright council, but with hearty affection to bear it up againſt thoſe high-minded, arrogant, ſtubborn, ambitious, covetous canons, truſting in their biting tongues, with crafty prevention, and utterly untrue ſurmiſes, to ſtop the light, that their ungodly miſdoing in darkneſs ſhall either not be ſeen, or at the leaſt may ſeem to appear in colourable appearance of right. Inſomuch that I do not a little marvel at theſe qualities in Mr. Chaunter, the canon, and the dean of Worceſter, whoſe ungentle and untrue behaviour I have not only known, but expertly proved, and ſenſibly felt in two of the firſt to my great loſſes, whereof I make no complaint. But I wonder in my mind, and lament in my heart, the ſtrange alteration and wilful going back of my old faithful brother George Conſtantine, which (knowing them all three to have been in times paſt either obſtinate enemies to the true bearers of the croſs of Chriſt, or at leaſt private lurkers under pretence of favour towards the goſpel, to ſting the poor followers thereof, ſeeking but their own lucre and pleaſure in all their doings) would ſo earneſtly cleave unto them in their wrongdeeds, as to betray me with his tongue, become untrue of his promiſe, and a bearer of filthy ſin for lucre's ſake, even yet ſtill perſiſting in the ſame, namely, in things manifeſtly known unto many, although he would deny it, and that I might not be credited. And as for their Præmunire, both George and they at my firſt coming, ungently detaining from Mr. Farlee his commiſſion for the chancellorſhip, would have faced me down with Præmunire, becauſe it was written in my own name according to the ſtatute: yet was I fain for the zeal of unity, not to ſee their uncourteous deeds, departing with Mr. Farlee for the avoiding of their malice and envy; and gave that office, for the amity of George, unto Mr. Chaunter his ſon-in-law, and to Mr. Meyrick the office of Cardigan. But ſeeing afterward their covetous reſpect to their own glory and lucre, not regarding the reformation of ſin, and eſpecially of ſhameleſs whoredom, I was compelled to remove them ſore againſt their wills: and whereas I deſired many and ſundry times charitable redreſs of their wrong doings in the vacation time, I obtained many fair words, and nothing in deed. Alſo deſiring to have ſight of the book of ſtatutes of the church, for the knowledge of my duty and theirs, I could not obtain it. Deſiring to have a key of the chapter ſeal, as my lord of Bath had, they would not deliver it, but upon conditions; yet was I content to be bridled, receiving it as pleaſed them to give it. And further, requiring the ſight of neceſſary evidences, for the declaration of divers things in traverſe of my right, they would in no wiſe grant it. And thereupon conſidering their ungentleneſs, I moved the Quo warranto, knowing right well, that if they ſhould ſhew any ſubſtantial grant under the king's ſeal for their corporation, it muſt therein appear the biſhop to be the head, and ever hath been under the king; for other they never have, nor had, except they would return to Rome again, as I truſt they will not. And yet perceiving afterward that they had no ſpecial grant to ſhew, or elſe ſuch as they would not ſhew, I myſelf for the reſpect of unity wrote my letters to the king's attorney, by reaſon whereof the Quo warranto was ſtayed, and ſo yet remaineth.

But touching the certificate, the king's ſubſidy being due at Michaelmaſs laſt, and forborne till after Chriſtmaſs, and lawfully demanded before they did utterly refuſe to pay both to my vice-collector and to myſelf, except I would take it of them in portions, not knowing where to aſk the reſt, and it is committed to me in the king's roll a whole ſum in groſs, to be received of the canons reſidentiaries for their dividend: who becauſe they cannot agree in dividing, would have the king's majeſty to tarry for his money, till they can agree to make diviſion; and I cannot demand it of any particular perſon, nor at any particular place.

Wherefore I moſt humbly beſeech your fatherly goodneſs, for the Lord's ſake, to perſiſt and continue my good lord and friend until ſuch time as ye find me either deſiring to be defended in my wrong, or not willing to put the judgment of my right cauſe into your hands. And becauſe that the reſidue of matters touching them and their ungentle, untrue, and ungodly doings is too long, and I have moleſted you too much with this my tedious letter, I ſhall now ceaſe; humbly beſeeching your good lordſhip to accept in good part this my boldneſs proceeding of neceſſity, and to pardon it for the love of our Lord Jeſus, who ſave and keep you in health, comfort, and honour long to endure, for the advancement of his glory. Written at Aberguily this ninth of March.

Your lordſhip's to command during life,

R. F.

And thus you have heard the firſt trouble of this good biſhop in king Edward's days, with the whole diſcourſe thereof; which we thought the rather to expreſs here, to give other biſhops warning to be more circumſpect, whom they ſhould truſt and have about them. Briefly; in few words to conclude this proceſs, biſhop Farrar, partly upon the importunate ſuit of his adverſaries, partly upon the ſiniſter and unfortunate fall of the good duke of Somerſet, by whom he had been before promoted and maintained, having but ſmall favour ſhewed, was detained in priſon till the death of king Edward, and the coming in of queen Mary and the popiſh religion, whereby a new trouble roſe upon him, being now accuſed and examined for his faith and doctrine. The proceſs of which his trouble here likewiſe followeth.

After that the aforeſaid Mr. Farrar biſhop of St. David's had been long detained in cuſtody under ſureties, in the reign of king Edward, not for any juſt cauſe for his part deſerved, but by reaſon that he had been promoted by the duke of Somerſet, and now after his fall he found fewer friends to ſupport him againſt ſuch as haunted after his biſhoprick; at length after the deceaſe of king Edward, by the coming in of queen Mary, the ſtate of religion began to be changed and altered: whereby a new trouble roſe upon him, being now accuſed and examined, not for any matter of Præmunire, but for his faith and doctrine. Whereupon he was called before the biſhop of Wincheſter, with Mr. Hooper, Mr. Rogers, Mr. Bradford, Mr. Saunders, and others, the fourth of February. On which day he ſhould alſo with them have been condemned; but becauſe leiſure did not ſo well then ſerve the biſhop, his condemnation was deferred, and he ſent to priſon again, where he continued till February 14. What his examinations and anſwers were before the ſaid biſhop of Wincheſter, ſo much as remained and came to our hands, I have here annexed.

The Anſwer of Robert Farrar Biſhop of St. David's, before the Biſhop of Wincheſter and others.

AT his firſt coming and kneeling before my lord chancellor, the biſhop of Durham, and the biſhop of Worceſter, who ſat at the table; and Mr. Rocheſter, Mr. Southwel, Mr. Bourne, and others ſtanding at the table's end, the lord chancellor ſaid unto him on this ſort:

Wincheſter. Now, Sir, have you heard how the world goeth here?

Farrar. If it like your honour, I know not.

Winch. What ſay you? do you not know things abroad, notwithſtanding you are a priſoner?

Far. No, my lord, I know not.

Winch. Lo, what a froward fellow is this?

Far. If it pleaſe your lordſhip, how ſhould I know any thing abroad, being a priſoner?

Winch.

Winch. Have you not heard of the coming in of the lord cardinal?

Far. I know not my lord cardinal; but I heard that a cardinal was come in, but I did not believe it, and I believe it not yet.

I pray your lordſhip (ſaid the biſhop of Worceſter) tell him yourſelf, that he may know what is done.

Winch. The queen's majeſty and the parliament hath reſtored religion into the ſame ſtate it was in at the beginning of the reign of king Henry VIII. Ye are in the queen's debt, and her majeſty will be good unto you, if you will return to the catholic church.

Far. In what ſtate I am concerning my debts to the queen's majeſty in the court of exchequer, my lord treaſurer knoweth: and the laſt time that I was before your honour, and the firſt time alſo, I ſhewed you that I had made an oath, never to conſent nor agree, that the biſhop of Rome ſhould have any power or juriſdiction within this realm: and further I need not rehearſe to your lordſhip, you know it well enough.

You were once abjured for hereſy (ſaid Mr. Bourne) in Oxford.

Far. That was I not.

Bourne. You were.

Far. I was never, it is not true.

Bourne. You went from St. David's to Scotland.

Far. That I did not.

Bourne. You did.

Far. That did I never, but I went from York into Scotland.

Bourne. Ah, ſo ſaid I; you went with Barlow.

Far. That is true, but never from St. David's.

Bourne. You carried books out of Oxford, to the archbiſhop of York, L. Lee.

Far. That I did not.

Bourne. You did.

Far. I did not, but I carried old books from S. Oſwald's to the archbiſhop of York.

Bourne. You ſupplanted your maſter.

Far. That did I never in my life.

Bourne. By my faith you did.

Far. Forſooth, I did not, never in my life, but did ſhield and ſave my maſter from danger, and that I obtained of king Henry the eighth, for my true ſervice, I thank God therefore.

My lord (ſaid Mr. Bourne to my lord chanceller) he hath an ill name in Wales as ever had any.

Far. That is not ſo. Whoſoever ſaith ſo, they ſhall never be able to prove it.

Bourne. He hath deceived the queen in divers ſums of money.

Far. That is utterly untrue, I never deceived king nor queen of one penny in my life, and you ſhall never be able to prove that you ſay.

Winch. Thou art a falſe knave.

Then biſhop Farrar ſtood up unbidden (for all that while he kneeled) and ſaid, No, my lord, I am a true man, I thank God for it. I was born under king Henry the ſeventh, I ſerved king Henry the eighth, and King Edward the ſixth truly, and have ſerved the queen's majeſty, that now is, truly with my poor heart and word: more I could not do, and I was never falſe, nor ſhall be by the grace of God.

Winch. How ſay'ſt thou, wilt thou be reformable?

Far. My lord, if it pleaſe your honour, I have made an oath to God, and to king Henry the eighth, and alſo to king Edward, and in that to the queen's majeſty, which I can never break while I live, to die for it.

Durham. You have made another oath before.

Far. No, my lord, I never made another oath before.

Durham. You made a vow.

Far. That did I not.

Winch. You made a profeſſion to live without a wife.

Far. No, my lord, if it pleaſe your honour, that did I never; I made a profeſſion to live chaſte, not without a wife.

Worceſt. You were ſworn to him that was maſter of your houſe.

Far. That was I never.

Winch. Well, you are a froward knave: we will have no more to do with you, ſeeing that you will not come; we will be ſhort with you, and that you ſhall know within this ſevennight.

Far. I am as it pleaſeth your honour to call me; but I cannot break my oath which your lordſhip yourſelf made before me, and gave in example, which confirmed my conſcience. Then I can never break that oath whilſt I live to die for it.

Durham. Well, ſaith he, he ſtandeth upon his oath: call another.

My lord chancellor then did ring a little bell, and Mr. Farrar ſaid, I pray God ſave the king and queen's majeſties long to continue in honour to God's glory and their comforts, and the comforts of the whole realm; and I pray God ſave all your honours, and ſo departed.

After theſe examinations thus ended, biſhop Farrar remained in priſon uncondemned, till the fourteenth day of February, and then was ſent down into Wales, there to receive ſentence of condemnation. Who then upon the ſix and twentieth of February, in the church of Carmarthen, being brought by Griffith Leyſon Eſq; ſheriff of the county of Carmarthen, was there perſonally preſented before Henry biſhop of St. David's, and Conſtantine the public notary: which Henry there and then diſcharged the ſaid ſheriff, and received him into his own cuſtody, further committing him to the keeping of Owen Jones, and thereupon declared unto the ſaid Mr. Farrar, the great mercy and clemency that the king and queen's highneſſes pleaſure was to be offered unto him, which he there did offer unto the ſaid Mr. Farrar; that is to ſay, That if he would ſubmit himſelf to the laws of this realm, and conform himſelf to the unity of the univerſal catholic church, he ſhould be received and pardoned: after that, ſeeing the ſaid Mr. Farrar to give no anſwer to the premiſes, the ſaid biſhop miniſtered unto him theſe articles following.

1. Firſt, Whether he believeth the marriage of prieſts lawful by the laws of God, and holy church, or no?

2. Item, Whether he believeth, that in the bleſſed ſacrament of the altar, after the words of conſecration duly pronounced by the prieſt, the very body and blood of Chriſt is really and ſubſtantially contained, without the ſubſtance of bread and wine?

Unto which articles the ſaid biſhop required the ſaid Mr. Farrar to anſwer upon his allegiance.

To which he ſaid, he would anſwer when he ſaw a lawful commiſſion, and would make no further anſwer at that time. Whereupon the ſaid biſhop taking no advantage upon the ſame anſwer, committed him to the ſaid keeper, to be kept in priſon until a new monition, and in the mean time to deliberate with himſelf for his further anſwer to the premiſſes.

Another Examination of Biſhop Farrar, before Henry Morgan the pretenſed Biſhop of St. David's, George Conſtantine his Regiſter, and others, the laſt of February, 1555.

MORGAN the pretenſed biſhop of St. David's ſitting as judge, miniſtered unto biſhop Farrar, there perſonally preſent before him, certain articles and interrogatories in writing: which being openly read and miniſtered unto him, the ſaid biſhop Farrar refuſed to anſwer, till he might ſee his lawful commiſſion and authority. Whereupon the aforeſaid pretenſed biſhop of St. David's did pronounce him as Contumax, and for the puniſhment of this his contumacy to be counted pro confeſſo, and ſo did pronounce him in writing. Which being being done, he committed the ſaid biſhop to the cuſtody of Owen Jones, until Monday next, being the fourth of March, then to be brought again into the ſame place, between one and two.

Another Appearance of Dr. Farrar.

THE day and place appointed, the ſaid biſhop appearing again before the pretenſed biſhop, humbly ſubmitting himſelf as ready to anſwer to the articles and poſitions above-mentioned, gently required the copy of the articles, and a competent term to be aſſigned unto him, to anſwer for himſelf: which being granted unto him, and the Thurſday next being aſſigned unto him between one and three, to anſwer preciſely and fully; ſo he was committed again to cuſtody, as above.

Another Appearance of Dr. Farrar.

ON Thurſday, as was appointed, which was the ſeventh of March, the ſaid biſhop perſonally again appeared, where he exhibited a certain bill in writing, containing in it his anſwer unto certain articles objected and miniſtered unto him before. Then after Henry the pretenſed biſhop of St. David's offered him again the ſaid articles as before: the tenor whereof tendeth to this effect.

Firſt, That he willed him being a prieſt to renounce matrimony.

Secondly, To grant the natural preſence of Chriſt in the ſacrament, under the forms of bread and wine.

Thirdly, That the maſs is a propitiatory ſacrifice for the quick and the dead.

Fourthly, That general councils lawfully congregated never did, nor can err.

Fifthly, That men are not juſtified before God by faith only, but that hope and charity are alſo neceſſarily required to juſtification.

Sixthly, That the catholic church which only hath authority to expound ſcriptures, and to define controverſies of religion; and to ordain things appertaining to public diſcipline, is viſible, and like unto a city ſet upon a mountain for all men to underſtand.

To theſe articles thus objected to him, he refuſed to ſubſcribe, affirming that they were invented by man, and pertain nothing to the catholic faith. After this, the biſhop above named delivered unto him the copy of the articles, aſſigning him Monday next following, to anſwer and ſubſcribe to the ſame either affirmatively or negatively.

Another Appearance of Dr. Farrar.

UPON which Monday, March 11. he appearing again before the biſhop, and the aforeſaid notary George Conſtantine, exhibited in a written paper his mind and anſwer to the aforeſaid articles, which the biſhop had twice now objected againſt him before, to which articles and anſwers he did ſo ſubſcribe, adding theſe words, as Tenens ſe de æquitate & juſtitia eſſe Epiſcopum Menevenſem, that the biſhop aſſigned the next Wedneſday, in the forenoon, to hear his final and definitive ſentence.

The laſt Appearance of Dr. Farrar.

ON which day and place the ſaid biſhop Dr. Farrar, perſonally there appearing, was demanded by Henry the pretenſed biſhop of St. David's, whether he would renounce and recant his hereſies, ſchiſms, and errors (as he called them) which hitherto he had maintained, and if he would ſubſcribe to the catholic articles, otherwiſe than he had done before.

After this the ſaid biſhop, Dr. Farrar, did exhibit a certain ſchedule written in Engliſh, and remaining in the acts; appealing withal by expreſs word of mouth from the biſhop, as from an incompetent judge, to cardinal Poole, &c.

Notwithſtanding all which, the ſaid biſhop, proceeding in his rage, pronounced the definitive ſentence againſt him contained in writing, and there left in the acts: by which ſentence he pronounced him as an heretic excommunicate, and to be given up forthwith to the ſecular power, namely, to Mr. Leyſon ſheriff of the town of Carmarthen.

This good biſhop being condemned and degraded, was committed to the ſecular power, and not long after was brought to the place of execution in the town of Carmarthen, where he in the market place, in the ſouth-ſide of the market-croſs, the thirtieth day of March, being Saturday next before Paſſion-Sunday, moſt conſtantly ſuſtained the torments of the fire.

Concerning whoſe conſtancy, this is moreover to be added, that one Richard Jones, a knight's ſon, coming to Dr. Farrar a little before his death, ſeemed to lament the painfulneſs of the death he had to ſuffer; unto whom the biſhop anſwered again to this effect, ſaying, That if he ſaw him once to ſtir in the pains of his burning, he ſhould then give no credit to his doctrine. And as he ſaid, ſo he right well performed the ſame; for ſo patiently he ſtood, that he never moved, till one Richard Gravell with a ſtaff daſhed him upon the head and ſo ſtruck him down.

The Hiſtory of Rawlins White, burned at Cardiffe in Wales about the Month of March; reported by I. Dane, who was almoſt continually with him during his Trouble, unto his Death.

FOraſmuch as we have here related the hiſtory of Dr. Farrar, burned at the town of Carmarthen in Wales, I thought to adjoin and accompany with the ſame the hiſtory alſo of Rawlins White, a fiſherman, who both in the like cauſe, and in the ſame month of March, and year aforeſaid, gave his life like a valiant ſoldier of Jeſus Chriſt to Martyrdom, and was burned at Cardiffe; the proceſs of whoſe ſtory here followeth.

Rawlins White was by his calling and occupation a fiſherman, living and continuing in the ſaid trade for the ſpace of twenty years at leaſt, in the town of Cardiffe, being one of a very good name, and well accounted amongſt his neighbours. As touching his religion at firſt, it cannot otherwiſe be known, but that he was a great partaker of the ſuperſtition and idolatry that then was uſed, I mean in the reign of king Henry the eighth. But after that God of his mercy had raiſed up the light of his goſpel, through the bleſſed government of king Edward the ſixth, Rawlins White began partly to miſlike that which before he had embraced, and to have ſome good opinion of that which before by the iniquity of the time had been concealed from him: and the rather to bring this good purpoſe and intent of his to paſs, he began to be a diligent hearer, and a great ſearcher out of the truth.

Becauſe the good man was altogether unlearned, and withal very ſimple, he knew no ready way how he might ſatisfy his great deſire. At length it came in his mind to take a ſpecial remedy to ſupply his neceſſity, which was this: He had a little boy which was his own ſon, which child he ſet to ſchool to learn to read Engliſh; now after the little boy could read indifferently well, his father every night after ſupper, ſummer and winter, would have the boy to read part of the holy ſcripture, and now and then of ſome other good book. In which kind of virtuous exerciſe the old man had ſuch delight and pleaſure, that, as it ſeemed, he rather practiſed himſelf in the ſtudy of the ſcripture, than in the trade or ſcience which beforetime he had uſed: ſo that within few years in the ſaid time of king Edward, through the help of his little ſon, and through much conference beſides, profited and went forward in ſuch ſort, that he was able not only to reſolve himſelf touching his own former blindneſs and ignorance, but was alſo able to admoniſh and inſtruct others: and therefore when occaſion ſerved he would go from one place to another viſiting ſuch as he had beſt hope in. By which his doing he became in that country, both a notable and open profeſſor of the truth, being at all times and in all ſuch places, not without the company of his little boy, whom (as I have ſaid) he uſed as an aſſiſtant to this good purpoſe. And to this his great induſtry and endeavour in the holy ſcripture, God did alſo add in him a ſingular gift of memory, ſo that by the benefit thereof he would and could do that in vouching and rehearſing of the text, which men of riper and more profound knowledge, by their notes and other helps of memory, could very hardly accompliſh. Inſomuch that he, upon the alledging of ſcripture, very often would cite the book, the leaf, yea and the very ſentence; ſuch was the wonderful working of God in this ſimple and unlearned man.

Now when he had thus continued in his profeſſion the ſpace of five years, king Edward died, upon whoſe deceaſe queen Mary ſucceeded, and with her all kind of ſuperſtition crept in. Which thing being once perceived, Rawlins White did not altogether uſe open inſtruction and admonition (as before he was wont) and therefore oftentimes in ſome private place or other he would call his truſty friends together, and with earneſt prayer and great lamentation paſs away the time, ſo that by his virtuous inſtructions, being without any blemiſh of error, he converted a great number, which number (no doubt) had greatly increaſed, had not the cruel ſtorm of perſecution been. The extremity and force whereof at laſt ſo purſued this good man, that he looked every hour to go to priſon; whereupon many of thoſe who had received comfort by his inſtructions, did reſort unto him, and by all means poſſible began to perſuade him to ſhift for himſelf, and to diſpoſe his goods by ſome reaſonable order to the uſe of his wife and children, and by that means he ſhould eſcape that danger, which was imminent over his head.

But Rawlins, nothing abaſhed for his own part through the iniquity of the time, and nothing at all moved with theſe their perſuaſions, thanked them moſt heartily for their good will, and told them plainly that he had learned one good leſſon touching the confeſſion and denial of Chriſt; advertiſing them, that if he upon their perſuaſions ſhould preſume to deny his maſter Chriſt, Chriſt in the laſt day would deny and utterly condemn him: and therefore (ſaid he) I will, by his grace, confeſs and bear witneſs of him before men, that I may find him in everlaſting life.

Notwithſtanding which anſwer, his friends were very importunate with him. Howbeit he continued ſtill in his good purpoſe ſo long, till at laſt he was taken by the officers of the town, as a man ſuſpected of hereſy; upon which apprehenſion he was convented before the biſhop of Landaffe that then was, the ſaid biſhop lying then at his houſe near Chepſtow: by whom after divers combats and conflicts with him and his chaplains, this good father Rawlins White was committed to priſon in Chepſtow. But this his keeping, whether it were by the biſhop's means, becauſe he would rid his hands of him, or through the favour of his keeper, was not ſo ſevere and extreme, but that (if he had ſo pleaſed) he might have eſcaped oftentimes.

But at laſt he was removed by the aforenamed biſhop from Chepſtow to the caſtle of Cardiffe, where he continued for the ſpace of one whole year: duting which time, this reporter reſorted to him very often, with money and other relief from this reporter's mother (who was a great favourer of thoſe that were in affliction in thoſe days) and others of his friends: which he received not without great thanks and praiſes given to the name of God. And albeit that he was thus troubled and impriſoned as ye have heard, to his own undoing in this world, and to the utter decay of his poor wife and children; yet was his heart ſo ſet to the inſtruction and furtherance of others in the way of ſalvation, that he was never in quiet, but when he was perſuading or exhorting ſuch of his familiar friends, as commonly came unto him. Inſomuch that on Sundays and other times of leiſure, when his friends came to viſit him, he would paſs away the time in prayer and exhortations, admoniſhing them always to beware of falſe prophets which come in ſheeps clothing.

Now when he had continued in Cardiffe caſtle for the ſpace of one whole year (as I have ſaid) the time of his further trial was at hand. Whereupon the afore-named biſhop of Landaffe cauſed him to be brought again from the caſtle of Cardiffe unto his own houſe near Chepſtow; and whilſt he continued there, the biſhop endeavoured by various means to reduce him to ſome conformity. But when they found their threatening words and flattering promiſes ineffectual, the biſhop deſired him to adviſe, and determine with himſelf, either to recant his opinions, or elſe to ſuffer the rigour of the law, and thereupon gave him a day of determination: which day being come, the biſhop with his chaplains went into his chapel, with a great number of the neighbours that had the curioſity to ſee their proceedings. When the biſhop and his retinue were placed in order, poor Rawlins White was brought before them. The biſhop (after much deliberation in addreſſing himſelf, as it ſeemed, and ſilence forewarned to the reſt that were preſent) made a long diſcourſe to him, declaring the cauſe of his being ſent for, which was, that he was a man well known to hold heretical opinions, and that by his inſtruction many were led into blind error. In the end, he exhorted him to conſider his preſent circumſtances: For (ſaid the biſhop) Rawlins, you have oftentimes ſince your firſt trouble, both here in my houſe, and elſewhere, ſuffered much for your opinions, and yet notwithſtanding ye ſeem altogether obſtinate and wilful. Now hereupon we thought good to ſend for you, to ſee if there be any conformity in you: ſo that the matter is come to this point, That if you will repent of that which you have done againſt the laws of God and the prince, we are ready to uſe favour towards you; but if we can by no means prevail upon you to reform, we are minded at this time to miniſter the law unto you, and therefore adviſe with yourſelf what you will do.

When the biſhop had ended his long tale, this good father Rawlins ſpake boldly to him, and ſaid, My lord, I thank God I am a chriſtian man, and I hold no opinions contrary to the word of God; and if I do, I deſire to be reformed out of the word of God, as a chriſtian ought to be. Many more words paſſed between the biſhop and Rawlins White, which this reporter doth not well remember. But in the end, when Rawlins would in no wiſe recant his opinions, the biſhop told him plainly, that he muſt proceed againſt him by the law, and condemn him as an heretic.

Proceed in your law in God's name, ſaid Rawlins; but for an heretic you ſhall never condemn me while the world ſtandeth. But, ſaid the biſhop to his company, before we proceed any further with him, let us pray unto God that he would ſend ſome ſpark of grace upon him (meaning Rawlins), and it may ſo chance, that God through our prayer will here turn and convert his heart. When Rawlins heard the biſhop ſay ſo; Ah, my lord, quoth he, now you deal well, and like a good biſhop, and I thank you moſt heartily for your great charity, and gentleneſs. Chriſt ſaith, "Whereas two or three be gathered together in my name, I will be in the midſt of them:" and there be more than two or three of you. Now if it be ſo that your requeſt be godly and lawful, and and that ye pray as ye ſhould pray, without doubt God will hear you. And therefore, my lord, go to, do you pray to your God, and I will pray to my God: I know that my God will hear my prayer, and perform my deſire.

By and by the biſhop with his company went to prayers. And Rawlins, turning himſelf to a pew that ſtood near him, fell down upon his knees, covering his face with his hands: and when they had prayed awhile, the biſhop with his company aroſe from prayer. And then alſo aroſe Rawlins, and came before the biſhop.

Then ſaid the biſhop, Now Rawlins, how is it with thee? Wilt thou revoke thy opinions, or no? My lord, ſaid he, Rawlins you left me, and Rawlins you find me, and by God's grace Rawlins I will continue. Certainly if your petitions had been juſt and lawful, God would have heard them; but you honour a falſe God, and pray not as you ſhould pray; and therefore God hath not granted your deſire. But I am one poor ſimple man, as you ſee, and God hath heard my complaint, and I truſt he will ſtrengthen me in his own cauſe.

When the biſhop perceived that their hypocriſy took no effect, he began to reprove him with ſharp words, and forthwith was ready to read the ſentence. However, upon ſome advice given to him by his chaplains that were there preſent, he thought beſt firſt to have a maſs, thinking that by ſo doing, ſome wonderful work ſhould be wrought in Rawlins, and thereupon a prieſt began the maſs.

In the mean time poor Rawlins betook himſelf to prayer in a place hard by, till ſuch time as the prieſt came to the Sacring, as they term it, which is a principal point of their idolatry. When Rawlins heard the ſacring-bell ring (as the uſe was), he roſe out of his place, and came to the quire-door, and there ſtanding awhile, turned himſelf to the people, ſpeaking theſe words, Good people, if there be any brethren amongſt you, or at leaſt, if there be but one brother amongſt you, the ſame one bear witneſs at the day of judgment, that I bow not to this idol (meaning the hoſt that the prieſt held over his head).

The maſs being ended, Rawlins was immediately called for. To whom the biſhop uſed many perſuaſions; but the good man continued ſo ſtedfaſt in his former profeſſion, that the biſhop's talk was altogether in vain, and to no purpoſe. Whereupon the biſhop cauſed the definitive ſentence to be read. Which being ended, Rawlins was diſmiſſed, and from thence he was by the biſhops commandment carried again to Cardiffe, there to be put into the priſon of the town, called Cockmarel, a very dark, loathſome, and moſt vile priſon.

Rawlins in the mean time paſſed away the time in prayer, and chiefly in ſinging of Pſalms: which kind of exerciſe he always uſed, both at Cardiffe-caſtle, and in all other places.

Now after he had thus continued a priſoner in Cockmarel priſon at Cardiffe (as is aforeſaid) a good ſpace, about three weeks before he ſuffered, the head officers of the town, that had the charge of his execution, were determined to burn him, becauſe they would be ſooner rid of him; having not indeed a writ of execution awarded, as by the law they ſhould have. Whereupon one H. Lewis, the recorder of the town that then was, ſeeing that they went about to burn him without any warrant by writ, came to them and told them, That if they did burn him before they had the writ, De Hæreticis comburendis, the wife of the ſaid Rawlins would upon juſt cauſe, by law, call their doings into queſtion.

Immediately upon this advertiſement, they ſent to London for the writ above-named; upon the receipt whereof they made ſome ſpeed to the execution of the ſaid Rawlins. Now when the day was come, wherein the good father ſhould perform and accompliſh the laſt act of this his worthy conflict, he was the night before ordered to prepare himſelf.

Now when he perceived his time was no leſs near than was reported to him, he ſent forthwith to his wife, and willed her by the meſſenger, that in any wiſe ſhe ſhould make ready and ſend unto him his wedding-garment, meaning a ſhirt, which afterward he was burned in. Which requeſt, or rather commandment of his, his wife with great ſorrow and grief of heart did perform, and early in the morning ſent it to him, which he received moſt gladly.

Now when the hour of his execution was come, this good and conſtant father Rawlins White was brought out of priſon, having on his body the long ſhirt, which (as you heard before), he called his wedding garment, and an old ruſſet coat which he was wont to wear. Beſides this, he had upon his legs an old pair of leather-buſkins, which he had uſed long before. And thus being brought out of priſon (as I have ſaid) he was accompanied, or rather guarded, with a great company of bills and gleaves. Which when he beheld, Alas! ſaid he, what meaneth all this? All this needeth not. By God's grace I will not ſtart away: but I with all my heart and mind give unto God moſt hearty thanks, that he hath made me worthy to abide all this for his holy name's ſake.

So he came to a place in his way, where his poor wife and children ſtood weeping, and making a great lamentation; the ſudden ſight of whom ſo pierced his heart, that the tears trickled down his face. But he ſoon after, as though he had miſliked this infirmity of his fleſh, began to be as it were altogether angry with himſelf: inſomuch, that ſtriking his breaſt with his hand, he uſed theſe words, Ah fleſh, ſtayeſt thou me ſo? wouldeſt thou fain prevail? Well, I tell thee, do what thou canſt, thou ſhalt not, by God's grace, have the victory. By this time this poor innocent came to the very altar of his ſacrifice (I mean the place appointed for his death) and there found a ſtake ready ſet up, with ſome wood towards the making of the fire. Which when he beheld, he ſet forward himſelf very boldly: but in going toward the ſtake, he fell down upon his knees and kiſſed the ground; and in riſing again, a little earth ſticking on his noſe, he ſaid theſe words, Earth unto earth, and Duſt unto duſt: thou art my mother, and unto thee I ſhall return. Then went he chearfully and very joyfully, and ſet his back cloſe unto the ſtake; and when he had ſtood there awhile, he caſt his eye upon this reporter, and called him unto him, and ſaid, I feel a great fighting between the fleſh and the ſpirit, and the fleſh would very fain have his ſwing; and therefare I pray you, when you ſee me any thing tempted, hold your finger up to me, and I truſt I ſhall remember myſelf.

As he was thus ſtanding with his back cloſe unto the ſtake, a ſmith came with a great chain of iron; whom when he ſaw, he caſt up his hand with a loud voice, and gave God great thanks. Then the ſmith caſt a chain about him, and as he was making it faſt on the other ſide, Rawlins ſaid unto him, I pray you, good friend, knock in the chain faſt; for it may be that the fleſh would ſtrive mightily, but God of his great mercy give me ſtrength and patience to abide the extremity.

Now when the ſmith had made him ſure to the ſtake, the officers began to lay on more wood, with a little ſtraw and reed: wherein the good old man was no leſs occupied than the beſt; for as far as he could reach with his hands, he would pluck the ſtraw and reed, and lay it about him in places moſt convenient for his ſpeedy diſpatch. Which thing he did with ſuch a chearful countenance and familiar geſture, that all men there preſent were aſtoniſhed at it.

Thus when all things were ready, ſo that there lacked nothing but kindling the fire, directly over-againſt the ſtake, in the face of Rawlins White, there was a ſtanding erected, whereupon ſtept up a prieſt, addreſſing himſelf to ſpeak to the people, which were many in number, becauſe it was market-day. When Rawlins perceived him, and and conſidered the cauſe of his coming, he reached a little ſtraw unto him, and made two little ſtays, and ſet them under his elbows. Then went the prieſt forward in his ſermon, wherein he ſpake of many things touching the authority of the church of Rome. In the mean time Rawlins gave ſuch a good ear and attention, that he ſeemed nothing at all moved or diſquieted. At laſt the prieſt came to the ſacrament of the altar, and there he began to inveigh againſt Rawlins's opinions; in which his invection he cited the common place of ſcripture, and thereupon made a learned interpretation.

Now when Rawlins perceived that he went about not only to preach and teach the people falſe doctrine, but alſo to confirm it by ſcripture, he ſuddenly ſtarted up, and beckoned his hands to the people, ſaying twice, Come hither good people, and hear not a falſe prophet preaching: and then ſaid unto the preacher, Ah thou naughty hypocrite, doſt thou preſume to prove thy falſe doctrine by ſcripture? Look in the text what followeth; Did not Chriſt ſay, "Do this in remembrance of me?" After which words, the prieſt being rather amazed than interrupted, forthwith held his peace.

Then ſome that ſtood by cried out, Put fire; Set to fire: which being done, the ſtraw and reed caſt up a great and ſudden flame. In which flame this good man bathed his hands ſo long, until ſuch time as the ſinews ſhrunk, and the fat dropped away, ſaving that once he did, as it were, wipe his face with one of them. All this while, which was ſomewhat long, he cried with a loud voice, O Lord, receive my ſoul; O Lord, receive my ſpirit, until he could not open his mouth. At laſt, the extremity of the fire was ſo vehement againſt his legs, that they were conſumed almoſt before the reſt of his body was burned, which made the whole body fall over the chain into the fire ſooner than it would have done. Thus died this good old man for the teſtimony of God's truth, being now rewarded, no doubt, with the crown of eternal life.

It is further recorded of the ſaid good father Rawlins, by this reporter, that as he was going to his death and ſtanding at the ſtake, he ſeemed in a manner to be altered in nature. For as before he was wont to go ſtooping, or rather crooked, through the infirmity of age, having a ſad countenance and a very feeble complexion, and withal very ſoft in ſpeech and geſture, now he went and ſtretched himſelf not only upright, but alſo bore withal a moſt pleaſant and comfortable countenance, and with great courage and boldneſs both in ſpeech and behaviour.

It is alſo ſaid by this reporter, that a little before the fire flaſhed up to his body, many of his friends came up to him, and took him by the hand, amongſt whom the reporter of this ſtory held him ſo long by the hand, till the flame aroſe and forced them to part. In the mean time the prieſt of whom I ſpake before, cried out and ſaid, That it was not lawful for any man to take him by the hand, becauſe he was an heretic, and condemned by the church. The chief cauſe of his trouble was his opinion concerning the ſacrament of the altar. He was at the time of his death about ſixty years of age.

Before I paſs over this month of March, I cannot but leave a little memorandum of the words or conſultation of queen Mary, uſed to ſome of the council the 28th day of March, concerning the reſtoring again of the abbey lands. Who after ſhe had called into her preſence four of her privy council, namely, William lord marquis of Wincheſter, high-treaſurer of England; Sir Robert Rocheſter, knight, the queen's comptroller; Sir William Peter, knight, ſecretary; and Sir Francis Inglefield, knight, maſter of the wards; ſpoke to them as followeth:

"You are here of our council, and we have ordered you to be called unto us, to the intent you might hear of me my conſcience, and the reſolution of my mind, concerning the lands and poſſeſſions as well of monaſteries as of other churches whatſoever, being now preſently in my poſſeſſion.

"Firſt, I do conſider, that the ſaid lands were taken away from the churches aforeſaid in the time of ſchiſm, and that by unlawful means, ſuch as are contrary both to the law of God and of the church: for which cauſe my conſcience doth not ſuffer me to detain them; and therefore I here expreſly refuſe either to claim or to retain the ſame lands for mine, but with all my heart freely and willingly, without any covenant or condition, here and before God I do ſurrender and relinquiſh the ſaid lands and poſſeſſions, or inheritances whatſoever, and do renounce the ſame with this mind and purpoſe, that order and diſpoſition thereof may be taken, as ſhall ſeem beſt liking to our moſt holy lord the pope, or elſe his legate the lord cardinal, to the honour of God, and wealth of this our realm.

"And albeit you may object to me again, that conſidering the ſtate of my kingdom, and the dignity thereof, my crown imperial cannot be honourably maintained and furniſhed without the poſſeſſions aforeſaid; yet notwithſtanding I ſet more by the ſalvation of my ſoul, than by ten kingdoms; and therefore the ſaid poſſeſſions I utterly refuſe here to hold after that ſort and title, and give moſt hearty thanks to Almighty God, who hath given me an huſband likewiſe minded, with no leſs good affection in this behalf, than I myſelf.

"Wherefore I charge and command, that my chancellor (with whom I have conferred my mind in this matter before) and you four, do reſort together to-morrow to the moſt reverend lord legate, and ſignify to him the premiſſes in my name, and give your attendance upon him for the more full declaration of the ſtate of my kingdom, and of the aforeſaid poſſeſſions accordingly, as you yourſelves do underſtand the matter, and can inform him in the ſame."

This intimation being given by the queen, firſt unto the counſellors, and then coming to the cardinal's hand, he drawing out a copy thereof in Latin, ſent the ſame to the pope; which copy drawn in Latin, and coming afterward to my hand, I have thus tranſlated into Engliſh as you have heard.

Furthermore, here by the way is to be underſtood, that in the month before, which was February, and on the 19th day of the ſaid month, the biſhop of Ely, with the lord Montacute, and 140 horſe, were ſent as ambaſſadors from the king and queen to Rome. For what cauſe, is not expreſſed; but by conjecture it may be well ſuppoſed to be for the ſame cauſe of abbey-lands, as by the ſequel thereof may probably appear. For it was not long after the pope did ſet forth in print a bull of excommunication for all manner of ſuch perſons, without exception, as kept any of the church or abbey-lands; by virtue of which bull, the pope excommunicated as well ſuch as had any of the church or abby-lands, as alſo all ſuch princes, biſhops, and noblemen, juſtices of peace, and others in office, who had not, or did not forthwith put the ſame bull in execution. Albeit this execution (God be thanked) to this day was never put in practice.

Wherein again is to be obſerved another catholic fetch, worthy to be marked. For where by rigour and force they may overmaſter, they ſpare for no coſt, but lay on load enough. This well appeared, and ſtill doth appear in burning the poor patient chriſtians, whom becauſe they ſee to be deſtitute of power and ſtrength to reſiſt them, and content with patience to receive whatſoever is put upon them, there they play the lions, and make no end of burning and perſecuting. But where they eſpy themſelves to be overmatched, or fear to receive a foil in preſuming too far, there they keep in, and can ſtay the execution of their laws and bulls, be they never ſo apoſtolical, till they eſpy a convenient time for their purpoſe, as in this caſe is evident for all the world to ſee.

For notwithſtanding that the pope's bull, coming with full authority for the reſtitution of abbey-lands, did thunder out moſt terrible excommunication, not only againſt them which detained any ſuch lands, but alſo againſt all others that did not ſee the pope's commandment to be executed; yet neither the biſhop of Wincheſter, nor any of the pope's clergy, would greatly ſtir in that matter, perceiving the nobility to be too ſtrong for them; and therefore were contented to let the caſe fall, or at leaſt to ſtay for a more convenient opportunity.

Yea, and moreover under a crafty pretence, that the nobility and men of lands at the firſt coming out of the bull ſhould not be exaſperated too much againſt them, they ſubtilly abuſed the pulpits, and diſſembled with the people, affirming that the ſaid pope's late bull, ſet forth in print for reſtitution of abbey-lands, was not meant for England, but for other foreign countries: where in very deed the meaning of that bull was only for England, and no country elſe, as both by this intimation of queen Mary here mentioned, and by many other conjectures, and alſo by Mr. Feckman's ballet of Caveat Emptor, may appear. Whereby it is eaſy for all men to underſtand what the purpoſe of thoſe men was to do, if time, which they obſerved, might have ſerved their devotion. But to let this matter paſs of the pope's bull, the time now ſerveth to treat of pope Julius's death, foraſmuch as he made his end about the latter end of the month of March.

Concerning the deeds and acts of which pope, to make a full declaration, it were not ſo much tedious to the reader, as horrible to all good men. Under this Julius, flouriſhed the archbiſhop of Beneventanus, a Florentine, named Johannes à Caſa, dean of the pope's chamber, and a chief legate to the Venetians: who well declaring the fruit of that filthy ſee, ſo far forgot both honeſty and nature, that he was not aſhamed to play the filthy Sodomite himſelf, and to boaſt openly of the ſame; but alſo took upon him moſt impudently in Italian metre, to all men's ears, to ſet forth the praiſe and commendation of that beaſtly iniquity, ſaying, That he himſelf never uſed other; and this book was printed at Venice by one Trojanus Navus: and yet the pope could ſuffer this ſo great iniquity and ſhameleſs beaſtlineſs, even under his noſe in his own chamber, who could not abide the true doctrine of Chriſt in chriſtian books.

Amongſt other pranks and deeds of the aforeſaid pope, in his jubilee, and in the ſynod of Trent, and in confirming of the idol of Lauretane, this is alſo reported of him in his life, that he delighted greatly in pork-fleſh and peacocks. Upon a time when he was admoniſhed by his phyſician to abſtain from all ſwines-fleſh, for that it was noiſom for his gout, and yet would not follow his counſel: the phyſician afterward gave warning to his ſteward or orderer of his diet, that he ſhould ſet no more pork-fleſh before him. Whereupon when the pope perceived the ſaid pork-fleſh to be lacked in his accuſtomed ſervice: Where, ſaid he, is my pork? And when his ſteward had anſwered that his phyſician had forbidden any pork to be ſerved: the pope burſted out into a great rage, and ſaid theſe words, Bring me, ſaid he, my pork-fleſh, in the deſpite of God.

At another time, he ſitting at dinner, pointing to a peacock upon his table, which he had not touched; Keep, ſaid he, this cold peacock for me againſt ſupper, and let me ſup in the garden: for I ſhall have gueſts. So when ſupper came, and, amongſt other hot peacocks, he ſaw not his cold peacock brought to his table: the pope, after his wonted manner, moſt horribly blaſpheming God, fell into an extreme rage, &c. Whereupon one of his cardinals ſitting by, deſired him, ſaying, Let not your holineſs, I pray you, be moved with a matter of ſo ſmall weight. Then pope Julius anſwering again; What, ſaid he, if God was ſo angry for an apple, that he caſt our firſt parents out of paradiſe for the ſame, why may not I, being his vicar, be angry then for a peacock, ſince a peacock is a greater matter than an apple? Behold here, good reader, by this pope, the holineſs of that blaſphemous ſee: and yet thou ſhalt ſee here what affection was borne to this pope here in England, by the Dirges, Hearſes, and Funerals commanded to be had and celebrated in all churches by the queen and her council, as may appear by the copy of their letters here following.

A Letter from the Biſhop of Wincheſter (being Lord Chancellor) unto Bonner Biſhop of London, concerning the celebrating of the Pope's Funeral.

AFTER my hearty commendations to your good lordſhip. The king and queen's majeſty having certain knowledge of the death of the pope's holineſs, thought good there ſhould be as well ſolemn obſequies ſaid for him throughout the realm, as alſo theſe prayers (which I ſend you here incloſed) uſed at maſs-time in all places at this time of vacation; and therefore ordered me to ſignify their pleaſures unto you in this behalf, that thereupon ye might proceed to the full accompliſhment thereof, by putting the ſame in due execution within your own dioceſe, and ſending word to the reſt of the biſhops, to do the like in theirs.

Thus doubting not but that your lordſhip will uſe ſuch diligence in this matter at this time, as ſhall be neceſſary, I bid your lordſhip heartily well to fare. From my houſe at Aſher, the 10th of April 1555.

Your aſſured friend and brother,
Stephanus Winton, Chancel.

Prayers commanded to be uſed in the Funeral Maſſes for the Pope, the Apoſtolic See being vacant.

WE beſeech thee, O Lord, of thy great pity to grant to the holy Roman church a biſhop, whoſe care towards us may be always acceptable to thee, and that he may be revered by thy people for his good government, to the glory of thy name, through our Lord.

A Secret Prayer.

MAY thy abundant pity, O Lord, towards us, grant that we may rejoice to have obtained a biſhop of our holy mother church acceptable to thy Majeſty, thro' our Lord.

After the Communion.

MAY thy wonderful grace, O Lord, rejoice us (being refreſhed with the ſacrament of thy precious body and blood) in the choice of a biſhop who may inſtruct thy people in all virtue, through our Lord.

Upon this command, on Wedneſday in Eaſter week there were hearſes ſet up, and Dirges ſung for the ſaid Julius in divers places. At which time a woman going into St. Magnus church at the Bridge-foot in London, and there ſeeing an hearſe and other preparation, aſked what it meant: ſome that ſtood by, ſaid that it was for the pope, and that ſhe muſt pray for him. Nay, ſaid ſhe, that will I not, for he needeth not my prayers: and ſeeing he could forgive us all our ſins, I am ſure he is clean himſelf: therefore I need not to pray for him. She was heard to ſpeak theſe words by ſome that ſtood by: who by and by carried her into the cage at London-Bridge, and bid her cool herſelf there.

Almighty God by many and ſundry ways hath admoniſhed men of all nations in theſe latter years to embrace, and not violently to reſiſt the light of his goſpel: as firſt by preaching of his word: ſecondly, by the blood of the martyrs: and thirdly, by terrible example from time to time ſhewed upon his adverſaries. In the number of whom cometh here to be remembered the notable working of God's hand upon a certain prieſt in Kent, named Nightingal, parſon of Crondal near Canterbury, who upon Shrove Sunday, which was about the third day of the ſaid month of March, rejoicing greatly at this alteration of religion, began to make a ſermon to his pariſhioners, taking his theme out of the words of St. John; "He that ſaith that he hath no ſin, is a lyar, and the truth is not in him, &c." and upon the ſame very impertinently declared to them all ſuch articles as were ſet forth by the pope's authority, and by the commandment of the biſhops of this realm; ſaying moreover unto the people in this wiſe, Now maſters and neighbours, rejoice and be merry, for the prodigal ſon is come home. For I know that moſt part of you be as I am, for I know your hearts well enough. And I ſhall tell you what hath happened in this week paſt: I was before my lord cardinal Poole, and he made me as free from ſin as I was at the font-ſtone: and on Thurſday laſt being before him, he hath appointed me to notify (I thank him for it) the ſame unto you. And I will tell you what it is. And ſo reading the pope's bull of pardon that was ſent into England, he ſaid, he thanked God that he had lived to ſee that day; adding moreover, that he believed by the virtue of that bull he was clean from ſin, as the night that he was born: And immediately upon the ſame fell ſuddenly down out of the pulpit, and never ſtirred hand nor foot. Teſtified by Robert Auſten of Chatham, who both heard and ſaw the ſame, and is witneſſed alſo by the country round about.

On the ſecond day of April John Awcock died in priſon, and was buried in the fields, as the manner of the papiſts was, to deny their chriſtian burial to ſuch as died out of their popiſh antichriſtian church.

Having now entered into the month of April, we will ſet down in order out of the public records what happened in the ſaid month. The firſt day of April, 1555. a letter was ſent to the ſheriff of Kent, to apprehend Thomas Woodgate and William Maynard, for preaching ſecretly, and to ſend them up to the council.

The ſeventh day of the ſaid month, another letter was ſent to the ſaid ſheriff for the apprehenſion of one Harwich, who went about with a boy with him, preaching from place to place.

The 15th of April a letter was directed to Sir Nicholas Hare, and Sir Thomas Cornwallis, requiring them to examine Mr. Flower, alias Branch, what he meant to wear about his neck written, Deum time, Idolum fuge, and whom elſe he knew to wear the like; praying them alſo to ſpeak to Bonner biſhop of London, ſpeedily to proceed againſt him for his religion according to the laws, and that the juſtices of peace of Middleſex ſhould likewiſe proceed againſt him for ſhedding of blood in the church, according to the ſtatute, ſo as if he continued in his opinion, he might be executed at the fartheſt by the latter end of this week, and that his right hand be ſtricken off the day before his execution, or the ſame day.

The 22d of April there was a like letter ſent to the juſtices of peace of Middleſex, with a writ for the execution of the ſaid Flower, commanding him to ſee his hand ſtricken off before his burning.

The 29th of April, Mr. Robert Horneby, ſervant then to the lady Elizabeth, was convented before the council for his religion: and ſtanding conſtantly to the truth, notwithſtanding their threats and other perſuaſions, was therefore committed to the Marſhalſea.

A Declaration of the Life, Examination, and Burning of George Marſh, who ſuffered at Weſt-Cheſter, the 24th Day of April 1555.

GEorge Marſh was born in the pariſh of Deane in the county of Lancaſter, and was well brought up in learning and honeſt trade of living by his parents; who afterwards about the 25th year of his age took to wife an honeſt maiden of the country; with whom he continued, earning their living upon a farm, having children between them lawfully begotten, and then God taking his wife out of this world, he (leaving his houſhold and children in good order) went unto the univerſity of Cambridge, where he ſtudied, and much increaſed in learning, and was a miniſter of God's holy word and ſacraments, and for a while was curate to Laurence Saunders, as himſelf reporteth. In which condition of life he continued for a ſpace, earneſtly ſetting forth God's true religion, to the defacing of Antichriſt's falſe doctrine, by his godly readings and ſermons, as well there and in the pariſh of Deane, as elſewhere in Lancaſhire.

At length he was apprehended, and kept cloſe priſoner in Cheſter, by George Cotes then biſhop of that ſee, within the precinct of the biſhop's houſe, about the ſpace of four months, being not permitted to have relief and comfort of his friends; but charge being given unto the porter, to mark who they were that aſked for him, and to ſignify their names unto the biſhop, as by the particular deſcription of his ſtory, teſtified and recorded with his own pen, more evidently may appear in the proceſs hereunder following.

The Examination of George Marſh, written by himſelf.

ON Monday before Palm-Sunday, which was the 12th of March, it was told me at my mother's houſe, that Roger Wrinſtone, with others of Mr. Barton's ſervants, did make diligent ſearch for me in Bolton, and when they perceived that I was not there, they gave ſtrict charge to Robert Ward and Robert Marſh, to find and bring me to Mr. Barton the day next following, with others, to be brought before the honourable earl of Derby, to be examined in matters of religion, &c.

I knowing this, by relation of divers of my friends was diverſely affected; my mother and ſome of my friends adviſing me to fly, and to avoid the peril, which thing I had intended before after a week then next enſuing, if this in the mean while had not chanced; ſeeing that if I were taken, and would not recant in matters of religion (as they thought I would not, and as God ſtrengthening and aſſiſting me with his Holy Spirit I never will) it would not only have put them to great ſorrow, heavineſs, and loſſes, with coſts and charges, to their ſhame and rebuke in this world, but alſo mine own ſelf, after troubles and painful impriſonment, unto ſhameful death.

This conſidered, they adviſed and counſelled me to depart and fly the country, as I intended to have done, if this had not happened. To whoſe counſel my weak fleſh would gladly have conſented, but my ſpirit did not fully agree: thinking and ſaying thus to myſelf, that if I fled away, it would be thought, reported, and ſaid, that I did not only fly the country, and my neareſt and deareſt friends, but much rather from Chriſt's holy word, according as theſe years paſt I had with my heart, or at leaſt with mine outward living profeſſed, and with my word and mouth taught, according to the ſmall talent given me of the Lord. I being thus with their counſel and advice, and the cogitations and counſels of mine own mind drawn as it were divers ways, went from my mother's houſe, ſaying, I would come again at evening.

In the mean time I ceaſed not by earneſt prayer to aſk and ſeek counſel of God (who is the giver of all good gifts) gifts) and of other my friends, whoſe pious judgments and knowledge I much truſted to. After this I met with one of my ſaid friends on Deane-moor, about ſun going down; and after we had conſulted together of my buſineſs, not without hearty prayer kneeling on our knees, we departed. I not fully determining what to do, but taking my leave of my friend, ſaid, I doubt not but God (according as our prayer and truſt was) would give me ſuch wiſdom and counſel as ſhould be moſt to his honour and glory, the profit of my neighbours and brethren in the world, and obtaining of mine eternal ſalvation by Chriſt in heaven.

This done, I returned to my mother's houſe again, where ſeveral of Mr. Barton's ſervants had been ſeeking after me; who, when they could not find me, ſtrictly charged my brother and William Marſh to ſeek me that night, and to bring me to Smethehils the next day: who being ſo charged, were gone to ſeek me in Adderton, or elſewhere I know not. Thus intending before to have been all night with my mother, but then conſidering that my tarrying there would diſquiet her with her houſhold, I departed from thence, and went beyond Deane church, and there tarried all night with an old friend of mine, taking ill reſt, and conſulting much with myſelf of my trouble.

At my firſt awaking, one came to me from a faithful friend of mine with letters, who ſaid this: My friend's advice was that I ſhould in no wiſe fly, but abide and boldly confeſs the faith of Jeſus Chriſt. At whoſe words I was ſo confirmed and eſtabliſhed in my conſcience, that from thenceforth I conſulted no more, whether it were better to fly or to tarry; but was at a point with myſelf, that I would not fly, but go to Mr. Barton who did ſeek for me, and there preſent myſelf, and patiently bear ſuch croſs as it ſhould pleaſe God to lay upon my ſhoulders. Whereupon my mind before being much diſquieted and troubled, was now merry and at eaſe.

I aroſe early in the morning, and after I had ſaid the Engliſh litany (as my cuſtom was) with other prayers, kneeling on my knees by my friend's bed-ſide, I prepared myſelf to go toward Smethehils; and as I was going thither, I went into the houſes of Henry Widdowes, of my mother-in-law, of Ralph Yeton, and of the wife of Thomas Richardſon, deſiring them to pray for me, and have me commended to all my friends, and to comfort my mother, and be good to my little children; for (as I ſuppoſed) they ſhould not ſee my face any more before the laſt day; and ſo took my leave of them not without tears ſhed on both parts, and came to Smethehils about nine of the clock, and preſented myſelf afore Mr. Barton; who ſhewed me a letter from the earl of Derby, wherein he was commanded to ſend me with others to Lathum.

Whereupon he charged my brother and William Marſh to bring and deliver me the next day by ten of the clock, before the ſaid earl or his council. I made earneſt ſuit with other ſpecial friends, which I had there at the ſame time, to Mr. Barton, that he would take ſome one of them, or them all bound by recognizance or otherwiſe, for mine appearing before the ſaid earl or his ſaid council, that my brother and William Marſh might be at home, becauſe it was the chiefeſt time of feeding, and their ploughs could not go if they were not at home; but nothing could be obtained.

Then we went to my mother's, and there I dined and ſhifted part of my cloaths: and ſo praying, took my leave of my mother, the wife of Richard Marſh, and both their houſholds, they and I both weeping, and departed from them, and went toward Lathum, and were all night a mile and an half on this ſide Lathum. The next day, which was Wedneſday, we aroſe, prayed, and came to Lathum betimes, and tarried there till four of the clock in the afternoon.

Then I was called by Roger Mekinſon to my lord and his council, and brought intothe chamber of preſence, where was preſent Sir William Nores, Sir Pierce Alee, Mr. Sherburn the parſon of Grapnal, Mr. More, with others. Where when I had tarried a little while, my lord turned towards me, and aſked, What was my name? I anſwered, Marſh.

Then he aſked, Whether I was one of thoſe that ſowed evil ſeed and diſſention among the people? Which thing I denied, deſiring to know mine accuſers, and what could be laid againſt me: but that I could not know.

Then he ſaid, he would with his council examine me themſelves, and aſked me, Whether I was a prieſt? I ſaid no. Then he aſked me, What had been my living? I anſwered, I was a miniſter, ſerved a cure, and taught a ſchool. Then ſaid my lord to his council, this is a wonderful thing. Before he ſaid he was no prieſt, and now he confeſſeth himſelf to be one. I anſwered, by the laws now uſed in this realm (as far as I do know) I am none.

Then they aſked me, Who gave me orders, or whether I had taken any at all? I anſwered, I received orders of the biſhop of London and Lincoln.

Then ſaid they one to another, Thoſe be of theſe new heretics, and aſked me, What acquaintance I had with them? I anſwered, I never ſaw them but at the time when I received orders.

They aſked me, How long I had been curate, and whether I had miniſtered with a good conſcience? I anſwered, I had been curate but one year, and had miniſtered with a good conſcience, I thanked God, and if the laws of the realm would have ſuffered me, I would have miniſtered ſtill; and if the laws at any time hereafter would ſuffer me to miniſter after that ſort, I would miniſter again.

At which they murmured, and the parſon of Grapnal ſaid, This laſt communion was the moſt deviliſh thing that ever was deviſed. Then they aſked me, what my belief was?

I anſwered, I believe in God the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghoſt, according as the ſcriptures of the Old and New Teſtaments do teach, and according as the four ſymbols or creeds, that is to wit, the creed commonly called the Apoſtles, the creed of the council of Nice, of Athanaſius, and of Auſtin and Ambroſe do teach.

And after a few words, the parſon of Grapnal ſaid, But what is thy belief in the ſacrament of the altar?

I anſwered, I believe that whoſoever, according to Chriſt's inſtitution, did receive the holy ſacrament of Chriſt's body and blood, did eat and drink Chriſt's body and blood, with all the benefits of his death and reſurrection, to their eternal ſalvation; for Chriſt, ſaid I, is ever preſent with his ſacrament.

Then they aſked me, Whether the bread and wine, by the virtue of the words pronounced by the prieſt, were changed into the fleſh and blood of Chriſt; and that the ſacrament, whether it were received or reſerved, was the very body of Chriſt?

Whereunto I made anſwer, I knew no further than I had ſhewed already. For my knowledge is imperfect, ſaid I; deſiring them not to aſk me ſuch hard and unprofitable queſtions, whereby to bring my body into danger of death, and ſuck my blood. Whereat they were not a little offended, ſaying, they were no blood-ſuckers, and intended nothing to me, but to make me a good chriſtian.

So after many other queſtions which I avoided as well as I could, remembering the ſaying of St. Paul, "Fooliſh and unlearned queſtions avoid, knowing they do but gender ſtrife:" my lord commanded me to come to the board, and gave me pen and ink in my hand, and commanded me to write mine anſwers to the queſtions of the ſacrament abovenamed; and I wrote as I had anſwered before. Whereat he being much offended, commanded me to write a more direct anſwer, ſaying, I ſhould not chuſe but do it.

Then I took the pen and wrote, that further I knew not. Whereat he being ſore grieved, after many threatenings enings ſaid, I ſhould be put to a ſhameful death like a traitor, with other like words; and ſometimes giving me fair words if I would turn and be conformable as others were, how glad he would be.

In concluſion, after much ado, he commanded me to ward in a cold, windy ſtone houſe, where was little room; where I lay two nights without any bed, ſaving a few great canvas tent cloaths; I had a pair of ſheets, but no woollen cloaths, and ſo continued till Palm-Sunday, occupying myſelf as well as I could in meditation, prayer and ſtudy; for no man could be ſuffered to come to me but my keeper twice a day when he brought me meat and drink.

Another Examination of Geo. Marſh.

ON Palm-Sunday after dinner I was ſent for to my lord and his council (ſaving Sir William Nores and Sir Pierce Alee were not then preſent) amongſt whom was Sir John Beram, and the vicar of Preſcot. So they examined me yet once again of the ſacrament. And after I had communed apart with the vicar of Preſcot a good ſpace concerning that matter, he returned with me to my lord and his council, ſaying, That anſwer which I had made before, and then did make (as it is above written) was ſufficient for a beginner, and as one which did not profeſs a perfect knowledge in that matter, until ſuch time as I had learned further. Wherewith the earl was very well pleaſed, ſaying, he doubted not but by the means and help of the vicar of Preſcot I would be conformable in other things: and after many fair words he commanded I ſhould have a bed, with fire, and liberty to go amongſt his ſervants, ſo that I would do no harm with my communication amongſt them.

And ſo after much other communication I departed, much more troubled in my mind than before, becauſe I had not with more boldneſs confeſſed Chriſt, but in ſuch ſort as mine adverſaries thought thereby they ſhould prevail againſt me; whereat I was much grieved: for hitherto I went about, as much as in me lay, to rid myſelf out of their hands: if by any means without open denying of Chriſt and his word that could be done.

This conſidered, I cried more earneſtly to God by prayer, deſiring him to ſtrengthen me with his Holy Spirit, with boldneſs to confeſs him; and to deliver me from their enticing words, and that I were not ſpoiled thro' their philoſophy and deceitful vanity, after the traditions of men and ordinances of the world, and not after Chriſt.

A day or two after I was ſent for to the vicar of Preſcot, and the parſon of Grapnal; where our communication was concerning the maſs: and he aſked what offended me in the maſs. I anſwered, the whole maſs did offend me, firſt becauſe it was in a ſtrange language, whereby the people were not edified, contrary to St. Paul's doctrine, 1 Cor. 14. and becauſe of the manifold and intolerable abuſes and errors contained therein, contrary to Chriſt's prieſthood and ſacrifice.

Then they aſked me in what place thereof; and I named ſome places; which places they went about with gentle and far-ſought interpretations to mitigate, ſaying thoſe places were underſtood far otherwiſe than the words did purport, or than I did take them.

I anſwered, I did underſtand them as they did purport, and as their own books do comment and gloſs upon them.

They ſaid, Sacrificium or Oblatio did not in the maſs ſignify any thing elſe, than either a ſacrifice of praiſe and thankſgiving, or elſe a memorial of a ſacrifice or oblation. So they cauſed a maſs-book to be ſent for, and ſhewed me where in ſome places of the maſs was written, Sacrificium laudis. Whereto I anſwered, that it followed not therefore that in all places it ſignified a ſacrifice or oblation of praiſe or thankſgiving; and altho' it did, yet was not a ſacrifice of praiſe or thankſgiving to be offered for the ſins of the people, for that did Chriſt by his own paſſion once offer on the croſs: where the words of the maſs were, that the prieſt did offer an oblation and ſacrifice for the ſins and offences both of himſelf and of the people; for them that were dead, and for the ſalvation of the living: and that the commixtion of the body and blood of Chriſt was health both of body and ſoul.

The vicar anſwered, that was to be underſtood of the commixtion of Chriſt's body and blood with his church or people. So after much exhortation unto me, that I ſhould be conformable to the true catholic church (which, as they meant, was the Romiſh church) I departed, not conſenting unto them.

Within a day or two Mr. More came to me, bringing with him certain articles, to which Dr. Crome had conſented and ſubſcribed in the preſence of certain witneſſes in the days of king Henry the eighth, and deſired me to read them over, and aſked me whether I would conſent and ſubſcribe unto thoſe articles. And after communication had of one or two of the ſaid articles, I confeſſed plainly I would not conſent and ſubſcribe to thoſe articles: for then I did againſt mine own conſcience: and ſo he departed.

So within a ſhort ſpace after, the ſaid parſon and vicar ſent for me again, ſaying, my lord would be at a ſhort point with me; for if I would not conſent and ſubſcribe unto four articles drawn out of the articles aforeſaid, I muſt go to priſon ſtraightways.

The firſt was, whether the maſs now uſed in the church of England was according to Chriſt's inſtitution, and with faith, reverence, and devotion to be heard and ſeen?

The ſecond, whether the Almighty, by the words pronounced by the prieſt, did change the bread and wine after the words of conſecration into the body and blood of Chriſt, whether it were received or reſerved?

Thirdly, whether the lay-people ought to receive but under the form of bread only, and that the one kind was ſufficient for them?

Fourthly, whether confeſſion to the prieſt now uſed in England were godly and neceſſary?

Theſe four queſtions or articles they delivered me in writing, and bade me to go to my chamber and ſubſcribe my anſwers with mine own hand, and come again; and within one half hour I came to them again, and delivered them the queſtions with mine anſwers. The firſt I denied. The ſecond I anſwered, as I did to my lord before, and is above written. To the third I anſwered, the lay-people by Chriſt's inſtitution ought to receive under both kinds, and that it ſufficeth them not to receive under one kind only. Fourthly, that tho' confeſſion auricular were a commodious means to inſtruct the rude people, yet it was not neceſſary nor commanded of God.

They much exhorted me then to leave mine opinions, ſaying, I was much deceived, underſtanding the ſcriptures amiſs, and counſelled me to follow the catholic church of Chriſt, and to do as others did. I anſwered, my faith in Chriſt conceived by his holy word I neither could nor would deny, alter, or change, for any living creature whatſoever he were, deſiring them to ſpeak to my lord, that during my life and impriſonment my poor friends might be ſuffered to relieve me with neceſſary things according to their powers. And ſo after much exhortation of them, to do and believe as the catholic church did, we departed; I from thenceforth continuing in the porter's ward, not coming forth of my chamber, except at noon and night while I dined and ſupped.

Upon one of the Eaſter holy days Mr. Sherburn and Mr. More ſent for me, perſuading me much to leave mine opinions; ſaying, all the bringers up and favourers of that religion had evil luck, and were either put to death or in priſon, and in danger of life. Again, the favourers of the religion now uſed had wondrous good luck and proſperity in all things: with many other worldly worldly reaſons of man's wiſdom; for as for the ſcriptures, Mr. Sherburn confeſſed himſelf ignorant.

I anſwered, that I believed and leaned only to the ſcriptures, not judging things by proſperity or adverſity: but they earneſtly adviſed me to recant mine opinions, and not to be hindered for any worldly ſhame.

I anſwered, that that which I did, I did not for the avoiding of any worldly ſhame, ſaying, My ſoul and life were dearer to me than the avoiding of any worldly ſhame: neither yet did I it for any vain praiſe of the world, but in the reverent fear of God.

Then Mr. More queſtioned with me of receiving the ſacrament under one kind. I ſaid, Chriſt's inſtitution was plain, that all men ſhould drink of the cup. Then he told me of the 24th of St. Luke, and the 20th of the Acts, where was mention of breaking bread only: from which he gathered, that they received the ſacrament but under one kind.

That I denied, ſaying, thoſe places either did not ſpeak of the celebration of the Lord's ſupper, or elſe under the name of breaking bread was ſignified and meant the receiving of the ſacrament, both of the body and blood of Chriſt, according to his inſtitution. So after much communication of that matter, Mr. Sherburn ſaid, It was great pity that I being a well-favoured young man, and one that might have good living, and do good, would ſo fooliſhly caſt myſelf away, ſticking ſo hard to ſuch fooliſh opinions.

I anſwered as I had done before to my lord and to his council, that my life, mother, children, brethren, ſiſters, and friends, with other delights of life, were as dear and ſweet unto me as unto any other man, and that I would be as loth to loſe them as another would, if I might hold them with a good conſcience, and without the ignominy of Chriſt; and ſeeing I could not do that, my truſt was, that God would ſtrengthen me with his Holy Spirit to loſe them all for his ſake: for I take myſelf, ſaid I, for a ſheep appointed to be ſlain, patiently to ſuffer what croſs ſoever it ſhall pleaſe my merciful Father to lay on me. And ſo after I had deſired them, that if I were committed to priſon, my friends might be ſuffered to relieve me, they departed.

Mr. More after this brought me a book of one Alphonſus a Spaniſh fryar, of all hereſies wherewith the church of Rome, which he called Chriſt's true church, had been troubled ſince Chriſt's time, willing me to read and take counſel of that book; and appointed me a place where this author did write againſt them that ſay, the lay-people ought to receive under both kinds.

This author I perceived did vehemently write againſt Luther, Melancthon, Pelican, and other Germans of this our time, in all points defending the blaſphemous abuſes and enormities of the Romiſh church, condemning as deteſtable hereſies whatſoever was written, taught, or believed contrary to the ſame, uſing for his ſtrongeſt and ſureſt arguments, the conſent, agreement, and determination or the Romiſh church. After a few days Mr. More came to me again, aſking me how I liked the book. I ſaid, the author of the book did in all points, being a papiſt, allow the rites and abuſes of the Romiſh church; and ſhewed him further, that this author without authority, and contrary both to the ſcriptures and old doctors, did condemn for hereſy the lay-people receiving of this ſacrament under both kinds, whereas this author witneſſeth his own ſelf, Chriſt's church 900 years after Chriſt uſed the contrary.

In concluſion he rebuked me, ſaying I was unlearned, and erred from the catholic faith; ſtubborn, and ſtood altogether in mine own conceit. I anſwered, For my learning, I acknowledge myſelf to know nothing but Jeſus Chriſt, even him that was crucified; and that my faith was grounded upon God's holy word only, and ſuch as, I doubted not, pleaſed God, and as I would ſtand in until the laſt day, God aſſiſting me: and that I did not ſay or do any thing either of ſtubbornneſs, ſelf-wilfulneſs, vain-glory, or any other worldly purpoſe, but with good conſcience, and in the fear of God: and deſired him to ſpeak to my lord and his council, that I might find ſome gentleneſs and mercy at their hands. He made me ſhort anſwer. Then I ſaid, I commit my cauſe unto God, who hath numbered the hairs of my head, and appointed the days of my life, ſaying; I am ſure God, which is a righteous judge, would make inquiſition for my blood, according as he hath promiſed. Then he took his book from me and departed.

I continued ſtill in ward until Low Sunday, and after dinner my keeper Richard Scot came to me in my chamber, and told me that two young men were come to carry me to Lancaſter, and he delivered me unto them, a great company both of my lord's ſervants and others accompanying and bringing me on the way, unto Richard Adderton's, and ſomewhat further, counſelling and perſuading like as is aforeſaid.

To whom I made plain anſwer, that in matters of faith I would give place to no earthly creature. So they comforted me, and ſaid that they were ſorry for me, ſaying; If I knew mine opinion to be good, I did well, and ſo they departed, willing my bringers to treat me kindly.

My bringers by the way ſhewed me they were ordered and adviſed to bind me, and that they deſired firſt to ſee me: and after they had looked on me ſitting at dinner, they anſwered they would take charge of me being looſe, for they ſaid I ſeemed to be an honeſt man.

The firſt night we were at Broughton, and the ſecond day we came to Lancaſter betimes in the afternoon, and they kept me all night with them of their gentleneſs, and in the morning delivered me to the jaylor, who brought me into the higheſt priſon, where I do remain.

After that, the ſaid George came to Lancaſter caſtle, and there, being brought with other priſoners unto the ſeſſions, was made to hold up his hand with the malefactors. The earl of Derby had this communication with him as here followeth.

Communication between George Maſh, and the Earl of Derby.

I Said unto my lord, I had not dwelled in the country theſe three or four years paſt, and came home but lately to viſit my mother, children, and others of my friends, and to have departed out of the country before Eaſter then next, and to have gone out of the realm. Wherefore I truſted, ſeeing nothing could be laid againſt me, wherein I had offended againſt the laws of this realm, his lordſhip would not with captious queſtions examine me, to bring my body into danger of death, to the great diſcomfort of my mother, but ſuffer me to avoid peaceably, ſeeing I might have fled out of the country, and yet of mine own will came to his lordſhip.

He ſaid to his council, he had heard tell of me above at London: and intended to make ſearch for me, and take me either in Lancaſhire or above at London, and aſked me into what land I would have gone.

I anſwered, I would have gone either into Almain, or elſe into Denmark. He ſaid to his council, In Denmark they uſed ſuch hereſy as they have done in England; but as for Almain, he ſaid the Emperor had deſtroyed them.

So after ſuch like words, I ſaid unto him, my truſt was, that his lordſhip being of the honourable council of the late king Edward, conſenting and agreeing to acts concerning faith toward God and religion, under great pain, would not ſo ſoon after conſent to put poor men to ſhameful death, as he had threatened me for embracing the ſame with ſo good a conſcience.

He anſwered, that he, with the lord Windſor and lord Dacres, with one more whoſe name I have forgotten, did not conſent to thoſe acts, and that the names of them four would be to be ſeen, as long as the parliament houſe ſtood. Then my lord did rehearſe the evil luck of the dukes of Northumberland and Suffolk, with others, becauſe they favoured not the true religion; and again the good hap and proſperity of the queen's highneſs, becauſe ſhe favoured the true religion, thereby gathering the one to be good, and of God; and the other to be wicked, and of the devil; and ſaid that the duke of Northumberland confeſſed ſo plainly.

George Marſh to the Reader.

FOraſmuch as not only when I was at Lathum, but alſo ſince I departed thence, I hear that there be divers and ſundry reports and opinions of the cauſe of mine impriſonment, as well at Lathum as at Lancaſter (as I am informed by credible perſons), ſome ſaying it was only becauſe I would not do open penance; and ſome becauſe I could not agree with my lord and his council concerning the ſacrament of Chriſt's body and blood, and the manner of Chriſt's preſence there; ſome becauſe I would not grant it ſufficient, and according to Chriſt's inſtitution, the lay-people to receive the ſaid ſacrament under one kind only: I thought it good, dearly beloved in Chriſt, and my bounden duty, to certify you by mine own hand-writing, of mine examination and handling at Lathum, and to tell you the truth as near as I could, to quiet your mind in this behalf; and therefore I have here written with mine own hand the certainty of thoſe things, as near as I could, here above expreſſed, not omitting any thing at all concerning religion, whereof they did examine me: howbeit I perceive in ſome things I keep not the ſame order in writing that thing which was aſked by them, and anſwered by me before or after, as it was in very deed in all points, ſaving this, telling the truth as near as I can, deſiring you to accept in good worth this my good will, and to pray for me and all them that be in bonds, that God would aſſiſt us with his Holy Spirit; and that we may with boldneſs confeſs his holy name; and that Chriſt may be magnified in our bodies, that we may ſtand full and perfect in all the will of God; to whom be all honour and glory world without end, Amen.

And thus you have heard all the whole trouble which George Marſh ſuſtained both at Lathum, and alſo at Lancaſter, teſtified and written with his own hand, whereto he addeth moreover, and ſaith:

While I was, ſaith he, in ward at Lathum, divers at ſundry times came to me. Some ſaid unto me that all my fellows had recanted, and were gone home, whereas indeed that was not ſo; for I ſaw ſeveral of them divers times after. Others ſaid, that it was reported amongſt my lord's houſhold, that I had conſented and agreed in all things with my lord and his council.

While I was at Lancaſter, at this ſeſſion many came to talk with me: ſome out of good will, but without knowledge, gave me ſuch like counſel as Peter gave Chriſt as he went up to Jeruſalem, when he took him aſide and began to rebuke him, ſaying; Maſter, favour thyſelf, this thing ſhall not be unto thee. But I anſwered with Chriſt's ſharp anſwer unto Peter again; who turned about, and ſaid unto Peter, Come after me, Satan: and perceiving that they were an hindrance unto me, and that they favoured not the things which are of God, but the things that are of men, I made them a plain anſwer, that I neither could nor would follow their counſel, but that by God's grace I would both live and die with a pure conſcience, and according as hitherto I had believed and profeſſed. For we ought in no wiſe to flatter and bear with them, though they love us never ſo well, who go about to pluck us away from the obedience that we owe unto God and to his word, but after Chriſt's example ſharply to rebuke them for their counſel.

Some others, yea even ſtrangers alſo came to me far unlike unto theſe, who after ſober communication had, conſented with me in all things, lamenting much my troublous eſtate, giving me comfortable words, and ſome money too, and reſorted to me oftentimes, for the ſpace of two, three, or four days. There came alſo many prieſts to me, by two, three, four, five, or ſix at once, whoſe mouths it was a thing eaſy enough to ſtop; for the prieſts (which is much to be lamented) be not always the greateſt ſcholars, and beſt learned in the law of God. At their departing they either conſented with me, or elſe had nothing to ſay againſt me, ſaying they could find no fault with my words. My communication with them was about the ſacrament. There came alſo into the priſon to me Mr. Weſtby, Mr. Aſhton of Hill, Mr. Aſhton of Chaterton, and many more, both gentlemen and others, to my great comfort. Unto whom I had good occaſion to utter a great part of my conſcience; for God ſo ſtrengthened me with his Spirit of boldneſs, according to my humble requeſt and prayer before (everlaſting thanks be given him therefore) that I was nothing afraid to ſpeak to any that came to me, no not even to the judges themſelves, before whom I was thrice arraigned at the bar, among the thieves, with irons on my feet, and put up my hand as others did; but yet with boldneſs I ſpake unto them ſo long as they would ſuffer me.

They alſo ſent for me the fourth time into their chamber, where amongſt other things they laid it ſtraitly to my charge, that I had reported, that I knew a great many good gentlemen in Lancaſhire of mine opinions, and ſtraitly charged me, upon pain of allegiance to the queen's grace, to ſhew who they were. But I denied that I had ſpoken any ſuch thing (as it was indeed a falſe forged lye of ſome wicked wretches). After that, they threatened and rebuked me, for my preaching to the people out of the priſon, as they called it, and for my praying and reading ſo loud, that the people in the ſtreets might hear. The truth is, I and my fellow-priſoner Warburton, every day on our knees, did read morning and evening prayer, with the Engliſh Litany every day twice, both before noon and after, with ſome other prayers, and alſo read every day certain chapters of the Bible, commonly towards night: and we read alſo theſe things with ſo high and loud a voice, that the people without in the ſtreets might hear us, and would oftentimes, namely in the evenings, come and ſit down in our ſight under the windows and hear us read, wherewith others being offended, complained.

All this while George Marſh was not yet brought before the biſhop, whoſe name was Dr. Cotes, placed the ſame time in the biſhoprick of Cheſter. Of whoſe coming then into Lancaſter, the ſaid George Marſh reporteth himſelf as followeth.

The biſhop being at Lancaſter, there ſet up and confirmed all blaſphemous idolatry, as holy-water caſting, proceſſion, gadding, mattins mumbling, children confirming, maſs hearing, idols up-ſetting, with ſuch heathenish rites forbidden by God; but no goſpel-preaching, which Chriſt, God's Son, ſo earneſtly commanded. He was informed of me, and willed to ſend for me and examine me. Which thing he refuſed to do, ſaying he would have nothing to do with heretics ſo haſtily. So haſty in judgment, and calling men heretics, are our biſhops in their lordly dignities, before they hear or ſee what is to be amended or condemned, contrary to the expreſs commandment of God's word, which ſaith, "Condemn no man before thou haſt tried out the truth of the matter; and when thou haſt made inquiſition, then reform righteouſly. Give no ſentence before thou haſt heard the cauſe, but firſt let men tell out their tale: and he that giveth ſentence in a matter before he hear it, is a fool, and worthy to be confounded."

And inſtead of his liberality towards me poor priſoner, he ſent for the jaylor, and rebuked him becauſe he ſuffered me to fare ſo well, ordering him to have me more ſtrictly kept and dieted: but if his lordſhip were tabled but one week with me, I do think he would judge our fare but ſlender enough.

Alſo he, and his chaplains and chancellor, did find fault with the ſchoolmaſter and others, for ſpeaking to me as to a moſt heinous heretic, and alſo with the jaylor for ſuffering them. Such is the mercy that thoſe religious fathers ſhew to the friendleſs and comfortleſs in their adverſities. If we may know the tree by the fruits, as Chriſt ſaith, no man can judge ſuch for any other, but for enemies to Chriſt and his true religion. God lay it never to their charge, but forgive them, and turn their hard hearts, if it be his will.

But it is no new thing for the biſhops to perſecute the truth, and the prophets of the Lord, for their conſtancy in preaching of the true faith; for ſo did their phariſaical forefathers, if ye mark well the hiſtories of the holy Bible. Paſhur was the head biſhop of the temple, the ring-leader of falſe prophets, the chief heretic taker, that is as much as to ſay, the out-thruſter of true piety. After that the dignity of prieſthood was given unto him, he abuſed it; for he taught not, neither reproved by the word, but affrighted the godly with cruelty. He not only ſtruck, but alſo impriſoned the holy prophet Jeremy, though he withſtood him not, but preſently looked for the help of God, ſtedfaſtly preaching the truth of God.

What miſchief the ungracious biſhop Jaſon wrought among the Jews, deſtroying all piety, and ſetting up abominable idolatrous laws, ye may read in the fourth chapter of the ſecond of Maccabees. How the execrable and blind biſhops, Annas and Caiaphas, which never ſpake the truth of God themſelves, unleſs it were againſt their wills, unwittingly to their utter deſtruction, how, I ſay, they oppreſſed the truth in Chriſt and his apoſtles, is ſo well known that I need not to rehearſe it.

And thus much hitherto concerning the impriſonment of George Marſh, and his examinations before the earl of Derby and his deputies above-named. Now proceeding further in the troubleſome perſecution of this good man, let us likewiſe conſider the latter part of his troubles and examinations which followed under the biſhop of the ſame dioceſe, which was Dr. Cotes; the effect whereof being drawn out of his own writing, here briefly followeth.

The Examination of George Marſh by Dr. Cotes Biſhop of Cheſter.

YE heard before how George Marſh being firſt impriſoned at Lathum, and afterward tranſlated unto Lancaſter, was troubled by the earl. Again, within few days after, the ſaid Marſh was removed from Lancaſter, and coming to Cheſter, was ſent for by Dr. Cotes then biſhop, to appear before him in his hall, no body elſe being preſent; and then he aſked him certain queſtions concerning the ſacrament: who made ſuch anſwers as the biſhop ſeemed therewith to be content, ſaving that he utterly denied tranſubſtantiation, and allowed not the abuſe of the maſs, nor that the lay-people ſhould receive under one kind only, contrary to Chriſt's inſtitution; in which point the biſhop went about to perſuade him: howbeit (God be thanked) all in vain. Much other talk he had with him, to move him to ſubmit himſelf to the univerſal church of Rome; and when he ſaw he could not prevail, he ſent him to priſon again: and after being there, came to him divers times one Maſſy, a fatherly old man, one Wrench the ſchoolmaſter, one Henſham the biſhop's chaplain, and the archdeacon, with many more; who with all probability of words and philoſophy, or worldly wiſdom and deceitful vanity, after the tradition of men, and the beggarly ordinances and laws of the world, but not after Chriſt, went about to perſuade him to ſubmit himſelf to the church of Rome, and to acknowledge the pope to be head thereof, and to interpret the ſcriptures no otherwiſe than that church did; with many ſuch like arguments and perſuaſions of fleſhly wiſdom.

To whom the ſaid George Marſh anſwered, that he did acknowledge and believe (though much evil be withal annexed) one holy catholic and apoſtolic church, without which there is no ſalvation, and that this church is but one, becauſe it ever hath, doth, and ſhall confeſs and believe one only God, and him only worſhip, and one only Meſſiah, and in him only truſt for ſalvation: which church alſo is ruled and led by one Spirit, one word, and one faith, and that this church is univerſal and catholic, becauſe it ever hath been ſince the world's beginning, is, and ſhall endure to the world's end, and comprehending within it all nations, kindreds, and languages, degrees, ſtates, and conditions of men; and that this church is built only upon the foundation of the prophets and apoſtles, Jeſus Chriſt himſelf being the head corner-ſtone, and not upon the Romiſh laws and decrees, the biſhop of Rome being the ſupreme head.

And where they ſaid, the church did ſtand in ordinary ſucceſſion of biſhops, being ruled by general councils, holy fathers, and the laws of holy church, and ſo had continued by the ſpace of fifteen hundred years and more; he made anſwer, that the holy church, which is the body of Chriſt, and therefore moſt worthy to be called holy, was before any ſucceſſion of biſhops, general councils, or Romiſh decrees: neither yet was bound to any time or place, ordinary ſucceſſion, general councils, or traditions of fathers, neither had any ſupremacy over empires and kingdoms: but that it was a poor ſilly flock, diſperſed and ſcattered abroad, as ſheep without a ſhepherd in the midſt of wolves, or as a flock of orphans and fatherleſs children; and that this church was led and ruled by the only laws, councils, and word of Chriſt, he being the ſupreme head of this church, and aſſiſting, ſuccouring, and defending her from all aſſaults, errors, troubles, and perſecutions, wherewith ſhe is ever compaſſed about.

He ſhewed and proved unto them alſo by the flood of Noah, the deſtruction of Sodom, the Iſraelites departing out of Egypt; by the parables of the ſower, of the king's ſon's marriage, of the great ſupper, and by other plain ſentences of ſcripture, that this church was of no eſtimation, and little in compariſon of the church of hypocrites and wicked worldlings.

He was thruſt at with all violence of craft and ſubtilty, but yet the Lord upheld him and delivered him. Everlaſting thanks be to that merciful and faithful Lord, who ſuffereth us not to be tempted above our might, but in the midſt of our troubles ſtrengtheneth us with his moſt holy Spirit of comfort and patience, giveth us a mouth and wiſdom how and what to ſpeak, againſt which all his adverſaries were not able to reſiſt.

Another Appearance of George Marſh.

NOW after that the ſaid biſhop had taken his pleaſure in puniſhing this his priſoner, and often reviling him, giving taunts and odious names of heretic, &c. he cauſed him to be brought forth into a chapel, in the cathedral church of Cheſter, called our Lady-chapel, before him the ſaid biſhop, at two of the clock in the afternoon, who was there placed in a chair for that purpoſe, and Fulk Dutton mayor of the ſaid city, Dr. Wall, and other prieſts aſſiſting him, placed not far from the ſaid biſhop, but ſomewhat lower; George Wenſloe chancellor, and one John Getham regiſter, ſat directly over-againſt the ſaid biſhop.

Then they cauſed the ſaid George Marſh to take an oath upon a book, to anſwer truly unto ſuch articles as ſhould be objected againſt him. Upon which oath taken, the chancellor laid to his charge, that he had preached and openly publiſhed moſt heretically and blaſphemouſly within the pariſh of Deane, Eccles, Bolton, Berry, and many other pariſhes within the biſhop's dioceſe, in the months of January, February, or ſome other time of the year laſt, proceeding directly againſt the pope's authority and and catholic church of Rome, the bleſſed maſs, the ſacrament of the altar, and many other articles. Unto all which in ſum he anſwered, that he neither heretically nor blaſphemouſly preached or ſpake againſt any of the ſaid articles; but ſimply and truly, as occaſion ſerved, and (as it were thereunto forced in conſcience) maintained the truth touching the ſame articles, as he ſaid all you now preſent did acknowledge the ſame in the time of the late king Edward the ſixth.

Then they examined him ſeverally of every article, and bade him anſwer directly yea or nay, without circumſtance; for they were come to examine, and not to diſpute at that preſent.

Then he anſwered them unto every article very modeſtly, according to the doctrine by public authority received and taught in this realm at the death of the ſaid king Edward: whoſe anſwers were every one noted and written by the regiſter to the uttermoſt that could make againſt him, which cannot at this preſent be gotten. After this, the company for that time brake up, and he was returned to priſon again.

The laſt Appearance of George Marſh before the Biſhop.

WIthin three weeks after this, or thereabouts, in the ſaid chapel, and in like manner as before, the ſaid biſhop and others beforenamed being there aſſembled, the ſaid George Marſh was brought by the keeper and others with bills and other weapons before them; where firſt the ſaid chancellor, by way of an oration, declared unto the people preſent the ſaid biſhop's charge and burning charity, who even like as a good ſhepherd doth ſee to his flock, that none of his ſheep have the ſcab or other diſeaſe for infecting other clean ſheep, but will ſave and cure the ſaid ſcabbed ſheep; ſo his lordſhip had ſent for the ſaid George Marſh there preſent, as a ſcabbed ſheep, and had weeded him out for corrupting others, and had done what he could in ſhewing his charitable diſpoſition toward the ſaid Marſh, to reduce him from his naughty hereſies; but all that he could do would not help: ſo that he was now determined, if the ſaid Marſh would not relent and abjure, to pronounce and give ſentence definitive againſt him. Wherefore he bade the ſaid George Marſh to be well adviſed what he would do, for it ſtood upon his life: and if he would not at that preſent forſake his heretical opinions, it would be (after the ſentence given) too late, though he would never ſo gladly deſire it.

Then the ſaid chancellor firſt aſked him, whether he were not of the biſhop's dioceſe? To which he anſwered, that he knew not how large his dioceſe was, for his continuance was at Cambridge. But then they replied and aſked, whether he had not lately been at Deane pariſh in Lancaſhire, and there abode? He anſwered, yea.

Then the chancellor read all his former anſwers that he made in that place at his former examination, and at every one he aſked him, whether he would ſtick to the ſame or no? To which he anſwered again, Yea, yea.

How ſay ye then to this, quoth the chancellor? In your laſt examination, amongſt many other damnable and ſchiſmatical hereſies, you ſaid, That the church and doctrine taught and ſet forth in king Edward's time, was the true church, and the doctrine of the true church, and that the church of Rome is not the true and catholic church.

I ſo ſaid indeed, quoth Marſh, and I believe it to be true. Here alſo others took occaſion to aſk him (for that he denied the biſhop of Rome's authority in England) whether Linus, Anacletus, and Clement, that were biſhops of Rome, were not good men, and he anſwered yes, and divers others; but, ſaid he, they claimed no more authority in England, than the biſhop of Canterbury doth at Rome; and I ſtrive not, quoth he, with the place, neither ſpeak I againſt the perſon of the biſhop, but againſt his doctrine, which in moſt points is repugnant to the doctrine of Chriſt.

Thou art an arrogant fellow indeed then, ſaid the biſhop. In what article is the doctrine of the church of Rome repugnant to the doctrine of Chriſt?

To whom George Marſh anſwered and ſaid, Oh my lord, I pray you judge not ſo of me: I ſtand now upon the point of my life and death; and a man in my caſe hath no cauſe to be arrogant, neither am I, God is my record. And as concerning the diſagreement of the doctrine, among many other things, the church of Rome erreth in the ſacrament. For where Chriſt in the inſtitution thereof did as well deliver the cup, as the bread, ſaying, "Drink ye all of this;" and St. Mark reporteth, that they did drink of it: in like manner St. Paul delivered it unto the Corinthians. And in the ſame ſort alſo it was uſed in the primitive church for the ſpace of many hundred years. Now the church of Rome doth take away one part of the ſacrament from the laity. Wherefore if I could be perſuaded in my conſcience by God's word that it were well done, I could gladly yield in this point.

Then ſaid the biſhop, There is no diſputing with an heretic. And therefore when all his anſwers were read, he aſked him whether he would ſtand to the ſame; being as they were, ſaid he, full of hereſy, or elſe forſake them, and come unto the catholic church.

To whom he made this full anſwer, and ſaid, That he held no heretical opinion, but utterly abhorred all kind of hereſy, although they moſt untruly ſo did ſlander him. And he deſired all the people there to bear him witneſs (if any hereafter ſhould ſlander him, and ſay that he held any grievous hereſy), that in all articles of religion he held no other opinion than was by law eſtabliſhed, and publicly taught in England at the death of king Edward the ſixth, and in the ſame pure religion and doctrine he would, by God's grace, ſtand, live and die. And here the chancellor ſpake to one Leach, who ſtood near to Marſh, and bade him ſtand farther from him; for his preſence did him no good.

This being done, the biſhop took a writing out of his boſom, and began to read the ſentence of condemnation: but when the biſhop had read almoſt half thereof, the chancellor called him, and ſaid, Good my lord, ſtay, ſtay: for if ye proceed any farther, it will be too late to call it again; and ſo the biſhop ſtayed. Then his popiſh prieſts, and many other of the ignorant people, called upon Marſh, with many earneſt words, to recant, and amongſt others one Pulleyn a ſhoe-maker ſaid to him, For ſhame, man, remember thyſelf, and recant. They bade him kneel down and pray, and they would pray for him: So they kneeled down, and he deſired them to pray for him, and he would pray for them.

The biſhop then aſked him again, whether he would not have the queen's mercy in time; and he anſwered, he did gladly deſire the ſame, and did love her grace as faithfully as any of them; but yet he durſt not deny his Saviour Chriſt, for loſing his mercy everlaſtingly, and ſo win everlaſting death.

Then the biſhop put his ſpectacles again upon his noſe, and read forward his ſentence about five or ſix lines, and there again the chancellor, with flattering words and ſmiling countenance, called to the biſhop, and ſaid, Yet, good my lord, once again ſtay, for if that word be ſpoken all is paſt, no relenting will then ſerve: and the biſhop (pulling off his ſpectacles) ſaid, I would ſtay, if it would be.

How ſay'ſt thou, quoth he, wilt thou recant? Many of the prieſts and ignorant people bade him do ſo, and call to God for grace; and pulled him by the ſleeve, and bade him recant and ſave his life. To whom he anſwered, I would would as fain live as you, if in ſo doing I ſhould not deny my maſter Chriſt, and again he ſhould deny me before his Father in heaven.

Then the biſhop read out his ſentence unto the end, and afterwards ſaid unto him, Now will I no more pray for thee, than I will for a dog. And Marſh anſwered, That notwithſtanding he would pray for his lordſhip: and after this the biſhop delivered him unto the ſheriffs of the city. Then his late keeper bade him farewel good George, with weeping tears, which cauſed the officers to carry him to a priſon at the north-gate, where he was very ſtrictly kept until the time he went to his death, during which time he had ſmall comfort or relief of any worldly creature.

For being in the dungeon or dark priſon, none that would do him good could ſpeak with him, or at leaſt durſt enterprize ſo to do for fear of accuſation: and ſome of the citizens which loved him, for the goſpel's ſake (whereof there were but a few), although they were never acquainted with him, would ſometime in the evening at a hole upon the wall of the city (that went into the ſaid dark priſon), call to him, and aſk him how he did. He would anſwer them moſt chearfully, that he did well, and thanked God moſt highly, that he would vouchſafe of his mercy to appoint him to be a witneſs of his truth, and to ſuffer for the ſame, wherein he did moſt rejoice; beſeeching him that he would give him grace not to faint under the croſs, but patiently bear the ſame to his glory and comfort of his church: with many other ſuch like ſayings at ſundry times, as one that moſt deſired to be with Chriſt. Once or twice he had money caſt him in at the ſame hole, about ten-pence at one time, and two ſhillings at another time: for which he gave God thanks, and uſed the ſame to his neceſſity.

When the time and day appointed came that he ſhould ſuffer, the ſheriffs of the city, whoſe names were Amry and Couper. with their officers, and a great number of poor ſimple barbers with ruſty bills and poll-axes, went to the north gate, and there took out the ſaid George Marſh, who came with them moſt humbly and meekly, with a lock upon his feet. And as he came upon the way towards the place of execution, ſome folks proffered him money, and looked that he ſhould have gone with a little purſe in his hand (as the manner of felons was accuſtomed in that city in times paſt, at their going to execution), to the end to gather money to give unto a prieſt to ſay maſſes for them after their death, whereby they might, as they thought, be ſaved: but Marſh ſaid, he would not as then be troubled to receive money, but deſired ſome good man to take the money, if the people were diſpoſed to give any, and to give it unto the priſoners or poor people. So he went all the way unto his death with his book in his hand, looking upon the ſame; and many of the people ſaid, This man goeth not unto his death as a thief, or as one that deſerveth to die.

Now when he came to the place of execution without the city, near unto Spittle-Boughton, one Cawdrey being then a deputy chamberlain of Cheſter, ſhewed Marſh a writing under a great ſeal, ſaying, That it was a pardon for him if he would recant. Whereat Marſh anſwered, That he would gladly accept the ſame (and ſaid further, that he loved the queen), but foraſmuch as it tended to pluck him from God, he would not receive it upon that condition.

After that, he began to ſpeak to the people, ſhewing the cauſe of his death, and would have exhorted them to ſtick unto Chriſt. Whereupon one of the ſheriffs ſaid: George Marſh, we muſt have no ſermoning now. To whom he ſaid, Maſter, I cry your mercy: and ſo kneeling down made his prayers, and then put off his cloaths unto his ſhirt, and then he was chained to the poſt, having a number of faggots under him, and a thing made like a firkin, with pitch and tar in the ſame over his head; and by reaſon the fire was unſkilfully made, and that the wind did drive the ſame to and fro, he ſuffered great extremity in his death, which notwithſtanding he abode very patiently.

Wherein this in him is to be noted, That when he had been a long time tormented in the fire without moving, having his fleſh ſo broiled and puffed up, that they which ſtood before him underneath could ſee the chain wherewith he was faſtened, and therefore ſuppoſed no leſs but he had been dead, notwithſtanding ſuddenly he ſpread abroad his arms, ſaying, Father of heaven, have mercy upon me, and ſo yielded his ſpirit into the hands of the Lord.

Upon this, many of the people ſaid that he was a martyr, and died marvellous patient. Which cauſed the biſhop ſhortly after to make a ſermon in the cathedral church, and therein affirmed, that the ſaid Marſh was an heretic, and was a fire-brand in hell.

In recompenſe of this his good and charitable ſermon, within ſhort time after, the juſt judgment of God appeared upon the ſaid biſhop, recompencing him in ſuch wiſe, that not long after he turned up his heels and died, Upon what cauſe his death was gendered, I have not here preciſely to pronounce, becauſe the rumor and voice of the people is not always to be followed. Notwithſtanding ſuch a report went in all new mens mouths, that he was burned of an harlot. Wherefore, whether he did ſo or no, I am not certain, neither dare lean too much upon public ſpeech. Albeit this is certain, that when he was afterwards ſearched, being dead, by ſome of his ſecret friends and certain aldermen for ſtopping the rumor of the people, this maidenly prieſt and biſhop was found not to be free from certain appearance, which declared but ſmall virginity in him, and that the rumor was not raiſed up altogether upon nought amongſt the people. But of this I will ſtay, and proceed no further; not becauſe more cannot be ſaid, but becauſe I will not be ſo uncharitable in defacing theſe men, as they are cruel in condemning God's ſervants to death.

George Marſh wrote ſeveral letters in priſon, beſides his examinations, as before you have heard. Touching which his examinations, this letter firſt he ſendeth to his friends, the copy whereof here followeth.

A Letter of Mr. Marſh to his Friends.

HERE you have, dearly beloved friends in Chriſt, the chief and principal articles of chriſtian doctrine briefly touched, which heretofore I have both believed, profeſſed and taught, and as yet do believe, profeſs, and teach, and am ſurely purpoſed by God's grace, to continue in the ſame until the laſt day. I do want both time and opportunity to write out at large the probations, cauſes, parts, effects, and contraries or errors of theſe articles, which whoſo deſireth to know, let them read over the common places of the pious learned men, Philip Melancthon and Eraſmus Sarcerius, whoſe judgment in theſe matters of religion I do chiefly follow and lean unto. The Lord give us underſtanding in all things, and deliver us from this evil world, according to his will and pleaſure, and bring us again out of this hell of affliction, into which it hath pleaſed the merciful Lord to throw us down: and deliver us out of the mouth of the lion, and from all evil doing, and keep us unto his everlaſting and heavenly kingdom. Amen.

Though Satan be ſuffered as wheat to ſift us for a time, yet our faith faileth not through Chriſt's aid, but that we are at all times able and ready to confirm the faith of our weak brethren, "and always ready to give an anſwer to every man that aſketh us a reaſon of the hope that is in us, and that with meekneſs and reverence, having a good conſcience; and whereas they backbite us as evil-doers, they may be aſhamed, foraſmuch as they have falſly accuſed our good converſation in Chriſt." I thought myſelf now of late years, for the cares of this life, well ſettled with my loving and faithful wife and children, and alſo well quieted in the peaceable poſſeſſion of that pleaſant Euphrates, I do confeſs it: but the Lord, who worketh all things for the beſt to them that love him, would not there leave me, but did take my dear and beloved wife from me; whoſe death was a painful croſs to my fleſh.

Alſo I thought myſelf now of late well placed under my moſt loving and moſt gentle Mr. Laurence Saunders, in the cure of Langhton. But the Lord of his great mercy would not ſuffer me long there to continue (although for the ſmall time I was in his vineyard, I was not an idle workman). But he hath provided me, I perceive it, to taſte of a far other cup; for by violence hath he yet once again driven me out of that glorious Babylon, that I ſhould not taſte too much of her wanton pleaſures, but with his moſt dearly beloved diſciples to have my inward rejoicing in the croſs of his Son Jeſus Chriſt: the glory of whoſe church, I ſee it well, ſtandeth not in the harmonious ſound of bells and organs, nor yet in the gliſtering of mitres and copes, neither in the ſhining of gilt images and lights (as the blind papiſts do judge it), but in continual labours and daily afflictions for his name's ſake.

God at this preſent here in England hath his fan in his hand, and after his great harveſt, whereinto theſe years paſt he hath ſent his labourers, is now ſifting the corn from the chaff and purging his floor, and ready to gather the wheat into his garner, and burn up the chaff with unquenchable fire.

Take heed and beware of the leaven of the ſcribes and of the ſadducees; I mean the erroneous doctrine of the papiſts, which with their gloſſes deprave the ſcriptures. For as the apoſtle St. Peter doth teach us, "There ſhall be falſe teachers amongſt us, which privily ſhall bring in damnable ſects: And ſaith, that many ſhall follow their damnable ways, by whom the way of truth ſhall be evil ſpoken of, and that through covetouſneſs they ſhall with fained words make merchandize of us;" and Chriſt earneſtly warneth us, to "beware of falſe prophets, which come to us in ſheep's cloathing, but inwardly they are ravening wolves. By their fruits you ſhall know them." The fruits of the prophets are their doctrine. In this place are we chriſtians taught, that we ſhould try the preachers, and others that come under a colour to ſet f rth true religion unto us, according to the ſaying of St. Paul, "Try all things, and chuſe that which is good." Alſo the evangeliſt St. John ſaith, "Believe not every ſpirit, but prove the ſpirits whether they be of God or not; for many falſe prophets, ſaith he, are gone out into the world." Therefore if thou wilt know the true prophets from the falſe, try their doctrine by the true touchſtone, which is the word of God: and as the pious Bereans did, "Search ye the ſcriptures, whether thoſe things which be preached unto you be even ſo or not; or elſe by the outward converſation of them ye may eaſily be deceived." Deſunt fortaſſis aliqua.

A Letter of Exhortation from George Marſh to the faithful Profeſſors of Langhton.

GRACE be unto you, and peace be multiplied in the knowledge of Jeſus Chriſt our Lord, Amen.

I thought it my duty to write unto you, my beloved in the Lord at Langhton, to ſtir up your minds, and to call to your remembrance the words which have been told you before, and to exhort you (as that good man, and full of the Holy Ghoſt, Barnabas did the Antiochians), that with purpoſe of heart ye continually cleave unto the Lord, and that ye ſtand faſt, and be not moved away from the hope of the goſpel, whereof, God be thanked, ye have had plenteous preaching unto you by your late paſtor Mr. Saunders, and other faithful miniſters of Jeſus Chriſt, which now, when perſecution ariſeth becauſe of the word, do not fall away like ſhrinking children, and forſake the truth, being aſhamed of the goſpel whereof they have been preachers, but are willing and ready for your ſakes (which are Chriſt's myſtical body) to forſake not only the chief and principal delights of this life (I do mean), their native countries, friends, livings, &c. but alſo to fulfil their miniſtry to the utmoſt, that is to wit, with their painful impriſonments and blood-ſheddings, if need ſhall require, to confirm and ſeal Chriſt's goſpel, whereof they have been miniſters; and (as St. Paul ſaith) they are ready not only to be caſt into priſon, but alſo to be killed for the name of the Lord Jeſus.

Whether theſe being that good ſalt of the earth, that is, true miniſters of God's word, by whoſe doctrine, being received through faith, men are made ſavoury unto God, and which themſelves loſe not their ſaltneſs, now when they be proved with the boiſterous ſtorms of adverſity and perſecution; or others being that unſavoury ſalt which hath loſt his ſaltneſs, that is to wit, thoſe ungodly miniſters, which do fall from the word of God into the dreams and traditions of Antichriſt: whether of theſe, I ſay, be more to be credited and believed, let all men judge.

Wherefore, my dearly beloved, receive the word of God with meekneſs, that is grafted in you, which is able to ſave your ſouls: and ſee that ye be not forgetful hearers, deceiving yourſelves with ſophiſtry, but doers of the word; whom Chriſt doth liken to a wiſe man, which buildeth his houſe on a rock, that when the great rain deſcended, and the floods came and beat upon the houſe, it fell not, becauſe it was grounded upon a rock: that is to wit, that when Satan, with all his legion of devils, with all their ſubtle ſuggeſtions, and the world with all the mighty princes thereof, with their crafty counſels, do furiouſly rage againſt us, we faint not, but abide conſtant in the truth, being grounded upon a moſt ſure rock, which is Chriſt, and the doctrine of the goſpel, againſt which the gates of hell (that is, the power of Satan) cannot prevail.

And be ye followers of Chriſt and his apoſtles, and receive the word in much affliction (as the pious Theſſalonians did): for the true followers of Chriſt and the apoſtles, be they which receive the word of God. They only receive the word of God, which both believe it, and alſo frame their lives after it, and be ready to ſuffer all manner of adverſity for the name of the Lord, as Chriſt and all the apoſtles did, and as all that will live godly in Chriſt Jeſus muſt do: for there is none other way into the kingdom of heaven, but through much tribulation. And if we ſuffer any thing for the kingdom of heaven's ſake, and for righteouſneſs ſake, we have the prophets, Chriſt, the apoſtles, and martyrs for an enſample to comfort us: for they did all enter into the kingdom of heaven at the ſtrait gate and narrow way that leadeth unto life, which few do find. And unleſs we will be content to deny our ownſelves, and take up the croſs of Chriſt, and his ſaints, it is an evident argument that we ſhall never reign with him.

And again, if we can find in our hearts patiently to ſuffer perſecutions and tribulations, it is a ſure token of the righteous judgment of God, that we are counted worthy of the kingdom of God, for which we alſo ſuffer. "It is verily (ſaith the apoſtle) a righteous thing with God, to recompence tribulation to them that trouble us, and reſt to us that be troubled;" for after this life, the godly being delivered from their tribulations and pains, ſhall have a moſt quiet and joyful reſt: whereas the wicked and ungodly contrariwiſe ſhall be tormented for evermore with intolerable and unſpeakable pains, as Chriſt, by the parable of the rich glutton and wretched Lazarus, doth plainly declare and teach. Theſe ought we to have before our eyes always, that in the time of adverſity and perſecution (whereof all that will be the children of God ſhall be partakers, and wherewith it hath pleaſed God to put ſome of us in already) we may ſtand ſtedfaſt in the Lord, and endure even unto the end, that we may be ſaved. For unleſs we, like good warriors of Jeſus Chriſt, will endeavour ourſelves to pleaſe him, who hath choſen us to be ſoldiers, and fight the good fight of faith even unto the end, we ſhall not obtain that crown of righteouſneſs, which the Lord, that is a righteous judge, ſhall give to all them that love his coming.

Let us therefore receive with meekneſs the word that is grafted in us, which is able to ſave our ſouls, and ground ourſelves on the ſure rock Chriſt. "For (as the apoſtle ſaith) other foundation can no man lay, beſides that which is laid already, which is Jeſus Chriſt." If any man build on this foundation, gold, ſilver, precious ſtones, timber, hay, ſtubble, every man's work ſhall appear, for the day ſhall declare it, and it ſhall be ſhewed in the fire. And the fire ſhall try every man's work what it is. If any man's work that he hath builded upon, abide, he ſhall receive a reward: if any man's work burn, he ſhall ſuffer loſs; but he ſhall be ſaved himſelf, nevertheleſs yet as it were through fire."

By fire here doth the apoſtle underſtand perſecution and trouble; for they which do truly preach and profeſs the word of God, which is called the word of the croſs, ſhall be railed upon and abhorred, hated, thruſt out of company, perſecuted and tried in the furnace of adverſity, as gold and ſilver are tried in the fire.

By gold, ſilver, and precious ſtones, he underſtandeth them that in the midſt of perſecution abide ſtedfaſt in the word. By timber, hay, and ſtubble, are meant ſuch, as in time of perſecution do fall away from the truth. And when Chriſt doth purge his floor with the wind of adverſity, theſe ſcatter away from the face of the earth like light chaff which ſhall be burned with unquenchable fire. If they then which do believe, do in the time of perſecution ſtand ſtedfaſtly in the truth, the builder (I do mean the preacher of the word) ſhall receive a reward, and the work ſhall be preſerved and ſaved: but if ſo be that they go back and ſwerve, when perſecution ariſeth, the builder ſhall ſuffer loſs, that is to ſay, ſhall loſe his labour and coſt, but yet he ſhall be ſaved, if he, being tried in the fire of perſecution, do abide faſt in the faith.

Wherefore, my beloved, give diligent heed, that ye as living ſtones be built upon this ſure rock, and be made a ſpiritual houſe, and a holy prieſthood to offer up ſpiritual ſacrifices, acceptable unto God by Jeſus Chriſt. For we are the true temple of God, and the Spirit of God dwelleth in us, if ſo be that we continue in the doctrine of the goſpel. We are alſo an holy and royal prieſthood, to offer up ſpiritual ſacrifices and oblations; for the ſacrifices of the New Teſtament are ſpiritual and of three manners.

The firſt is the ſacrifice of praiſe and thankſgiving, which St. Paul doth call the fruits of thoſe lips which confeſs the name of God.

The ſecond is mercy towards our neighbours, as the prophet Hoſea ſaith, "I will have mercy and not ſacrifice." Read the 25th of St. Matthew.

The third is when we make our body a quick ſacrifice holy and acceptable unto God, that is, when we mortify, and kill our fleſhly concupiſcences and carnal luſts, and ſo bring our fleſh, through the help of the Spirit, under the obedience of God's holy law. This is a ſacrifice to God moſt acceptable, which the apoſtle calleth, "Our reaſonable ſerving of God." And let us be ſure, that unleſs we do now at this preſent take better heed to ourſelves, and uſe thankfully the grace of God offered to us by the goſpel preached theſe years paſt, whereby we are induced and brought to the knowledge of the truth; unleſs, I ſay, we keep Chriſt and his holy word dwelling by faith in the houſe and temple of our hearts, the ſame thing that Chriſt threateneth unto the Jews, ſhall happen unto us; that is to wit, the unclean ſpirit of ignorance, ſuperſtition, idolatry, infidelity, and unbelief, the mother and head of all vices, which by the grace of God was caſt out of us, bringing with him ſeven other ſpirits worſe than himſelf, ſhall to our utter deſtruction return again unto us; and ſo ſhall we be in worſe caſe than ever we were before. "For if we, after we have eſcaped from the filthineſs of the world, through the knowledge of the Lord and Saviour Jeſus Chriſt, be yet tangled therein again and overcome, then is the latter end worſe than the beginning: and it had been better for us not to have known the way of righteouſneſs, than after we have known it, to turn from the holy commandment given unto us."

For it is then happened unto us according to the true proverb, "The dog is turned to his vomit again, and the ſow that was waſhed to wallowing in the mire." And thus to continue and perſevere in infidelity, and to kick againſt the manifeſt and knowing truth, and ſo to die without repentance, and with a deſpair of the mercy of God in Jeſus Chriſt, is to ſin againſt the Holy Ghoſt, which ſhall not be forgiven, neither in this world, neither in the world to come. "For it is not poſſible (ſaith St. Paul) that they which were once enlightened, and have taſted of the heavenly gift, and have taſted of the good word of God, and of the power of the world to come; if they fall away, ſhould be renewed again by repentance: foraſmuch as they have, as concerning themſelves, crucified the Son of God again, making a mocking of him." St. Paul's meaning in this place is, that they that believe truly and unfeignedly God's word, do continue and abide ſtedfaſt in the known truth.

If any therefore fall away from Chriſt and his word, it is a plain token that they were but diſſembling hypocrites for all their fair faces outwardly, and never believed truly; as Judas, Simon Magus, Demas, Hymeneus, Philetus, and others were, which all fell away from the known verity, and made a mock of Chriſt: which St. Paul doth call here, to crucify Chriſt anew, becauſe that they turning to their old vomit again, did moſt blaſphemouſly tread the benefits of Chriſt's death and paſſion under their feet. They that are ſuch can in no wiſe be renewed by repentance: for their repentance is fleſhly, as the repentance of Cain, Saul, and Judas was, which being without godly comfort, breedeth deſperation unto death. Theſe are not of the number of the elect: and as St. John doth ſay, "They went out from us, but they were not of us: for if they had been of us, they would have remained with us unto the end." Alſo the apoſtle ſaith in another place, "If we ſin willingly after we have received the knowledge of the truth, there remaineth no more ſacrifice for ſin, but a fearful looking for judgment and violent fire, which ſhall devour the adverſaries."

They ſin willingly, which of a ſet malice and purpoſe do with-hold the truth in unrighteouſneſs and lying, kicking againſt the manifeſt and open known truth, which although they do perfectly know that in all the world there is none other ſacrifice for ſin, but only that all-ſufficient ſacrifice of Chriſt's death: yet notwithſtanding they will not commit themſelves wholly unto it, but rather deſpiſe it, allowing other ſacrifices for ſin, invented by the imagination of man (as we ſee by daily experience) unto whom, if they abide ſtill in their wickedneſs and ſin, remaineth a moſt horrible and dreadful judgment. This is that ſin unto death, for which St. John would not that a man ſhould pray.

Wherefore, my beloved in Chriſt, let us, (on whom the ends of the world are come) take diligent heed unto ourſelves, that now in theſe laſt and perilous times (in which the devil is come down, and hath great wrath becauſe he knoweth his time is but ſhort, and whereof the prophets, Chriſt and the apoſtles have ſo much ſpoken, and have given us an earneſt forewarning) we withhold not the truth in unrighteouſneſs, believing, doing, or ſpeaking any thing againſt our knowledge and conſcience, or without faith. For if we ſo do, for whatſoever cauſe it be, it is a wilful and obſtinate infidelity, and a ſin unto death: and as our Saviour Chriſt ſaith, "If ye believe not, ye ſhall die in your own ſins." For unleſs we hold faſt the word of life, both believing it, and alſo bringing forth fruit worthy of repentance, we ſhall with the unprofitable fig-tree, which did but cumber the ground, be cut down, and our talent taken from us, and given unto another that ſhall put it to a better uſe; and we, through our own unthankfulneſs put from the mercy of God, ſhall never be able to pay our debts, that is to ſay, we ſhall altogether be loſt and undone. "For the earth that drinketh in rain that cometh oft upon it, and bringeth forth herbs meet for them that dreſs it, receiveth bleſſing of God: but that ground that beareth thorns and briars, is reproved and is nigh unto curſing, whoſe end is to be burned."

Nevertheleſs, dear friends, we truſt to ſee better of you, and things which accompany ſalvation, and that ye being the good ground, watered with the moiſtneſs of God's word plenteouſly preached among you, will with a good heart hear the word of God and keep it, bringing forth fruit with patience. And be none of thoſe forgetful and hypocritical hearers, which although they hear the word, yet the devil cometh, and catcheth away that which was ſown in their heart; either having no root in themſelves, endure but a ſeaſon, and as ſoon as tribulation or perſecution ariſeth becauſe of the word, by and by they are offended; either with the cares of this world and deceitfulneſs of riches choke the word, and ſo are unfruitful. Read the parable of the ſower, and among other things note and mark, that the moſt part of the hearers of God's word are but hypocrites, and hear the word without any fruit or profit, yea, only to their greater condemnation; for only the fourth part of the ſeed doth bring forth fruit. Therefore let not us that be miniſters, or profeſſors, and followers of God's word, be diſcouraged, though that very few do give credit, and follow the doctrine of the goſpel, and be ſaved.

Whoſoever therefore hath ears to hear, let him hear: for whoſoever hath, to him ſhall be given, and he ſhall have abundance: but whoſoever hath not, from him ſhall be taken away, even that he hath: that is to ſay, they that have a deſire of righteouſneſs, and of the truth, ſhall be more and more illuminated of God: on the contrary part, they that do not covet after righteouſneſs and truth, are more hardened and blinded, though they ſeem unto themſelves moſt wiſe. For God doth here follow an example of a loving father, which when he ſeeth that fatherly love and correction doth not help towards his children, uſeth another way. He ceaſeth to be beneficial unto them, and to miniſter unto them fatherly correction: he giveth them over unto themſelves, ſuffering them to live as they liſt.

But we truſt to ſee better of you, my dearly beloved, and that ye like very Gaderenites, for fear to loſe your worldly ſubſtance or other delights of this life, will not baniſh away Chriſt and his goſpel from among you: but that ye with all diligence of mind will receive the word of God, taught you by ſuch miniſters, as now when perſecution ariſeth becauſe of the word, are not aſhamed of the teſtimony of our Lord Jeſus, but are content to ſuffer adverſity with the goſpel, and therein to ſuffer trouble as evil doers, even unto bonds. And if ye refuſe thus to do, your own blood will be upon your own heads. And as ye have had plenteous preaching of the goſpel, more than others have had: ſo ye ſhall be ſure, if ye repent not and bring forth fruits worthy of repentance, to be ſorer plagued, and to receive greater vengeance at God's hand, than others, and the kingdom of God ſhall be taken from you, and be given to another nation, which will bring forth the fruits thereof.

Wherefore, my dearly beloved in Chriſt, take good heed to yourſelves, and ponder well in your minds, how fearful and horrible a thing it is to fall into the hands of the living God. And ſee that ye receive not the word of God in vain, but continually labour in faith, and declare your faith by your good works, which are infallible witneſſes of the true juſtifying faith, which is never idle, but worketh by charity. And ſee that ye continually give yourſelves unto all manner of good works: amongſt which, the chiefeſt are to be obedient to the magiſtrates (ſince they are the ordinance of God, whether they be good or evil), unleſs they command idolatry and ungodlineſs, that is, things contrary unto true religion. For, then ought we to ſay with Peter, "We ought more to obey God than man." But in any wiſe we muſt beware of tumult, inſurrection, rebellion, or reſiſtance.

The weapon of a chriſtian in this matter, ought to be the ſword of the Spirit, which is God's word and prayer, coupled with humility and due ſubmiſſion, and with readineſs of heart, rather to die than to do any ungodlineſs. Chriſt alſo doth teach us, that all power is of God, yea even the power of the wicked, which God cauſeth oftentimes to reign for our ſins and diſobedience toward him and his word. Whoſoever then doth reſiſt any power, doth reſiſt the ordinance of God, and ſo purchaſe to himſelf utter deſtruction and undoing.

We muſt alſo by all means be promoters of unity, peace, and concord. We muſt honour and reverence princes, and all that be in authority, and pray for them, and be diligent to ſet forth their profit and commodity.

Secondly, We muſt obey our parents, or them that be in their rooms, and be careful for our houſholds, that they be provided for and fed, not only with bodily, but much rather with ſpiritual food, which is the word of God.

Thirdly, We muſt ſerve our neighbours by all means we can, remembering well the ſaying of Chriſt, "Whatſoever ye would that men ſhould do unto you, do ye likewiſe unto them, for this is the law and the prophets."

Fourthly, We muſt diligently exerciſe the neceſſary work of prayer for all eſtates: knowing that God therefore hath ſo much commanded it, and hath made ſo great promiſes unto it, and doth ſo well accept it. After theſe works, we muſt learn to know the croſs, and what affection and mind we muſt bear towards our adverſaries and enemies, whatſoever they be, to ſuffer all adverſities and evils patiently, to pray for them that hurt, perſecute, and trouble us: and by thus uſing ourſelves, we ſhall obtain an hope and certainty of our vocation, that we be the elect children of God.

And thus I commend you, brethren, unto God and to the word of his grace, which is able to build further, and to give you an inheritance among all them which are ſanctified; beſeeching you to help Mr. Saunders and me your late paſtors, and all them that be in bonds for the goſpel's ſake, with your prayers to God for us, that we may be delivered from all them that believe not, and more unreaſonable and froward men, and that this our impriſonment and affliction may be to the glory and profit of our chriſtian brethren in the world, and that Chriſt may be magnified in our bodies, whether it be by death or life. Amen.

Salute from me all the faithful brethren: and becauſe I write not ſeveral letters to them, let them either read or hear theſe my letters. The grace of our Lord be with you all, Amen. The 28th of June, by the unprofitable ſervant of Jeſus Chriſt, and now alſo his priſoner,

George Marſh.

Save yourſelves from this untoward generation. Pray pray, pray: never more need.

Another Letter of George Marſh, to ſome of his Friends at Mancheſter in Lancaſhire.

GRACE be with you, and peace from God the Father, and from our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, Amen. After ſalutations in Chriſt to you, with thanks for your friendly friendly remembrance of me, desiring and wishing unto you, not only in my letters, but also in my daily prayers, such consolation in spirit, and taste of heavenly treasures, that ye may thereby continually work in faith, labour in love, persevere in hope, and be patient in all your tribulations and persecutions, even unto the end and glorious coming of Christ: these shall be earnestly to exhort and beseech you in Christ, as ye have received the Lord Jesus, even so to walk, rooted in him, and not to be afraid of any terror of your adversaries, be they never so many and mighty, and you on the other side never so few and weak: for the battle is the Lord's. And as in times past, God was with Abraham, Moses, Isaac, David, the Maccabees, and others, and fought for them, and delivered all their enemies into their hands, even so hath he promised to be with us also unto the world's end, and so to assist, strengthen, and help us, that no man shall be able to withstand us. "For as I was with Moses, so will I be with thee, saith God, and will never leave thee nor forsake thee. Be strong and bold; neither fear nor dread: for the Lord thy God is with thee, whithersoever thou goest. Now if God be on our side, who can be against us?"

In this our spiritual warfare is no man overcome, unless he traiterously leave and forsake his captain, either cowardly cast away his weapons, or willingly yield himself to his enemies, either fearfully turn his back and fly. Be strong therefore in the Lord, dear brethren, and in the power of his might, and put on all the armour of God, that ye may be able to stand stedfast against the crafty assaults of the devil.

Now what weapons ye must fight withal, learn of St. Paul, a champion both much exercised, and also most valiant and invincible. For we must think none other, but that the life of man is a perpetual warfare upon earth, as the examples of all godly men throughout all ages do declare. The valiant warrior St. Paul being delivered into the hands of the ungodly, and that so many times, and also from so many extreme perils and dangers of death, as he his ownself doth witness, is fain to commit himself in the end to the rough waters of the sea, where he was in great peril and jeopardy of his own life: yet was God always (to the great comfort of all that hear of it) most ready to comfort and succour him, and gloriously delivered him out of all his troubles; so that no man that invaded him, could do him any harm: and in the end he was compelled to say, I have finished my course, the time of my departing is at hand, I long to be loosed, and to be with Christ, which is the best of all, most heartily desiring death.

These things be written for our learning and comfort, and be to us a sure obligation, that if we submit ourselves to God and his holy word, no man shall be able to hurt us, and that he will deliver us from all troubles, yea from death also, until such time as we covet and desire to die. "Let us therefore run with patience unto the battle that is set before us, and look unto Jesus the captain and finisher of our faith, and after his example, for the rewards that is set out unto us, patiently to bear the cross, and despise the shame. For all that will live godly in Christ Jesus, shall suffer persecution."

Christ was no sooner baptized, and declared to the world to be the Son of God, but Satan was by and by ready to tempt him: which thing we must look for also: yea, the more we shall increase in faith and virtuous living, the more strongly will Satan assault us: whom we must learn, after the example of Christ, to fight against, and overcome with the holy and sacred scriptures the word of God (which are our heavenly armour) and sword of the Spirit. And let the fasting of Christ, while he was tempted in the wilderness, be unto us an example of sober living, not for the space of forty days, (as the papists do fondly fansy of their own brains) but as long as we are in the wilderness of this wretched life, assaulted of Satan, who like a roaring lion walketh about, and ceaseth not, seeking our utter destruction.

Neither can the servant of God at any time come and stand before God, that is, lead a godly life, and walk innocently before God, but Satan cometh also among them, that is, he daily accuseth, findeth fault, vexeth, persecuteth, and troubleth the godly: for it is the nature and property of the devil always to hurt, and do mischief, unless he be forbidden of God: for unless God doth permit him, he can do nothing at all, not so much as enter into a filthy hog: but we are of more price than many hogs before God, if we cleave unto his Son by faith.

Let us therefore, knowing Satan's deceits and rancour, walk the more warily, and take unto us the shield of faith, wherewith we may be able to quench and to overcome all the fiery and deadly darts of the wicked. Let us take to us the helmet of salvation, and sword of the Spirit, which is the word of God, and learn to use the same according to the example of our grand captain Christ. Let us fast and pray continually. For this frantic kind of devils goeth not out otherwise, as Christ doth teach us, but by faithful prayer and fasting, which is true abstinence and soberness of living, if we use the same according to the doctrine of the gospel and word of God. Fasting is acceptable to God, if it be done without hypocrisy, that is to say, if we use it to this intent, that thereby this mortal body and disobedient carcase may be tamed and brought under the subjection of the Spirit: and again, if we fast to this intent, that we may spare wherewith to help and succour our poor needy brethren.

This fast do the christians use all the days of their life, although among the common sort of people remaineth yet still that superstitious kind of fasting, which God so earnestly reproveth by his prophet Isaiah. For as for true chastening of the body, and abstaining from vice, with shewing mercy towards our needy neighbours, we will neither understand nor hear of it, but still think with the Jews, that we do God a great pleasure when we fast, and that we then fast, when we abstain from one thing, and fill our bellies with another. And verily in this point doth our superstition much exceed the superstition of the Jews: for we never read that they ever took it for a fast, to abstain from flesh, and to eat either fish or white-meat, as they call it.

To fasting and prayer must be joined alms, and mercy towards the poor and needy: and that our alms may be acceptable unto God, three things are chiefly required.

First, That we give with a chearful and joyful heart; for the Lord loveth a chearful giver.

Secondly, That we give liberally, putting aside all niggardship, knowing that he that soweth little, shall reap little; and he that soweth plenteously, shall reap plenteously. Let every man therefore do according as he is able. The poorest wretch in the world may give as great and acceptable an alms in the sight of God, as the richest man in the world can do. The poor widow that did offer but two mites, which make a farthing, did highly please Christ; insomuch that he himself affirmed, That she of her penury had added more to the offerings of God, than all the rich men, which of their superfluity had cast in very much. "For if there be first a willing mind (as St. Paul saith), it is accepted, according to that a man hath, and not according to that a man hath not."

Thirdly, We must give without hypocrisy and ostentation, not seeking the praise of men, or our own glory or profit. And although the scriptures in some places make mention of a reward to our alms and other good works, yet ought we not to think that we do merit or deserve any thing: but rather we ought to acknowledge, that God in his mere mercy rewardeth in us his own gifts. For what hath he that giveth alms, that he hath not received? He then that giveth to a poor man any manner of thing, giveth not of his own, but of those goods which he hath received of God. "What haſt thou, ſaith the apoſtle, that thou haſt not received? If thou haſt received it, why rejoiceſt thou, as though thou hadſt not received it?"

This ſentence ought to be had in remembrance of all men. For if we have nothing, but that which we have received, what can we deſerve? or what need we to diſpute and reaſon of our own merits? it cometh of the free gift of God, that we live, that we love God, that we walk in his fear. Where is our deſerving then? We muſt alſo in this our ſpiritual warfare arm ourſelves with continual prayer, a very neceſſary, ſtrong, and invincible weapon, and, after the example of Chriſt and all other godly men, cry heartily unto God in faith, in all our diſtreſſes and anguiſhes. Let us go boldly to the ſeat of grace, where we ſhall be ſure to receive mercy, and find grace to help in time of need. For now is pride and perſecution increaſed: now is the time of deſtruction and wrathful diſpleaſure.

Wherefore, my dear brethren, be ye fervent in the law of God, and venture your lives, if need ſhall require, for the teſtament of the fathers, and ſo ſhall ye receive great honour, and an everlaſting name. Remember Abraham: was not he found faithful in temptation, and it was reckoned unto him for righteouſneſs? Joſeph in time of his trouble kept the commandment, and was made a lord of Egypt. Phineas was ſo fervent for the honour of God, that he obtained the covenant of an everlaſting prieſthood. Joſhua, for the fulfilling of the word of God, was made the captain of Iſrael. Caleb bare record before the congregation, and received an inheritance. David alſo in his merciful kindneſs obtained the throne of an everlaſting kingdom. Elias being zealous and fervent in the law, was taken up into heaven. Ananias, Azarias, and Miſael, remained ſtedfaſt in the faith, and were delivered out of the fire. In like manner Daniel, being unguilty, was ſaved from the mouth of the lions.

And thus ye may conſider throughout all ages, ſince the world began, that whoſoever put their truſt in God were not overcome. Fear not ye then the words of ungodly men; for their glory is but dung and worms; today they are ſet up, and to-morrow are they gone; for they are turned into earth, and their memorial cometh to nought. Wherefore let us take good hearts unto us, and quit ourſelves like men in the Lord; for if we do the things that are commanded us in the law of the Lord our God, we ſhall obtain great honour therein.

Beloved in Chriſt, let us not faint becauſe of affliction, wherewith God trieth all them that are ſealed unto life everlaſting: for the only way into the kingdom of God is through much tribulation. For the kingdom of heaven (as God teacheth by his prophet Eſdras) is like a city built and ſet upon a broad field, and full of all good things, but the entrance is narrow and ſudden (full of ſorrow and travail, perils and labours): like as if there were a fire at the right hand, and a deep water at the left; and as it were one ſtrait path between them both, ſo ſmall, that there could but one man go there. If this city were now given to an heir, and he never went thro' the perilous way, how could he receive his inheritance? Wherefore ſeeing we are in this narrow and ſtrait way, which leadeth unto the moſt joyful and pleaſant city of everlaſting life: let us not ſtagger, neither turn back, being afraid of the dangerous and perilous way, but follow our captain Jeſus Chriſt in the narrow and ſtrait way, and be afraid of nothing, no not even of death itſelf: for it is he muſt lead us to our journey's end, and open us the door unto everlaſting life. Conſider alſo the courſe of this world, how many there be which for their maſter's ſake, or for a little promotion's ſake, would adventure their lives in worldly affairs, as commonly in wars, and yet is their reward but light and tranſitory, and ours is unſpeakable, great and everlaſting. They ſuffer pains to be made lords on earth for a ſhort ſeaſon: how much more ought we to endure like pains, yea peradventure much leſs, to be made kings in heaven for evermore? Conſider alſo the wicked of this world, which for a little pleaſure's ſake, or to be avenged on their enemies, will fight with ſword and weapons, and put themſelves in danger of impriſonment and hanging. So much as virtue is better than vice, and God mightier than the devil, ſo much ought we to excel them in this our ſpiritual battle.

And ſeeing, brethren, it hath pleaſed God to ſend me, and that moſt worthy miniſter of Chriſt, John Bradford, your country-men, in the fore-front of this battle, where (for the time) is moſt danger, I beſeech you all, in the bowels of Chriſt, to help us, and all our fellow-ſoldiers ſtanding in like perilous place, with your prayers to God for us, that we may quit ourſelves like men in the Lord, and give ſome example of boldneſs and conſtancy mingled with patience in the fear of God, that ye and others our brethren, through our example, may be ſo encouraged and ſtrengthened to follow us, that ye alſo may leave example to your weak brethren in the world to follow you, Amen.

Conſider what I ſay, the Lord give us underſtanding in all things. Brethren, the time is ſhort; it remaineth that ye uſe this world as though you uſed it not: for the faſhion of this world vaniſheth away. See that ye love not the world, neither the things that are in the world: but ſet your affection on heavenly things, where Chriſt ſitteth on the right hand of God. Be meek, and long-ſuffering, ſerve and edify one another, with the gift that God hath given you. Beware of ſtrange doctrine; lay aſide the old converſation of greedy luſts, and walk in a new life. Beware of uncleanneſs, covetouſneſs, fooliſh talking, falſe doctrine and drunkenneſs: rejoice and be thankful towards God, and ſubmit yourſelves one to another. Ceaſe from ſin, ſpend no more time in vice, be ſober and apt to pray, be patient in trouble, love each other, and let the glory of God and profit of your neighbour be the only mark to ſhoot at in all your doings. Repent ye of the life that is paſt, and take better heed to your doings hereafter. And above all things cleave ye faſt to him, who was delivered to death for our ſins, and roſe again for our juſtification. To whom with the Father, and the Holy Ghoſt, be all honour and power for evermore. Amen.

Salute from me in Chriſt all others which love us in the faith, and at your diſcretion make them partakers of theſe letters: and pray ye all for me and others in bonds for the goſpel, that the ſame God (which by his grace hath called us from wicked popery unto true chriſtianity, and now of love proveth our patience by perſecution) will of his mercy and favor in the end glorioufly deliver us, either by death or by life, to his glory, Amen. At Lancaſter, Aug. 30.

By me an unprofitable ſervant of Chriſt,
George Marſh.

A Letter from G. Marſh to Jenkin Crampton, James Leiver, Elice Fogge, Ralph Bradſhaw, &c.

THE grace of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, and the love of God, and the fellowſhip of the Holy Ghoſt be with you all, Amen. After ſalutations in Chriſt, and hearty thanks for your friendly tokens and your other remembrances towards me, beſeeching God that ye may increaſe in faith, fear and love, and all good gifts, and grow up into a perfect man in Chriſt: theſe be earneſtly to exhort you, yea and beſeech you in the tender mercy of Chriſt, that with purpoſe of heart ye continually cleave unto the Lord, and that ye worſhip and ſerve him in ſpirit, in the goſpel of his Son: for God will not be worſhipped after the commandments and traditions of men, neither yet by any other means appointed, preſcribed and taught us, but by his holy word. And tho' all men for the moſt part defile themſelves with the wicked traditions of men, and ordinances after the world, and not after after Chriſt: yet do ye after the example of Tobit, Daniel and his three companions, Mattathias and his three ſons, be at a point with yourſelves, that ye will not be defiled with the unclean meats of the heathen; I do mean the filthineſs of idolatry, and the very heatheniſh ceremonies of the papiſts: but as the true worſhippers, ſerve ye God in ſpirit and truth, according to the ſacred ſcriptures, which I would wiſh and deſire you above all things continually and reverently (as Chriſt and St. Paul command you) to ſearch and read, with the wholeſome monitions of the ſame: to teach, exhort, comfort and edify one another, and your brethren and neighbours, now in the time of this our miſerable captivity, and great famiſhment of ſouls, for want of the food of God's word. And doubt not but that the merciful Lord, who hath promiſed to be with us even unto the world's end, and that whenſoever two or three be gathered together in his name, he will be in the midſt of them, will aſſiſt you, and teach you the right meaning of the ſacred ſcriptures, will keep you from all errors, and lead you into all truth, as he hath faithfully promiſed.

And though you think yourſelves unable to teach, yet at the commandment of Chriſt, now in time of famine, the hungry people being in a wilderneſs far from any towns, which if they be ſent away faſting, are ſure to faint and periſh by the way, employ and beſtow thoſe five loaves and two fiſhes that ye have, upon that hungry multitude, although you think it nothing among ſo many. And he that increaſed the five loaves and two fiſhes to feed five thouſand men, beſides women and children, ſhall alſo augment his gifts in you, not only to the edifying and winning of others in Chriſt, but alſo to an exceeding great increaſe of your knowledge in God and his holy word. And fear not your adverſaries; for either according to his accuſtomed manner God ſhall blind their eyes that they ſhall not ſpy you, either get you favour in their ſight, or elſe graciouſly deliver you out of their hands by one means or other.

Obey with reverence all your ſuperiors, unleſs they command idolatry or ungodlineſs. Make proviſion for your houſholds, chiefly that they be inſtructed and taught in the law of God. Love your wives even as your own-ſelves, and as Chriſt loved the congregation. Love your children, but abuſe them not, leſt they be of a deſperate mind; and bring them up in the nurture and information of the Lord, and teach them even as the godly parents of Tobit the younger, and Suſanna, did teach their children, even from their infancy to reverence God according to his law, and to abſtain from ſin, providing that in no wiſe they be brought up in idleneſs and wantonneſs, ſeeing that ye reckon yourſelves to be children of God, and look for the life which God ſhall give to them which never turn their belief from him. See that ye ever fear God, and keep his commandments; and though the plague of God chance upon you, yet remain ye ſtedfaſt in the faith and fear of God, and thank him, and ſerve him in ſuch holineſs and righteouſneſs as are acceptable before him all the days of your life. Comfort yourſelves in all your adverſities, and ſtay yourſelves in him, who hath promiſed not to leave you as fatherleſs and motherleſs children without any comfort, but that he will come to you like a moſt gentle and moſt merciful Lord. He will continually ſtand by you in all your troubles, aſſiſting, helping, and ſuccouring you at all times. "I will be with you (ſaith he) unto the end of the world." And cleave you faſt unto him, which was incarnate, lived, wrought, taught, and died for your ſins, yea, roſe again from death, and aſcended into heaven for your juſtification. Repent ye of the life that is paſt, and ceaſe from ſin, and from henceforward live as much time as remaineth in the fleſh, not after the luſts of men, but after the will of God. To do good and diſtribute, forget not, Faſt and pray buſily, and as every man hath received the gift, miniſter the ſame one to another as good miniſters of the manifold graces of God, that God in all things may be glorified through Jeſus Chriſt, to whom be praiſe and dominion for ever, and while the world ſtandeth, Amen.

Yours, George Marſh.

Another Letter of George Marſh.

THE ſame grace and peace (dearly beloved in Chriſt); do I intirely deſire and wiſh unto you, which the apoſtle St. Paul wiſheth to all them, unto whom he did write and ſend his epiſtles, than which two things no better can be wiſhed and deſired of God. Grace is throughout all the epiſtles of Paul, taken for the free mercy and favour of God, whereby he ſaveth us freely without any deſervings or works of the law. In like manner peace is taken for the quietneſs and tranquillity of the conſcience, being fully perſuaded that thro' the only merits of Chriſt's death and blood-ſhedding, there is an atonement and peace made between God and us, ſo that God will no more impute our ſins unto us, nor yet condemn us.

Dearly beloved, I will not be negligent to put you always in remembrance of things, tho' that you know them yourſelves, and be alſo eſtabliſhed in the preſent truth; notwithſtanding I think it meet, as long as I am in this tabernacle, to ſtir you up by putting you in remembrance. Wherefore I beſeech you, brethren, and exhort you in the Lord Jeſus, that ye increaſe more and more, even as ye have received, how ye ought to walk, and to pleaſe God. And as Barnabas, that good man and full of the Holy Ghoſt, exhorted the Antiochians, with purpoſe of heart cleave ye continually unto the Lord. And ſtand faſt, and be not moved from the hope of the goſpel, whereof God be thanked, ye have had plenteous preaching unto you theſe three years paſt, by the faithful miniſters of Jeſus Chriſt, Leiver, Pilkinton, Bradford, Saunders, and others, which now, when perſecution ariſeth, becauſe of the word, do not fall away like ſhrinking children, and forſake the truth, but are preſt and ready for your ſakes, which are his myſtical body, to forſake the chief and principal delights of this life, and ſome of them in giving place to the outrageous tyranny of the world, to forſake their livings, friends, native land, and other chief pleaſures of this life, and to commit themſelves to painful exile, that if it pleaſe God, Chriſt may come again out of Egypt. And others are ready to fulfil their miniſtry unto the uttermoſt: that is to wit, with their painful impriſonments and blood-ſhedding, if need ſhall require, to confirm and ſeal Chriſt's goſpel whereof they have been miniſters: and as St. Paul ſaith, not only to be caſt into priſon, but alſo to die for the name of the Lord Jeſus.

Be ye not therefore aſhamed of the teſtimony of our Lord Jeſus, neither be ye aſhamed of us which are his priſoners, but ſuffer ye adverſity with the goſpel, for which word we ſuffer as evil doers, even unto bonds, but the word of God is not bound with us. Therefore we ſuffer all things for the elect's ſake, that they alſo may obtain the ſalvation which is in Chriſt Jeſus with eternal glory: wherefore ſtand ye faſt in the faith, and be not moved from the hope of the goſpel, and ſo ſhall ye make us even with joy to ſuffer for your ſakes, and as the apoſtle ſaith, To fulfil that which is behind of the paſſions of Chriſt in our fleſh, for his body's ſake, which is the congregation. St. Paul doth not here mean, that there wanteth any thing in the paſſion of Chriſt, which may be ſupplied by man; for the paſſion of Chriſt, as touching his own perſon, is that moſt perfect and all-ſufficient ſacrifice, whereby we are all made perfect, as many as are ſanctified in his blood: but theſe his words ought to be underſtood of the elect and choſen in whom Chriſt is, and ſhall be perſecuted unto the world's end. The paſſion of Chriſt then, as touching his myſtical body, which is the church, ſhall not be perfected till they have all ſuffered, whom God hath appointed to ſuffer for his Son's ſake. Wherefore eſtabliſh yourſelves, and be of good comfort, and be not moved in theſe afflictions, knowing that we are appointed thereunto. For on our parts nothing can be greater conſolation and inward joy unto us in our adverſity, than to hear of your faith and love, and that ye have a good remembrance of us always, praying for us as we do for you, as the apoſtle writeth of the Theſſalonians, ſaying, Now are we alive, if ye ſtand ſtedfaſt in the Lord: for good ſhepherds do always count the welfare and proſperous eſtate of Chriſt's flock to be their own: for while it goeth well with the congregation, it goeth well with them alſo in whatſoever affliction or adverſity they be: but when they ſee the church in any peril of weakneſs, then be they weary of their own lives, then can they have no reſt nor joy. "Who is weak, ſaith St. Paul, and I am not weak? who is offended, and I do not burn?" But this affection is not in them that ſeek their own lucre and glory.

And foraſmuch as the life of man is a perpetual warfare upon earth, let us run with joy unto the battle that is ſet before us, and like good warriors of Jeſus Chriſt pleaſe him, who hath choſen us to be ſoldiers, and not like ſhrinking children faint and fall away from the truth now in time of adverſity and tribulation, wherewith all that live godly in Chriſt Jeſus muſt be tried, even as gold and ſilver is proved in the fire, and whereof all the ſcriptures have given us ſo much forewarning. For God is wont for the moſt part to warn his elect and choſen, what affliction and trouble ſhall happen unto them for his ſake, not to affright them thereby, but rather to prepare their minds againſt the boiſterous ſtorms of perſecution. As we have a notable example in the apoſtle St. Paul, unto whom God ſent Agabus, who propheſied unto him of the impriſonment and bands that he ſhould ſuffer at Jeruſalem; in whom we have alſo a good example of conſtancy and ſtedfaſtneſs, who regarding not the tears of his familiar friends, nor yet the peril of his own life, did through fire and water go on ſtill to ſet forth the glory of God; and he being delivered from the hands of his wicked and blood-thirſty enemies, and that ſo many times, is in concluſion fain to commit himſelf to the rough waters of the ſea, where he was a long ſeaſon in great peril and jeopardy of his own life. But God was always (to the great comfort of all that ſhall hear it) moſt ready to help and ſuccour him. Firſt, he did ſend him a moſt friendly and ſweet company, I mean Ariſtarchus and Lucas, ſo ruling the heart of the under captain Julius, that he courteouſly intreated him, and gave him liberty to go to his friends, and to refreſh himſelf, and he was beneficial unto him at all times. In like manner was God with Joſeph, and delivered him from all his adverſities, and gave him favour and wiſdom in the ſight of Pharaoh king of Egypt, inſomuch that he made him governor over all Egypt, and over all his houſhold. In like manner was he with Jeremy and Daniel, in their great troubles, and appointed men for them in their moſt troubles, to relieve, ſuccour, and help them, to their ſingular comfort.

Alſo when Peter was in Herod's priſon ſleeping between two ſoldiers, bound with two chains, and the keepers before the door keeping the priſon, the ſame night that Herod had intended to have brought him out unto the people the day following, to have put him unto death to pleaſe the Jews; as a little before he had killed James the brother of John with the ſword; God ſent his angel, and the chains fell off from Peter's hands, and the iron gate opened unto him by its own accord, and ſo was Peter wonderfully delivered by God. For it is the true living God that looſeth all bands, and delivereth out of priſon, and not that feigned god St. Leonard. On the true God did St. Peter call, unto him did he aſcribe the glory of his deliverance, ſaying, "Now I know of a truth, that God hath ſent his angel, &c."

Theſe things are written for our learning, that we thro' patience and comfort of the ſcriptures might have hope. The God of patience and comfort, grant that we be like-minded one towards another, after the enſample of Chriſt Jeſus, that we all agreeing together, may with one mouth glorify God the Father of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt.

A poor priſoner for Chriſt, George Marſh.

A Letter from George Marſh to Robert Langley.

THE grace of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, and the love of God, and the fellowſhip of the Holy Ghoſt, be with you, good brother in Chriſt, Robert Langley, and with all them that love the Lord Jeſus unfeignedly, Amen.

After hearty commendations to you, with thanks for that ye did viſit me a priſoner in Chriſt, and unacquainted with, to your coſts, this ſhall be to let you know, that ye ſhall receive from me mine examination and handling at Lathum, and the cauſe of mine impriſonment, according as I did promiſe you: and this ye ſhall receive by my brother, or ſome one of the Bradſhaws of Bolton within this ſeven-night, willing you to ſhew the ſame to ſuch faithful men about Mancheſter or elſewhere, as you do take to be favourers of true religion, and Chriſt's holy word, and then to deliver it again. And whereas you did put me in comfort, that if I did want any thing neceſſary unto this life, you with ſome others would be bearers with me in this my coſtly and painful affliction; I give you moſt hearty thanks, and rejoice greatly in the Lord, who ſtirs up the hearts of others to be careful for me in this my great neceſſity. I thank God, as yet I do want nothing, and intend to be as little chargeable to others (ſaving my mother) as I can. If I do want, I will be bold with you and others, to ſend for your relief and help in my neceſſity; deſiring you in the mean while to pray for me, and all others in the bonds of Chriſt, that God would perform the thing which he hath begun in us, that we may with boldneſs confeſs Jeſus Chriſt, and fight the good fight of faith.

Yours, George Marſh.

Mr. Marſh's Letter to his Friend.

GRACE be with you, and peace be multiplied in the knowledge of God, and Jeſus the Lord.

After hearty commendations and thanks to you, not only for your large token, but much more for your loving letters, full of conſolation to me as touching my perſon to you unknown: theſe ſhall be to certify you, that I rejoice greatly in the Lord, when I do perceive how my ſweet Saviour Chriſt doth ſtir up the minds not only of my familiar friends in times paſt, but alſo of ſundry and divers heretofore unto me unknown and unacquainted, to bear part with me in this my painful and coſtly impriſonment, ſending me things not only neceſſary for this preſent life, but alſo comfortable letters, encouraging and exhorting me to continue grounded and eſtabliſhed in the faith, and not to be moved away from the hope of the goſpel, whereof, according to my ſmall talent, I have been a miniſter: and daily I call and cry unto the Lord in whom is all my truſt, and without whom I can do nothing, that he which hath begun a good work in me, would vouchſafe to go forth with it until the day of Jeſus Chriſt, being ſurely certified in my conſcience of this, that he will ſo do, foraſmuch as he hath given me, that not only I ſhould believe on him, but alſo ſuffer for his ſake. The Lord ſtrengthen me with his Holy Spirit, that I may be one of the number of thoſe bleſſed, which enduring to the end, ſhall be ſaved.

And whereas you ſay, that my ſuffering of perſecution with Chriſt is a thing to you moſt comfortable, I make anſwer, that in all mine adverſity and neceſſity nothing on your behalf is greater conſolation unto me, than to hear of the faith and love of others, and how they have good remembrance of us always, even as the apoſtle apoſtle reporteth by the Theſſalonians, ſaying, Now are we alive, if ye ſtand ſtedfaſt in the Lord. For my truſt in the Lord is, that this my buſineſs ſhall happen to the furtherance of the goſpel, and that you will be none of thoſe forgetful and hypocritical hearers, whereof ſome being but way-ſide hearers, the devil cometh and taketh away the word out of their hearts, leſt they ſhould believe and be ſaved (but let prayer be made without ceaſing by the congregation unto God for them), and no doubt God will to your conſolation glorioufly deliver by one means or other his oppreſſed. Only tarry ye the Lord's leiſure; be ſtrong, let your heart be of good comfort, and wait ye ſtill for the Lord. He tarrieth not that will come, look for him therefore and faint not, and he will never fail you.

Yours, George Marſh.

A Letter from James Bradſhaw, ſent to George Marſh in Priſon.

GRACE and peace from God the Father, and the Lord Jeſus Chriſt be with you alway, Amen.

We had a letter from you, which is a great comfort unto us, to ſee you take the croſs ſo thankfully. Trouble and affliction doth prove, try, inſtruct, confirm, and ſtrengthen the faith, provoke and ſtir up prayer, drive and force us to amendment of life, to the fear of God, to meekneſs, to patience, to conſtancy, to gentleneſs, to ſoberneſs, temperance, and to all manner of virtues, and are the occaſion of exceeding much good, as well tranſitory as eternal, in this world as in the world to come. There is neither good nor bad, godly nor ungodly, but he hath one croſs or other. And although ſome there be that can ſhift for a while, and make proviſion for themſelves for a time, by craft and ſubtilty and diſſimulation, or by ſome falſhood in fellowſhip (as they call it), yet they bring themſelves at length into the higheſt danger, confuſion and ſhame, both in this world, and in the world to come. And ſeeing that all the troubles and adverſity in this world are a thouſand times more light and eaſy, yea nothing in compariſon of the eternal fire, which is prepared and already kindled for the unfaithful wicked enemies of God; all faithful and godly perſons ought to bear and ſuffer their tranſitory affliction and adverſity the more patiently, willingly, and thankfully; conſidering and remembering all the dearly beloved friends of God, which were wonderfully vexed and plagued of their enemies, Abraham of the Chaldees, Lot of the Sodomites, Iſaac of Iſhmael, Jacob of Eſau, Moſes of his people, David of Saul, and of his own ſon. As for Job, he had not a drop of blood in his body. John Baptiſt, the holieſt that ever was born of a woman, was, without any law, right, or reaſon, beheaded in priſon, as though God had known nothing at all of him.

We have many thouſands fellow-martyrs and companions of our miſery and adverſity, in reſpect of whoſe impriſonment, racking, chains, fire, wild beaſts, and other means wherewith they were tormented, all that we ſuffer is but a blaſt of wind. Therefore now, whoſoever is aſhamed of the croſs of Chriſt, and aggrieved therewith, the ſame is aſhamed to have Chriſt for his fellow and companion, and therefore ſhall the Lord Jeſus Chriſt be aſhamed of him again at the latter day.

Thus I leave for this time, beſeeching you to let me have your advice, becauſe I do not outwardly ſpeak that with my tongue that I do not think in my heart. Pray for me, as I for you. I beſeech the Holy Ghoſt to have you in his keeping alway, Amen.

By your friend,

James Bradſhaw.

A daily Prayer uſed by George Marſh.

"O Lord Jeſus Chriſt, which art the only phyſician of wounded conſciences, we miſerable ſinners, truſting in thy gracious goodneſs, do briefly open unto thee the evil tree of our heart, with all the roots, boughs, leaves, and fruits, and with all the crooks, knots, and knoures, all which thou knoweſt: for thou throughly perceiveſt as well the inward luſts, doubtings, and denying thy providence, as thoſe groſs outward ſins which we commit inwardly and deadly. Wherefore we beſeech thee, according to the little meaſure of our infirmity, although we be far unable and unapt to pray, that thou wouldeſt mercifully circumciſe our ſtoney hearts, and for theſe old hearts, create new within us, and repleniſh us with a new ſpirit, and water us, and moiſten us with the juice of heavenly grace, and wells of ſpiritual waters, whereby the inward venom and noiſome juice of the fleſh may be dried up, and cuſtom of the old man changed, and our heart, always bringing forth thorns and briars to be burned with fire, from henceforth may bear ſpiritual fruits in righteouſneſs and holineſs, unto life everlaſting, Amen."

Beloved, among other exerciſes, I do daily on my knees, uſe this confeſſion of ſins, willing and exhorting you to do the ſame, and daily to acknowledge unfeignedly to God your unbelief, unthankfulneſs, and diſobedience againſt him. This ſhall ye do, if ye will diligently conſider and look yourſelves firſt in the pure glaſs of God's commandments, and there ſee your outward filthineſs and uncleanneſs, and ſo learn to vanquiſh the ſame, that is to wit, fall in hearty diſpleaſure againſt ſin, and thereby be provoked to long after Chriſt, for we truly are ſinners; but he is juſt, and the juſtifier of all them that believe on him. We are poor, but he is rich in mercy toward all them that call upon him. If we hunger and thirſt for righteouſneſs, let us reſort unto his table, for he is a moſt liberal feaſt-maker. He will ſet before us his own holy body, which is given to us to be our meat, and his precious blood, which was ſhed for us, and for many, for the remiſſion of ſins, to be our drink. He biddeth, willeth, and calleth for gueſts, which hunger and thirſt. "Come (ſaith he), all ye that labour and are laden, and I will refreſh you, cool and eaſe you, and you ſhall find reſt unto your ſouls."

The Life of William Flower, who, for ſtriking of a Prieſt, was apprehended, firſt having his Hand cut off, and after martyred for his conſtant Adherence to the Truth.

WIlliam Flower, otherwiſe named Branch, firſt concerning his trade of life, and bringing up, he was born at Snowhill in the county of Cambridge, where he went to ſchool ſome years, and then came to the abbey of Ely; where, after he had remained a while, he was a profeſſed monk according to the order and rule of the ſame houſe where he remained, uſing and bearing the habit of a monk, and obſerving the rules and orders of the ſame houſe, until he came to one and twenty years of age, or thereabout; and before he came to that age, and being a profeſſed monk, he was made a prieſt alſo in the ſame houſe, and there did celebrate and ſing maſs a good ſpace together. After that, by reaſon of a viſitation, and certain injunctions given in the ſame time by the authority of king Henry the eighth, he forſook the ſame houſe, and caſting from him the ſaid monk's habit and religion aforeſaid, took upon him and uſed the habit of a ſecular prieſt, and returned to Snowhill, where he was born; and there he did celebrate and ſing maſs, and taught children their primmer and accidence about half a year together.

Then he went to Ludgate in Suffolk, and there ſerved as a ſecular prieſt about a quarter of a year; and from thence he went to Stoniland, where he tarried and ſerved as a ſecular prieſt alſo, until the coming out of the ſix articles: and then he departed from thence, and went into Glouceſterſhire, where after he had made his abode in the country a while, at length in Tewksbury, according to God's holy ordinance he married a wife, with whom he ever after faithfully and honeſtly continued: and after his marriage, he tarried in Tewksbury about two years together; and from thence he went to Broſley, where he tarried three quarters of a year, and practiſed phyſic and chirurgery; and from thence he removed to Northamptonſhire, where under a gentleman he taught children their primmers, and to write and read. But departing from thoſe parts he came to London, and there remained for a certain ſpace. After that, being deſirous to ſee his country, he returned to Snowhill where he was born; from thence to Brankſtrey in Eſſex, then to Coxall, where he taught children a ſpace, and ſo came to Lambeth near London, where he hired a houſe, and placed his wife, where he and his wife did dwell together till this time: howbeit for the moſt part he was always abroad, except once or twice in a month, to viſit and ſee his wife; where he being at home upon Eaſter-day about ten or eleven of the clock in the forenoon of the ſame day, came over the water from Lambeth into St. Margaret's church at Weſtminſter, where he ſeeing a prieſt named John Cheltam adminiſtering and giving the ſacrament of the altar to the people, and therewith being greatly offended in his conſcience with the prieſt for the ſame his doing (for that he judged him not to be a catholic miniſter, neither his act to be catholic and laudable according to God's word), did ſtrike and wound him upon the head, and alſo upon the arm and hand with his wood-knife, the prieſt having the ſame time in his hand a chalice, with certain conſecrated hoſts therein, which were ſprinkled with the blood of the ſaid prieſt.

In which action as indeed he did not well or evangelically, ſo afterward, being examined before biſhop Bonner, did no leſs confeſs his not well doing in the ſame, ſubmitting therefore himſelf willingly to puniſhment, when it ſhould come. Howbeit touching his belief in the ſacrament, and the popiſh miniſtration; he neither would nor did ſubmit himſelf.

Whereupon the aforeſaid William Flower, being firſt apprehended and laid in the Gatehouſe at Weſtminſter (where he had given two groats the ſame day a little before to the priſoners, ſaying, he would ſhortly after come to them), with as many irons as he could bear: afterward was ſummoned before biſhop Bonner his ordinary, April 19. 1555. where the biſhop, after he had ſworn him upon a book (according to his ordinary manner), miniſtered articles and interrogatories to him. But before I ſpeak of the articles, firſt we have here to ſet forth what communication paſſed betwixt him and Robert Smith, being then alſo there priſoner with him, concerning his fact done at Weſtminſter, the tenor and effect of which communication here followeth.

A Communication between Robert Smith and William Flower, concerning his Striking of the Prieſt at Weſtminſter.

Smith. FRiend, foraſmuch as I underſtand that you do profeſs the goſpel, and alſo have ſo done a long ſeaſon, I am bold to come unto you, and in the way of communication to demand and learn a truth at your own mouth, of certain things by you committed, to the aſtoniſhing not only of me, but of divers others that alſo profeſs the truth.

Flower. I praiſe God for his great goodneſs in ſhewing me the light of his holy word; and I give you hearty thanks for your viſitation, intending by God's grace to declare all the truth that ye ſhall demand lawfully of me, in all things.

Smith. Then I deſire you to ſhew me the truth of your deed, committed on John Cheltam prieſt, in the church, as near as you can, that I may hear from your own mouth how it was.

Flower. I came from my houſe at Lambeth over the water, and entering into St. Margaret's church, and there ſeeing the people falling down before a moſt ſhameful and deteſtable idol, being moved with extreme zeal for my God, whom I ſaw before my face diſhonoured, I drew forth my hanger, and ſtrake the prieſt which miniſtered the ſame unto them: whereupon I was immediately apprehended; and this is moſt true, as the act is manifeſt.

Smith. Did ye not know the perſon that ye ſtrake, or were ye not zealous upon him for any evil will or hatred between you at any time?

Flower. No verily, I never to my knowledge ſaw the perſon before that preſent, neither ought him or any man alive evil will or malice; for if he had not had it, another ſhould, if I had any time come where the like occaſion had been miniſtered, if God had permitted me to do it.

Smith. Do ye think that thing to be well done, and after the rule of the goſpel?

Flower. I do confeſs all fleſh to be ſubject to the power of Almighty God, whom he maketh his miniſters to do his will and pleaſure; as in example, Moſes, Aaron, Phineas, Joſhua, Zimri, Jehu, Judith, Mattathiah, with many others, not only changing degrees, but alſo planting zeals to his honour, againſt all order and reſpect of fleſh and blood. For, as St. Paul ſaith, "His works are paſt finding out:" by whoſe ſpirit I have alſo given my fleſh at this preſent unto ſuch order, as it ſhall pleaſe the good will of God to appoint, in death, which before the act committed I looked for.

Smith. Think you it convenient for me, or any other, to do the like by your example?

Flower. No verily, neither do I know if it were to do again, whether I could do it again, or no: for I was up very early at St. Paul's church upon Chriſt's day in the morning, to have done it in my jealouſy: but when I came in place I was no more able to do it, than now to undo that is done; and yet now being compelled by the ſpirit, not only to come over the water, and to enter the church, but being in mind fully content to die for the Lord, gave over my fleſh willingly without all fear, I praiſe God. Wherefore I cannot learn you to do the like. Firſt, becauſe I know not what is in you. Secondly, becauſe the rules of the goſpel commandeth us to ſuffer with patience all wrongs and injury; yet nevertheleſs, if he make you worthy, that hath made me zealous, ye ſhall not be hindered, judged, nor condemned: for he doth in his people his unſpeakable works in all ages, which no man can comprehend. I humbly beſeech you to judge the beſt of the ſpirit, and condemn not God's doings: for I cannot expreſs with my mouth the great mercies that God hath ſhewed on me in this thing, which I repent not.

Smith. Are ye not aſſured to have death miniſtered unto you for the ſame act committed, and even with extremity?

Flower. I did, before the deed committed, adjudge my body to die for the ſame: whereupon I carried about me in writing, mine opinion of God and the holy ſcriptures; that if it had pleaſed God to have given them leave to have killed my body in the church, they might in the ſaid writing have ſeen my hope, which (I praiſe God) is laid up ſafe within my breaſt, notwithſtanding any death that may be miniſtered upon my body in this world; being aſcertained of everlaſting life through Jeſus Chriſt our Lord, and being moſt heartily ſorry for mine offences committed in this fleſh, and truſting ſhortly, through his mercy, to ceaſe from the ſame.

Smith.

Smith. It is no need to examine or commune with you of the hope that ye have any further: for I perceive (God be praiſed) ye are in good eſtate, and therefore I beſeech God for his mercies ſpread his wings over you, that as for his love you have been zealous, even to the loſs of this life, ſo he may give you his Holy Spirit to conduct you out of this death into a better life, which I think will be ſhortly.

Flower. I hunger for the ſame (dear friend) being full aſcertained that they can kill but the body, which I am aſſured ſhall receive life again everlaſting, and ſee no more death; entirely deſiring you and all that fear the the Lord, to pray with me to Almighty God, to perform the ſame in me ſhortly.

And thus Robert Smith departed, leaving him in the dungeon, and went again to his ward. And this (gentle reader) is the truth, as near as the ſaid Smith could report it.

And thus much concerning the talk between him and Robert Smith in priſon, concerning his fact in ſtriking the prieſt. Now to return again to the matter of his examination, where we left: we ſhewed before how this William Flower, after his ſtriking the prieſt, firſt was laid in the Gatehouſe; then, being examined before biſhop Bonner, had articles againſt him, the copy whereof here followeth.

Articles objected by Bonner, againſt William Flower, late of Lambeth in the County of Surry.

1. THAT thou being of a lawful age and diſcretion, at the leaſt of ſeventeen years old, waſt a profeſſed monk in the late abbey of Ely, wherein after thy profeſſion thou remainedſt until the age of one and twenty years, uſing all the mean time the habit and religion of the ſame houſe, and was reputed and taken notoriouſly for ſuch a perſon.

2. Item, That after the premiſſes, thou waſt ordered and made prieſt, according to the laudable cuſtom of the catholic church, and afterward thou didſt execute and miniſter as a prieſt, and waſt commonly reputed, named, and taken for a prieſt.

3. Item, That after the premiſſes thou forgetting God, thy conſcience, honeſty, and the laudable order of the catholic church, didſt, contrary to thy profeſſion and vow, take, as unto thy wife, one woman, commonly called Alice Pulton, in the pariſh church of Tewksbury in the dioceſe of Glouceſter, with whom thou hadſt mutual cohabitation, and carnal copulation, as man and wife, and begat of her two children.

4. Item, That thou being a religious man and a prieſt, didſt, contrary to the order of the eccleſiaſtical laws, take upon thee to practiſe in divers places within the dioceſe of London, phyſic and chirurgery, when thou waſt not admitted, expert, nor learned.

5. Item, That upon Eaſter-day laſt paſt, that is to wit, the fourteenth day of this preſent month of April, within the pariſh church of St. Margaret's at Weſtminſter, within the county of Middleſex and dioceſe of London, thou didſt maliciouſly, outrageouſly, and violently pull out thy weapon, that is to wit, thy wood-knife or hanger. And whereas the prieſt and miniſter there, called Sir John Cheltam, was executing his cure and charge, eſpecially in doing his ſervice, and adminiſtering the ſacrament of the altar to communicants, then didſt thou wickedly and abominably ſmite with thy ſaid weapon the ſaid prieſt, firſt upon the head very ſore, and afterwards upon his hands or other parts of his body, drawing blood abundantly from him; the ſaid prieſt then holding the ſaid ſacrament in his hand, and giving no occaſion why thou ſhouldeſt ſo hurt him; the people being grievouſly offended therewith, and the ſaid church polluted thereby, ſo that the inhabitants were compelled to repair to another church to communicate, and to receive the ſaid ſacrament.

6. Item, That by reaſon of the premiſſes, thou waſt and art by the eccleſiaſtical laws of the church, amongſt other penalties, excommunicated and accurſed, ipſo facto, and not to be accompanied withal, neither in the church, nor elſewhere, but in ſpecial caſes.

7. Item, That thou, concerning the truth of Chriſt's natural body and blood in the ſacrament of the altar, haſt been by the ſpace of theſe years, 20, 19, 18, 17, 16, 15, 14, 13, 12, 11, 10, 9, 8, 7, 6, 5, 4, 3, 2, and 1. or any one of them, and yet art at this preſent of this opinion; that is to ſay, that in the ſaid ſacrament of the altar, after the words of conſecration, there is not really, truly, and in very deed contained (under the form of bread) the very true and natural body of our Saviour Jeſus Chriſt.

8. Item, That thou for the hatred and diſdain that thou hadſt and didſt bear againſt the ſaid ſacrament, and the virtue thereof, and againſt the ſaid prieſt adminiſtering the ſame (as before), didſt ſmite, wound, and hurt him in manner and form as is before declared.

9. Item, That thou, over and beſides the pains due unto thee for the doing of the cruel fact, art alſo by the order of the eccleſiaſtical laws of the church, and the laudable cuſtom and ordinance of the ſame, to be reputed, taken, and adjudged (as thou art indeed) a very heretic, and to be puniſhed by and with the pains due for hereſy, by reaſon of the ſaid hereſy and damnable opinion.

10. Item, That all the premiſſes be true, manifeſt, notorious, and famous, and that upon the ſame, and every part thereof, there was and is, within the ſaid pariſh of St. Margaret's and other places thereabout, a public voice and fame.

The Anſwer of William Flower to the aforeſaid Articles.

TO the firſt article he anſwereth and confeſſeth the ſame to be true in every part thereof, except that he ſaith and confeſſed that he never conſented and agreed in his heart to be a monk.

To the ſecond article he anſwereth and confeſſeth the ſame to be true in every part thereof. Howbeit he ſaith, that he never did, nor yet doth eſteem the ſaid order of prieſthood, according to the order of the ſaid catholic church, becauſe he was offended therewith in his conſcience.

To the third article he anſwereth and confeſſeth, That he intending to live in holy matrimony, and not forgetting God, did marry with the ſaid Alice Pulton named in this article, wherein he believed that he did well, and according to God's laws. Further, confeſſing and believing, that all the time when he was profeſſed monk, and made prieſt, he did thereby utterly forget God: but when he did ſo marry the ſaid Alice Pulton, and in continuing with her did beget three children, he did remember God, as he ſaith, and believeth that he did then lawfully.

To the fourth article he anſwereth and believeth the ſame to be true in every part thereof.

To the fifth article he anſwereth and confeſſeth, That his conſcience being greatly offended with the ſaid Sir John Cheltam prieſt, for adminiſtering the ſacrament of the altar to the people at the place and time ſpecified in this article, he did ſo ſmite and ſtrike the ſame prieſt with his hanger or wood-knife, as well upon his head, as upon other parts and places of his body, which he remembereth not, whereby the blood ran out, and was ſhed in the ſaid church, as he believeth, having, as he ſaith, none other cauſe or matter ſo to do, but only that his conſcience was offended and grieved, in that the ſame prieſt did ſo give and adminiſter the ſaid ſacrament to the people: which people he believeth was greatly abaſhed and offended with his ſaid fact and doing, and were enforced forced and compelled to go out of the church, and to repair to another to receive the ſaid ſacrament. And further, being then demanded and examined, whether he did then mind and intended to have killed the ſaid prieſt; or not: he ſaid, he would not anſwer thereunto. And being further examined, whether he did well or evil in ſtriking the ſaid prieſt; he would make no anſwer thereunto.

To the ſixth he anſwereth and ſaith, That whether he be ſo excommunicate or accurſed, as is contained in this article, he referreth himſelf herein to the eccleſiaſtical laws.

To the ſeventh he anſwereth and ſaith, That by the ſpace of ſix and twenty years now paſt, he hath always been, and yet is of this opinion touching the ſaid ſacrament of the altar, as followeth; namely, that in the ſacrament of the altar, after the words of conſecration, there is not really, truly, and in very deed contained under the form of bread, the very true and natural body of our Saviour Jeſus Chriſt.

To the eighth he anſwereth and believeth the ſame to be true in every part thereof.

To the ninth he anſwereth, and herein he referreth himſelf to the ſaid laws, cuſtom, and ordinance ſpecified in this article, that is to ſay, the canonical laws.

To the laſt he anſwereth and believeth, that thoſe things before by him confeſſed be true; and thoſe things which he hath denied, be untrue; and that the ſaid common voice and fame hath and doth only labour and go upon thoſe things by him before confeſſed.

By me William Flower, alias Branch.

After this examination, the biſhop began to inſtruct him, and to exhort him to return again to the unity of his mother the catholic church, with ſuch reaſons as he is commonly wont to uſe to others, promiſing many fair things if he would do ſo, beſides the forgiving of what was paſt.

To this William Flower anſwering again, thanked him for his offer: and where it was in his power to kill or not to kill his body, he ſtood therewith contented, let him do therein what he thought; yet over his ſoul he had no ſuch power, which being once ſeparated from the body, is in the hands of no man, but only of God either to ſave or ſpill. As concerning his opinion of the ſacrament, he ſaid he would never go from that he had ſpoken, do he with him what he would.

Then the biſhop aſſigned him again to appear in the ſame place in the afternoon, betwixt 3 and 4. In the mean time to adviſe himſelf of his former anſwers, whether he would ſtand to the ſame his opinions or not: which if he ſo did, he would further proceed againſt him, &c.

In the afternoon the ſaid William Flower appeared again before the ſaid biſhop at the hour and place appointed. To whom the biſhop ſitting in his conſiſtory, ſpake theſe words: Flower, ye were this afternoon here before me, and made anſwer to certain articles; and thereupon I reſpited you till now, to the intent you ſhould conſider and weigh with yourſelf your ſtate, and to remember while you have time, both your abominable act, and alſo that evil opinion which ye have conceived touching the verity of Chriſt's true natural body in the ſacrament of the altar.

To whom the ſaid Flower anſwered as followeth: That which I have ſaid, I will ſtand to; and therefore I require that the law may proceed againſt me. Whereupon the biſhop commanded his notary (Harward by name) to read to him again his articles, as before. Which being read, the ſame William Flower perſiſting in his ſentence, anſwered to all parts of the artieles, as in the forenoon before, ſave only that he requeſted the biſhop concerning the fifth article, he might alter ſomething his anſwer therein, after this tenor and manner of words, to wit, And moreover confeſſeth and ſaith, that whereas he ſtruck the prieſt on Eaſter-day laſt paſt, in St. Margaret's church in Weſtminſter, he hath ſince that time, and yet doth miſlike himſelf in that doing, and doth now judge and believe that the ſame act was evil and naught. Howbeit he ſaith and believeth, that for the matter and cauſe whereof he ſo ſtruck the ſaid prieſt (which was for miniſtering the ſacrament of the altar, which he taketh and judgeth abominable), he neither did, nor doth miſlike himſelf at all therein.

Moreover, he deſireth of the ſaid biſhop licence to be granted him, to alter and take out ſome of the ninth article, and in place thereof, theſe words to be placed; to wit, Herein he referreth himſelf to the laws, cuſtom and ordinance ſpecified in this article, &c. At which requeſt, Bonner granted to the altering of both the articles according as he deſired, and ſo put in the acts.

After this, the biſhop turning again to his old manner of exhorting, went about with words (and words only), to perſuade him to ſubmit himſelf to the catholic church, and to the faith thereof. Notwithſtanding all his perſuaſions, he ſtill remained in the conſtancy of his ſentence, ſaying, that he would not be removed from that he had ſpoken, to die therefore. Whereupon the biſhop aſſigned him the next day (being the 20th day of April) to appear in the ſame place, between eight and nine of the clock in the morning, then and there to hear the ſentence pronounced in caſe he would not relent.

The next morning the ſaid William Flower was brought by the keeper belonging to the warden of the Fleet, before biſhop Bonner, who, according to his uſual manner, endeavoured to reduce him to his catholic church, and the unity thereof, that is, from Chriſt to antichriſt: ſometimes alluring him with fair promiſes, and ſometimes with menaces, terrors, and threatenings. To which he anſwered, Do what ye will, I am at a point: for the heavens ſhall as ſoon fall, as I will forſake my opinion, &c. Whereupon the biſhop, after he had commanded theſe words to be regiſtered, called for the depoſitions of certain witneſſes, produced for the better information of this matter, the names of which witneſſes were theſe: William Jennings, John Bray, Robert Graunt, Richard Dodd, William Pampion, Robert Smalwood, the pariſh prieſt of St. Margaret's, Weſtminſter. The ſum and effect of whoſe depoſitions here enſueth.

Robert Graunt of Weſtminſter, examined upon the ſaid anſwers of William Flower, ſaith and depoſeth; That he did hear and ſee the ſaid Flower acknowledge and recognize the ſaid anſwers, and ſubſcribe to the ſame with his own hand, and alſo was preſent in the church of St. Margaret's in Weſtminſter, when the ſaid William Flower did ſmite and wound the prieſt, when he was adminiſtering the ſacrament; and how this examinant among others preſſed towards him to take him, and was hurt thereby upon his chin; and after he was taken, this examinant did help to conduct him to the Gatehouſe.

Richard Dodd of Weſtminſter, examined upon the ſaid anſwers, ſaith and depoſeth, That he did hear and ſee the ſaid Flower acknowledge and recognize the ſaid anſwers, and ſubſcribe to the ſame with his own hand; and alſo did ſee and was preſent, when the ſaid Flower upon Eaſter-day laſt paſt drew his wood-knife, and ſtruck the prieſt upon the head, hand, and arm: who being wounded therewith, and having a chalice with conſecrated hoſts there in his hand, ſprinkled with the ſaid prieſt's blood, was reſcued by this examinant, and the ſaid Flower carried to the Gate-houſe, and the wood-knife taken away by this examinant.

William Pampion, one of the church-wardens of the ſaid pariſh church of St. Margaret's in Weſtminſter, examined upon the ſaid anſwers of the ſaid Flower, ſaith and depoſeth, That the ſame anſwers be true, and in his ſight were ſubſcribed with the hand of the ſaid Flower. And that upon Eaſter-day laſt paſt, about eleven of the clock in the forenoon, in the pariſh church of St. Margaret's in Weſtminſter, among a great number of the people ready to receive the ſacrament, the prieſt's back being turned toward the ſaid Flower, he the ſaid Flower ſuddenly drew forth his wood-knife, and ſtruck Sir John Cheltam the prieſt both upon his head, hand, and arm, whereby he was wounded, and bled abundantly, and the chalice with conſecrated hoſts being in his hand, were ſprinkled with his blood, and the people in great fear cried out lamentably, as though they ſhould preſently have been killed.

Robert Smalwood of Weſtminſter, examined upon the ſaid anſwers, ſaith and depoſeth, That he did hear and ſee the ſaid Flower acknowledge and recognize the ſaid anſwers, and ſubſcribe the ſame with his own hand; and touching the ſtriking and wounding the prieſt in St. Margaret's church in Weſtminſter upon Eaſter-day laſt, this examinant ſaith, he was not there when the fact was done, but immediately after he came to church, and found the prieſt hurt, and wounded in the head, hand, and arm, by the ſaid Flower, and the people in great heavineſs by reaſon thereof. Alſo the people did report, as this examinant ſaith, that Flower did the deed, as the prieſt had the chalice in his hand, adminiſtering the ſacrament to the people.

William Jennings of Weſtminſter, being examined upon the anſwers of the ſaid William Flower, ſaith and depoſeth by virtue of his oath, That he did hear and ſee the ſaid Flower acknowledge and recognize the ſaid anſwers, and ſubſcribe to the ſame with his own hand, in the conſiſtory place: and further depoſeth, That he upon Eaſter-day laſt paſt was preſent at the church of St. Margaret's, Weſtminſter, where Flower ſtruck the ſaid Sir John Cheltam prieſt, firſt upon the head, and afterward upon his arm, whereby the ſaid prieſt is like to loſe his hand. Alſo this jury depoſeth, That the ſaid Sir John Cheltam had a chalice with certain conſecrated hoſts therein in his hand, which were ſprinkled with the blood of the ſaid prieſt, and after the ſaid Flower was apprehended by this examinant and others, they carried him immediately to the Gatehouſe in Weſtminſter.

John Bray, one of the church-wardens of the pariſh church of St. Margaret's in Weſtminſter, ſworn and examined upon the ſaid anſwers, ſaith and depoſeth, That he did hear and ſee the ſaid Flower acknowledge and recognize the ſaid anſwers, and alſo ſubſcribe unto the ſame. And further depoſeth of Flower's ſtriking the prieſt, in effect, as the reſt of the examinants do, and that this ſaid jurate was preſent there at the doing thereof.

After the depoſitions of theſe witneſſes were taken, publiſhed, and denounced, the ſaid biſhop ſpake to William Flower, and aſked him, if he knew any matter or cauſe why ſentence ſhould not be read, and he to be pronounced as an heretic. Whereunto he anſwered as followeth: I have nothing at all to ſay, for I have already ſaid unto you all that I have to ſay; and that I have ſaid I will not go from: and therefore do what you will, &c.

Which when he had ſpoken, the biſhop proceeded to the ſentence, condemning and excommunicating him for an heretic, and after pronounced him alſo to be degraded, and ſo committed him to the ſecular power. Upon the 24th day of the aforeſaid month, of April, which was St. Mark's eve, he was brought to the place of martyrdom, which was in St. Margaret's churchyard at Weſtminſter, where the fact was committed: and there coming to the ſtake where he ſhould be burned, firſt he maketh his prayer to Almighty God, with a confeſſion of his faith, in manner as followeth.

"O eternal God, moſt mighty and merciful Father, who haſt ſent down thy Son upon the earth to ſave me and all mankind, who aſcended up into heaven again, and left his blood upon the earth behind him, for the redemption of our ſins, have mercy upon me, have mercy upon me, for thy dear Son our Saviour Jeſus Chriſt's ſake, in whom I confeſs only to be all ſalvation and juſtification, and that there is no other means, nor way, nor holineſs, in which or by which any man can be ſaved in this world. This is my faith, which I beſeech all men here to bear witneſs of."

Then he ſaid the Lord's prayer, and ſo made an end.

Then Mr. Cholmeley came to him, deſiring him to recant his hereſy, whereby he might do good to the people, or elſe he would be damned.

Flower anſwered as followeth: Sir, I beſeech you for God's ſake to be contented: for that I have ſaid, I have ſaid, and I have been of this faith from the beginning; and I truſt to the living God he will give me his Holy Spirit to continue to the end. Then he deſired all the world to forgive him whom he had offended, as he forgave all the world.

This done, firſt his hand being held up againſt the ſtake, was ſtruck off, his left hand being faſtened behind him. At which ſtriking off his hand, ſome that were preſent, and purpoſely obſerving the ſame, credibly informed us, that he in no part of his body did once ſhrink at the ſtriking thereof, but once a little he ſtirred his ſhoulders.

And thus fire was ſet unto him, who burning therein, cried with a loud voice, O the Son of God have mercy upon me, O the Son of God receive my ſoul, three times, and ſo his ſpeech being taken from him, he ſpake no more, lifting up notwithſtanding his ſtump with his other arm as long as he could. And thus he endured the extremity of the fire, being therein cruelly handled, by reaſon of the few faggots that were brought being not ſufficient to burn him, they were fain to ſtrike him down into the fire. Where he lying along (which was doleful to behold), upon the ground, his lower part was conſumed in the fire, whilſt his upper part was without the fire, his tongue in all men's ſight ſtill moving in his mouth.

May 1555.

The third of May a letter was ſent to George Colt and Thomas Daniel, to make ſearch for and apprehend John Bernard and John Walſh, who uſed to repair to Sudbury, and carrying about with them the bones of Pigot that was burned, do ſhew them to the people, perſuading them to be conſtant in his religion, and upon examination to commit them to further ordering, according to the laws.

This day Stephen Appes was committed to the Little Eaſe in the Tower, there to remain two or three days till further examination.

The 12th day Mr. Thomas Roſs, preacher, was by the council's letters delivered from the Tower to the ſheriff of Norfolk, to be conveyed and delivered to the biſhop of Norwich, and he either to reduce him to recant, or elſe proceed againſt him according to the law.

The 16th a letter was ſent to the lord treaſurer: ſignifying what the lord lieutenant had done for Roſs; and that order ſhould be given, according to his lordſhip's requeſt, for letters to the biſhops: and for Appes, whom the lieutenant of the Tower reporteth to be mad, his lordſhip perceiving the ſame to be true, ſhould commit him to Bedlam, there to remain till their further order.

The 26th a letter was ſent to the lord treaſurer, to confer with the biſhop of London, and the juſtices of the peace of that county, wherein they are to be executed that are already condemned for religion, and upon agreement of places, to give order for their execution accordingly.

The 28th a letter was ſent to the lord treaſurer, to cauſe ſpeedy preparation to be made of ſuch money as was appointed for ſuch perſons as ſhould carry the joyful tidings of queen Mary's good delivery of a child, to divers princes, that they be not compelled to ſtay when the time ſhall come. The ambaſſadors were, the lord admiral to the emperor, the lord Fitzwalter to the French king, Sir Henry Sidney to the king of the Romans, Richard chard Shelly to the king of Portugal, whoſe free paſſage through France Dr. Wotton was ordered to procure.

The 29th a letter was directed to Francis Ingleſield to make ſearch for one John D. at London, and to apprehend him, and ſend him to the council, and to make ſearch for ſuch papers and books as he thinketh may touch the ſame D. or one Benger.

The Martyrdom of John Cardmaker, and John Warne, Upholſter, who ſuffered both together in Smithfield, May 30. 1555.

UPON the 30th day of May John Cardmaker, otherwiſe called Taylor, prebendary of the church of Wells; and John Warne, upholſter, of the pariſh of St. John in Walbrook, ſuffered together in Smithfield. Of whom it remaineth now particularly to intreat, beginning with Mr. Cardmaker, who was firſt an obſervant friar before the diſſolution of the abbeys: afterwards was a married miniſter, and in king Edward's time appointed to be a reader in St. Paul's, where the papiſts were ſo much grieved with him for his doctrine's ſake, that in his reading they cut and mangled his gown with their knives. Mr. Cardmaker being apprehended in the beginning of queen Mary's reign, with Mr. Barlow biſhop of Bath, was brought to London, and put in the Fleet-priſon, king Edward's laws being yet in force. But after the parliament was ended, in which the pope was again admitted as ſupreme head of the church, and the biſhops had alſo gotten power and authority, Ex officio, to exerciſe their tyranny, theſe two were brought before the biſhop of Wincheſter lord chancellor, and others appointed by commiſſion (as before is mentioned), to examine the faith of ſuch as were then priſoners, and as unto others before, ſo now unto them the chancellor offered the queen's mercy, if they would agree, and be conformable, &c.

To this they both made ſuch an anſwer, as the chancellor with his fellow commiſſioners allowed them for catholics. Whether they of weakneſs ſo anſwered, or he of ſubtilty would ſo underſtand their anſwer, that he might have ſome forged example of a ſhrinking brother to lay in the diſh of the reſt, which were to be examined; it may eaſily be perceived by this, that to all them which followed in examination, he objected the example of Barlow and Cardmaker, commending their ſoberneſs, diſcretion, and learning. But whatſoever their anſwer was, yet notwithſtanding Barlow was led again to the Fleet, from whence he afterward being delivered, did by exile conſtantly bear witneſs to the truth of the goſpel. Cardmaker was conveyed to the Compter in Bread-ſtreet, the biſhop of London procuring it to be publiſhed, that he ſhould ſhortly be delivered, after that he had ſubſcribed to tranſubſtantiation and certain other articles. To the ſame priſon where Cardmaker was, Laurence Saunders was brought (after the ſentence of excommunication and condemnation was pronounced againſt him), where theſe two priſoners had ſuch chriſtian conference, that whatſoever the breath of the biſhop bluſtered, and the fickle ears of the people too lightly believed, in the end they both ſhewed themſelves conſtant confeſſors and worthy martyrs of Chriſt: as of Laurence Saunders is already written. After whoſe departure Cardmaker remained there priſoner, to be baited by the papiſts, who would needs ſeem to have a certain hope that Cardmaker was become theirs. Continual and great conference divers of them had with him, with reaſonings, perſuadings, threatenings, and all to none effect. To the end that their doings might appear, he required them to put their reaſons in writing, and promiſed by writing to anſwer them.

Dr. Martin, who bare alſo a part in thoſe pageants, took upon him to be the chief doer by writing, whoſe long unſavoury letters and ſimple reaſons for tranſubſtantiation, and ſuch papiſtical traſh, Mr. Cardmaker anſwered largely, learnedly, and ſubſtantially, confuting the ſame, opening the falſhood of his arguments, and delivering the ſentences of the fathers (which Martin abuſed for his purpoſe) to their true underſtanding; which anſwers I would had come to our hands. Thus conſtantly abode this good man all the enemies doings, as he did alſo the death which he ſuffered in Smithfield in London: whereof ye ſhall hear more anon. But firſt we will ſurvey the matter and manner of the articles objected againſt him by biſhop Bonner, with his anſwers annexed to the ſame, as followeth.

Articles objected by Biſhop Bonner againſt John Taylor, alias Cardmaker.

1. I Edmund biſhop of London, object againſt thee, Sir John Taylor, alias Cardmaker, that thou waſt and art of the city and dioceſe of London, and ſo of the juriſdiction of me Edmund biſhop of London.

2. Item, That thou in times paſt didſt profeſs the rule of St. Francis, and didſt by vow promiſe to keep poverty, chaſtity, and obedience, according to the rule of St. Francis.

3. Item, That thou in times paſt didſt receive all the order of the church then uſed: To wit, Tam majores quam minores.

4. Item, That thou after thy ſaid entry into religion and profeſſion and orders aforeſaid, didſt take to wife a widow, and with her hadſt carnal copulation, and didſt get of her a woman child, breaking thereby thy vow and order, and alſo the ordinance of the church.

5. Item, That thou haſt believed and taught, and ſo doſt believe, that in the ſacrament of the altar under the viſible ſigns there, that is to ſay, under the forms of bread and wine, there is really and truly the true and very natural body and blood of our Saviour Jeſus Chriſt.

6. Item, That the belief of the catholic church is, that in having the body and blood of Chriſt really and truly contained in the ſacrament of the altar, is to have (by the omnipotent power of Almighty God) the body and blood of Chriſt there inviſibly and really preſent under the ſaid ſacrament, and not to make thereby a new God, or a new Chriſt, or a new body of Chriſt.

7. Item, That it may ſtand well together, and ſo is the faith of the catholic church, that the body of Chriſt is viſibly and truly aſcended into heaven, and there is in the viſible form of his humanity; and yet the ſame body in ſubſtance is inviſibly and truly contained in the ſaid ſacrament of the altar.

8. Item, That Chriſt at his laſt ſupper taking bread into his hands, bleſſing it, breaking it, giving it to his apoſtles, and ſaying, Take, eat, this is my body; did inſtitute a ſacrament there, willing that his body really and truly ſhould be contained in the ſaid ſacrament, no ſubſtance of bread and wine there remaining, but only the accidents thereof.

Mr. Cardmaker's Anſwers to the aforeſaid Articles.

TO the firſt article he anſwereth, and confeſſeth the ſame to be true in every part thereof.

To the ſecond article he anſwereth, and confeſſeth, That he being under age, did profeſs the ſaid order and religion, and afterward by the authority of king Henry the eighth, he was diſpenſed with for the ſame religion.

To the third he anſwereth, and confeſſeth the ſame to be true in every part thereof.

To the fourth he anſwereth, and confeſſeth the firſt part thereof to be true: and to the ſecond part of the ſame article he anſwereth and ſaith, that in marriage he brake brake no vow, becauſe he was ſet at liberty to marry, both by the laws of this realm, and alſo by the laws and ordinances of the church of the ſame.

To the fifth he anſwereth, and confeſſeth, That he hath believed and taught as it is contained in this article, but he doth not now ſo believe nor teach.

To the ſixth he anſwereth, That he doth not believe the ſame to be true in any part thereof.

To the ſeventh he anſwereth, That he doth not believe the ſame to be true in any part thereof.

To the eighth he anſwereth, and doth believe, that it is true; that is to ſay, that Chriſt taking bread at his laſt ſupper into his hands, bleſſing it, breaking it, giving it to his diſciples, and ſaying, Take, eat, this is my body, did inſtitute a ſacrament there. And to the other part of this article, namely (willing that his body really and truly ſhould be contained in the ſaid ſacrament, no ſubſtance of bread and wine there remaining, but only the accidents thereof), he anſwereth, that he doth not believe the ſame to be true.

By me, John Cardmaker.

Mr. Cardmaker calling to mind afterward the ready cavillings of the papiſts, and thinking himſelf not to have fully, and according to his true meaning, anſwered the latter part of the laſt eighth article, did the next day after the aforeſaid anſwers exhibit unto the biſhop in a ſchedule this hereafter following.

Where in my anſwer to your articles I deny the preſence of Chriſt in the ſacrament, I mean not his ſacramental preſence, for that I confeſs; but my denial is of his carnal preſence in the ſame. But yet further, becauſe this word is oftentimes taken by the holy fathers, not only for bread and wine, but alſo for the whole adminiſtration and receiving of the ſame according to Chriſt's inſtitution: ſo I ſay, that Chriſt is preſent ſpiritually too, and in all them which worthily receive the ſacrament; ſo that my denial is ſtill of the real, carnal and corporal preſence in the ſacrament, and not of the ſacramental nor ſpiritual preſence.

This I thought good to add to my former anſwer, becauſe no man ſhould miſunderſtand it.

By me, John Cardmaker.

Articles objected againſt John Warne, Upholſter, of the Pariſh of St. John in Walbrook, with his Anſwers to the ſame.

FIRST, That thou John Warne, being of the age of 29 years, and of the pariſh of St. John of Walbrook in London, haſt believed, and doſt believe firmly and ſtedfaſtly, that in the ſacrament of the altar there is not the very true and natural body of our Saviour Chriſt in ſubſtance, under the forms of bread and wine.

Item, That thou haſt believed, and doſt believe, that after the words of conſecration ſpoken by the prieſt, there is not (as the church of England doth believe and teach) the body of Chriſt; but that there doth only remain the ſubſtance of material bread, as it is before the conſecration, or ſpeaking of the words of conſecration; and that the ſaid bread is in no wiſe altered or changed.

Item, That thou haſt ſaid and doſt believe, that if the catholic church do believe and teach, that there is in the maſs, now uſed in England, and in other places of Chriſtendom, a ſacrifice wherein there is a ſacrament containing the body and blood of Chriſt really and truly; then that belief and faith of the church is naught, againſt God's truth and the ſcripture.

Item, That thou haſt ſaid, that about a twelvemonth ago and more, a great rough water ſpaniel of thine was ſhorn on the head, and had a crown like a prieſt made in the ſame, thou didſt laugh at it and like it, though thou didſt it not thyſelf, nor knewеſt who did it.

Item, That thou neither this Lent laſt paſt, nor at any time ſince the queen's majeſty's reign, haſt come into the church, or heard maſs, or been confeſſed, or received the ſacrament of the altar; and haſt ſaid, that thou art not ſorry that thou haſt ſo done, but thou art glad, becauſe thou haſt not therewith defiled thy conſcience, which otherwiſe thou ſhouldſt have done.

Upon all which articles John Warne being examined by the ſaid biſhop Bonner, in preſence of divers witneſſes, May 23. 1555. did confeſs and believe the ſame, and ſubſcribe hereunto his name with his own hand.

By me, John Warne.

It alſo was objected againſt the ſaid John Warne, by the aforeſaid biſhop, as followeth.

Item, That thou John Warne waſt in time paſt here in the city of London, convented in Guildhall for hereſy againſt the ſacrament of the altar, according to the order of the laws of this realm of England in the time of king Henry VIII. and when alderman Barnes was ſheriff, and the Thurſday after that Anne Aſkew was burnt in Smithfield; and thereupon thou waſt ſent a priſoner to Newgate, to whom Edmund biſhop of London did repair with his chaplains, to inſtruct thee in the true faith of Chriſt, touching the ſaid ſacrament of the altar, and to bring thee from thy error, which was, that in the ſacrament of the altar there is not the body of Chriſt, nor any corporal preſence of Chriſt's body and blood, under the forms of bread and wine: but that in the ſaid ſacrament there is only material bread and wine, without any ſubſtance of Chriſt's body and blood at all: and becauſe thou wouldſt not leave and forſake thy ſaid hereſy therein, but perſiſt and abide obſtinately and wilfully therein, thou wert, according to the ſaid laws, condemned to death and to be burnt; and thereupon ſuit being made for thee to the king and others in the court, thou hadſt a pardon of king Henry the eighth, and thereby didſt ſave thy life.

Nevertheleſs in thy heart, conſcience, and mind, thou didſt both then, and alſo afore believe no otherwiſe than at this preſent thou doſt believe; that is to ſay, that in the ſacrament of the altar there is neither the very true body nor blood of Chriſt, nor no other ſubſtance but the ſubſtance of material bread and wine; and to receive the ſaid material bread and wine, and to break it, and to diſtribute it among the people, only is the true receiving of Chriſt's body, and no otherwiſe: ſo that thy faith and belief is, that in the ſaid ſacrament there is no ſubſtance of Chriſt's material body and blood; but all the thing that is there is material bread, and the receiving thereof, as before; and that the ſubſtance of the natural and true body of Chriſt, born of the virgin Mary, is only in heaven, and not in the ſacrament of the altar. In which thine opinion thou haſt ever hitherto ſince continued, and ſo doſt continue at this preſent, thou confeſſing all to be true, and in witneſs thereof ſubſcribing thy name thereunto, as followeth.

By me, John Warne.

John Warne being examined upon the aforeſaid articles by the biſhop before certain witneſſes, whoſe names were John Roſwell, John Heywood, Robert Ravens, the 23d of May, did anſwer for the ſame, confeſſing and granting the articles and the contents thereof to be true, according as they were objected in every part, ſubſcribing alſo the ſame with his hand. Such ſtrength and fortitude God's Holy Spirit wrought in him, to ſtand ſtoutly and confidently to the defence of the ſincere doctrine of his Son.

Whereupon the biſhop exhorting him with many words to leave his hereſies (as he called them), and to return to the boſom of his mother the holy church, commanded him to appear again the next day, being the 24th of May.

Who ſo doing (and anſwering as he did before), was ordered to come thither again in the afternoon, and ſo he did; did: at which time he was earneſtly exhorted by the ſaid biſhop to recant his opinions. To whom he anſwered, that he would not depart from his received profeſſion, unleſs he were thereunto throughly perſuaded by the holy ſcriptures.

Upon which anſwer he was ordered to come again the next day, being the 25th of May, at one of the clock in the afternoon. At which day and hour the biſhop examined him again upon all his former articles before objected, to which he moſt conſtantly adhered, with this further anſwer added thereunto: I am perſuaded (quoth he) that I am in the right opinion, and I ſee no cauſe to repent; for all filthineſs and idolatry is in the church of Rome.

The biſhop then ſeeing that notwithſtanding all his fair promiſes, and terrible threatenings (whereof he uſed many), he could not prevail; finiſhed this examination with the definitive ſentence of condemnation pronounced againſt the ſaid John Warne, and charged the ſheriffs of London with him, under whoſe cuſtody he remained in the priſon of Newgate, until the 30th day of May.

Which day being appointed for their execution, John Cardmaker, with the ſaid John Warne, were brought by the ſheriffs to the place where they ſhould ſuffer. Who being come to the ſtake, firſt the ſheriffs called Mr. Cardmaker aſide, and talked with him ſecretly, ſo long, that in the mean time Mr. Warne had made his prayers, was chained to the ſtake, and had wood and reed ſet about him, while Mr. Cardmaker was talking with the ſheriffs.

The people who before had heard that Mr. Cardmaker would recant, and beholding this, were greatly afflicted, thinking indeed that Mr. Cardmaker ſhould now recant at the burning of Mr. Warne. At length Mr. Cardmaker departed from the ſheriffs, and came towards the ſtake, and (in his garments as he was), kneeled down, and made a long prayer in ſilence to himſelf. His prayers being ended, he roſe up, put off his cloaths unto his ſhirt, and went with a bold courage to the ſtake, and kiſſed it: and taking Mr. Warne by the hand, he heartily comforted him, and ſo gave himſelf to be alſo bound to the ſtake moſt gladly. The people ſeeing this ſo ſuddenly done, contrary to their fearful expectation, as men delivered out of a great doubt, cried out for joy, ſaying, God be praiſed, the Lord ſtrengthen thee, Cardmaker, the Lord Jeſus receive thy ſpirit. And this continued while the executioner put fire to them, and they both paſſed through the fire to the bleſſed reſt and peace among God's holy ſaints and martyrs, to enjoy the crown of triumph and victory prepared for the elect ſoldiers and warriors of Chriſt Jeſus in his bleſſed kingdom. To whom be glory and majeſty for ever. Amen.

The Confeſſion and Faith of Mr. John Warne, which he wrote the Day before he ſuffered, May 30. 1555.

"I Believe in God the Father Almighty, maker of heaven and earth."

A Father, becauſe he is the Father of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, who is the everlaſting Word, whom before all words he hath begotten of himſelf, which Word was made fleſh, and therein alſo manifeſted to be his Son; in whom he hath adopted us to be his children, the inheritors of his kingdom, and therefore he is our Father: an Almighty God, becauſe he hath of nothing created all things viſible and inviſible, both in heaven and in earth, even all creatures contained therein, and governeth them.

"And in Jeſus Chriſt his only Son our Lord."

The eternal Word, perfect God with his Father, of equal power in all things, of the ſame ſubſtance, of like glory, by whom all things were made, and have life, and without whom nothing liveth: he was made alſo perfect man, and ſo being very God and very man in one perſon, is the only Saviour, redeemer, and ranſomer of them which were loſt in Adam our forefather. He is the only means of our deliverance, the hope of our health, the ſurety of our ſalvation.

"Which was conceived by the Holy Ghoſt, born of the virgin Mary."

According to the Father's moſt merciful promiſe, this eternal Son of God, forſaking the heavenly glory, humbled himſelf to take fleſh of a virgin, according to the ſcriptures, uniting the ſubſtance of the Godhead to the ſubſtance of the manhood, which he took of the ſubſtance of that bleſſed virgin Mary in one perſon, to become therein the very Meſſiah, the anointed king and prieſt, for ever appointed to pacify the Father's wrath, which was juſtly gone out againſt us all for ſin.

"Suffered under Pontius Pilate, was crucified, dead, and buried, and deſcended into hell."

He was arraigned before Pontius Pilate the ruler of Jewry, and ſo unjuſtly accuſed of many crimes, that the ruler judged him innocent, and ſought means to deliver him; but contrary to known juſtice, he did let go Barabbas who had deſerved death, and delivered Chriſt to be crucified, who deſerved no death: which doth manifeſtly declare unto us, that he ſuffered for our ſins, and was buffetted for our offences, as the prophets do witneſs, thereby to have it manifeſted to all men, that he is that Lamb of God that taketh away the ſins of the world. Therefore ſuffering for our ſins, he received and did bear our deſerved condemnation, the pains of death, the taſte of abjection, the very terror of hell, yielding his ſpirit to his Father, his body to be buried in earth.

"The third day he roſe again from death to life."

To make full and perfect the whole work of our redemption and juſtification, the ſame crucified body which was laid in the grave, was raiſed up the third day from death, by the power of his Father, and glory of his Godhead: he became the firſt fruits of the reſurrection, and got the victory of death, that all by him might be raiſed up from death. Through whom all true penitent ſinners may now boldly come unto the Father, and have remiſſion of their ſins.

"He aſcended into heaven, and ſitteth on the right hand of God the Father Almighty."

After that in his death and reſurrection he had conquered ſin, death, and the devil, and had been converſant forty days in the earth, being ſeen of the apoſtles, and more than five hundred brethren at once, in the ſame body in which he wrought the work of our ſalvation, he aſcended into heaven with eternal triumph, for the victory over death, ſin, and hell, leaving the paſſage open, by which all true believers may and ſhall enter into his kingdom, where he now ſitteth at his Father's right hand, that is to ſay, in power and glory equal, in majeſty co-eternal.

"From thence he ſhall come to judge the quick and the dead."

He ſhall appear again in great glory to receive his elect unto himſelf, and to put his enemies under his feet, changing all living men in a moment, and raiſing up all that be dead, that all may be brought to his judgment. In this ſhall he give to each man according to his deeds. They which have followed him in regeneration, which have their ſins waſhed away in his blood, and are cloathed with his righteouſneſs, ſhall receive the everlaſting kingdom, and reign with him for ever; and they, which after the race of the corrupt generation of Adam have followed fleſh and blood, ſhall receive everlaſting damnation with the devil and his angels.

"I believe in the Holy Ghoſt."

I do believe that the Holy Ghoſt is God, the third perſon in the Trinity, in unity of the Godhead equal with the Father and the Son, given through Chriſt to inhabit our ſpirits, by which we are made to feel and underſtand the great power, virtue, and loving kindneſs of Chriſt our Lord. For he illuminateth, quickeneth, and certifieth our ſpirit, that by him we are ſealed up unto the day of redemption, by whom we are regenerate and made new creatures, ſo that by him and through him we do receive all the abundant goodneſs promiſed us in Jeſus Chriſt.

" The holy catholic church."

This is an holy number of Adam's poſterity, elected, gathered, waſhed, and purified by the blood of the Lamb from the beginning of the world, and is diſperſed through the ſame by the tyranny of Gog and Magog; that is to ſay, the Turk and his tyranny, and Antichriſt, otherwiſe named the biſhop of Rome, and his angels, as this day alſo doth teach.

" The communion of ſaints."

Which moſt holy congregation (being, as St. Paul teacheth, built upon the foundation of the apoſtles and prophets, Chriſt being the head corner ſtone), tho' it be by tyranny of Satan and his miniſters perſecuted, ſome by impriſonment, ſome by death, and ſome by other afflictions and painful torments; yet doth it remain in one perfect unity, both in faith and fellowſhip: which unity is knit in an unſpeakable knot, as well of them which are departed from this mortal life, as of them which now be living, and hereafter ſhall be in the ſame, and ſo ſhall continue until they all do meet in the kingdom, where the head Jeſus Chriſt, with all his holy members (of which number thro' Chriſt I aſſuredly believe I am one), ſhall be fully compleat, knit, and united together for evermore.

" The forgiveneſs of ſins."

I do believe that my ſins, and all their ſins which do rightly believe the holy ſcripture, are forgiven only thro' Jeſus Chriſt, of whom only I do profeſs that I have my whole and full ſalvation and redemption, which St. Paul ſaith, cometh not thro' our works and deſervings, but freely by grace, leſt any ſhould boaſt himſelf. Thro' the blood of the croſs all things in heaven and earth are reconciled, and ſet at peace with the Father: without him no heavenly life given, nor ſin forgiven.

" The reſurrection of the body."

I do believe, that by the ſame my Saviour Chriſt, I and all men ſhall riſe again from death; for he, as St. Paul ſaith, is riſen again from the dead, and is become the firſt fruits of them which ſleep. For by a man came death, and by a man cometh the reſurrection from death. This man is Chriſt, thro' the power of whoſe reſurrection I believe that we all ſhall riſe again in theſe our bodies; the godly cloathed with immortality, to live with Chriſt for ever; the wicked alſo ſhall riſe immortal, to live with the devil and his angels in death everlaſting.

" And the life everlaſting."

Through the ſame Jeſus, and by none other, I am ſure to have life everlaſting. He only is the way and entrance into the kingdom of heaven. " For ſo God loved the world, that he did give his only Son Jeſus Chriſt, to the end that ſo many as do believe in him might have everlaſting life." Which I am ſure to poſſeſs ſo ſoon as I am diſſolved, and departed out of this tabernacle, and in the laſt day both body and ſoul ſhall poſſeſs the ſame for ever, to which God grant all men to come.

I believe, that the ſacraments, that is to ſay, of baptiſm and of the Lord's-ſupper, are ſeals of God's moſt merciful promiſes towards mankind. In baptiſm, as by the outward creature of water I am waſhed from the filthineſs which hangeth on my fleſh; ſo do I aſſuredly believe, that I am by Chriſt's blood waſhed clean from my ſins, thro' which I have ſure confidence of my certain ſalvation. In the partaking of the Lord's-ſupper, as I receive the ſubſtance of bread and wine (the nature of which is to ſtrengthen the body), ſo do I by faith receive the redemption wrought in Chriſt's body broken on the croſs, life by his death, reſurrection by his reſurrection, and in ſum, all that ever Chriſt in his body ſuffered for my ſalvation, to the ſtrengthening of my faith in the ſame. And I believe, that God hath appointed the eating and drinking of the creatures of bread and wine in his holy ſupper according to his word, to move and to ſtir up my mind to believe theſe articles above written.

This is my faith; this do I believe; and I am content by God's grace to confirm and ſeal the truth of the ſame with my blood.

By me, John Warne.

Mr. Cardmaker's Letter to his Friend.

THE peace of God be with you. You ſhall right well perceive that I am not gone back, as ſome men do report of me, but as ready to give my life, as any of my brethren, that are gone before me, altho' by a policy I have a little prolonged it, and that for the beſt, as already it appeareth unto me, and ſhall ſhortly appear unto all. That day that I recant any point of doctrine, I ſhall ſuffer twenty kinds of death, the Lord being mine aſſiſtance, as I doubt not but he will. Commend me to my friend, and tell him no leſs. This the Lord ſtrengthen you, me, and all his elect: my riches and poverty is as it was wont to be, and I have learned to rejoice in poverty as well as riches, for that I account now to be very riches. Thus fare ye well in Chriſt. Salute all my brethren in my name. I have conferred with ſome of my adverſaries, learned men, and I find that they be but ſophiſts and ſhadows.

Mr. Cardmaker being condemned, and in Newgate, one Mr. Beard came to him two or three days before he ſuffered death, and ſaid unto him, Sir, I am ſent unto you by the council, to know whether you will recant or no?

Card. From which council are ye come? I think ye are not come, nor yet ſent from the queen's council, but rather from the commiſſioners, unto whom (as I ſuppoſe) ye belong. And whereas you would know, whether I will recant or no, thus I pray you report of me to thoſe whom ye ſaid ſent you. I know you are a tailor by your occupation, and have endeavoured yourſelf to be a cunning workman, and thereby to get your living: ſo I have been a preacher theſe twenty years, and ever ſince that God by his great mercy hath opened mine eyes to ſee his eternal truth, I have by his grace endeavoured myſelf to call upon him, to give me the true underſtanding of his holy word, and I thank him for his great mercy; I hope I have diſcharged my conſcience in the ſetting forth of the ſame, to that little talent that I have received.

Beard. Yea, Sir; but what ſay you to the bleſſed ſacrament of the altar?

Card. I ſay, and mark it well, that Chriſt, the night before his bitter paſſion, ordained the holy and bleſſed communion, and hath given commandment, that his death ſhould be preached before the receiving thereof, in remembrance of his body broken, and his precious blood ſhed for the forgiveneſs of our ſins, to as many as faithfully believe and truſt in him.

And furthermore, to conclude the matter briefly with him, he aſked of him, Whether the ſacrament he ſpake of had a beginning or no? Whereunto when he had granted and affirmed the ſame to be, then Mr. Cardmaker again thus inferred thereupon: If the ſacrament (ſaid he), as you confeſs, have a beginning and an ending, then it cannot be God; for God had no beginning nor ending: and ſo deſiring him well to note the ſame, he departed from him.

The fifth day, Mr. Secretary Bourne, the maſter of the rolls, Sir Francis Englefield, Sir Richard Read, and Dr. Hughes, authorizing them, or two or three of them at the leaſt, to proceed to further examination of Benger, Cary, D. and Field, upon ſuch points as they ſhall gather out of their former confeſſions, concerning their lewd and vain practice of calculating or conjuring, preſently ſent unto them with the ſaid letters.

The ſeventh day there was another letter to Sir John Tregonwel, willing him to join in commiſſion with the ſaid lord North, and others abovenamed, about the examination of the ſaid parties and others, for conjuring and witchcraft.

And the 29th of Auguſt, Cary and D. were ſet at liberty upon bonds for their good appearing until Chriſtmas after.

The twelfth day a letter was ſent to the lord treaſurer, to cauſe writs to be made to the ſheriff of Suſſex, for the burning and executing of Dirike a brewer, at Lewes, and two others, the one at Stainings, the other at Chicheſter.

The 23d of June a letter was ſent to Bonner, to examine a report given to the council of four pariſhes in the county of Eſſex, that ſtill uſed the Engliſh ſervice, and to puniſh the offenders, if any ſuch be.

The Hiſtory of John Ardeley and John Simſon, of the Pariſh of Wigborow the Great, in Eſſex.

JOHN Ardeley and John Simſon were condemned for the ſame cauſe and on the ſame day with Mr. Cardmaker and John Warne, which was the 25th day of May. But before we come to the ſtory of them, firſt here is to be noted the copy of the king and queen's letter directed from the court the ſame day, and ſent by a poſt early in the morning to biſhop Bonner, in tenor and form as followeth.

"RIGHT reverend father in God, right truſty and well beloved, we greet you well. And where of late we addreſſed our letters to the juſtices of peace within every of the counties of this our realm, whereby amongſt other inſtructions given them for the good order and quiet government of the country round about them, they are willed to have a ſpecial regard unto ſuch diſordered perſons as (forgetting their duties towards God and us), do lean to any erroneous and heretical opinions, refuſing to ſhew themſelves conformable to the catholic religion of Chriſt's church; wherein if they cannot by good admonitions and fair means reform them, they are willed to deliver them to the ordinary, to be by him charitably travailed withal, and removed (if it may be), from their naughty opinions, or elſe if they continue obſtinate, to be ordered according to the laws provided in that behalf: underſtanding now, to our no little marvel, that divers of the ſaid diſordered perſons, being by the juſtices of peace for their contempt and obſtinacy, brought to the ordinaries to be uſed as is aforeſaid, are either refuſed to be received at their hands, or if they be received, are neither ſo travailed with, as chriſtian charity requireth, nor yet proceeded withal according to the order of juſtice, but are ſuffered to continue in their errors, to the diſhonour of Almighty God, and dangerous example of others; like as we find this matter very ſtrange, ſo we have thought convenient both to ſignify our knowledge, and therewith alſo to admoniſh you to have in this behalf ſuch regard henceforth to the office of a good paſtor and biſhop, as when any ſuch offenders ſhall be by the ſaid officers or juſtices of the peace brought unto you, you do uſe your good wiſdom and diſcretion in procuring to remove them from their errors, if it may be, or elſe in proceeding againſt them (if they ſhall continue obſtinate), according to the order of the laws; ſo as through your good furtherance, both God's glory may be better advanced, and the commonwealth more quietly governed. Given under our ſignet, at our manor of Hampton-court, the 24th of May, the firſt and ſecond years of our reign."

This letter coming from the court to the biſhop, made him the more earneſt and haſty to the condemnation, as well of others, as of theſe men, of whom we are now treating, namely, Mr. John Simſon and Mr. John Ardeley. Who being both of one country, of one town, and of one trade, that is, being both huſbandmen in the town of Wigborow in Eſſex, and alſo almoſt both of one age, Simſon being of the age of 34. the other of 30. were brought up both together by the under-ſheriff of Eſſex, to Bonner biſhop of London, upon the accuſation of hereſy, as in that time it was called.

As concerning the order and manner of their examinations before the biſhop, as the articles objected againſt them were much alike, ſo their anſwers again to the ſame were not much different in manner and form; as here followeth, taken out of the biſhop's own regiſters.

Articles objected by Biſhop Bonner againſt John Simſon and John Ardeley, Huſbandmen, at Fulham.

1. THAT thou John Simſon (or John Ardeley), huſbandman, of the age of 34 years or thereabouts, waſt and art of the pariſh of Great Wigborow, within the dioceſe of London, and thou haſt not believed, nor doſt believe, that there is here in earth one catholic and univerſal whole church, which doth hold and believe all the faith and religion of Chriſt, and all the neceſſary articles and ſacraments of the ſame.

2. Item, That thou haſt not believed, nor doſt believe, that thou art neceſſarily bounden, under the pain of damnation of thy ſoul, to give full faith and credence unto the ſaid catholic and univerſal church, and to the religion of the ſame, in all neceſſary points of the ſaid faith and religion, without wavering or doubting in the ſaid faith or religion, or in any part thereof.

3. Item, That thou haſt not believed, nor doſt believe, that that faith and religion, which both the church of Rome, Italy, Spain, England, France, Ireland, Scotland, and all other churches in Europe, being the members and parts of the ſaid catholic and univerſal church, do believe and teach, is both agreeing with the ſaid catholic and univerſal church, and the faith and religion of Chriſt, and alſo is the very true faith and religion which all chriſtian people ought to believe, obſerve, follow, and keep; but contrariwiſe thou haſt believed, and doſt believe, that that faith and religion, which the ſaid church of Rome, and all the other churches aforeſaid have heretofore believed, and do now believe, is falſe, erroneous, and naught, and in no wiſe ought to be believed, obſerved, kept, and followed by any chriſtian man.

4. Item, That albeit it be true, that in the ſacrament of the altar there is in ſubſtance the very body and blood of Chriſt under the forms of bread and wine, and albeit that it be ſo believed, taught, and preached undoubtedly in the ſaid church of Rome, and all other the churches aforeſaid, yet thou haſt not ſo believed, nor doſt ſo believe; but contrariwiſe thou haſt and doſt believe firmly and ſtedfaſtly, that there is not in the ſaid ſacrament of the altar, under the ſaid forms of bread and wine, the very ſubſtance of Chriſt's body and blood, but that there is only the ſubſtance of material and common bread and wine, with the forms thereof; and that the ſaid material and common bread and wine, are only the ſigns and tokens of Chriſt's body and blood, and by faith to be received, only for a remembrance of Chriſt's paſſion and death, without any ſuch ſubſtance of Chriſt's body and blood at all.

5. Item, That thou haſt believed and taught, and thou haſt openly ſpoken, and to thy power maintained and defended, and ſo doſt believe, think, maintain, and defend, that the very true receiving and eating of Chriſt's body and blood, is only to take material and common bread, and to break it, and to diſtribute it amongſt the people, remembering thereby the paſſion and death of Chriſt only.

6. Item, That thou haſt likewiſe believed, taught, and ſpoken, that the maſs now uſed in this realm of England, and and other the churches aforeſaid, is abominable and naught, and full of idolatry, and is of the ordinance of the pope, and not of the inſtitution of Chriſt, and hath no goodneſs in it, ſaving the Gloria in Excelſis, and the epiſtle and the goſpel, and that therefore thou haſt not, nor wilt not come to be preſent at the maſs, nor receive the ſacrament of the altar, or any other ſacrament of the church, as they are now uſed in this realm of England, and other the churches aforeſaid.

7. Item, That thou haſt in times paſt believed preciſely, and obſtinately affirmed and ſaid, and ſo doſt now believe and think, that auricular confeſſion is not needful to be made unto the prieſt, but it is a thing ſuperfluous and vain, and ought only to be made to God, and to none other perſon: and likewiſe thou haſt condemned as ſuperfluous, vain, and unprofitable, all the ceremonies of the church and the ſervice of the ſame, and haſt ſaid that no ſervice in the church ought to be ſaid but in the Engliſh tongue, and if it be otherwiſe ſaid, it is unlawful and naught.

John Simſon and John Ardeley's Anſwers to the aforeſaid Articles.

TO the firſt, they believe, that here in earth there is one catholic and univerſal holy church, which doth hold and believe as is contained in the firſt article, and that this church is diſperſed and ſcattered abroad throughout the whole world.

To the ſecond, they believe (that they be bound to give faith and credence unto it, as is contained in the ſecond article.

To the third, as concerning the faith and religion of the church of Rome, of Italy, Spain, France, Ireland, Scotland, and other churches in Europe, they ſay, they have nothing to do with that faith and religion; but as concerning the faith and religion of England, that if the ſaid church of England be ruled and governed by the word of life, then the church of England hath the faith and religion of the catholic church, and not otherwiſe; and do ſay alſo, that if the church of England were ruled by the word of life, it would go about to condemn them and others of this hereſy.

To the fourth they anſwer, that in the ſacrament, commonly called the ſacrament of the altar, there is very bread and very wine, not altered nor changed in ſubſtance in any wiſe; and that he that receiveth the ſaid bread and wine, doth ſpiritually and by faith only receive the body and blood of Chriſt, but not the very natural body and blood of Chriſt in ſubſtance under the forms of bread and wine.

To the fifth they ſay, they have anſwered, anſwering to the ſaid fourth article; and yet nevertheleſs they ſay, that they have believed, and do believe, that in the ſacrament of the altar there is not the very ſubſtance of Chriſt's body and blood, but only the ſubſtance of the natural bread and wine.

To the ſixth they ſay, that they believe, that the maſs is of the pope, and not of Chriſt; and therefore it is not good, nor having in it any goodneſs, ſaving the Gloria in Excelſis, the epiſtle and goſpel, the creed, and the Pater noſter; and for this cauſe they ſay they have not, nor will not come and hear maſs.

To the ſeventh, John Ardeley anſwereth and ſaith, That he believeth the contents of the ſame to be true; but John Simſon doth anſwer, that he is not as yet fully reſolved with himſelf, what anſwer to make thereunto; and further, that as touching the common and daily ſervice ſaid and uſed in the church, he ſaith, that he never ſaid, that ſervice in the church ought to be ſaid but in the Engliſh tongue, nor yet he never ſaid, that if it be otherwiſe ſaid and uſed than in Engliſh, it is unlawful and naught.

John Ardeley and John Simſon.

Theſe articles being thus objected to them, and their anſwers made unto the ſame, as before, the biſhop, according to his uſual manner, reſpited them to the afternoon, between the hours of two and three. At which time the biſhop repeating again the ſaid articles unto them, and beginning with John Ardeley, did urge and ſolicit him to recant.

To whom John Ardeley anſwered in the following words: My lord, quoth he, neither you, nor any ether of your religion, is of the catholic church; for you be of a falſe faith: and I doubt not but you ſhall be deceived at length, bear as good a face as ye can. Ye will ſhed the innocent blood, and you have killed many, and yet go about to kill more, &c.

And added further, ſaying, If every hair of my head were a man, I would ſuffer death in the opinion and faith I now profeſs. Theſe with many other words he ſpake. Then the biſhop yet demanded if he would relinquiſh his erroneous opinions (as he called them), and be reduced again to the unity of the church. He anſwered, No, God forbid that I ſhould ſo do, for then I ſhould loſe my ſoul.

After this the ſaid biſhop read the ſentence of condemnation againſt him, as he alſo did againſt John Simſon, ſtanding likewiſe in the ſame cauſe and conſtancy with John Ardeley, after aſking them in his formal manner; if they knew any cauſe why ſentence ſhould not be pronounced againſt them: which was done the 25th of May, and ſo were both committed to the ſecular power, that is, to the hands of the ſheriffs, to be conveyed to the place where they ſhould be executed. But before I come to their execution, I muſt not omit what happened in the cloſing up the examination of theſe good men, which is this.

At the time of the examination of John Simſon and John Ardeley aforeſaid, there were aſſembled ſuch a great multitude of people, that becauſe the conſiſtory was not able to hold them, they were fain to ſtand in the church, near about the ſaid conſiſtory, waiting to ſee the priſoners when they ſhould depart. It happened in the mean time, that the biſhop being ſet in a heat with the ſtout and bold anſwers of the ſaid two priſoners (eſpecially of John Simſon), burſt out in his loud and angry voice, and ſaid, Have him away, Have him away.

The people in the church hearing theſe words, and thinking (becauſe the day was far ſpent), that the priſoners had their judgment, they being deſirous to ſee the priſoners had to Newgate, ſevered themſelves, ſome running one way, others another way, which cauſed ſuch a noiſe in the church, that they in the conſiſtory were all amazed, and marvelled what it ſhould mean: wherefore the biſhop alſo being ſomewhat afraid of this ſudden ſtir, aſked what there was to do. The ſtanders by anſwering and ſaid, That there was like to be ſome tumult, for they were together by the ears.

When the biſhop heard this, by and by his heart was in his heels, and leaving his ſeat, he with the reſt of the court betook them to their legs, haſtening with all ſpeed poſſible to recover the door that went into the biſhop's houſe: but the reſt being ſomewhat lighter of foot than my lord, did ſooner recover the door, and thronging haſtily to get in, keep the biſhop ſtill out, and cried, Save my Lord, Save my Lord; but meaning yet firſt to ſave themſelves if any danger ſhould come, whereby they gave the ſtanders by good matter to laugh at. But of this matter enough.

Now John Simſon and John Ardeley being delivered (as is aforeſaid) to the ſheriffs, were ſhortly after ſent down from London to Eſſex, where they were both put to death in one day, but not in the ſame place, for John Simſon ſuffered at Rochford, and John Ardeley at Railey.

For the better conſideration of the rigorous cruelty of theſe catholic days, this is furthermore worthy of all men to be noted, and known to all poſterity, concerning the examinations of John Ardeley and his company, how that they being brought before the commiſſioners, were by them greatly charged of ſtubbornneſs and vain-glory. Unto whom they anſwered in defence of their own ſimplicity, that they were content willingly to yield to the queen all their goods and lands, that they might be ſuffered to live under her, in keeping their conſcience free from all idolatry and popery. Yet this would not be granted, although they had offered all to their heart blood; ſo greedy and ſo thirſty be theſe perſecutors of chriſtian blood. The Lord give them repentance if it be his will, and keep from them the juſt reward of ſuch cruel dealing, Amen.

The ridiculous Proceedings of Biſhop Bonner, againſt John Tooly, whoſe Body being taken up out of his Grave, was given to the ſecular Power, and ſo burned for an Heretic.

ABOUT the ſame time of the burning of theſe two foreſaid, in the beginning of the month of June, fell out a ſolemn proceſs, and much ado was made about the pope's ſpirituality, againſt John Tooly in a caſe of hereſy. The ſtory is this: There was about the time that the Spaniards began firſt to make a ſtir in England, one John Tooly a citizen and poulterer in London, who conſpired with others of his ſociety to rob a Spaniard at St. James's: and although the deed was heinous and wicked of itſelf, yet was it aggravated and made greater than it was by others, being committed againſt ſuch a perſon, and againſt ſuch a country, which both the queen and her whole court did highly favour. The robbery being known, and brought into judgment, John Tooly was found guilty, and judged to be hanged, whereas notwithſtanding in this realm there are many more thefts committed than thieves executed.

The aforeſaid Tooly being led to the gallows (which ſtood near Charing Croſs), a little before he died, ſtanding upon the cart, read a certain prayer in a printed book, and two other prayers written in two ſeveral papers: who then having the halter about his neck, deſired the people there preſent to pray for him, and to bear him witneſs that he died a true chriſtian man, and that he truſted to be ſaved only by the merits of Chtiſt's paſſion, and ſhedding of his precious blood, and not by any maſſes, or trentals, images, or ſaints, which were, as he ſaid, mere idolatry and ſuperſtition, and deviſed by the biſhop of Rome; and as the ſame Tooly, and two others his fellows which were there hanged with him, did ſteal and rob for covetouſneſs, ſo the biſhop of Rome did ſell his maſſes and trentals, with ſuch paltry, for covetouſneſs, and there being a great anger (as appeared), againſt the biſhop of Rome, ſpake with a loud voice theſe words following; "From the tyranny of the biſhop of Rome, and all his deteſtable enormities; from falſe doctrine and hereſy, and from the contempt of thy word and commandment, good Lord, deliver us."

And then adding further to the ſame, he ſpake unto the people; All you that be true chriſtian men, ſay with me, Amen. And immediately thereupon 300 perſons and more, to the judgment and eſtimation of thoſe that were there preſent, anſwered and ſaid, Amen, three times together at leaſt.

After this it happened, that when John Tooly had read the bill the firſt time, it fell from him, and a certain young man (who was thought to be an apprentice), ſtooped down and took up the bill, and climbed up by the cart, and delivered it to Tooly again, which he again did read to the people. That done, he delivered unto one of the marſhal's officers the book aforeſaid, and deſired him to deliver it to one Mr. Haukes, ſaying, that it was his book. Furthermore, he delivered one of the prayers, written in a paper, to one Robert Bromely, ſerjeant, who deſired to have it of him; on the top of which was written a line, containing theſe words, Beware of Antichriſt; and ſubſcribed underneath, Per me Thomas Harold, priſoner in the Marſhalſea, enemy to Antichriſt. For the bill aforeſaid, Robert Bromely was afterward brought, and was fain to aſk pardon of the biſhop, and to deteſt all the words of Tooly, and glad ſo to eſcape.

Thus while Tooley had made his prayers, as is aboveſaid, to be delivered from the pope's tytanny, by the ſame prayer he fell into great tyranny. For ſo ſoon as the report of this fact came to the ears of the prieſts and mitred prelates, they were not a little mad thereat, thinking it not tolerable that ſo great a reproach ſhould be done againſt the holy father; calling therefore for a council together, as though it had been a matter of great importance, Tooly's talk at his death was debated among them. At laſt (after much pro and contra) they all conſented to thoſe men's judgment, who thought it meet that the violating of the pope's holineſs ſhould be revenged with fire and faggot. And I do eaſily believe that cardinal Poole was no ſmall doer in this ſentence; for as Wincheſter and Bonner did always thirſt after the blood of the living, ſo Pool's lightning was for the moſt part kindled againſt the dead; and he reſerved this charge only to himſelf, I know not for what purpoſe, except peradventure being loth to be ſo cruel as the other, he thought nevertheleſs by this means to diſcharge his duty towards the pope. By the ſame cardinal's order the bones of Martin Bucer and Paulus Phagius, which had been almoſt two years in their graves, were taken up and burned at Cambridge, as Tooly's carcaſe was here at London. And beſides this, becauſe he would ſhew ſome token of his diligence in both univerſities, he cauſed Peter Martyr's wife, a woman of worthy memory, to be digged out of the church-yard, to be buried on the dunghill. Of theſe two prodigious acts ye ſhall hear more hereafter. But now to our purpoſe of Tooly, who having ended his prayer, was hanged, and put into his grave, out of which he was digged again, by the command of the biſhops; and becauſe he was ſo bold to derogate the authority of the biſhop of Rome, at the time of his death, it pleaſed them to judge and condemn him as an heretic, upon the commandment of the council's letter, as here appeareth.

The Council's Letter to Biſhop Bonner.

AFTER our very hearty commendations to your lordſhip, underſtanding that of late, amongſt others that have ſuffered about London for their offences, one lewd perſon that was condemned for felony died very obſtinately, profeſſing at the time of his death ſundry heretical and erroneous opinions; like as we think it not convenient that ſuch a matter ſhould be overpaſſed without ſome example to the world, ſo we thought good to pray your lordſhip to cauſe further enquiry to be made thereof, and thereupon to proceed to the making out of ſuch proceſs as by the eccleſiaſtical laws is provided in that behalf. And ſo we bid your lordſhip heartily well to fare. From Hampton-Court, April 28. 1555.

The

The Writ or Mandate of Biſhop Bonner, ſet up at Charing-croſs, St. Paul's Church Door, and at St. Martin's in the Fields, for the citing and further enquiring out of the Caſe of John Tooly.

EDmund by the ſufferance of God, biſhop of London, to all and ſingular parſons, vicars, curates, and others, clerks and learned men, being within our dioceſe of London, and eſpecially unto Richard Clony, our ſworn ſumner; greeting, ſalutation, and benediction. Foraſmuch as it is come to our hearing by common fame, and the declaration of ſeveral credible perſons, that one John Tooly late citizen and poulterer of London, the ſon of perdition and iniquity, coming to the profundity of malice at the ſelf-ſame time in which he ſhould go to hanging, according to the laws of the realm, for the great theft lately by him committed, at which time chiefly he ſhould have cared for the wealth of his ſoul, and to have died in the unity of the catholic church, did utter divers and ſundry damnable, blaſphemous and heretical opinions and errors, utterly contrary and repugnant to the verity of the catholic faith, and unity of the ſame, and did exhort, ſtir up, and encourage the people, there ſtanding in great multitude, to hold and defend the ſame errors and opinions: and moreover, certain of the people there ſtanding, as did appear, affected with errors and hereſies, as favourers and defenders of the ſaid John, did confirm and give expreſs conſent to the aforeſaid words, propoſitions and affirmations; which thing we do utter with ſorrow and bitterneſs of heart.

We therefore the aforeſaid Edmund, and biſhop aboveſaid, not being able, nor daring to paſs over in ſilence, nor wink at the aforeſaid heinous act, leſt by our negligence and ſlackneſs the blood of them might be required at our hands at the moſt terrible day of judgment, deſiring to be certified and informed whether the premiſſes declared unto us, be of the truth, and leſt that any ſcabbed ſheep, lurking amongſt the ſimple flock of our Lord, do infect them with deadly hereſy: to you therefore we ſtraitly charge and command, that you cite, or cauſe to be cited, all and ſingular, having or knowing the truth of the premiſſes, by ſetting up this citation upon the church door of St. Martin's in the Fields, being within our dioceſe of London, and alſo upon the cathedral church door of St. Paul's in London, leaving there the copy hereof, or by other means or ways, the beſt you can, that this citation and monition may come to their knowledge.

All which and ſingular by the tenor of theſe preſents we cite and admoniſh that they appear, and every one of them do appear before us, our vicar general, or commiſſary, whatſoever he be in that behalf, in our cathedral church of St. Paul's in London, in the conſiſtory place, upon Thurſday the 2d day of May, now next enſuing, betwixt the hours of 9 and 10 of the clock in the forenoon the ſame day, to bear witneſs of the truth in this behalf, and to depoſe and declare faithfully the truth that they know or have heard of the premiſſes, and moreover to do and receive what law and reaſon doth require.

Further we commit unto you as before, and ſtraitly enjoining you do command, that ye will generally cite the wife of the ſaid Tooly that is dead, and his children, and his kindred by father and mother, his friends and his familiars in eſpecial, and all other and every of them, if there be any perhaps that deſire to defend and purge the remembrance of the perſon in the premiſſes, that ye admoniſh them after the manner and form aforeſaid, whom we likewiſe, by the tenor of theſe preſents, do in ſuch ſort cite and admoniſh that they appear all, and that every one of them do appear (under pain to be compelled to keep ſilence for ever hereafter in this behalf), before us, or our vicar general in ſpiritual matters, or ſuch our commiſſary, at the day, hour, and place aforeſaid, to defend the good name and remembrance of him that is dead, and to ſay, alledge, and propoſe in due form of law, a cauſe reaſonable, if they have or can tell of any, why the ſaid John Tooly, that is dead, ought not to be determined, and declared for ſuch an heretic and excommunicate perſon, and his remembrance condemned, in the deteſting and condemning of ſo heinous a deed and crime, and his body or carcaſe to lack church burial, as a rotten member cut off from the church, and the ſame to be committed to the arm and power ſecular, and they compelled hereafter for ever to hold their peace.

And furthermore to do, receive, and to ſuffer, as law and reaſon will, and as the quality of ſuch matter, and the nature themſelves do conſtrain and require; and moreover, that you cite and admoniſh, after the manner aforeſaid, all and every of the receivers, favourers, and creditors of the ſaid John Tooly that is dead, eſpecially if any of them do incline and give conſent to thoſe wicked and deteſtable affirmations, propoſitions, and rehearſals aforeſaid, that on this ſide the ſaid Thurſday they return and ſubmit themſelves unto us, and to the lap of the mother holy-church: which thing if they do, we, truſting upon the mercy of Almighty God, do promiſe that we will receive them being penitent for ſuch their errors and faults, with thanks, benignity, mercy, and favour, to the comfort and health of their own ſouls, and in that behalf ſave their honeſties to the uttermoſt of our power: otherwiſe, if they will not provide thus to come of their own accord, but to abide the ordinary proceſs of the law, let thoſe men know that we will puniſh more ſeverely this offence, according to the uttermoſt of the law, and as far as the law will bear it; and what ye ſhall do in the premiſſes, let him among you, which ſhall execute this our preſent mandate, certify us, or our vicar general in ſpiritual matters, either by his own perſon, or by his letters patents, together with theſe authentically ſealed.

Dated at London under our ſeal, the laſt day of April, 1555. and of our tranſlation the 11th.

When the time of this citation was expired, and this Tooly being cited did not appear: next in order of law came the ſuſpenſion (whereas one ſuſpenſion had been enough for him), and after that cometh the excommunication, that is, that no man ſhould eat and drink with him; or if any met him by the way, he ſhould not bid him good-morrow, and beſides that, he ſhould be excluded from the communion of the church. Theſe things being prepared in ſuch a manner, as in ſuch caſes full wiſely they uſe to do, at length one ſtood up that made anſwer to certain articles, rehearſed in judgment openly, and that in the behalf of the dead man. But when the poor dead man could neither ſpeak for himſelf, nor did (as they ſaid) ſufficiently anſwer them by the other, to avoid the name of an heretic; firſt witneſſes were provided againſt him, whoſe names were Henry Clark, Eſquire; Thomas Way, keeper of the Marſhalſea; Philip Andrew, under marſhal; William Holingworth, fiſhmonger; William Gellard, William Walter, chandler; Richard Longman, merchant-taylor; Philip Britten, John Burton, brewer; Thomas Smith, ſerjeant. Then he was condemned for an heretic, and ſo committed to the ſecular power, namely to the ſheriffs of London, who with the like diligence went about to execute their charge. Therefore receiving the man, being ſuſpended, excommunicated, condemned as an heretic, and beſides that, dead, they laid him on the fire to be burned, namely, for a continual remembrance thereof: this was done the fourth day of June.

The Life and Martyrdom of Thomas Haukes, Gent.

IMmediately after the ſtory of Dr. Taylor, mention was made of ſix men brought before biſhop Bonner upon the 8th day of February, whoſe names were Stephen Knight, W. Pigot, Thomas Tomkins, J. Laurence, William Hunter. In which number was alſo Thomas Haukes, and condemned likewiſe with them the 9th day of February. But becauſe his execution did not ſo ſhortly follow with theirs, but was prolonged to the 10th day of June, it followeth therefore now conſequently to enter diſcourſe thereof; firſt, beginning briefly with his pious converſation and inſtitution of life, then ſhewing of his troubles, alſo of his examinations and conflicts with the biſhop and other adverſaries, according as the order of the ſtory doth require.

As touching therefore his education and order of life: firſt, he was of the county of Eſſex, born of an honeſt ſtock, in calling and profeſſion a courtier, brought up daintily from his childhood, and like a gentleman. Beſides that, he was of ſuch comelineſs and ſtature, ſo well endued with excellent qualities, that he might ſeem on every ſide a man (as it were) made for the purpoſe. But his genteel behaviour towards others, and eſpecially his fervent ſtudy and ſingular love unto true religion and piety did ſurmount all the reſt. Wherein as God did ſingularly adorn him; even ſo he, being ſuch a valiant martyr of God, may ſeem to make famous the whole company of other holy martyrs, and as a bright ſtar to make the church of God and his truth, of themſelves bright and clear, more gloriouſly to ſhine by his example.

For if the conqueſts of martyrs are the triumphs of Chriſt (as St. Ambroſe doth notably and truly write), undoubtedly Chriſt in a few men hath either conquered more notably, or triumphed more gloriouſly, than in this young man: he ſtood ſo wiſely in his cauſe, ſo pious in his life, and ſo conſtantly in his death. But to the declaration of the matter:

Firſt, Mr. Haukes following the faſhion of the court, as he grew in years, entered ſervice with the lord of Oxford, where he remained a good ſpace, being there right well eſteemed and loved by all the houſhold, ſo long as Edward the ſixth lived. But he dying, all things began to go backward, religion to decay, true piety not only to wax cold, but alſo to be in danger every where, and chiefly in the houſes of great men. Haukes miſliking the ſtate of things, and eſpecially in ſuch mens houſes, rather than he would change the profeſſion of true godlineſs, which he had taſted, thought to change the place: and ſo forſaking the nobleman's houſe, departed thence to his own home, where more freely he might give himſelf to God, and uſe his own conſcience.

But what place in this world ſhall a man find ſo ſecret for himſelf, whither the old wicked ſerpent cannot creep, whereby he may have ſome matter to overthrow the quietneſs of the godly? Now in the mean ſeaſon (as it happened) Haukes, keeping his houſe at home, had born unto him a young ſon, whoſe baptiſm was deferred to the third week, for that he would not ſuffer him to be baptized after the papiſtical manner; which thing the adverſaries not able to ſuffer, laying hands upon him, did bring him to the earl of Oxford, there to be reaſoned with, as not ſound in religion, in that he ſeemed to contemn the ſacraments of the church.

The earl either intending not to trouble himſelf in ſuch matters, or elſe ſeeing himſelf not able to weigh with him in ſuch caſes of religion; ſent him up to London with a meſſenger, and letters; and ſo, willing to clear his own hands, put him in the hands of Bonner biſhop of London; the contents of which his letter ſent to Bonner, be theſe.

"MOST reverend father in God, be it known unto you, that I have ſent you one Thomas Haukes, dwelling in the county of Eſſex, who hath a child that hath remained unchriſtened more than three weeks; who, being upon the ſame examined, hath denied to have it baptized, as it is now uſed in the church, whereupon I have ſent him to your good lordſhip, to uſe as ye think beſt, by your good diſcretion."

When the biſhop had peruſed this letter, and afterward read it to Mr. Haukes, he hearing the ſame, thought with himſelf that he ſhould not be very well uſed, ſeeing he was put to his diſcretion. Then wrote the biſhop a letter again to him that ſent the priſoner, with many great thanks for his diligence in ſetting forth the queen's proceedings. Then the biſhop began to enter communication with Mr. Haukes, firſt aſking, what ſhould move him to leave his child unchriſtened ſo long? To whom Mr. Haukes anſwered thus again as followeth.

Haukes. Becauſe we be bound to do nothing contrary to the word of God.

Bonner. Why? baptiſm is commanded by the word of God.

Haukes. His inſtitution therein I do not deny.

Bonner. What deny ye then?

Haukes. I deny all things invented and deviſed by man.

Bonner. What things be thoſe that be deviſed by man, that ye be ſo offended withal?

Haukes. Your oil, cream, ſalt, ſpittle, candle, and conjuring of water, &c.

Bonner. Will ye deny that which all the whole world, and your fathers have been contented withal?

Haukes. What my father and all the whole world have done, I have nothing to do withal: but what God hath commanded me to do, to that ſtand I.

Bonner. The catholic church hath taught it.

Haukes. What is the catholic church?

Bonner. It is the faithful congregation, whereſoever it be diſperſed throughout the whole world.

Haukes. Who is the head thereof?

Bonner. Chriſt is the head thereof.

Haukes. Are we taught in Chriſt, or in the church now?

Bonner. Have ye not read in the 14th of St. John, where he ſaid, He would ſend his Comforter which ſhould teach you all things?

Haukes. I grant you it is ſo, that he would ſend his Comforter, but to what end? Forſooth to this end, that he ſhould lead you into all truth and verity, and that is not to teach a new doctrine.

Bonner. Ah, Sir, ye are a right ſcripture man. For ye will have nothing but the ſcripture. There is a great number of your countrymen of your opinion. Do you know one Knight and Pigot?

Haukes. Knight I know, but Pigot I do not know.

Bonner. I thought ye were acquainted with him: it ſeemeth ſo by your judgment. What preachers do ye know in Eſſex.

Haukes. I know none.

Bonner. Do ye not know one Baget there?

Haukes. Yes forſooth, I know him.

Bonner. What manner of man is he?

Haukes. An honeſt man, ſo far as I know.

Bonner. Do you know him if ye ſee him?

Haukes. Yea that I do. Then ſaid he to one of his ſervants, Go call me Baget hither. And then he ſaid to me, Ye ſeem to be a very proud man and a ſtubborn. He that brought me up ſtood all this while by.

Haukes. What ſhould move your lordſhip ſo to ſay?

Bonner. Becauſe I ſee in a man that came with you much humility and lowlineſs.

Haukes. It ſeemeth your lordſhip ſpeaketh that to me, becauſe I make no courteſy to you. And with that came Baget. Then the biſhop ſaid to Baget, How ſay ye, Sir, know ye this man?

Baget. Yes forſooth, my lord. With that Baget and I ſhook hands. Then ſaid the biſhop to Baget, Sir, this man hath a child which hath lain three weeks unchriſtened (as I have letters to ſhew), who refuſeth to have it it baptized, as it is now uſed in the church: how ſay you thereto?

Baget. Forſooth, my lord, I ſay nothing thereto (with low courteſy to the hard ground).

Bonner. Say you nothing thereto? I will make you tell me whether it be laudable, and to be frequented and uſed in the church, or not.

Baget. I beſeech your lordſhip to pardon me, he is old enough, let him anſwer for himſelf.

Bonner. Ah, Sir knave, are ye at that point with me? Go call me the porter, ſaid he, to one of his men. Thou ſhalt ſit in the ſtocks, and have nothing but bread and water. I perceive I have kept you too well. Have I made thus much of you, and have I you at this point? Then came the biſhop's man, and ſaid, The porter is gone to London. Then ſaid the biſhop to Baget, Come with me; and he went away with him, and commanded me away, and bade one of his gentlemen to talk with me (who was one of his own teaching), who deſiring amongſt other things to know of me, with whom I was acquainted in Eſſex, and what men they were that were my teachers.

Haukes. When I ſee your commiſſion, I will make you anſwer. And then immediately came the biſhop again: but before he came, his man and I had much talk. Then the biſhop ſat down under a vine in his orchard, and called Baget to him, whom he carried away, and brought again, and called me alſo, and ſaid to Baget: How ſay ye now, Sir, unto baptiſm? Say whether it be to be frequented and uſed in the church, as it is now, or no?

Baget. Forſooth, my lord, I ſay it is good.

Bonner. I befool your heart, could ye not have ſaid ſo before? ye have wounded this man's conſcience. Then the biſhop turned to me, and ſaid; How ſay ye now, Sir, this man is turned and converted.

Haukes. I build not my faith upon this man, neither upon you, but only upon Chriſt Jeſus, who (as St. Paul ſaith) is the founder and author of all men's faith.

Bonner. I perceive ye are a ſtubborn fellow. I muſt be glad to work another way with you, to win you.

Haukes. Whatſoever ye do, I am ready to ſuffer it; for I am in your hands to abide it.

Bonner. Well ye are ſo, come on your ways, ye ſhall go in, and I will uſe you chriſtian-like: You ſhall have meat and drink, ſuch as I have in my houſe: but in any wiſe talk not.

Haukes. I purpoſe to talk nothing but the wotd of God and truth.

Bonner. I will have no hereſy talked on in my houſe.

Haukes. Why, is the truth become hereſy? God hath commanded that we ſhould have none other talk in our houſes, in our beds, at our meat, and by the way, but all truth.

Bonner. If ye will have my favour, be ruled by my counſel.

Haukes. Then I truſt ye will grant me my requeſt.

Bonner. What is that?

Haukes. That your doctors and ſervants give me no occaſion: for if they do, I will ſurely utter my conſcience. Then he commanded his men to take in Baget, that Haukes and he might have an opportunity to talk together. And ſo thus we departed, and went to dinner, and I dined at the ſteward's table.

After dinner, his chaplains and his men began to talk with me. But amongſt others, there was one named Darbiſhire, principal of Broadgates in Oxford, and the biſhop's kinſman, who ſaid to me, that I was too curious: for ye will have (ſaid he) nothing but your little pretty God's book.

Haukes. And is it not ſufficient for my ſalvation? Yea (ſaid he), it is ſufficient for our ſalvation, but not for our inſtruction.

Haukes. God ſend me the ſalvation, and you the inſtruction. And as we thus reaſoned came the biſhop, who ſaid unto me; I gave you a commandment that you ſhould not talk.

Haukes. And I deſired of you that your doctors and ſervants ſhould give me no occaſion. Then we went into his orchard again, he and I and his doctors.

Bonner: Would not ye be contented to have, that your child ſhould be chriſtened after the book that was ſet out by king Edward?

Haukes. Yes, with a good will; it is the thing that I deſire.

Bonner. I thought ſo: ye would have the ſame thing. The principal is in the name of the Father, the Son, and of the Holy Ghoſt, and in neceſſity it may ſerve.

Haukes. Chriſt did uſe it without any ſuch neceſſity: and yet we lack the chiefeſt point.

Bonner. What is that?

Haukes, "Go teach all nations, baptizing them, &c."

Bonner. Thou ſpeakeſt that, becauſe I am no preacher.

Haukes. I ſpeak the text: I do not mean you. Then ſpake all the doctors, and his men that were with him: He ſpake it of you, my lord (with a great noiſe that they made).

Bonner. Will ye be content to tarry here, and your child ſhall be baptized, and you ſhall not know of it, ſo that you will agree to it?

Haukes. If I would ſo have done, I needed not to have come to you: for I had the ſame counſel given before.

Bonner. You ſeem to be a luſty young man; you will not give your head for the waſhing; you will ſtand in the defence of it for the honour of your country. Do ye think that the queen and I cannot command it to be done in ſpite of your teeth?

Haukes. What the queen and you can do, I will not ſtand in it: but ye get my conſent never the ſooner.

Bonner. Well, you are a ſtubborn young man: I perceive I muſt work another way with you.

Haukes. Ye are in the hands of God, and ſo am I.

Bonner. Whatſoever you think, I will not have you ſpeak ſuch words unto me. And ſo we departed until even-ſong time: and before even-ſong was begun, my lord called for me to come to him in the chapel, and ſaid; Haukes, thou art a proper young man, and God hath done his part unto thee; I would be glad to do thee good. Thou knoweſt that I am thy paſtor, and one that ſhould anſwer for thee. If I would not teach thee well, I ſhould anſwer for thy ſoul.

Haukes. That I have ſaid, I will ſtand to it, God willing: there is no way to remove it.

Bonner. Nay, nay, Haukes, thou ſhalt not be ſo wilful. Remember Chriſt bade two go into his vineyard, the one ſaid he would, and went not; the other ſaid he would not, and went.

Haukes. The laſt went.

Bonner. Do thou likewiſe, and I will talk friendly with thee; how ſayeſt thou? It is in the ſixth of St. John: "I am the bread of life, and the bread that I will give is my fleſh, which I will give for the life of the world. And whoſoever eateth my fleſh and drinketh my blood, hath everlaſting life. My fleſh is very meat indeed, and my blood is drink indeed. And he that eateth my fleſh and drinketh my blood, dwelleth in me, and I in him." Do ye believe this?

Haukes. Yea, I muſt needs believe the ſcriptures.

Bonner. Why, then I truſt that you be found in the bleſſed ſacrament.

Haukes. I beſeech your lordſhip to feel my conſcience no farther than in that, that I was accuſed in unto you.

Bonner. Well, well, let us go unto even-ſong.

With that I turned my back to go out of the chapel.

Bonner. Why, will you not tarry even-ſong?

Haukes. No forſooth.

Bonner. And why?

Haukes. For I will not.

Bonner. And why will ye not?

Haukes. Becauſe I have no edifying thereby, for I underſtand no Latin.

Bonner. Why, you may pray by yourſelf. What books have ye?

Haukes. I have the New Teſtament, the books of Solomon, and the Pſalter.

Bonner. Why I pray you tarry here, and pray you on your Pſalter.

Haukes. I will not pray in this place, nor in any ſuch. Then ſaid one of his chaplains; Let him go, my lord, and he ſhall be no partaker with us in our prayers.

Haukes. I think myſelf beſt at eaſe when I am fartheſt from you. And ſo the biſhop went to even-ſong, and I came down and walked between the hall and the chapel in the court, and tarried there till even-ſong was done; and within an hour after that even-ſong was done, the biſhop ſent for me into his chamber where he lay himſelf, and when I came, there was he and three of his chaplains.

Bonner. Ye know of the talk that was between you and me, as concerning the ſacrament. You would not have your conſcience ſought any farther, than in that ye were accuſed of.

Haukes. I thought you would not be both mine accuſer and judge.

Bonner. Well, ye ſhall anſwer me to the ſacrament of the altar, the ſacrament of baptiſm, the ſacrament of penance, and the ſacrament of matrimony.

Haukes. There is none of theſe, but I dare ſpeak my conſcience in them.

Bonner. The ſacrament of the altar ye ſeem to be found in.

Haukes. In the ſacrament of the altar? why, Sir, I do not know it.

Bonner. Well, we will make you to know it, and believe in it too, before we have done with you.

Haukes. No, that ſhall ye never do.

Bonner. Yes, a faggot will make you do it.

Haukes. No, no, a fig for your faggot. What God thinketh meet to be done, that ſhall ye do, and more ye ſhall not do.

Bonner. Do ye not believe that there remaineth in the bleſſed ſacrament of the altar, after the words of conſecration be ſpoken, no more bread, but the very body and blood of Chriſt? And at that word he put off his cap.

Haukes. I do believe as Chriſt hath taught me.

Bonner. Why? did not Chriſt ſay, "Take, eat, this is my body?"

Haukes. Chriſt ſaid ſo: but therefore it followeth not, that the ſacrament of the altar is ſo as you teach, neither did Chriſt ever teach it ſo to be.

Bonner. Why? the catholic church taught it ſo, and they were of Chriſt's church.

Haukes. How prove you it? The apoſtles never taught it ſo. Read the Acts, the ſecond and the twentieth. Neither St. Peter nor St. Paul ever taught it, neither inſtituted it ſo.

Bonner. Ah, Sir, ye will have no more than the ſcripture teacheth, but even as Chriſt hath left it bare.

Haukes. He that teacheth me any otherwiſe, I will not believe him.

Bonner. Why? then ye muſt eat a lamb, if ye will have but Chriſt's inſtitution only.

Haukes. Nay, that is not ſo: before that Chriſt did inſtitute the ſacrament, that ceremony ceaſed, and then began the ſacrament.

Bonner. Alas, you know not how it began, neither of the inſtitution thereof.

Haukes. Then I would be glad to learn.

Bonner. Marry, we will teach you: but you are ſo ſtubborn, that ye will not learn.

Haukes. Except ye learn me by the word of God, I will never credit you, nor believe you: and thus we concluded. Then the biſhop and his chaplains laughed, and ſaid: Jeſu, Jeſu, what a ſtubbornneſs and arrogantneſs is this? and this was in his chamber where he lay. Then ſaid the biſhop to me, Go ye down and drink, for it is faſting-day: it is Midſummer-Eve, but I think ye love neither faſting nor praying.

Haukes. I will never deny faſting, neither praying, ſo that it be done as it ought to be done, and without hypocriſy or vain-glory.

Bonner. I like you the better for that: and ſo we left for that night.

The next day the biſhop went to London: for Mr. Fecknam was made dean that day, and I tarried ſtill at Fulham.

Then did the biſhop's men deſire me to come to maſs, but I did utterly refuſe it, anſwering them as I did their maſter.

That night the biſhop came home to Fulham again.

Talk between Mr. Harpsfield and Thomas Haukes.

UPON Monday morning very early, the biſhop did call for me. There was with him Mr. Harpſfield archdeacon of London, to whom the biſhop ſaid, This is the man which I told you of, who would not have his child chriſtened, nor will have any ceremonies.

Harpsfield. Chriſt uſed ceremonies. Did he not take clay from the ground, and took ſpittle, and made the blind man to ſee?

Haukes. That I well know, but Chriſt did never uſe it in baptiſm. If ye will needs have it, put it to the uſe that Chriſt put it unto.

Harpſ. Admit your child die unchriſtened: what a heavy caſe ſtand you in?

Haukes. I admit if it do, what then?

Harpſ. Marry then are ye damned, and your child both.

Haukes. Judge you no farther than ye may by the ſcriptures.

Harpſ. Do ye not know that your child is born in original ſin?

Haukes. Yes, that I do.

Harpſ. How is original ſin waſhed away?

Haukes. By true faith and belief in Chriſt Jeſus.

Harpſ. How can your child, being an infant, believe?

Haukes. The deliverance of it from ſin ſtandeth in the faith of his parents.

Harpſ. How prove you that?

Haukes. By St. Paul, in the ſeventh and the firſt to the Corinthians, ſaying, "The unbelieving man is ſanctified by the believing woman, and the unbelieving woman is ſanctified by the believing man, or elſe were your children unclean."

Harpſ. I will prove that they whom thou putteſt thy truſt in, will be againſt thee in this opinion.

Haukes. Who be thoſe?

Harpſ. Your great learned men in Oxford.

Haukes. If they do it by the ſcriptures, I will believe them.

Bonner. Recant, recant: do ye not know that Chriſt ſaid, Except ye be baptized, ye cannot be ſaved?

Haukes. Doth chriſtianity ſtand in outward ceremonies, or no?

Bonner. Partly it doth: what ſay you to that?

Haukes. I ſay as St. Peter ſaith, "Not the waſhing of water purgeth the filthineſs of the fleſh, but a good conſcience conſenting unto God."

Harpſ. Beware of p ide, brother, beware of pride.

Haukes. It is written, "Pride ſerveth not for men, nor yet for the ſons of men."

Bonner. Let us make an end here. How ſay you to the maſs, ſirrah?

Haukes. I ſay it is deteſtable, abominable, and profitable for nothing.

Bonner. What, nothing profitable in it? what ſay you to the epiſtle and goſpel?

Haukes. It is good, if it be uſed as Chriſt left it to be uſed.

Bonner. Well, I am glad that ye ſomewhat recant: recant all, recant all.

Haukes. I have recanted nothing, nor will do.

Bonner. How ſay you to Confiteor?

Haukes. I ſay it is abominable and deteſtable, yea, and a blaſphemy againſt God and his Son Jeſus Chriſt, to call upon any, to truſt to any, or to pray to any, ſave only to Chriſt Jeſus.

Bonner. To truſt to any, we bid you not: but to call upon them, and to pray to them, we bid you. Do ye not know when ye come into the court ye cannot ſpeak with the king and queen, unleſs ye call to ſome of the privy chamber that are next to the king and queen?

Haukes. They that liſt receive your doctrine. You teach me that I ſhould not believe nor truſt in any, but to call on them: and St. Paul ſaith, "How ſhould I call upon him whom I believe not?"

Bonner. Will you have no body to pray for you when you be dead?

Haukes. No ſurely, except you can prove it by the ſcriptures. Then the biſhop pointed unto Harpsfield, and ſaid unto me: Is it not well done to deſire this man to pray for me?

Haukes. Yes ſurely, ſo long as we live, prayer of the righteous man is available: but this man's prayers, you being dead, profiteth nothing at all.

Bonner. Will ye grant the prayer of the righteous man to prevail?

Haukes. I grant it doth for the living, but not for the dead.

Bonner. Not for the dead?

Haukes. No forſooth; for David ſaith, "No man can deliver his brother from death, nor make agreement unto God for him: for it coſt more to redeem their ſouls, ſo that ye muſt let that alone for ever."

Alſo Ezekiel ſaith, "Though Noah, Daniel, or Job dwelt among them, yet can they in their righteouſneſs exceed no farther than themſelves." Then the biſhop ſaid to Harpsfield, Sir, ye ſee this man hath no need of our lady, neither of any of the bleſſed ſaints. Well, I will trouble you no longer; I did call you, hoping that you ſhould do ſome good on him, but it will not be. And he ſaid to me, Sir, it is time to begin with you; we will rid you away, and then we ſhall have one heretic leſs.

Harpſ. What books have you?

Haukes. The New Teſtament, Solomon's books, and the Pſalter.

Harpſ. Will you read any other books?

Haukes. Latimer's books, my lord of Canterbury's book, Bradford's ſermons, Ridley's books.

Bonner. Away, away, he will have no books but ſuch as maintain his hereſies. And ſo they departed, for Harpsfield was booted to ride unto Oxford, and I went to the porter's lodge again.

The next day came thither an old biſhop, who had a pearl in his eye, and he brought with him to my lord a diſh of apples, and a bottle of wine. For he had loſt his living, becauſe he had a wife. Then the biſhop called me again into the orchard, and ſaid to the old biſhop: This young man hath a child, and will not have it chriſtened.

Haukes. I deny not baptiſm.

Bonner. Thou art a fool, thou can'ſt not tell what thou wouldeſt have. And that he ſpake with much anger.

Haukes. A biſhop muſt be blameleſs or faultleſs, ſober, diſcreet, no chider, nor given to anger.

Bonner. Thou judgeſt me to be angry: no by my faith am I not; and ſtroke himſelf upon his breaſt.

Then ſaid the old biſhop, Alas good young man, you muſt be taught by the church, and by your ancients, and do as your forefathers have done before you.

Bonner. No, no, he will have nothing but the ſcriptures, and God knows he doth not underſtand them. He will have no ceremonies in the church, no not one. What ſay you to holy water?

Haukes. I ſay to it, as to the reſt, and to all that be of his making that made them.

Bonner. Why the ſcriptures do allow it.

Haukes. Where prove you that?

Bonner. In the book of the Kings, where Eliſha threw ſalt into the water.

Haukes. Ye ſay truth; that it is written in the ſecond book of Kings, the ſecond chapter; the children of the prophets came to Eliſha, ſaying, "The dwelling of the city is pleaſant, but the waters be corrupted." This was the cauſe that Eliſha threw ſalt into the water, and it became ſweet and good: and ſo when our waters be corrupted, if ye can by putting in of ſalt make them ſweet, clear, and wholeſome, ye will the better believe your ceremonies.

Bonner. How ſay you to holy bread?

Haukes. Even as I ſaid to the other. What ſcripture have you to defend it?

Bonner. Have you not read where Chriſt fed five thouſand men, with five loaves and three fiſhes.

Haukes. Will ye make that holy bread? There Chriſt dealt fiſh with his holy bread?

Bonner. Look I pray you how captious this man is?

Haukes. Chriſt did not this miracle, or other, becauſe we ſhould do the like miracle, but becauſe we ſhould believe and credit his doctrine thereby.

Bonner. We believe no doctrine, but that which is wrought by miracles.

Haukes. No forſooth, for Chriſt ſaith, "Theſe tokens ſhall follow them that believe in me: they ſhall ſpeak with new tongues, they ſhall caſt out devils, and if they drink any deadly poiſon, it ſhall not hurt them."

Bonner. With what new tongues do ye ſpeak?

Haukes. Forſooth, where before that I came to the knowledge of God's word, I was a foul blaſphemer and filthy talker; ſince I came to the knowledge thereof, I have lauded God, praiſed God, and given thanks to God, even with the ſame tongue; and is not this a new tongue?

Bonner. How do you caſt out devils?

Haukes. Chriſt did caſt them out by his word, and he hath left the ſame word, that whoſoever doth credit and believe it, ſhall caſt out devils.

Bonner. Did you ever drink any deadly poiſon?

Haukes. Yea forſooth that I have; for I have drank of the peſtilent traditions and ceremonies of the biſhop of Rome.

Bonner. Now you ſhew yourſelf to be a right heretic?

Haukes. I pray you, what is hereſy?

Bonner. All things that are contrary to God's word.

Haukes. If I ſtand in any thing contrary hereto, then am I worthy to be ſo called.

Bonner. Thou art one, and thou ſhalt be burned, if thou ſtand and continue in this opinion. Ye think we are afraid to put one of you to death: yes, yes, there is a brotherhood of you, but I will break it, I warrant you.

Haukes. Where prove you that Chriſt or his apoſtles did kill any man for his faith?

Bonner. Did not Paul excommunicate?

Haukes. Yes my lord; but there is a great difference between excommunicating and burning.

Bonner. Have ye not read of the man and the woman in the Acts of the Apoſtles, whom Peter deſtroyed.

Haukes. Yes forſooth, I have read of one Ananias, and Sapphira his wife, who were deſtroyed for lying againſt the Holy Ghoſt, which ſerveth nothing to your purpoſe.

Bonner. Well, you will grant one yet.

Haukes. Well, if you will have us to grant you be of God, then ſhew mercy, for that God requireth.

Bonner. We will ſhew ſuch mercy unto you, as ye ſhewed unto us: for my benefice or biſhoprick was taken away from me, ſo that I had not one penny to live upon.

Haukes. I pray ye, my lord, what do ye give him now that was in the biſhoprick or benefice before that ye came again to it? Whereunto he anſwered me never a word: for he turned his back upon me, and talked with other men, ſaying that he was very ſorry for me, but he truſted that I would turn with St. Paul, becauſe I was ſo earneſt; and ſo he departed and went to dinner, and I to the porter's lodge again.

After dinner I was called into the hall again, and the biſhop deſired the old biſhop to take me into his chamber; for I would be glad (ſaid he), if ye could convert him. So he took me into his chamber, and ſate him down in a chair, and ſaid to me; I would to God I could do ye ſome good; ye are a young man, and I would not wiſh you to go too far, but learn of your elders to bear ſomewhat.

Haukes. I will bear with nothing that is contrary to the word of God. And I looked that the old biſhop ſhould have made me an anſwer, and he was faſt aſleep.

Then I departed out of the chamber alone, and went to the porter's lodge again, and there ſaw I the old biſhop laſt: I ſuppoſe he is not yet awake.

The next day Dr. Fecknam came to me and ſaid; Are ye he that will have no ceremonies?

Haukes. What mean you by that?

Fecknam. Ye will not have your child chriſtened, but in Engliſh; and you will have no ceremonies.

Haukes. Whatſoever the ſcripture commandeth to be done, I refuſe not.

Fecknam. Ceremonies are to be uſed by the ſcriptures.

Haukes. Which be thoſe?

Fecknam. How ſay you by Paul's breeches?

Haukes. I have read no ſuch thing.

Fecknam. Have ye not read in the Acts of the Apoſtles, how things went from Paul's body, and they received health thereby?

Haukes. I have read in the 19th of the Acts, how there went handkerchiefs and napkins from Paul's body, is it that you mean?

Fecknam. Yea the ſame is it: what ſay you to thoſe ceremonies?

Haukes. I ſay nothing to the ceremonies: for the text ſaith, that God did ſo work by the hands of Paul, that there went handkerchiefs and napkins from him, &c. So that it ſeemed by the text, that it was God that wrought, and not the ceremonies.

Fecknam. How ſay ye to the woman that came behind Chriſt, and touched the hem of his veſture? Did not her diſeaſe depart from her by that ceremony?

Haukes. No forſooth: for Chriſt turned back and ſaid to Peter, "Who is it that toucheth me? And Peter ſaid, Thou ſeeſt the people thruſt thee; and aſkeſt thou, Who touched me? Some body hath touched me, ſaith Chriſt, for virtue hath gone out of me." I pray you, whether was it the virtue that healed this woman, or his veſture?

Fecknam. Both.

Haukes. Then is not Chriſt true: for he ſaid, "Go thy way, thy faith hath made thee whole."

Bonner. Away, away to the ſacrament, for theſe are but mere trifles ſo that.

Fecknam. How ſay ye, ſirrah? Chriſt took bread, and brake it, and ſaid, "Take, eat, this is my body."

Haukes. I grant Chriſt ſaid ſo.

Fecknam. And is it not ſo?

Haukes. No forſooth, I do not underſtand it ſo.

Fecknam. Why, then is Chriſt a lyar?

Haukes. I think ye will ſo prove him.

Fecknam. Will I? why I have ſpoken the words that Chriſt ſpake.

Haukes. Is every word to be underſtood as Chriſt ſpake it? Chriſt ſaid, I am a door, a vine, I am a king, a way, &c.

Fecknam. Chriſt ſpake theſe words in parables.

Haukes. And why ſpeaketh he this in parables when he ſaid, I am a door, a vine, a king, a way, &c. more than this when he ſaid, This is my body: For after the ſame phraſe of ſpeech, as he ſaith, This is my body: ſo ſaith he, I am a door, a vine, a king, a way: he ſaith not, I am like a door, like a vine, &c.

Then Fecknam ſtood up, and ſaid, I had ſuch a one before me this other day. Alas, thoſe places ſerve nothing for your purpoſes. But I perceive ye hang and build on them that be at Oxford.

Haukes. What mean you by that?

Fecknam. I mean Latimer, Cranmer, and Ridley.

Haukes. I know nothing elſe by them, but that they be both godly and learned.

Fecknam. Wilt thou truſt to ſuch dolts? One of them hath a written book, wherein he affirmeth a real preſence in the ſacrament.

Haukes. What he hath done, I know not, but what he doth I know.

Fecknam. Ridley hath preached at Paul's Croſs openly, that the devil believeth better than you: for he believeth that Chriſt is able of ſtones to make bread, and ye will not believe Chriſt's body in the ſacrament, and yet thou buildeſt thy faith upon them.

Haukes. I build my faith upon no man, and that ye well know: for if thoſe men, and as many more as they be, ſhould recant, and deny that they have ſaid or done, yet will I ſtand to it, and by this ſhall ye know that I build my faith upon no man.

Bonner. If any of thoſe recant, what will ye ſay to it?

Haukes. When they recant, I will make you an anſwer.

Bonner. Then thou wilt ſay as thou doſt now for all that.

Haukes. Yea indeed will I, and that truſt to it, by God's grace.

Bonner. I dare ſay, Cranmer would recant, ſo that he might have his living. And ſo the biſhop and Fecknam departed from me with great laughing, and I went again to the porter's lodge.

The next day Dr. Chedſey came to the biſhop and him. They declared unto him that I had ſtood ſtubbornly in the defence againſt the chriſtening of my child, and againſt the ceremonies of the church, and that I would not have it chriſtened but in Engliſh.

Then ſaid Dr. Chedſey, Then he denieth the order of the catholic church.

Bonner. Yea, he thinketh that there is no church but in England and in Germany.

Haukes. And ye think that there is no church, but the church of Rome.

Ched. What ſay ye to the church of Rome?

Haukes. I ſay it is a church of a ſort of vicious cardidals, prieſts, monks and friars, which I will never credit nor believe.

Ched. What ſay ye to the biſhop of Rome?

Haukes. From him and all his deteſtable enormities, good Lord deliver us.

Ched. Marry ſo we may ſay, From king Henry the eighth, and all his deteſtable enormities, good Lord deliver us.

Haukes. Where were ye whiles that he lived, that ye would not ſay ſo?

Ched. I was not far.

Haukes. Where were ye in his ſon's days?

Ched. In priſon.

Haukes. It was for your well doing.

Bonner. He will by no means come within my chapel, nor hear maſs: for neither the maſs, neither the ſacrament of the altar can he abide, neither will he have any ſervice but in Engliſh.

Ched. Chriſt never ſpake in Engliſh.

Haukes. Neither ſpake he ever any Latin, but always in ſuch a tongue as the people may be edified thereby. And St. Paul ſaith, "That tongues profit us nothing." He maketh a ſimilitude between the pipe and the harp, and except it be underſtood what the trumpet meaneth, who can prepare himſelf to the battle? ſo if I hear the tongue which I do not underſtand, what profit have I thereby? no more than he hath by the trumpet, that knoweth not what it meaneth

Ched. If ye underſtand St. Paul's ſaying, he ſpeaketh it under a prophecy, "If one propheſy to you in tongues, &c."

Haukes. Forſooth St. Paul ſpeaketh plainly of tongues: for tongues ſerve not for them that believe.

Ched. I tell you St. Paul ſpeaketh altogether upon prophecy.

Haukes. St. Paul maketh a diſtinction between propheſying and tongues, ſaying, "That if any man ſpeak with tongues, let it be by two or three at the moſt, and let another interpret it. But if there be no interpreter, let them keep ſilence in the congregation, and let himſelf pray unto God: and then let the prophets ſpeak two or three, and that by courſe, and let the other judge: and if any revelation be made to him that ſitteth by, let the firſt hold his peace:" ſo that it ſeemeth that St. Paul maketh a diſtinction between tongues and propheſying.

Bonner. The order was taken in the catholic church that the Latin tongue ſhould ſerve thro' the whole world, becauſe that they ſhould pray all generally together in one tongue, and that to avoid all contention and ſtrife, and to have one univerſal order thro' the whole world.

Haukes. This did your councils of Rome conclude.

Bonner. Underſtand ye what the general councils of Rome mean?

Haukes. Indeed all your general councils of Rome be in Latin, and I am an Engliſh-man: therefore I have nothing to do with them.

Ched. Ye are to blame, being an unlearned man, to reprove all the councils throughout all the world.

Haukes. I reprove them not, but St. Paul rebuketh them, ſaying, "If any man preach any other doctrine than that which I have taught, do you hold him accurſed."

Ched. Hath any man preached any other doctrine unto you?

Haukes. Yea, I have been taught another goſpel ſince I came into this houſe.

Ched. What goſpel have you been taught?

Haukes. Praying to ſaints, and to our lady, and truſt in the maſs, holy bread, holy water, and in idols.

Ched. He that teaches you ſo, teaches you not amiſs.

Haukes. Curſed is he that teacheth me ſo: for I will not truſt in him nor believe in him.

Bonner. You ſpeak of idols, and you know not what they mean.

Haukes. God hath taught us what they be: for whatſoever is made, graven, or deviſed by man's hand, contrary to God's word, the ſame is an idol. What ſay you to that?

Ched. What be thoſe that ye are ſo offended withal?

Haukes. The croſs of wood, ſilver, copper, or gold, &c.

Bonner. What ſay ye to that?

Haukes. I ſay it is an idol. What ſay you to it?

Bonner. I ſay every idol is an image, but every image is not an idol.

Haukes. I ſay, what difference is there between an idol and an image?

Bonner. If it be a falſe God, and an image made of him, that is an idol: but if an image be made of God himſelf, it is no idol; but an image, becauſe he is a true God.

Haukes. Lay your image of your true God and of your falſe God together, and ye ſhall ſee the difference. Have not your images feet and go not, eyes and ſee not, ears and hear not, hands and feel not, mouths and ſpeak not? and even ſo have your idols.

Ched. "God forbid, ſaith St. Paul, that I ſhould rejoice in any thing elſe, but in the croſs of Chriſt Jeſus."

Haukes. Do you underſtand St. Paul ſo? Do you underſtand St. Paul? Unto which he anſwered me never a word.

Bonner. Where can we have a godlier remembrance, when we ride by the way, than to ſee the croſs?

Haukes. If the croſs were ſuch a profit unto us, why did not Chriſt's diſciples take it up and ſet it on a pole, and carry it in proceſſion, with Salve, feſta dies?

Ched. It was taken up.

Haukes. Who took it up? Helene, as ye ſay; for ſhe ſent a piece of it to a place of religion, where I was with the viſitors when that houſe was ſuppreſſed, and the piece of the holy croſs (which the religious had in ſuch eſtimation, and had robbed many a ſoul, committing idolatry to it), was called for, and when it was proved, and all come to all, it was but a piece of a lath covered over with copper, double gilded as it had been clean gold.

Bonner. Fie, fie, I dare ſay thou ſlandereſt it.

Haukes. I know it to be true, and do not believe the contrary. And thus did the biſhop and the doctor depart in a great fume: and Chedſey ſaid unto me, as he was about to depart, It is pity that thou ſhouldeſt live, or any ſuch as thou art. I anſwered, In this caſe I deſire not to live, but rather to die.

Ched. Ye die boldly, becauſe ye would glory in your death, as Joan Butcher did.

Haukes. What Joan Butcher did, I have nothing to do withal; but I would my part might be to-morrow. God make you in a better mind, ſaid they both, and ſo they departed, and I went to the porter's lodge with my keeper.

The dext day Dr. Chedſey preached in the biſhop's chapel, and did not begin his ſermon until all the ſervice was done: and then came the porter for me, and ſaid, My lord would have you come to the ſermon, and ſo I went to the chapel door, and ſtood without the door.

Bonner. Is not this fellow come?

Haukes. Yes, I am here.

Bonner. Come in, man.

Haukes. No, that I will not. He called again, and I anſwered, I will come no nearer, and ſo I ſtood at the door. Then ſaid the biſhop, Go to your ſermon.

Then Dr. Chedſey put the ſtole about his neck, and carried the holy water-ſprinkle unto the biſhop, who bleſſed him and gave him holy water, and ſo he went to his ſermon.

The text that he treated on was the 16th of St. Matthew, "Whom do men ſay that I the Son of Man am? Peter ſaid, Some ſay that thou art Elias, ſome ſay that thou art John Baptiſt, ſome ſay that thou art one of the prophets. But whom ſay ye that I am? Then ſaid Peter, Thou art Chriſt, the Son of the living God." Then left he the text there, and ſaid, Whoſe ſins ſoever ye bind, are bound: which authority (ſaid he) is left to the heads of the church, as my lord here is one, and ſo unto all the reſt that be underneath him. But the church hath been much kicked at ſince the beginning: yet kick the heretics, ſpurn the heretics never ſo much, the church doth ſtand and flouriſh. And then he went ſtraitway

ſtraitway to the ſacrament, and ſaid his mind on it, exalting it above the heaven (as moſt of them do), and ſo returned to his place again, ſaying, Whoſe ſins ye do remit, are remitted and forgiven: and ſo he applied it to the biſhops and prieſts to forgive ſins, and ſaid, All that be of the church will come and receive the ſame. And thus he proved by St. John, chap. 11. ſaying, that Chriſt came to raiſe Lazarus, who when he was riſen was bound in bands: then ſaid Chriſt to them that were in authority (who were his diſciples), Go ye and looſe him, looſe him you. And this was the effect of his ſermon, applying all to them, that they have the ſame authority that Chriſt ſpake of to his apoſtles; and ſo ended his ſermon, and they went to dinner.

Another Communication between Thomas Haukes and the Biſhop.

AFTER dinner I was called into the chapel, where were ſeveral of the queen's ſervants, and other ſtrangers whom I did not know.

Bonner. Haukes, how like you his ſermon?

Haukes. As I like all the reſt of his doctrine.

Bonner. What, are you not edified thereby?

Haukes. No, ſurely.

Bonner. It was made only becauſe of you.

Haukes. Why? then am I ſorry that ye had no more heretics here, as ye call them: I am ſorry that ye have beſtowed ſo much labour on one, and ſo little regarded.

Bonner. Well, I will leave you here, for I have buſineſs, I pray you talk with him: for if ye could do him good (ſaith he) I would be glad. This the biſhop ſpake to the queen's men, who ſaid unto me, Alas, what mean you to trouble yourſelf about ſuch matters againſt the queen's proceedings?

Haukes. Thoſe matters have I anſwered before them that be in authority: and unleſs I ſee you have a further commiſſion, I will anſwer you nothing at all. Then ſaid the biſhop's men (which were many), My lord hath commanded you to talk with us.

Haukes. If my lord will talk with me himſelf, I will anſwer him. They cried, Faggots, burn him, hang him, to priſon with him, it is pity that he liveth, lay irons upon him; and with a great noiſe they ſpake theſe words. Then in the midſt of all their rage I departed from them, and went to the porter's lodge again.

The next day the biſhop called me into his chamber, and ſaid, Ye have been with me a great while, and ye are never the better, but worſe and worſe: and therefore I will delay the time no longer, but ſend you to Newgate.

Haukes. My lord, you can do me no better pleaſure.

Bonner. Why would you ſo fain go to priſon?

Haukes. Truly I did look for none other when I came to your hands.

Bonner. Come on your ways, ye ſhall ſee what I have written. Then did he ſhew me certain articles, and theſe are the contents of them:

Whether the catholic church do teach and believe, that Chriſt's real preſence doth remain in the ſacrament or no, after the words of conſecration, according to the words of St. Paul, which are theſe; "Is not the bread which we break the partaking of the body of Chriſt, and the cup which we bleſs, the partaking of the blood of Chriſt?" which if it were not ſo, St. Paul would never have ſaid it.

Haukes. What your church doth I cannot tell: but I am ſure that the holy catholic church doth never ſo take it, nor believe it.

Bonner. Whether doth the catholic church teach and believe the baptiſm that now is uſed in the church, or no?

Haukes. I anſwered to it as I did to the other queſtion before. Then did the biſhop with much flattery counſel me to be perſuaded, and to keep me out of priſon, which I utterly refuſed, and ſo we departed. And I ſuppoſed that the next day I ſhould have gone to priſon, and ſo I had, except for the archdeacon of Canterbury, whoſe name is Harpsfield, whom the biſhop had deſired to talk with me, and began to perſuade me concerning the ſacrament and the ceremonies: and after much talk he ſaid, that the ſacrament of the altar was the ſame body that was born of the virgin Mary, which did hang upon the croſs.

Haukes. He was upon the croſs both alive and dead: which of them was the ſacrament?

Harpſ. The archdeacon anſwered, alive.

Haukes. How do you prove that?

Harpſ. You muſt believe. Doth not St. John ſay, "He is condemned already that believeth not?"

Haukes. St. John ſaith, "He that believeth not in the Son of God is already condemned," but he ſaith not, He that believeth not in the ſacrament is already condemned.

Harpſ. There is no talk with you: for ye are both without faith and learning, and therefore I will talk no more with you in ſcripture.

Haukes. Then two that ſtood by bade me enter further in talk with him; and I ſaid unto him, Why is the rood-loft ſet betwixt the body of the church and the chancel?

Harpſ. I cannot tell: for ye have aſked a queſtion which you cannot tell yourſelf.

Haukes. Yes that I can: for this ſaith one of your own doctors, That the body of the church doth repreſent the church militant, and the chancel the church triumphant: and ſo becauſe we cannot go from the church militant to the church triumphant, but that we muſt bear the croſs of Chriſt; this is the cauſe of the rood-loft being between the body of the church and the chancel.

Harpſ. This is well and learnedly concluded.

Haukes. As all the reſt of your doctrine is; and ſo with many perſuaſions on his part we ended, and ſo he departed: and I to the porter's lodge again.

The next day in the morning, which was the firſt day of July, the biſhop called me himſelf from the porter's lodge, commanding me to make myſelf ready to go to priſon, and to take ſuch things with me as I had of my own. And I ſaid, I do neither intend to bribe, neither to ſteal, God willing. Then he did write my warrant to the keeper of the Gate-houſe at Weſtminſter, and delivered it to Harpsfield, who with his own man and one of the biſhop's men brought me to priſon, and delivered the warrant and me to the keeper: and this was contained in the warrant:

"I will and command you, that you receive him who cometh named in this warrant, and that he be kept as a ſafe priſoner, and that no man ſpeak with him, and that ye deliver him to no man, except it be the council, or to a juſtice: for he is a Sacramentary, and one that ſpeaketh againſt baptiſm, a ſeditious man, a perilous man to be abroad in theſe perilous days." And thus was I received, and they departed. And there I remained thirteen days, and then the biſhop ſent two of his men unto me, ſaying, My lord would be glad to know how ye do. I anſwered them, I do like a poor priſoner. They ſaid, My lord would know, whether ye be the ſame man that ye were when ye departed. I ſaid, I am no changeling. They ſaid, My lord would be glad that ye ſhould do well. I ſaid, if my lord will do me any good, I pray you deſire him to ſuffer my friends to come to me. So they ſaid they would ſpeak for me, but I heard no more of them.

This is the firſt examination of me Thomas Haukes, bing examined by Edmund Bonner, then biſhop of London, and by his chaplains and doctors at Fulham, four miles from London, where I lay, till I came to priſon at Weſtminſter: and after his two men had been with me, I heard no more of him till the third day of September.

Here followeth the ſecond Time of mine Examination, which was the third Day of September, for the Biſhop did ſend his Men for me to come to his Palace of London; and ſo my Keeper and his Men brought me to his Palace the ſame Day.

THE biſhop of Wincheſter, then being chancellor, preached that day at Paul's Croſs, and the biſhop of London ſaid to my keeper, I think your man will not go to the ſermon to-day.

Haukes. Yes, my lord, I pray you let me go: and that that is good I will receive, and the reſt I will leave behind me; and ſo I went. And when the ſermon was done, I and my keeper came to the biſhop's houſe, and there we remained till dinner was done: and after dinner the biſhop called for me, and aſked me, if I were the ſame man that I was before.

Haukes. I am no changeling, nor none will be.

Bonner. Ye ſhall find me no changeling neither. And ſo he returned into his chamber, and there he did write the ſide of a ſheet of paper, and all that while I ſtood in the great chamber, and as many with me as might well ſtand in the chamber. And as I ſtood there, Dr. Smith came unto me (who once recanted, as it appeared in print), ſaying, That he would be glad to talk brotherly with me. I aſked him what he was. Then ſaid they that ſtood by, He is Dr. Smith. Then ſaid I, Are you he that did recant? And he ſaid, It was no recantation, but a declaration.

Haukes. You were beſt to term it well for your own honeſty.

Smith. Shall I term it as it pleaſeth you?

Haukes. To be ſhort with you, I will know whether ye will recant any more or no, before that I talk with you, credit you, or believe you: and ſo I departed from him to the other ſide of the chamber. Then ſaid the biſhop's men and his chaplains, that my lord commanded me to talk with him. Then they that ſtood by cried with a great noiſe, Hang him, burn him; it is pity that he liveth, that diſobeyeth my lord's commandment.

Then ſaid one Miles Huggard, Where prove you that infants were baptized?

Haukes. "Go teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghoſt." Sir, here is none excepted.

Mr. Huggard. What ſhall we go to teach children?

Haukes. That word doth trouble you; it might be left out full well: it is too much for you to teach. Is not your name Miles Huggard?

Mr. Hug. So am I called.

Haukes. Be you not a hoſier, and dwell in Pudding-lane?

Mr. Hug. Yes that I am, and there I do dwell.

Haukes. It ſhould ſeem ſo, for ye can better ſkill to eat a pudding, and make a hoſe, than in the ſcripture either to anſwer or oppoſe. With that he was in great rage, and chafed up and down. Then I deſired that ſome man would take ſome pains to walk the gentleman, he did fret ſo for anger. Then one that ſtood by me (who was parſon of Hornchurch and Rumford in Eſſex) ſaid, Alas, what do you mean? a young man to be ſo ſtubborn? there ſeemeth too much pride in you.

Haukes. Are ye not the parſon of Hornchurch?

Parſon. Yes, that I am.

Haukes. Did you not ſet ſuch a prieſt in your benefice?

Parſon. Yes, for a ſhift.

Haukes. Like will to like; ſuch maſter, ſuch man. For I know the prieſt to be a very vile man, as any could be. I aſked the parſon, what kin he was to the weather-cock of St. Paul's? and he fell into a great laughter with the reſt of his companions. He ſaid, that I did rail.

Then ſaid another that ſtood by unto me; What books have you here? I anſwered, the New Teſtament. May I look in it? ſaid he. Yea, that ye may, ſaid I. And ſo he looked in my book, and ſaid it was corrupt. I anſwered him, If the things contained in it be true, then are ye falſe prophets. He ſaid, that he would oppoſe me in the firſt word of the Teſtament, ſaying, Here is a generation of Chriſt: and Iſaiah ſaith, No man can tell his generation.

Haukes. What meaneth Iſaiah by that?

I would learn of you, ſaid he.

Haukes. Ye would be angry if the ſcholar ſhould teach the maſter: but if ye will have me to teach you, I will tell you Iſaiah's meaning.

Then ſaid he, No man can tell the generation between the Father and the Son: but you (I dare ſay) did know it before.

Haukes. Why then Iſaiah denieth not the generation.

Then ſaid he, Why is Chriſt called Chriſt?

Haukes. Becauſe he is a Meſſias.

Then ſaid he, Why is he called a Meſſias?

Haukes. Becauſe he was ſo propheſied by the prophets.

Then ſaid he, Why is your book called a book?

Haukes. Theſe words do breed more ſtrife than godly edifying.

Beware, ſaid he, that ye do not decline from the church, for if you do, you will prove yourſelf an heretic.

Haukes. Even as you do call us heretics, that do incline to Chriſt's church from your church: ſo are ye all falſe prophets that do decline from Chriſt's church to your own church. And by this ſhall all men know you to be falſe prophets, if ye ſay, This ſaith the church: and will not ſay, This ſaith our Lord. And ſo he went his way, as tho' he had a flea in his ear.

Then came another, and ſaid unto me, He would talk with me; for he perceived (as he ſaid) that I was angry and out of patience.

Haukes. I will ſee your commiſſion, before I talk with you, or with any man more. For I knew not how to be rid of them, they came ſo thick about me. For I ſaid, that I came to talk with my lord, and not with any of them.

With that came the biſhop, bringing a letter in his hand, which he had written in my name, and read it unto me after this manner: I Thomas Haukes do here confeſs and declare before my ſaid ordinary Edmund biſhop of London, that the maſs is abominable and deteſtable, and full of all ſuperſtition; and alſo as concerning the ſacrament of the body and blood of Chriſt (commonly called the ſacrament of the altar), that Chriſt is in no part thereof, but only in heaven: this I have believed, and this I do believe, &c.

Haukes. Stop there, my lord: what I have believed, what have you to do withal? But what I do believe, to that ſtand I, and will. Then he took his pen, and ſaid that he would ſcrape it out for my pleaſure, and ſo he did to my thinking.

Then he went further with his writing, and ſaid, I Thomas Haukes have talked with my ſaid ordinary, and with certain good, godly, and learned men. Notwithſtanding I ſtand ſtill in mine opinion.

Haukes. Shall I grant you to be good, godly, and learned men, and yet grant myſelf to ſtand in a contrary opinion? No, I will not grant you to be good, godly, and learned men.

Bonner. Ye will grant that ye have talked with us: the other I will put out for your pleaſure. Then ſaid all his doctors, If your lordſhip be ruled by him, he will cauſe you to put out all together: and then read more to me. Here unto this bill have I ſet my hand; and then he offered me the bill and his pen, and bade me ſet my hand to it.

Haukes. Ye ſhall not have my hand to any thing of your making or deviſing.

Bonner. Wilt not thou ſet to thy hand? It ſhall be to thy ſhame for the denying of it.

And then he called all his doctors, and ſaid, he would have every man's hand to it that was in the chamber; and ſo he had all their hands to it, and ſaid; he that will not ſet his hand to it, I would he were hanged; and ſo ſaid all his chaplains and doctors with a great noiſe.

Then the biſhop thruſt me on the breaſt with great anger; and ſaid he would be even with me, and with all ſuch proud knaves in Eſſex.

Haukes. Ye ſhall do no more than God ſhall give you leave.

Bonner. This jeer ſhall not be unpuniſhed, truſt to it.

Haukes. As for your curſings, railings and blaſphemings, I care not for them: for I know the moths and worms ſhall eat you, as they eat cloth or wool.

Bonner. I will be even with you when time ſhall come.

Haukes. You may in your malice deſtroy a man: but when ye have done, ye cannot do ſo much as make a finger; and ye be meetly even with ſome of us already.

Bonner. If I do thee any wrong, take the law of me.

Haukes. Solomon ſaith, "Go not to law with a judge; for he will judge according to his honour."

Bonner. Solomon ſaith, "Give not a fool an anſwer."

Haukes. What, do you count me a fool?

Bonner. Yea, by my troth do I, and ſo doſt thou me too: but God forgive thee, and ſo do I.

Haukes. Thought is free, my lord. Then the biſhop took the bill and read it again; and when he ſaw that he could not have my hand to it, then he would have had me to take it into my hand, and to give it to him again.

Haukes. What needeth that ceremony? neither ſhall it into my hand, heart, or mind. Then he wrapt it up, and put it in his boſom, and went away in great anger, and called for his horſe, for the ſame day he rode on his viſitation into Eſſex: and ſo I went to priſon again with my keeper. This was the ſecond time of my examination.

Written by me Tho. Haukes, who deſireth all faithful men and brethren to pray unto God, to ſtrengthen me in his truth unto the end. Pray, pray, pray, gentle brethren, pray.

After all theſe private conferences, perſuaſions and long debates with Mr. Haukes in the biſhop's houſe, as hitherto hath been declared, the biſhop ſeeing no hope to win him to his wicked ways, was fully ſet to proceed openly againſt him after the ordinary courſe of his popiſh law. Whereupon Mr. Haukes was ſhortly after cited with the reſt of his other companions abovementioned, namely, T. Tomkins, S. Knight, W. Pyget, J. Lawrence, and W. Hunter, to appear in the biſhop's conſiſtory, the eighth day of February, this preſent year 1555. Upon which appearance was laid againſt him, in like order as to the others, firſt the bill of his confeſſion, written with Bonner's own hand, to which bill ye heard before how this worthy man denied to ſubſcribe.

This bill of confeſſion being read, and he ſtanding ſtedfaſtly to the ſame, the biſhop then aſſigned him with the other five the next day following, which was the 9th of February, to appear before him again, to give a reſolute anſwer what they would ſtick to. Which day being come, and the aforeſaid ſix priſoners being ſeverally called before the biſhop, at the coming of Thomas Haukes, the biſhop deſired him to remember what was ſaid to him yeſterday, and now while he had time and ſpace, to adviſe with himſelf what he would anſwer, for he ſtood upon life and death. Well, ſaid Mr. Haukes again, I will willingly receive whatſoever ſhall be put upon me. Then certain other interrogatories or articles were commenced againſt him by the ſaid biſhop (in like manner as to the others), to the number of four, with another bill alſo which biſhop Bonner brought out of his boſom, containing private matters againſt the ſaid Thomas Haukes, which the biſhop called hereſies and errors, but we may better call them chriſtian verities. To which matter being read, the ſaid Haukes anſwered openly again, ſaying that it was true, and that he was glad it was ſo true as it was, with more words to the like effect. And this was in the forenoon, the eleventh day of February. In the afternoon again the ſaid Haukes appearing and hearing the aforeſaid bill of his confeſſion, with the articles and interrogatories read unto him, with like conſtancy in anſwering again to the biſhop; My lord (ſaith he) as you being my friend have cauſed theſe my ſayings to be written; ſo do you cauſe them to be read: and yet I will never go from them. And then being exhorted by the biſhop, with many fair words, to return again to the boſom of the mother church: No, my lord (ſaid he) that will I not: for if I had an hundred bodies, I would ſuffer them all to be torn in pieces, rather than I will abjure or recant. And ſo continuing ſtill in the ſame ſong, notwithſtanding that the doctors and lawyers were ever calling upon him to come again to the unity of the church, he ever kept them off with this anſwer, that he would never go from the belief he was in, ſo long as he lived. Whereupon biſhop Bonner at laſt read the ſentence of death upon him, and ſo was he condemned the ſame day with the reſidue of his fellows, which was the ninth of February. Nevertheleſs his execution was prolonged, and he remained in priſon till the tenth day of June. Then he was committed to the hands and charge of the lord Rich, who, being ſufficiently aſſiſted with power by the worſhipful of the ſhire, had the aforeſaid Thomas Haukes down into Eſſex, with ſix other fellow-priſoners whoſe ſtories hereafter follow, there to ſuffer martyrdom, Haukes at Coxhall, the others in ſeveral other places.

Thomas Haukes by the way uſed much exhortation to his friends; and whenſoever opportunity ſerved to talk with them, he would familiarly admoniſh them.

A little before his death there were ſeveral of his familiar acquaintance and friends, who frequented his company more familiarly, who ſeemed to be greatly confirmed both by the example of his conſtancy, and by his talk; yet notwithſtanding, being feared with the ſharpneſs of the puniſhment which he was going to ſuffer, privately deſired that in the midſt of the flame he would ſhew them ſome token, if he could, whereby they might be more certain, whether the pain of ſuch burning were ſo great, that a man might not therein keep his mind quiet and patient. Which thing he promiſed them to do; and ſo ſecretly between them it was agreed, that if the rage of the pain were tolerable and might be ſuffered, then he ſhould lift up his hands above his head toward heaven, before he gave up the ghoſt.

Not long after, when the hour was come, T. Haukes was led away to the place appointed for the ſlaughter, by the lord Rich and his aſſiſtants, who being now come to the ſtake, there mildly and patiently addreſſed himſelf to the fire, having a ſtrait chain caſt about his middle, with a multitude of people on every ſide compaſſing him about. Unto whom after he had ſpoken many things, eſpecially unto the lord Rich, reaſoning with him of the innocent blood of ſaints, at length after his fervent prayers firſt made and poured out unto God, the fire was kindled.

In which when he continued long, and when his ſpeech was taken away by violence of the flame, his ſkin alſo drawn together, and his fingers conſumed with the fire, ſo that now all men thought certainly he had been gone, ſuddenly and contrary to all expectation this good man being mindful of his promiſe before made, reached up his hands burning on a light fire, which was marvellous to behold, over his head to the living God, and with great rejoicing, as it ſeemed, ſtruck or clapped them three times together. At the ſight whereof there followed ſuch applauſe and out-cry of the people, and eſpecially of them which underſtood the matter, that the like hath not commonly been heard: and ſo the bleſſed martyr of Chriſt ſtraitway ſinking down into the fire, gave up his ſpirit, June 10. 1555. And thus have we plainly and expreſſly deſcribed unto you the whole ſtory, as well of the life, as of the death of T. Haukes, a moſt conſtant and faithful witneſs of Chriſt's holy goſpel.

gave

Mr. Thomas Haukes's Letter to the Congregation.

GRACE, mercy, and peace, from God the Father, and from our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, be alway with you all (my dear brethren and ſiſters in the Lord Jeſus Chriſt) for ever; and his Holy Spirit conduct and lead you all in all your doings, that you may always direct your deeds according to his holy word; that when he ſhall appear to reward every man according to their works, ye may as obedient children, be found watching, ready to enter into his everlaſting kingdom, with your lamps burning; and when the bridegroom ſhall ſhew himſelf, ye need not be aſhamed of this life which God hath lent you, which is but tranſitory, vain, and like unto a vapour, that for a ſeaſon appeareth and vaniſheth away: ſo ſoon paſſeth away all our terreſtrial honour, glory, and felicity. "For all fleſh (ſaith the prophet) is graſs, and all his glory as the flower of the field, which for a ſeaſon ſheweth her beauty, and as ſoon as the Lord bloweth upon it, it withereth away, and departeth." For in this tranſitory and dangerous wilderneſs, we are as pilgrims and ſtrangers following the footſteps of Moſes, among many unſpeakable dangers, beholding nothing with our outward man, but idle vanities and vexation of mind, ſubject to hunger, cold, nakedneſs, bonds, ſickneſs, loſs, labours, baniſhment, in danger of that dreadful dragon, and his ſinful ſeed, to be devoured, tempted, and tormented, who ceaſeth not behind every buſh to lay a bait, when we walk awry to have his pleaſure upon us, caſting abroad his apples in all places, times, and ſeaſons, to ſee if Adam will be allured and enticed to leave the living God and his moſt holy commandments, whereby he is aſſured of everlaſting life, promiſing the world at will, to all that will fall down in all ages, and for a meſs of pottage ſell and ſet at nought the everlaſting kingdom of heaven. So frail is fleſh and blood; "And in eſpecial Iſrael is moſt ready to walk awry, when he is filled with all manner of riches," as ſaith the prophet.

Therefore I am bold in bonds (as entirely deſiring your everlaſting health and felicity) to warn you, and moſt heartily deſire you to watch and pray; for our eſtate is dangerous, and requireth continual prayer. For on the high mountains doth not grow moſt plenty of graſs, neither are the higheſt trees fartheſt from danger, but ſeldom ſure, and always ſhaken by every wind that bloweth. Such a deceitful thing (ſaith our Saviour), is honour and riches, that without grace it choketh up the good ſeed ſown on his creatures, and ſo blindeth their eyes, that they go groping at noon-day in darkneſs: it maketh a man think himſelf ſomewhat, that is nothing at all. For though for our honour we eſteem ourſelves and ſtand in our own light, yet when we ſhall ſtand before the living God, there ſhall be no reſpect of perſons. For riches helpeth not in the day of vengeance: neither can we make the Lord partial for money. But as ye have miniſtered unto the ſaints, ſo ſhall ye receive the reward, which I am fully perſuaded and aſſured ſhall be plenteouſly poured upon you all, for the great goodneſs ſhewed unto the ſervants of the living God. And I moſt heartily beſeech Almighty God to pour forth a plenteous reward upon you for the ſame, and that he will aſſiſt you with his Holy Spirit in all your doings, that ye may grow, as ye have begun, unto ſuch a perfection as may be to God's honour, your own ſalvation, and the ſtrengthening of the weak members of Chriſt. For though the world rage, and blaſpheme the elect of God, ye know that it did ſo unto Chriſt, his apoſtles, and to all that were in the primitive church, and ſhall be unto the world's end.

Therefore believe in the light while ye have it, leſt it be taken away from you; if you ſhall ſeem to neglect the great mercy of God that hath been opened unto you, and your hearts conſented unto it, that it is the very and only truth pronounced by God's only Son Jeſus Chriſt, by the good will of our heavenly Father. Therefore I ſay in the bowels of my Lord Jeſus Chriſt, ſtick faſt unto it; let it never depart out of our hearts and converſation, that you with us and we with you at the great day, being one flock, as we have one ſhepherd, may riſe to the life immortal, through Jeſus Chriſt our only Saviour, Amen.

Yours in him that liveth for ever,
Thomas Haukes.

Mr. Haukes's Letter to his Wife.

GRACE be with you, and peace from God the Father, and from our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, which gave himſelf for our ſins, to deliver us from this preſent evil world, through the good will of God our Father, to whom be praiſe for ever and ever, Amen.

My dear yoke-fellow in the Lord, foraſmuch as the Lord hath not only called me to work in his vineyard, but hath alſo fulfilled his good work in me (I truſt to his glory, and to the comfort of all thoſe that look for his coming), I thought it my duty, dear yoke-fellow, to write unto you ſome leſſons out of God's book; and if you will direct yourſelf thereafter, doubt not of it but God, who refuſeth none that will come to him with their whole heart, will aſſiſt you with his Holy Spirit, and direct you in all his ways, to his honour and glory, who grant it for for his mercy ſake, Amen.

Firſt, I exhort you to fear God, to ſerve and honour his holy name, to love him with all your heart, ſoul, and mind, to believe faithfully all his promiſes, to lay ſure hold upon them, that in all your troubles whatſoever they are, ye may run ſtraight to the great mercy of God, and he will bring you forth of them: keep you within his wings: then ſhall ye be ſure that neither devil, fleſh, nor hell ſhall be able to hurt you.

But take heed; if you will not keep his holy precepts and laws, and to the uttermoſt of your power call for the help of God to walk in the ſame, but will leave them, and run to all abominations with the wicked world, and do as they do; then be ſure to have your part with the wicked world in the burning lake that never ſhall be quenched. Therefore beware of idolatry, which doth moſt of all ſtink before the face of Almighty God, and was by all good men moſt deteſted from the beginning of the world. For which, what kingdoms, nations, and realms God hath puniſhed with moſt terrible plagues, with fire, brimſtone, hunger, ſword and peſtilence, &c. to the utter ſubverſion of them, it is manifeſtly to be ſeen through the whole Bible. Yea, his own peculiar people, whom he had done ſo much for, when they fell from him, and went and ſerved other gods, contrary to his commandment, he utterly deſtroyed and rooted them out from off the earth: and as many as died in that damnable ſtate, not repenting their abominable evil, he threw them into the pit of hell. Again, how he hath preſerved thoſe that abhor ſuperſtition and idolatry, and that have only taken hold upon God with their whole heart, to ſerve him, to love him, and to fear him, &c. it is moſt manifeſtly to be ſeen even from the beginning, out of what great dangers he hath always delivered them: yea when all hope of deliverance was paſt as touching their expectation, even then in the ſight of all his enemies would he work his godly will and purpoſe, to the utter amazing and deſtruction of all thoſe that were his manifeſt enemies.

Further, I exhort you in the bowels of Chriſt that you will exerciſe and be ſtedfaſt in prayer; for prayer is the only means to pierce the heavens, to obtain at the hand of God whatſoever we deſire, ſo that it be aſked in faith.

Oh what notable things do we read in the ſcriptures that have been obtained through fervent prayer! We are commanded to call upon him for help, aid, and ſuccour in neceſſities and troubles, and he hath promiſed to help us. Again, they that will not call upon him with their whole heart, but upon other dead creatures, in whom there is no help (for there was none found worthy to open the book, but only the Lamb Chriſt which was killed for our ſins), I ſay, who that will refuſe his help, muſt even by the terrible judgments of God come utterly to confuſion: as it hath, and is daily manifeſt to be ſeen. And whatſoever you deſire of God in your prayer, aſk it for Jeſus Chriſt's ſake, for whom and in whom, God hath promiſed to give us all things neceſſary. And though that which we aſk come not at the firſt and ſecond calling, yet continue ſtill knocking, and he will at length open his treaſures of mercy, ſo that ye ſhall be ſure to obtain; for he hath ſo promiſed, if ye continue in faith, hoping ſurely in him. Theſe former leſſons, with all ſuch inſtructions as I have told you by mouth, I do wiſh that you would moſt earneſtly learn; and then I doubt not, but God who is the giver of all grace, will aſſiſt you in all your doings, that ye may be found worthy of his kingdom, which is prepared through Chriſt.

Further, whereas it pleaſed God to ſend us children: my deſire is, that they may be brought up in the fear of God, and in his laws. And this is to certify you, that ye deliver in any wiſe my eldeſt ſon unto Mr. Throgmorton, who upon his good will hath promiſed me to bring him up according to my deſire; and I truſt as God hath put into his heart. See therefore that ye deliver him in any wiſe without delay: and as for the other, if ye ſhall ſeem to be burdened with him (which I think nature will not ſuffer), my deſire is, that it be brought up in the fear of God to the uttermoſt of your endeavour, with ſome honeſt man that hath the fear of God before his eyes; and let us give thanks unto God which hath given them us, beſeeching him that they may be counted worthy to be of that flock that ſhall ſtand on the right hand of the majeſty of God, when he ſhall judge the world, Amen,

Yet once again I warn you, that ye continue in fervent prayer, as I ſaid before; then ſhall ye be ſure, that God even of his own mercy, according as he hath promiſed, will be an huſband unto you, and provide better for you than ever I was able to do; yea, he will cauſe all men that fear him to pity you, to help you, to ſuccour you in all your neceſſities, ſo that if any do you wrong, he will be avenged on him. Moreover, I wiſh you to keep company with thoſe of whom ye may learn to come to a more perfect knowledge in God, and I doubt not but God will provide that ſuch will be glad to receive you, if you ſhall profeſs and go forward in his truth.

Finally, and to make an end, I deſire you that ye take heed with whom ye couple yourſelf. See that he be a man that feareth God, loveth his laws, and will walk in the ſame to the uttermoſt of his power; ſuch a one as can be content to love you, and to care for you. Take heed he be no brawler, no drunkard, no wicked perſon, not given to filthineſs, no worldling, no dicer nor carder. In fine, no filthy perſon, but chuſe you ſuch a one as God may be glorified in both your lives. And again on your part, love him, ſerve him, obey him in all godlineſs, as long as God ſhall give you life in this world. Then ſhall ye both be ſure to obtain that kingdom which God the Father hath prepared, and Jeſus Chriſt obtained for you, that never ſhall have end, where I truſt to abide your coming, Amen.

By your huſband, Thomas Haukes.

A Letter of Thomas Haukes to Mr. Clement Throgmorton.

GRACE, mercy, and peace from God the Father, and from our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, be with you, and aſſiſt you in all your thoughts, words, and works, that he in all things, as moſt worthy, may be glorified, and that the bleſſing of Abraham may be poured plenteouſly on you and all your poſterity.

Whereas the love of God hath moved you to require my ſon to be brought up before your eyes, and the ſelf-ſame love hath alſo moved me in like caſe to leave him in your hands, as unto a father in mine abſence, I ſhall require you in God's behalf, according to your promiſes, that ye will ſee him brought up in the fear of the Lord, and inſtructed in the knowledge of his holy word, that he may thereby learn to leave the evil, and know the good, and always be pricked forward with fatherly inſtructions to follow my footſteps, that as Almighty God hath made me worthy through his ſpecial grace to work his will in obedience, he may learn to follow me his father in the like, to God's honour and praiſe: and this I require you in God's behalf to fulfil, or cauſe to be fulfilled, as ye before the living God will make anſwer for the ſame. I have left for the child certain books which ſhall be delivered unto you, wherein his inſtruction and ſalvation lieth, if he learn and practiſe the ſame. And thus moſt humbly beſeeching you once again, to be as good to him, as your promiſe was unto me, that is, to be a father, and a wall of defence unto him in all troubles, I leave him in your hand through the Lord Jeſus, and deſire him to bleſs both him and you according to his good promiſe: and all that good which ye ſhall do unto him, I ſhall moſt heartily deſire the everlaſting God to recompenſe unto you in his kingdom, where I hope to meet both him and you among all God's elect. To which God be all praiſe, honour, and glory, Amen.

Yours, and all mens in Chriſt Jeſus, Thomas Haukes.

The Hiſtory of Mr. Thomas Wats.

THomas Wats of Billerica within the county of Eſſex, of the dioceſe of London, was by his occupation a linnen-draper; who before he was apprehended had ſold and made away his cloth in his ſhop, and his things being ſet in order to his wife and children, gave away much of his cloth unto the poor. For he daily expected to be taken by God's adverſaries and his, as ſhortly after came to paſs: ſo that upon the 26th day of April, he was apprehended and brought before the lord Rich, and other commiſſioners at Chelmsford, and there being accuſed for not coming to the church, was upon the ſame examined before the lord Rich, Sir Henry Tyrel, Anthony Browne, Edmund Tyrel, Thomas Mildman, John Wiſeman, Roger Appleton, Richard Weſton, juſtice Gaudy, &c. The ſum and principal effect of which examination, hereunder followeth briefly expreſſed.

When Thomas Wats came before the lord Rich and the juſtices, whoſe names are ſpecified in the following letter (which they ſent unto the biſhop of London againſt him), at the ſeſſions at Chelmsford, the lord Rich ſpoke to him as follows:

Wats, ye be brought hither, as I underſtand, becauſe of diſobedience to the king and the queen's laws. Ye will not come to the church, ye will not hear maſs, &c. but have your conventicles a ſort of you in corners, contrary to the king and queen's proceedings. To which words Mr. Wats anſwered and ſaid:

My lord, if I have offended a law, I am ſubject here to the law. Then Anthony Browne, juſtice, ſaid unto him; him; Wats, I pray thee tell me who hath been thy ſchoolmaſter to teach thee this religion, or where didſt thou firſt learn it? Forſooth, ſaid Wats, even of you, Sir, you taught it me, and none more than you. For in king Edward's days in open ſeſſions you ſpake againſt this religion now uſed, no preacher more. You then ſaid the maſs was abominable, and all their trumpery beſides, wiſhing and earneſtly exhorting that none ſhould believe therein, and that our belief ſhould be only in Chriſt: and you ſaid then, whoſoever ſhould bring in any ſtrange nation to rule here, it were treaſon, and not to be ſuffered. Then Mr. Browne ſaid to my lord Rich, He belyes me, my lord. What a knave is this? He will ſoon bely me behind my back, when he doth it before my face. And my lord Rich ſaid again, I dare ſay he doth ſo.

After theſe words, Mr. Wats took occaſion to ſpeak ſomewhat of king Philip and of his coming in, but what it was I could not juſtly learn. But thus much was heard, that after thoſe words ſpoken, the bench among themſelves ſtood up, and ſaid one to another, Treaſon: except one good man called juſtice Gaudy, who a little before was about to ſpeak; but when he heard them cry Treaſon, he held down his head as one grieved and troubled at their doings.

In concluſion, the commiſſioners being weary of him, or elſe not willing to meddle further in ſuch matters, ſent him up to the biſhop of London, together with a letter, declaring the cauſe of his being ſent up, as by the contents thereof may be ſeen.

A Letter ſent by certain Juſtices in Eſſex to Bonner Biſhop of London.

AFTER our moſt hearty commendation to your good lordſhip, theſe ſhall be to advertiſe you, that at our ſeſſions of oyer and terminer held at Chelmsford the 26th day of April laſt paſt, there came before us in open court, one Thomas Wats of Billerica within your dioceſe, by ordinary proceſs, and then and there being examined why he refuſed to come to his pariſh church, and there to receive the ſacrament of the altar, and hear divine ſervice, according to the inſtitution of holy church, he openly there anſwered generally; that like as the ſervice of the church ſet out in the days of the late king Edward VI. was ſaid by us now to be abominable, heretical, ſchiſmatical, and all naught; ſo he ſaid, that all that is now uſed and done in the church is abominable, heretical, ſchiſmatical, and naught, with divers other erroneous and arrogant words: and therefore we have thought good to ſend him to your lordſhip, to be further examined by you of his particular opinions, as to your paſtoral office ſhall ſeem convenient, certifying you further, that in our opinion he is one of the moſt arrogant heretics that hath been heard ſpeak, or ever came before you, and not meet to be kept here in any jail, as well for fear of corrupting others, as for divers and ſundry other ſpecial cauſes hereafter to be more declared. Thus leaving to moleſt your good lordſhip, we commit you to the Holy Ghoſt. Given at Chelmsford April 27. 1555.

Your good lordſhip's moſt aſſured,

R. Rich.	Thomas Mildman.
Henry Tyrel.	John Wiſeman.
Anthony Browne.	Roger Appleton.
Edmund Tyrel.	Richard Weſton.

Now when the biſhop had received him, how he uſed him it is eaſy (by his common practices with others), to judge. What his private conferences were I know not, but what was publicly done in the conſiſtory at St. Paul's (the common ſtage for theſe tragedies), you ſhall here ſee.

The firſt Appearance of Thomas Wats in the Biſhop's Conſiſtory.

FIRST upon Thurſday, being the ſecond day of May, Thomas Wats was brought thither before the biſhop of London, and there being examined upon his words had before the lord Rich and others, as is contained in their letter, he did earneſtly affirm the ſame to be true. Whereupon the biſhop objected, and examined him upon theſe articles following, to which he anſwered, as under may appear.

Articles objected againſt Thomas Wats of Billerica in the County of Eſſex, within the Dioceſe of London, by Biſhop Bonner.

1. THAT the ſaid Thomas Wats was of Billerica, and ſo of the juriſdiction of the biſhop of London.

2. Item, That he believed not in the ſacraments of the holy and catholic church, as the catholic church of Rome, and all other churches members of the ſame, ever hitherto have believed, and is taught by all good and faithful people, nor hath allowed the ſacraments, rites, uſages, or ceremonies of the ſaid church, but hath deſpiſed the ſame.

3. Item, That he believeth, and hath alſo taught others, that the ſubſtance of material bread and wine do remain in the ſacrament of the altar after the conſecration, and that the ſaid material bread and wine are the ſigns and tokens of Chriſt's body hanged upon the croſs, and of his blood there ſhed, and that in the ſaid ſacrament there is only a memory or remembrance of Chriſt's body and blood, and nothing elſe.

4. Item, That he believeth, and doth preciſely affirm, that the very true preſence of Chriſt's body and blood in ſubſtance, is not in the ſacrament of the altar, but only in heaven, and no where elſe.

5. Item, That he believeth, affirmeth, and ſaith, that the maſs now uſed in the church of Rome, here in England, and other places, is full of idolatry, abomination, and wickedneſs, and that Chriſt did never inſtitute it, nor ordain it, nor yet allow it as a good and laudable thing to be uſed in his church.

6. Item, That he believeth and affirmeth, that auricular confeſſion to be made unto the prieſt is not neceſſary, but ſuperfluous; and that it is enough for a man to believe only, and to confeſs himſelf unto God. without any prieſt or miniſter at any time, though he may have the prieſt to confeſs him unto.

7. Item, That he believeth that Luther, Wickliffe, Dr. Barnes, and all others that have held againſt the ſacrament of the altar, and ſuffered death by fire or otherwiſe for the maintenance of the ſaid opinion, were good men and faithful ſervants and martyrs of Chriſt in ſo believing and dying.

8. Item, That he hath and doth believe, that to faſt, pray, or to do alms-deeds, is a thing utterly unprofitable; for if a man ſhall be ſaved, he ſhall be ſaved without doing of them; and if he ſhall be damned, they ſhall not help him, or do him any good at all.

9. Item, That the ſaid Wats of late coming into open court at the ſeſſions before the lord Rich, Sir Henry Tyrel knight, Anthony Browne eſquire, and others, and being then and there examined, did openly confeſs, that he had refuſed to come to the church, and to hear there the divine ſervice, and to receive the ſacrament of the altar, according to the order of the church: becauſe that like as the ſervice of the church ſet out in the days of the late king Edward the ſixth, was ſaid and alledged to be abominable, heretical, ſchiſmatical, and altogether naught; ſo he the ſaid Thomas Wats then and there ſaid openly before the ſaid commiſſioners, that all that is now uſed and done in the church, is abominable, heretical, ſchiſmatical, and altogether naught: and that he did alſo then utter before the ſaid commiſſioners other erroneous and arrogant words, to the hurt of his ſoul, and to the evil example of the people there preſent.

10. Item, That he the ſaid Thomas by reaſon of the premiſſes, was, and is to be taken, had, reputed, and judged as a manifeſt and open heretic, and for the ſame, by the order of eccleſiaſtical laws is to be declared accurſed; and being obſtinate and incorrigible, is to be delivered to the ſecular power, there to be puniſhed as an heretic.

11. Item, That he over and beſides all theſe offences and treſpaſſes aforeſaid, had alſo added this treſpaſs, namely, that he had believed and deliberately ſpoken that the church of Rome in her rites, ceremonies, ſacraments, conſtitutions, and traditions, is the ſynagogue of Satan; and therefore that he had conſented and agreed in opinion with one John Tooly, of late hanged at Charing-croſs, who at the time of his execution, deſired the people to pray to be delivered from the tyranny of the biſhop of Rome, with all his enormities; as who ſhould ſay, that his authority and doings were tyranny, and had all enormities and iniquities in them.

12. Item, That the premiſſes and every part thereof be true, notorious, manifeſt, and openly ſpoken and talked of amongſt the honeſt and credible perſons in great multitude, and that of all and ſingular the ſame within Billerica aforeſaid, and other places thereabout, being of the dioceſe of London, there is a common voice and fame thereof.

The Anſwer of Thomas Wats to the aforeſaid Articles.

TO the firſt he ſaid and confeſſed the ſame to be true in every part thereof.

To the ſecond article he anſwered, that he believeth in all the ſacraments according to Chriſt's inſtitution, and the catholic church; but not according to the biſhop of Rome's church: and further ſaid, that he doth not believe now as he had done in times paſt; for in time paſt he believed as the church then believed, but now he doth not ſo believe; for the church of Rome had deceived us, and therefore he ſaid he did not believe as the church of Rome believeth, but as Chriſt hath taught him; and further ſaid, that he was ſo taught to believe by the preaching of Mr. Alvey, and others whoſe names he remembereth not: who did preach the word of God truly and ſincerely.

To the third he anſwered, that he hath and doth believe, that Chriſt's body is in heaven, and no where elſe: and further, that he will never believe that Chriſt's body is in the ſacrament.

To the fourth he anſwered, confeſſing and firmly believing the ſame to be true.

To the fifth, That he did believe that the maſs is abominable, and that he will not go one jot from that his belief.

To the ſixth, That he never did, nor yet doth believe, that the prieſt can abſolve him from his ſins: howbeit, he denieth not that it is good to aſk counſel at the prieſt's mouth.

To the ſeventh he ſaid, That he knew not what the opinions of the ſaid perſons named in the ſaid article were; and in caſe the ſaid perſons did believe, that the body and blood of Chriſt were really and in very deed in the ſacrament of the altar, then that they were not good men. But in caſe they did believe that the body and blood of Chriſt was not in the ſacrament of the altar really and truly, then he believed that they were good men.

To the eighth, That he had not ſpoken as is contained in this article; but ſaid, that he hath and doth believe, that faſting, prayers, and alms-deeds be works of a lively faith.

To the ninth he confeſſed, That he did utter and ſpeak, as in this article is contained, and further he deſired God that he might die in that faith and belief wherein he now is.

To the tenth he anſwered and ſaid, That he will ſubmit himſelf herein to the order of the law: and further ſaid, that he truſteth that with God he ſhall be bleſſed, although with men he be accurſed.

To the eleventh he ſaid, He believed that the biſhop of Rome is a mortal enemy to Chriſt and his church. And as for Tooly he ſaid, he did never ſee or know him: but in caſe the ſaid Tooly did wiſh and pray as is contained in the article, then he did likewiſe wiſh and conſent with him therein.

To the twelfth he anſwered, that all which before he confeſſed to be true, is alſo true: and all that he hath denied to be true, he denieth again to be true, and believeth the ſame to be according to ſuch things as he hath confeſſed. By me Thomas Wats.

Theſe articles thus propounded and anſwered, the biſhop commanded him to appear again in the ſame place at three of the clock in the afternoon, upon the ſame day. At which hour being brought thither by his keeper, the biſhop began with him in this wiſe:

Wats, you know what I ſaid unto you to-day, and what I appointed unto you at this time. The time is now come; weigh and conſider with yourſelf, that you are but a man, and albeit that you will wilfully caſt away your body, yet caſt not away your ſoul, but while ye have time return and confeſs the truth.

Whereunto Thomas Wats anſwered and ſaid, I am weary to live in ſuch idolatry as ye would have me to live in. Upon which anſwer the biſhop cauſed his articles again to be read. He thereto anſwered as before, and farther, ſubſcribed the ſame with his own hand.

The biſhop after many perſuaſions to cauſe him to recant, ordered him to depart, and to come again on Saturday at eight of the clock in the morning. Where the biſhop being abſent, Dr. Nicholas Harpsfield, as then being his deputy, did ſit, and earneſtly exhorted him to deny his opinions. To whom in the end he anſwered,

Well, ye have a law to condemn me, and I ſubmit myſelf to the laws of the church (as you call it): and farther I do affirm, and ſtill ſtand to mine anſwers that I have made.

Whereupon Dr. Harpsfield ordered him to appear there again upon Friday, being the 10th day of the ſame month of May. Upon which day the biſhop privately ſent for the ſaid Thomas Wats into his chamber, and there with many fair promiſes tempted and tried him, whether he would revoke his errors, as he then termed them. But Wats anſwered him in this ſort; I will not believe your church, neither the Romiſh church, and therefore you do but labour in vain thus to travail with me. He was hereupon again diſmiſſed for that time until Friday the 17th of May, and then commanded to appear in the conſiſtory; which command he obeyed, and having the accuſtomed former articles miniſtered unto him, made then ſuch anſwers as before.

Being thus toſt to and fro from day to day, and hour to hour, he was at the laſt, the 18th of May, brought into the conſiſtory, where firſt was made a brief recital of all the former proceſs: and there the ſaid Wats being (by the biſhops and others) deſired to deny his profeſſion, made this final anſwer; God keep me from the doctrine that ye would have me to come unto, which ye have now declared. And I beſeech God that I may perſevere in that that I have done; for I will ſtand to mine anſwers.

The biſhop perceiving his fair flattering promiſes prevailed not (and having no great ſtore of other reaſons to perſuade with), put forth his laſt and ſtrongeſt argument of condemnation. Which being ended, he was delivered to the ſheriffs of London, and by them was ſent to Newgate, where he remained until the 9th of June, or (as ſome record) to the 22d of May: at which time he was carried to Chelmsford, and there was brought to Mr. Scot's houſe, keeping then an inn in Chelmsford, where, as they were eating meat with Haukes and the reſt that came down to their burning; they prayed together both before and after their meat.

Then Mr. Wats went and prayed privately to himſelf, and afterward came to his wife and his ſix children being there, and ſaid theſe words in effect; Wife, and my good children, I muſt now depart from you. Therefore henceforth know I you no more, but as the Lord hath given you unto me, ſo I give you again unto the Lord, whom I charge you ſee you do obey, and fear him: and beware ye turn not to this abominable popery, againſt which I ſhall anon, by God's grace, give my blood. Let not the murdering of God's people cauſe you to relent, but take occaſion thereby to be the ſtronger in the Lord's quarrel, and I doubt not but he will be a merciful father unto you. All theſe and ſuch like words ſpake he unto them, and they unto him: of whom two, as it is ſaid, offered to be burnt with him. In the end he bade them farewel, and kiſſed them all, and was carried to the fire.

At the ſtake, after he had kiſſed it, he ſpake to my lord Rich theſe or the like words: My lord, ſaid he, beware, beware, for you do againſt your own conſcience herein, and without you repent, the Lord will revenge it: for you are the cauſe of this my death.

Long perſuaſion had been in England with great expectation, for the ſpace of half a year or more, that the queen was conceived with child. This report was made by the queen's phyſicians, and others about the court; ſo that ſeveral were puniſhed for ſaying the contrary. And a command was given, that in all churches ſupplication and prayer ſhould be made for the queen's good delivery: the certificate whereof ye may read before in the letter of the council ſent to biſhop Bonner [See page 77.] And alſo the ſame moreover may appear by proviſion made before by act of parliament for the child.

And now foraſmuch as in the beginning of this month of June, about Whitſuntide, the time was thought to be nigh that this young maſter ſhould come into the world, and that midwives, rockers, nurſes, with the cradle and all, were prepared and in a readineſs; ſuddenly, upon what cauſe or occaſion is uncertain, a certain vain rumour was blown in London of the proſperous deliverance of the queen, and the birth of the child. Inſomuch that the bells were rung, bonfires and proceſſions made, not only in the city of London, and in moſt other parts of the realm, but alſo in the town of Antwerp guns were ſhot off upon the river by the Engliſh ſhips, and the mariners thereof rewarded with an hundred piſtolets or Italian crowns by the lady regent, who was the queen of Hungary. Such great rejoicing and triumph was made for the queen's delivery, and that there was a prince born. Yea, divers preachers, namely one the parſon of St. Ann within Alderſgate, after proceſſion and Te Deum ſung, took upon him to deſcribe the proportion of the child, how fair, how beautiful, and great a prince he was, as the like had not been ſeen.

In the midſt of this great ado, there was a ſimple man (this I ſpeak but upon information) dwelling within four miles of Barwick, that had never been half way to London, who ſaid concerning the bonfires made for queen Mary's child, Here is a joyful triumph, but at length all will not prove worth a meſs of pottage; as indeed it came to paſs: for in the end all proved clean contrary, and the joy and expectations of men were much deceived. For the people were certified, that the queen neither was as then delivered, nor after was in hope to have any child.

At this time many talked diverſly. Some ſaid this rumour of the queen's conception was ſpread for a policy; others affirmed, that ſhe was deceived by a tympany or ſome other like diſeaſe, to think herſelf with child, and was not; ſome thought ſhe was with child, and that it did by ſome chance miſcarry, or elſe that ſhe was bewitched; but what was the truth thereof the Lord knoweth, to whom nothing is ſecret. One thing of mine own hearing and ſeeing, I cannot paſs over unwitneſſed.

There came to me, whom I did both hear and ſee, one Iſabel Malt, a woman dwelling in Alderſgate-ſtreet in Horn-alley, not far from the houſe where this preſent book was printed, who before witneſs made this declaration unto us, That ſhe being delivered of a man-child upon Whitſunday in the morning, which was the 11th day of June, 1555. there came to her the lord North, and another lord to her unknown, dwelling then about Old Fiſh-ſtreet, demanding of her if ſhe would part with her child, and would ſwear that ſhe never knew nor had any ſuch child. Which, if ſhe would, her ſon, they ſaid, ſhould be well provided for, ſhe ſhould take no care for it, with many fair offers if ſhe would part with the child.

After that came ſome women alſo, of whom one they ſaid ſhould have been the rocker; but ſhe in no wiſe would let go her ſon, who at the writing hereof being alive, and called Timothy Malt, was of the age of thirteen years, and upward.

Thus much, I ſay, I heard of the woman herſelf. What credit is to be given to her relation, I deal not withal, but leave it to the liberty of the reader, to believe it they that liſt; to them that liſt not, I have no further warrant to aſſure them.

Among many other great preparations made for the queen's deliverance of child, there was a cradle very ſumptuouſly and gorgeouſly trimmed, upon which cradle for the child appointed, theſe verſes were written, both in Latin and Engliſh.

"Quam Maria ſobolem, Deus optime, ſumme dediſti,
"Anglis incolumem redde, tuere, rege."
The child which thou to Mary, O Lord of might, do'ſt ſend,
To England's joy, in health preſerve, keep and defend.

About this time there came over into England a certain Engliſh book, giving warning to Engliſhmen of the Spaniards, and diſcloſing ſome ſecret practices for the recovery of abbey lands, which book was called, A Warning for England. Whereof ye ſhall underſtand more, God willing, when we come to the Spaniſh Inquiſition. So that by the occaſion of this book, upon the 13th day of this month came out a certain proclamation, ſet forth in the name of the king and queen, repealing and diſannulling all manner of books written or printed, whatſoever ſhould tend to impair the pope's dignity, whereby not only much pious edification was hindered, but alſo great peril grew among the people. The copy of which proclamation here followeth.

A Proclamation ſet out by the King and Queen, for the reſtraining of all Books and Writings, tending againſt the Doctrine of the Pope and his Church.

WHEREAS by the ſtatute made in the ſecond year of king Henry IV. concerning the repreſſing of hereſy, there is ordained and provided a great puniſhment, not only for the authors, makers, and writers of books containing wicked doctrine, and erroneous and heretical opinions, contrary to the catholic faith and determination of the holy church, and likewiſe for their favourers and ſupporters; but alſo for ſuch as have or keep any ſuch books or writings, and do not make delivery of them to the ordinary of the dioceſe or his miniſters, within a certain time limited in the ſaid ſtatute, which act act or ſtatute being by authority of parliament of late revived, was alſo openly proclaimed, to the intent the ſubjects of the realm upon ſuch proclamation ſhould the rather eſchew the danger and penalty of the ſaid ſtatute, and as yet nevertheleſs in moſt parts of the realm the ſame is neglected, and little regarded: the king and queen our ſovereign lord and lady, therefore, &c. ſtraitly charge and command, that no perſon or perſons, of what eſtate, degree, or condition ſoever he or they be, from henceforth preſume to bring or convey, or cauſe to be brought or conveyed into this realm, any books, writings, or works hereafter mentioned; that is to ſay, any book or books, writings or works made or ſet forth, by, or in the name of Martin Luther, or any book or books, writings or works made and ſet forth, by, or in the name of Oecolampadius, Zuinglius, John Calvin, Pomerane, John Alaſco, Bullinger, Bucer, Melancthon, Bernardinus, Ochinus, Eraſmus, Sarcerius, Peter Martyr, Hugh Latimer, Robert Barnes, otherwiſe called Friar Barnes, John Bale, otherwiſe called Friar Bale, Juſtus Jonas, John Hooper, Miles Coverdale, William Tindal, Thomas Cranmer late archbiſhop of Canterbury, William Turner, Theodore Baſil, otherwiſe called Thomas Beacon, John Frith, Roy, and the book commonly called Hall's Chronicle, or any of them in the Latin tongue, Dutch tongue, Engliſh tongue, Italian tongue, or French tongue, or any other like book, paper, writing, or work, made, printed, or ſet forth by any other perſon or perſons, containing falſe doctrine contrary and againſt the catholic faith, and the doctrine of the catholic church. And alſo that no perſon or perſons preſume to write, print, utter, ſell, read, or keep any, or cauſe to be written, printed, uttered, or kept any of the ſaid books, papers, works, or writings, or any book or books written or printed in the Latin or Engliſh tongue, concerning the common ſervice and adminiſtration ſet forth in Engliſh to be uſed in the churches of this realm, in the time of king Edward VI. commonly called the communion book, or book or common ſervice and ordering of miniſters, otherwiſe called, The book ſet forth by authority of parliament, for common prayer and adminiſtration of the ſacraments, or to be uſed in the mother tongue within the church of England, but ſhall within the ſpace of fifteen days next after the publication of this proclamation, bring or deliver, or cauſe the ſaid books, writings, and works, and every of them remaining in their cuſtody and keeping, to be brought and delivered to the ordinary of the dioceſe, where ſuch books, works, or writings be or remain, or to his chancellor or commiſſaries, without fraud, colour or deceit, at the ſaid ordinary's will and diſpoſition to be burnt, or otherwiſe to be uſed or ordered by the ſaid ordinary, as by the canons or ſpiritual laws it is in that caſe limited or appointed, upon pain that every offender contrary to this proclamation ſhall incur the danger and penalties contained in the ſaid ſtatute, and as they will avoid their majeſties high indignation and diſpleaſure, and further anſwer at their uttermoſt perils.

And their majeſties by this proclamation give full power and authority to all biſhops and ordinaries, and all juſtices of the peace, mayors, ſheriffs, bailiffs of cities and towns corporate, and other head officers within this realm and the dominions thereof, and expreſly commandeth and willeth the ſame and every of them, that they and every of them, within their ſeveral limits and juriſdictions, ſhall in the default and negligence of the ſaid ſubjects, after the ſaid fifteen days expired, enquire and ſearch out the ſaid books, writings, and works; and for this purpoſe enter into the houſe or houſes, cloſets and ſecret places of every perſon, of whatſoever degree, being negligent in this behalf, and ſuſpected to keep any ſuch book, writing, or works, contrary to this proclamation: and that the ſaid juſtices, mayors, ſheriffs, bailiffs, or other head officers above ſpecified, and every of them within their ſaid limits and juriſdictions finding any of the ſaid ſubjects negligent and faulty in this behalf, ſhall commit every ſuch offender to ward, there to remain without bail or mainprize, till the ſame offender or offenders have received ſuch puniſhment as the ſaid ſtatute doth limit and appoint in this behalf. Given under our ſigns manual, at our manor of Hampton-court, the 13th day of June, the firſt and ſecond years of our reign.

Articles to be enquired upon by the Wardens of every company, touching ſeditious Books, eſpecially concerning the Book called, A Warning for England.

1. Whether they have ſeen any of the aforeſaid books.
2. Whether they have heard of any of the ſaid books.
3. Where they were, and in what place they have ſeen them.
4. Whom they know to have lately come from beyond the ſea, eſpecially from Zurich, Straſburgh, Frankfort, Wezel, Embden, and Diſburge.
5. Whom they know or vehemently ſuſpect to be common carriers of letters, or money thither from hence.
6. That they bring to my lord mayor all ſuch ſeditious books as they have, or ſhall find hereafter.

In this proclamation thou haſt heard, chriſtian reader, the profound and learned cenſure of the catholic church of England, what books they miſlike and reject as heretical, ſchiſmatical, and pernicious. Againſt which catholic cenſures of theſe learned fathers, I have not at this time to infer: neither doth any leiſure now ſerve to write apologies in defence of theſe authors here condemned. Only ſo much leave it may pleaſe the reader to grant me, to ſet before him here a pair of balance, wherein to weigh the books on the one ſide condemned, with the books on the other ſide allowed, to the end that we weigning the one with the other, may diſcern the better between them, which part weigheth beſt with God's holy truth and true catholic church, againſt manifeſt idolatrry and palpable abomination. And now therefore, as they have in this preſent proclamation given their condemnation upon theſe books above recited: ſo I deſire thee to give thy cenſure upon their books by them allowed, and upon the matter in them contained, and mark well what good ſtuff it is.

And firſt to begin with the primmer in Engliſh, for children after the uſe of Saliſbury, imprinted with a privilege according to the king and queen's majeſties letters patents in the reign of queen Mary. Let us repeat and ſurvey ſome part of the ſaid primmer (for to expreſs all it were too long), beginning with the firſt leſſon of our lady, in theſe words:

" Holy Mary, mother moſt pure of virgins all;
Mother and daughter of the king celeſtial,
So comfort us in our deſolation,
That by thy prayer and ſpecial meditation,
We enjoy the reward of thy heavenly reign."

Confer this with the ſcriptures, good reader, and judge uprightly whether this doctrine be tolerable in the church or not.

In the ſecond Leſſon.

" Holy Mary, of all godly the godlieſt,
Pray for us, of all holy the holieſt;
That he our prayers accept may in good wiſe,
Which of thee was born, and reigneth above the ſkies," &c.

In the third Leſſon.

" Thy Son beſeech with humble interceſſion,
To purge us clean of our tranſgreſſion;
That ſo being redeemed we may the place aſcend,
Where thou dwelleſt with him world without end."

The Verſicle.

" Pray for the people, intreat for the clergy, make interceſſion for the devout woman-kind; let all feel thy help, that worthily ſolemnize thy memorial, &c."

Another Verſicle.

" Holy mother of God, make thy petition, that we may deſerve Chriſt's promiſſion, &c."

And in the Anthem after Benedictus, thus it followeth:

" We beſeech thee of thy pity to have us in remembrance, and to make means for us unto Chriſt, that we being ſupported by thy help, may deſerve to attain the kingdom of heaven."

Furthermore in the Collect after it followeth:

" And grant, that through the gracious interceſſion of the virgin thy mother, we may be delivered from this preſent heavineſs, and have the fruition of eternal gladneſs.

It followeth moreover in the ſaid primmer thus, concerning the material croſs.

" O God, which haſt aſcended thy moſt holy croſs, and haſt given light to the darkneſs of the world, vouchſafe by the virtue of thy croſs to illuminate, viſit and comfort both our hearts and bodies, &c."

Moreover, in the name of St. John Baptiſt thus it prayeth:

" O Lord, defend us alway through the continual ſuccours of St. John Baptiſt. For the more frail we be, the more need we have to be relieved with neceſſary prayers, &c."

In which words note (good reader) not only the abſurdity of doctrine, but alſo the fooliſhneſs of the reaſon. For where their doctrine pretendeth that St. John Baptiſt ſhould pray for us, here we pray to God for St. John Baptiſt, that he will hear his prayer praying for us. It followeth furthermore in the name of Peter and Paul:

" Hear us mercifully, and grant that through the merits of them both, we may obtain the glory everlaſting, &c."

Of St. Andrew.

" So let him, O Lord, be a continual petitioner for us to thee, &c."

Of St. Laurence thus:

" St. Laurence the deacon did work a great work. For by the virtue of the holy croſs he gave ſight to the blind, &c."

And how can this be true, when the holy croſs was not yet found in the time of St. Laurence? For Helen which firſt found the croſs, as they ſay, came after St. Laurence more than forty years.

To Thomas Becket Archbiſhop of Canterbury.

" By the blood of Thomas, which he for thee did ſpend, make us, Chriſt, to climb, whither Thomas did aſcend."

Of St. Nicholas.

" O God, which haſt glorified bleſſed Nicholas, thy holy biſhop, with innumerable miracles, grant, we beſeech thee, that by his merits and prayers we may be delivered from the fire of hell."

Of Mary Magdalen.

" Grant, we beſeech thee, through thy mercy, to let her purchaſe for us the bliſs everlaſting, &c."

Another Prayer to our Lady.

" The dolorous compaſſion of God's ſweet mother, Bring us to the bliſs of Almighty God the Father, &c."

Another prayer in the ſaid Primmer to our Lady.

" Eſtabliſh us in peace and tranquillity,
And change the name of ſinful Eva:
Looſe thy priſoners from captivity,
Unto the blind give ſight again.
Deliver us from malignity,
To the end we may ſome grace attain.
Shew thyſelf to be a mother,
So that he accept our petition.
Deliver us from bondage of ſin, &c."

Item,

" Holy mother, ſuccour the miſerable, comfort the weak-ſpirited, give courage to the deſperate, pray for the people, make interceſſion for the clergy, and be a mean for the devout woman-kind, &c."

Another blaſphemous Prayer.

" O thou meek mother, have mercy therefore
On wretches, for whom thou hadſt theſe pains all,
Seeing thy Son that vine-cluſter preſſed ſore:
And from the peſtilence of death eternal,
Keep us, by 'vaiding the fiend infernal,
And join us with them which rewarded be
With eternal life, ſeeing the Deity."

Another blaſphemy in the ſaid Primmer.

" Hail queen, mother of mercy, our life, our ſweetneſs, our hope. Unto thee do we cry and ſigh, weeping and wailing. Come off therefore our patroneſs; caſt upon us thy pitiful eyes, and after this our baniſhment ſhew to us the bleſſed fruit of thy womb. O gate of glory, be for us a reconciliation unto the Father and the Son. From the wretched their faults expel: wipe the ſpots of ſin unclean, &c."

Item, To our Lady.

" The fruit of thy womb everlaſting,
We may behold through thy deſerving, &c."

Item,

" Grant, we beſeech thee, that by her merits and prayers we may attain to that unſpeakable joy, whereas ſhe being aſcended, doth now rejoice with thee in heaven for ever."

And thus much hitherto of this catholic Primmer, called our Lady's Mattins. Whereunto, if it were not tedious for the reader, we would alſo adjoin our Lady's Pſalter, to the intent that all indifferent readers, as they have ſeen what books theſe catholic fathers have condemned and do condemn for heretical; ſo they may alſo ſee and judge, what books on the other ſide they approve as lawful and catholic. And foraſmuch as it is not known to all men what our Lady's Pſalter is, or what it meaneth; yea, and ſome peradventure will deny any ſuch book of our Lady's Pſalter to be written or approved, here therefore we will firſt produce the name of the author, who was Bonaventure, a ſeraphical doctor, biſhop alſo and cardinal, canonized moreover by pope Sixtus IV. in the year 1482, for a ſaint in the kalendar, whoſe book is thus intitled in Latin, " Incipit Pſalterium beatæ virginis, compilatum per ſeraphicum doctorem ſanctum Bonaventuram epiſcopum Albanenſem, necnon ſanctæ Romanæ eccleſiæ preſbyterum cardinalem, in honorem genetricis, &c. Fol. 84." In the ſecond part of his whole works (which were printed at Argentine, An. 1495.) to ſhew himſelf a devout ſervant to his lady, hath taken every pſalm of David's Pſalter (which he peculiarly made and referred to Almighty God), and hath in ſeveral of the ſaid pſalms and verſes put out the name of the Lord, and hath placed in the name of our Lady. This being done through the whole pſalms and every one of them, it is now called our Lady's Pſalter, uſed to be ſung and ſaid in the praiſe and ſervice of our Lady. A brief taſte whereof for example ſake (for it were too long to ſhew all) we thought here to exhibit unto the reader in order, as followeth.

The Title of the Pſalter in Engliſh.

" Here beginneth the Pſalter of the bleſſed Virgin, made by the ſeraphical Doctor St. Bonaventure, the Biſhop of Alban, and Cardinal of the holy Church of Rome.

" BLeſſed is the man which underſtandeth thy name, O virgin Mary, thy grace ſhall comfort his ſoul. Thou ſhalt bring forth in him the moſt plentiful fruit of juſtice, being watered as it were with fountains of water. All women thou paſſeſt in the beauty of thy body; all angels and archangels in the excellency of thy holineſs. Thy mercy and thy grace is magnified every where, &c. Glory be to the Father, &c.

2. " Why do our enemies fret and imagine vain things againſt us? Let thy right hand defend us, O mother of God, terribly confounding and deſtroying them as a ſword. Come unto her all ye that labour and are troubled, and ſhe will give reſt unto your ſouls. Come unto her in your temptations, and her loving countenance ſhall ſtabliſh and comfort you. Bleſs her with all your heart; for the earth is full of her mercy. Glory be to the Father, &c.

3. " Why are they ſo many, O lady, that trouble me? In thy fury thou ſhalt perſecute and deſtroy them. Looſe the bonds of our impiety, and take away the burden of our ſins. Have mercy upon me, O lady, and heal my infirmity. Take away my ſorrow and the anguiſh of my heart. Deliver me not into the hands of mine enemies, and in the day of my death comfort my ſoul. Bring me unto the haven of ſalvation, and reſtore my ſpirit unto my maker and creator. Glory be to the Father, &c."

4. " When I called to thee, thou heardeſt, O my lady, and out of thy high throne thou didſt vouchſafe to think upon me. From the roaring of them that prepare themſelves to devour me, and out of the hands of ſuch as ſeek after my life, thy grace ſhall deliver me: becauſe thy mercy and thy pity are great towards all them that call upon thy holy name. Bleſſed be thou, O lady, for ever, and thy majeſty for ever and ever. Glorify her, all nations of the earth, &c."

5. " Hear my words, O lady, &c. turn our mourning into gladneſs, and our trouble into rejoicing. Let our enemies fall before our feet, and with thy power daſh their heads in pieces."

6. " O lady, ſuffer me not to be rebuked in God's anger, nor to be chaſtened in his heavy diſpleaſure, &c. From the gate and deep pit of hell, with thy holy prayers deliver us. Let the everlaſting gates be opened, that we may ſhew forth thy marvellous works for ever. Becauſe the dead, nor they that be in hell, ſhall not praiſe thee, O lady, but they which obtain by thy grace life everlaſting."

7. " O my lady, in thee will I put my truſt; deliver me from mine enemies, O lady. Stop the mouth of the lion, and bind the lips of the perſecutors. Make no tarrying, for thy name's ſake, to ſhew thy mercy upon me. Let the brightneſs of thy countenance ſhine upon us, that our conſcience may be ſaved before the moſt higheſt. If the enemy do perſecute my ſoul, O lady, help me that he deſtroy me not."

9. " I will give thanks to thee, O lady, with my whole heart, and will ſhew forth among the nations thy praiſe and glory, &c. They ſhall find grace through thee, the finder out of grace and ſalvation; the humble and penitent groan for pardon and forgiveneſs; heal thou the ſores of their heart, &c."

11. " In thee, O lady, do I put my truſt, &c. Seek her even from your youth, and ſhe ſhall glorify you. &c. Her mercy take from us the multitude of our ſins, and give unto us plenteouſneſs of merits, &c."

12. " Save me, O mother of love, and fountain of mercy, &c. Thou thyſelf alone haſt gone about the compaſs of the earth, to help them that call upon thee."

13. " How long doſt thou forget me, O lady, and doſt not deliver me in the day of my trouble? How long ſhall mine enemy triumph over me? With thy mighty power deſtroy him, &c. We magnify thee the finder and the author of grace, by whom the world is repaired, &c."

16. " Preſerve me, O lady, for in thee have I put my truſt, &c. Bleſſed be thy breaſts, which with thy deifying milk didſt nouriſh the Saviour, &c."

18. " I will love thee, O lady of heaven and earth; I will call upon thy name among the nations. Confeſs yourſelves unto her, ye that are troubled in heart, and ſhe ſhall ſtrengthen you againſt your enemies, &c. All ye cloyſterers honour her, for ſhe is your helper and ſpecial advocate. Be thou our refreſhing and reſt, for thou art the marvellous foundation of all religion."

20. " Hear us, O lady, in the day of trouble, &c. Caſt us not away in the time of our death, but ſuccour our ſoul when it forſaketh the body. Send an angel to meet it, that it may be defended from the enemies, &c. In torments and pain let it feel thy comfort, and grant to it a place among the elect of God."

25. " To thee, O lady, do I lift up my ſoul, &c. Let not the ſnares of death prevail againſt me, &c. Be thou my guide to the heavenly reſt, and to the company of angels aſſociate me."

26. " Judge thou me, O lady, for I am fallen from mine innocency: but becauſe I put my truſt in thee, therefore I ſhall not fall, &c."

27. " O lady, let the brightneſs of thy face be my ſight, and let the clearneſs of thy grace ſhine unto my mind, &c."

28. " To thee, O lady, &c. Have mercy upon me in the day of my trouble, and in the light of thy truth deliver me, &c."

31. " In thee, O lady, do I put my truſt, let me not be confounded for ever, in thy glory receive me. Thou art my ſtrength and my refuge, my conſolation and protection, &c. Deliver me from the ſnare that they have laid for me, becauſe thou art my helper. Into thy hands I commend my ſpirit, &c."

34. " I will always praiſe our lady, &c. In perils, in adverſity call upon her, and in time of need ye ſhall find ſuccour. Let her converſation be an example unto you, and follow the virtue of her humility. Becauſe therefore, O lady, thou waſt humble and lowly. Thou didſt compel the Word increate to take fleſh of thee."

36. " The wicked man ſaid, &c. Let him depart from his evil purpoſe; O mother of God, turn the countenance of God towards us: compel him to be merciful unto ſinners. Bleſſed be thy power and dominion in heaven, and bleſſed be thy magnificence upon the earth."

45. " My heart is inditing a good matter, O lady, &c. By thy holineſs let my ſins be purged, by thy integrity let me obtain incorruption, &c."

47. " Clap your hands, all ye people, &c. For ſhe is the gate of life, the door of ſalvation, the reconciler of our life; the hope of the penitent, the comfort of the ſorrowful, the bleſſed peace of hearts and ſalvation. Have mercy upon me, O lady, have mercy upon me; for thou art the light and hope of all that put their truſt in thee."

51. " Have mercy upon me, O lady, which art called the mother of mercy, and in the bowels of thy great compaſſion cleanſe me from mine iniquities."

54. " O lady, in thy name ſave me, and from mine unrighteouſneſs deliver me, &c."

70. " Make haſte, O lady, to help me, &c. Have mercy on thy ſervants, upon whom thy name is invocated, &c."

71. " In thee, lady, have I put my truſt: let me not be confounded for ever, in thy mercy deliver me, &c."

79. "O lady, the gentiles are come into the inheritance of God, whom thou didſt join unto Chriſt by thy merits, &c."

89. "Thou that ruleſt Iſrael, &c. The Saviour of life cometh from her, and all health floweth out of her heart, &c."

91. "Whoſo dwelleth in the help of the mother of God, ſhall dwell in the ſhadow of her protection, &c. Cry unto her in your dangers, and the ſcourge ſhall not come near your tabernacle. The fruit of grace ſhall be to him whoſo truſteth in her, and the gate of paradiſe ſhall be open unto him."

95. "Come let us rejoice to our lady, &c." Receive our ſouls at our laſt end, and bring them into everlaſting reſt, &c."

105. "Praiſe our lady, and call upon her name, &c. Everlaſting ſalvation is in thy hand, O lady, &c."

110. "The Lord ſaid unto our lady; Sit here, my mother, on my right hand, &c."

114. "In the paſſing of my ſoul out of this world, come and meet it, O lady, and receive it, &c. Be to it a ladder to the kingdom of heaven, and a right way to the paradiſe of God, &c."

119. "The whole earth is full of thy mercies, and therefore I will ſearch out the way of thy juſtifications, &c. I will covet for ever to praiſe thee, O lady, when thou ſhall teach me thy juſtifications, &c."

125. "They that put their truſt in thee, O mother of God, ſhall not be afraid of the face of their enemy, &c."

127. "Except our lady ſhall build the houſe of our heart, the building thereof ſhall not continue."

128. "Bleſſed is every one that feareth our lady, and bleſſed be all they which know to do her will, &c."

130. "Out of the deep I have called unto thee, O lady, O lady, hear my voice, &c."

132. "O lady, remember David, and all them that call upon thy name, &c."

134. "Behold and bleſs now our lady, all ye that put your truſt in her holy name."

136. "At the floods of Babylon, &c." There is no propitiation to be found without her, &c."

140. "Deliver me, O lady, from all evil, and from the infernal enemy defend me, &c."

145. "Our eyes look up and truſt in thee. Do thou ſend us meat and food convenient, &c. My tongue ſhall ſpeak thy praiſe, and ſhall bleſs thee for ever."

148. "Praiſe thou our lady, O Jeruſalem, and glorify her alſo, O thou Sion: For ſhe buildeth up thy walls, and bleſſeth thy children. Her grace maketh thee fat, and giveth peace unto thy coaſts, &c."

I could recite alſo other things of like blaſphemy, following immediately after this pſalter of our lady, in the ſeraphical doctor aforeſaid, as theſe:

"Behold my lady my ſaviour, I will be bold in thee, and will not fear, &c. Becauſe thou art my ſtrength, &c. And art become my ſalvation, &c."

"Rejoice, O all mankind, becauſe the Lord thy God hath given unto thee ſuch a mediatrix, &c."

"I will confeſs to thee, O lady, becauſe thou haſt hid theſe things from the wiſe, and haſt revealed them to the little ones."

"O thou wicked and peeviſh generation, acknowledge our lady thy ſaviour. Is not ſhe the mother that hath poſſeſſed thee, and in faith hath begotten thee?"

"O thou bleſſed, in thy hands is laid up our ſalvation, &c.."

"In thy name let every knee bend, in heaven and earth, and in hell."

"Like as an infant cannot live without the nurſe, ſo neither canſt thou have ſalvation without our lady."

"Whoſo will be ſaved, before all things he muſt needs hold this belief of our lady; which belief, unleſs every one ſhall hold perfect and ſound, he ſhall periſh without doubt for ever."

Moreover, after theſe ſo horrible things and intolerable to be heard, conſequently in the next tractation followeth the roſary or garland of our lady, compiled by the ſaid Bonaventure: wherein theſe words are to be read as followeth: "O mediatrix between God and man, the Lord hath worthily magnified thee, that thou only ſhouldeſt conceive his ſon. Wherefore, O good Mary our mediatrix, mother of grace, and mother of mercy, &c." And moreover, within few lines it followeth in theſe words, "Therefore, O our empreſs and lady moſt bountiful, by the authority of a mother command, command (I ſay) thy well-beloved Son, that he will ſtir up our minds from the love of worldly things, to heavenly deſires, &c."

Item, "O the advocate of the miſerable, the eyes of thy ſervants be directed to thee, &c."

To theſe premiſſes, I might alſo adjoin the horrible and moſt blaſphemous words of the ſaid Bonaventure in the ſaid book, fol. 100. pag 2. col. 1. which I beſeech thee to read and note. "What greater goodneſs can be, than that Chriſt is content to be captive upon the altar?"

Whereupon he ſpeaketh in the perſon of Jeremy, ſaying, "Behold I am in your hands, do with me as you ſee good, &c. Where note, ſaith he, that when any duke or prince is taken priſoner for his ſubjects, he is not let go, before he pay ſome great ſum of money for his ranſom. Even ſo neither we ought to let Chriſt go out of our hands being our priſoner and captive, except he grant to us remiſſion of our ſins and his heavenly kingdom. The prieſt therefore lifteth up the body of Chriſt upon the altar, as though he ſaid thus, Behold him whom the whole world is not able to comprehend, he is holden here our captive, wherefore let us hold him faſt, and not let him go before we obtain of him our requeſts, &c."

NOTES.

Is not here good catholic ſtuff (chriſtian reader) think you? Confer, I beſeech you, this doctrine with the doctrine of the apoſtles, which teach us that we are fully compleat in Chriſt, and I will refer me to no better judge than to your own conſcience. And now therefore, if any man have been in doubt in times paſt of the doctrine and proceeding of the church of Rome, whether it be rightly charged with blind errors, with blaſphemy intolerable, and idolatry abominable or not, here now he may be fully certified and reſolved. For where was ever idolatry or blaſphemy to be found, if it be not here in this mattins and pſalter of our lady? If idolatry be to make an idol to be worſhipped as God, which is no god, what do we here but make an idol of our lady (as we call her) to be worſhipped with no leſs dignity, glory, authority, reverence, and ſervice, than is the Lord God himſelf? And as he is called our Lord, ſo ſhe is called our lady. And if he be king, yet ſhe is the queen of heaven. And though he have the name of God, yet ſhe beareth ſo the title of the mother of God; that as mothers have authority over their children, ſo ſhe is willed to ſhew herſelf to be his mother, to cauſe him to grant our petitions. Finally, if he be our patron, yet ſhe is our patroneſs. The commandment ſaith, "Thou ſhalt worſhip the Lord thy God, and him only ſhalt thou ſerve." And what worſhip or ſervice can we give to God, more than we do aſcribe unto her? And what benefit is to be aſked at the hands of Chriſt our Saviour, which is not equally aſked of her? To ſave our ſouls, to give us peace, to grant grace, to comfort the deſperate, to looſe our captivity, to releaſe our ſins, to deliver from the fiend, to bring to heaven, &c. To her we pray, we cry, we weep, we ſigh, we groan, we knock and kneel, to her we truſt, and if we believe not alſo in our lady, we be heretics ipſo facto.

Further-

Furthermore, as Chriſt our only Lord and Saviour hath his church and congregation which profeſs his name, of whom we are called chriſtians; ſo neither is ſhe likewiſe without her chapels, her cloiſters, her chapters, fraternities, and brotherhoods, which profeſſing her name in like ſort, are called our lady's brethren, or white friers, beſides an innumerable ſort of other patrons of churches, of whom every one hath his peculiar church and religion by himſelf, yet all theſe together be included under the general devotion of our lady their ſupreme patroneſs and governeſs.

Now to proceed further to the other part of the commandment, which ſaith, "Him only ſhalt thou ſerve." What ſervice hath the Lord in all the church, but our lady alſo jointly with him hath the like? Her maſs, her mattins, her even-ſong, her hours and complin, her roſaries, her anthems, her collects, her primmer, her pſalter, her holy-days likewiſe, yea five to one. Finally, as the Lord hath his prayer called the Lord's prayer, ſo hath ſhe her Ave Mary's, yea ten Ave's to one Pater noſter; yea, and read further in the ſaid Bonaventure, and ye ſhall ſee her alſo to have her Te Deum, her Benedictus, her Magnificat, and alſo her Quicunque vult.

If the Lord our God had not expreſſed unto us his own will by plain words, limiting unto us by expreſs injunction what to believe, what to follow, and how to worſhip and ſerve him, and how to receive from him our ſalvation; but had left us to the imagination of our own inventions, every man to ſhift for himſelf after his own policy, then peradventure this way taken by the pope's church, to make friends and mediators between God and us, for reconciliation, remiſſion, and ſalvation, might have ſome rhime or reaſon; but now God's word doth bind us, doth preſcribe and limit us preciſely in every point touching ſalvation, what to believe, and what to do, ſhewing us plainly that we cannot be ſaved but by the blood of his Son only, neither can be juſtified but by faith only in the ſame Chriſt his Son: Wherefore not to believe that which he hath promiſed, is infidelity; and to follow any other belief than he hath ſet us, is plain idolatry. Which two ſpecial errors moſt commonly do follow the doctrine of the Romiſh church, as not only in this Primmer and Pſalter of our Lady aforeſaid, but alſo in all their proceedings, teachings and preachings beſides may well appear. For where the ſcripture doth perfectly promiſe and pronounce us to be juſtified through our faith in Chriſt, and willeth us to ſeek our ſalvation nowhere elſe, but only in the merits of Jeſus: the inſtitution of the church of Rome neither will receive that God hath freely given (wherein ſtandeth infidelity), neither yet will ſeek the ſame there where they ſhould, but in the merits and prayers of our Lady, St. John Baptiſt, St. Peter and Paul, St. Andrew, St. Nicholas, St. Thomas of Canterbury, and by the worthineſs of the material croſs, and ſuch other unlawful means, wherein ſtandeth plain idolatry. And yet ſuch books as theſe can be ſuffered among the catholics to be current, as good, wholeſome and lawful books; whereas the others, which lead us the true way from infidelity and blind idolatry to true chriſtianity, in no wiſe can be ſuffered. But of this to complain it is vain. Wherefore to paſs from this proclamation, let us proceed (God willing) in the courſe of our hiſtory.

The Hiſtory of Thomas Oſmond, William Bamford, and Thomas Oſborne, &c.

MEntion was made before in the ſtory of Thomas Haukes, of ſix priſoners beſides, which were ſent down with him to Eſſex the ſame time as he went to execution. Of which ſix priſoners, three were ſent to be burnt, the other three to recant, and to do penance: of whom it followeth next to intreat. The names of which ſix were theſe, Thomas Oſmond fuller, William Bamford, alias Butler, weaver, Thomas Oſborne fuller, Nicholas Chamberlain weaver, Thomas Brodehill weaver, Richard Web weaver, being all of the town of Coxhall. All which men, next after the examinations of Thomas Haukes and Thomas Wats, were ſent up to biſhop Bonner to be examined, by the earl of Oxford and Sir Philip Paris knight, a letter alſo being ſent with them, the copy whereof here followeth.

The Earl of Oxford's Letter to Biſhop Bonner.

AFTER our hearty commendations unto your good lordſhip, this ſhall be to advertiſe the ſame, that the conſtables of Coxhall within your dioceſe, have brought before us this day ſix perſons dwelling in the town of Coxhall aforeſaid, whoſe names do follow, to wit, Nicholas Chamberlain weaver, John Wallet fuller, Thomas Brodehill weaver, Richard Web weaver, William Bamford, alias Butler, weaver, and Thomas Oſborne fuller, for that they at the feaſt of Eaſter now laſt, have not obeyed to the order of the holy catholic church in receiving of the ſacraments, but obſtinately refuſing the ſame; beſides of holding divers other opinions contrary to the faith of the ſaid church. Wherefore we have thought it good to ſend the ſame perſons unto your good lordſhip further to be ordered, as in ſuch caſe ſhall appertain. Thus we commit your good lordſhip to the keeping of Almighty God. From Hedingham, the firſt of May 1555.

Your lordſhip's aſſuredly,
Oxford, Philip Paris.

The ſaid priſoners being ſent up the firſt of May, were brought before the ſaid biſhop the 17th of the ſaid month, to be examined upon divers and ſundry articles miniſtered and objected againſt them; whereunto they were compelled to anſwer, and to put their hands to the ſame; the copy of which their articles and anſwers, being all in one form and effect (if the regiſter ſay true) here followeth.

The Copy of the Articles objected againſt Thomas Oſmond, William Bamford, and Nicholas Chamberlain.

FIRST, That thou Thomas Oſmond fuller, waſt and art of the pariſh of Coxhall within the dioceſe of London, and thou haſt not believed nor doſt believe, that there is here in the earth one catholic and univerſal whole church, which doth hold and believe all the faith and religion of Chriſt, and all the neceſſary articles and ſacraments of the ſame.

2. Item, That thou haſt not believed nor doſt believe, that thou art neceſſarily bounden under the pain of the damnation of thy ſoul, to give full faith and credence unto the ſaid catholic and univerſal church, and to the faith and religion of the ſame in all neceſſary points of the ſaid faith and religion, without doubting or wavering in the ſaid faith and religion, or in any part thereof.

3. Item, That thou haſt not believed that the faith and religion, which both the church of Rome, Italy, Spain, England, France, Ireland, Scotland, and all other churches in Europe, being true members and parts of the ſaid catholic and univerſal church, do believe and teach, is both agreeing with the faith and religion of Chriſt, and alſo is the very true faith and religion which all chriſtian people ought to believe, obſerve, follow and keep; but contrariwiſe, thou haſt believed and doſt believe, that that faith and religion, which the ſaid church of Rome, and all the other churches aforeſaid, have heretofore believed, and do believe, is falſe, erroneous, and naught, and in no wiſe ought to be believed, obſerved, kept, and followed of any chriſtian perſon.

4. Item,

4. Item, That albeit it be true, that in the ſacrament of the altar there is in ſubſtance the very body and blood of our Saviour Chriſt under the forms of bread and wine; and albeit that it be ſo believed, taught and preached undoubtedly in the ſaid church of Rome, and all other churches aforeſaid, yet thou haſt not ſo believed, nor doſt ſo believe, but contrariwiſe, thou haſt believed, and doſt believe firmly and ſtedfaſtly, that there is not in the ſaid ſacrament of the altar, under the ſaid forms of bread and wine, the very ſubſtance of Chriſt's body and blood, but that there is only the ſubſtance of material and common bread and wine, with the forms thereof, and that the ſaid material and common bread and wine are only the ſigns and tokens of Chriſt's body and blood, and are by faith to be received only for a remembrance of Chriſt's paſſion and death, without any ſuch ſubſtance of Chriſt's body and blood at all.

5. Item, That thou haſt believed and taught, and haſt openly ſpoke and defended, and ſo doſt believe, think, maintain, and defend, that the very true receiving and eating of Chriſt's body and blood, is only to take material and common bread, and to break it and diſtribute it among the people, remembering thereby the paſſion and death of Chriſt only.

6. Item, That thou haſt likewiſe believed, taught, and ſpoken, that the maſs, now uſed in the realm of England, and other the churches aforeſaid, is abominable and naught, and full of idolatry, and is of the ordinance of the pope, and not of the inſtitution of Chriſt, and hath no goodneſs in it, ſaving the Gloria in Excelſis, the epiſtle and goſpel, and therefore thou haſt not, nor will not come and be preſent at maſs, nor receive the ſacrament of the altar, nor any other ſacrament of the church, as they are now uſed in the realm of England, &c.

7. Item, That thou haſt in times paſt believed, and yet doſt now believe, that auricular confeſſion is not neceſſary to be made unto the prieſt, but is a thing ſuperfluous, void, and naught, only to be made to God and to none other perſon. And likewiſe thou haſt condemned as ſuperfluous, vain, and unprofitable, all the ceremonies of the church, and the ſervice of the ſame, and haſt ſaid that no ſervice in the church ought to be ſaid but in the Engliſh tongue, and if it be otherwiſe, it is unlawful and naught.

8. Item, That thou being notoriouſly and openly ſuſpected for an heretic, and a perſon culpable in the premiſſes, waſt of late called and convented before the earl of Oxford, and Mr. Philip Paris, and there waſt charged with the ſaid hereſies, eſpecially againſt the ſacrament of the altar. And becauſe thou didſt maintain and ſtand to thy ſaid hereſies, and wouldeſt not come to the church and be confeſſed, and receive the ſaid ſacrament as other chriſtian people did, but utterly didſt refuſe to do the ſame, thou waſt by the ſaid earl of Oxford, and Mr. Philip Paris, ſent up by a conſtable unto me biſhop of London, and waſt by them denounced, detected, and put up to me as an heretic and miſbelieving perſon.

9. Item, That thou haſt known and believed, thou doſt know and believe, or at leaſt thou haſt credibly heard, reported, ſpoken, and ſaid, that all and all manner of perſons, which do teach, preach, or hold any thing concerning the ſacraments of the church, or any the articles of faith, otherwiſe than is found already diſcuſſed and determined by our mother the holy church, or doth call into doubt or queſtion that thing which is already decided or determined by the church, or that willingly and wittingly do utter, openly or privily, any ſlanderous or blaſphemous words concerning the ſaid ſacraments or any of them, or that do preach, teach, or keep any ſect or kind of hereſy againſt the wholeſome doctrine of the church, and do wittingly or obſtinately defend the ſect or kind of hereſy, are by the canons of the whole and univerſal catholic church, and alſo by the eccleſiaſtical laws of this church of England, by their ſo doing, accurſed with that curſe which doth ſeparate them from the entry into the church, from the receiving of the ſacraments, and from the company of faithful people, and are (in continuing in this ſaid ſect and hereſy) to be pronounced, declared, and taken for heretics, and to be delivered to the ſecular power, and by the laws temporal of this realm of England, and the cuſtom of the ſame, to be by the ſaid ſecular power put to death, and burnt for this ſaid ſect and hereſy.

10. Item, That thou by reaſon of the premiſſes waſt and art to be pronounced, taken, had, reputed, and judged for a manifeſt and open, wilful and obſtinate heretic, for a wicked and curſed perſon, and to be puniſhed accordingly for the ſame, according to the ſaid canon laws, uſages, and cuſtoms.

The Anſwers of Tho. Oſmond, W. Bamford, and Nicholas Chamberlain, to the aforeſaid Articles.

TO the firſt they anſwered and confeſſed the ſame to be true, except that they do believe that there is here in earth one catholic and whole church, and that the ſame church doth hold and believe as is contained in this article.

To the ſecond they anſwer and believe the ſaid article not to be true; for they ſay that they have and do believe that they are neceſſarily bounden, under pain of damnation of their ſoul, to give full faith and credence unto the ſaid catholic church, and to the faith and religion of the ſame, in all neceſſary points of the ſame faith and religion, without wavering or doubting in any part thereof.

To the third they anſwer, That the church of Rome, and other churches mentioned in this article, be not true members and parts (as they be uſed in faith and religion) of the catholic church of Chriſt and that the faith and religion uſed in the ſaid churches, is not agreeable with the church of Chriſt, but are falſe and erroneous.

To the fourth they anſwer and ſay, That howſoever the ſaid churches of Rome and others of Chriſtendom have and do believe touching the ſacrament of the altar, yet they do believe that in the ſacrament under the forms of bread and wine, there is not the very ſubſtance of Chriſt's body and blood, but that there is only the ſubſtance of material bread and wine, and that the ſame material bread and wine be only the ſigns and tokens of Chriſt's body and blood, and are to be received only for a remembrance of Chriſt's paſſion and death, without any ſubſtance of Chriſt's body and blood at all.

To the fifth article they anſwer, That the true receiving and eating of Chriſt's body, according to Chriſt's inſtitution, is to take, diſtribute, and eat material bread, and thereby to remember the paſſion and death of Chriſt, and ſo receive by faith (as they believe) Chriſt's body and blood, and not otherwiſe.

To the ſixth they anſwer, The ſame to be true in every part thereof, except that over and beſides the Gloria in Excelſis, the epiſtle and goſpel, which they believe to be good, they believe the Pater-noſter and Creed uſed in the maſs, be alſo good.

To the ſeventh they anſwer and confeſs, That auricular confeſſion is not neceſſary to be made to the prieſt; nevertheleſs they think that it is neceſſary to go to ſuch a prieſt as is able to give good counſel: and that for counſel only, and not otherwiſe. And as concerning the ceremonies of the church, they anſwer the ſame to be vain and unprofitable. No ſervice in the church ought to be ſaid, but only in the Engliſh tongue.

To the eighth they anſwer and believe the ſame to be true in every part thereof, except that they do not believe that they be heretics, or ſuſpected of hereſy.

To the ninth Oſmond and Bamford anſwered, That they referred themſelves to the ſaid laws mentioned in that article; but Chamberlain made no anſwer at all to this article.

To the tenth, the ſaid Oſmond and Bamford anſwered and ſaid, That by reaſon of their belief before by them confeſſed, they are not to be reputed, taken or adjudged for wilful and obſtinate heretics, nor to be puniſhed therefore, as is declared in that article. The other anſwered nothing.

Remarks upon the aforeſaid Articles.

THESE articles, in the ſame form and manner of words, are commonly objected to all others that follow after, with the ſame anſwers alſo thereunto annexed. In which articles thou may'ſt note, reader, the crafty and ſubtle handling of theſe lawyers and regiſters, who ſo deceitfully frame their articles and poſitions, that unleſs a man do adviſedly conſider them, it is hard for a ſimple man to anſwer to them, but he ſhall be enſnared and entangled. So they paint their church with ſuch a viſage of univerſal, whole, holy, catholic, as who ſhould ſay, He that denieth Rome, denieth the holy church of Chriſt here in earth. Likewiſe in examining them, and eſpecially the ſimple ſort in the matter of the ſacrament, to the material bread in the ſacrament they put their word [only] very captiouſly and fraudulently, to take them at the worſt advantage, making the people believe that they take the holy ſacrament to be no better than only common bread: when they do not ſo, but make a difference between the ſame, both in the uſe, honour, and name thereof.

Again, when the examinates hold but only againſt the erroneous points of Romiſh religion, theſe biſhops in their interrogatories give out the matter ſo generally, as though the ſaid examinates in general ſpake againſt all the articles of faith taught in Rome, Spain, England, France, Scotland, &c.

Moreover, concerning Latin ſervice, in ſuch crafty form of words they propound their article, that it might appear to the people theſe men do deny any ſervice to be lawful in any place, country, or language, but only in Engliſh.

And as theſe articles are craftily, captiouſly and deceitfully in form of words deviſed by the biſhops and their notaries: ſo the anſwers again to the ſame be no leſs ſubtilly framed, and after the moſt odious manner put down in the name of the examinates, which being thus read unto them, without further advice they were conſtrained upon a ſudden to ſubſcribe the ſame with their hands. Whereby if any word eſcaped their hand, peradventure not conſiderately ſubſcribed; there the papiſts take their advantage againſt them, to defame them, and to bring them into hatred with the people.

Theſe articles thus propounded and anſwered, they were diſmiſſed till the afternoon. At which time they did again appear, and there were examined and perſuaded by fair and flattering ſpeeches, as well by the biſhop as of others his aſſiſtants, to recant and revoke their opinions, who notwithſtanding remained conſtant and firm; and therefore, after the common uſage of their eccleſiaſtical laws, were ſent away again until the next day, being Saturday, the 18th of May. Then in the forenoon the biſhop uſing his accuſtomed manner of proceeding, which he had uſed before as well with them as with others, did likewiſe diſmiſs them, and at laſt in the afternoon condemned them as heretics, and ſo delivered them to the ſheriffs, in whoſe cuſtody they remained till they were delivered to the ſheriff of Eſſex, and by him were executed, Chamberlain at Colcheſter, the 14th of June; Thomas Oſmond at Maningtree, the 15th of June; and William Bamford, alias Butler, at Harwich, the ſame 15th of June.

The Life and Acts of the worthy Martyr Mr. John Bradford.

MR. John Bradford was born at Manchester in Lancaſhire; his parents brought him up in learning from his infancy, until he attained ſuch knowledge in the Latin tongue, and ſkill in writing, that he was able to gain his own living in ſome honeſt condition. Then he became ſervant to Sir John Harrington, knight, who in the great affairs of king Henry the eighth, and king Edward the ſixth, which he had in hand when he was treaſurer of the king's camps and buildings, at divers times in Bullonois, had ſuch experience of Mr. Bradford's activity in writing, his expertneſs in the art of auditors, as alſo of his faithful truſtineſs, that not only in thoſe affairs, but in many others of his private buſineſs, he truſted Mr. Bradford before others.

Mr. Bradford continued for ſeveral years in an honeſt and thriving way, after the courſe of this world, if his mind could have ſo liked, or had been given to the world as many others be. But the Lord which had elected him unto a better function, and pre-ordained him to preach the goſpel of Chriſt, called this his choſen ſervant to the underſtanding and partaking of the ſame goſpel of life. In which call he was ſo truly taught, that forthwith his effectual call was perceived by the fruits. For then he forſook his worldly affairs and forwardneſs in worldly wealth, and, after the juſt account given to his maſter of all his doings, he departed from him, and with marvellous favour to further the kingdom of God by the miniſtry of his holy word, he gave himſelf wholly to the ſtudy of the holy ſcriptures. And the better to accompliſh his deſign, he departed from the Temple at London, and went to the univerſity of Cambridge, to learn by God's law how to further the building of the Lord's temple. In Cambridge his diligence in ſtudy, his profiting in knowledge and pious converſation ſo pleaſed all men, that within a year after he had been there, the univerſity gave him the degree of Maſter of Arts.

Immediately after, the maſter and fellows of Pembroke-Hall gave him a fellowſhip in their college with them: yea that good man Martin Bucer ſo liked him, that he had him not only moſt dear unto him, but alſo oftentimes exhorted him to beſtow his talent in preaching. To which Mr. Bradford always anſwered, that he was unable to ſerve in that office through want of learning. To which Bucer was wont to reply, ſaying, If thou have not fine manchet bread, yet give the poor people barley bread, or whatſoever elſe the Lord hath committed unto thee. And while Mr. Bradford was thus perſuaded to enter into the miniſtry, Dr. Ridley, that worthy biſhop of London, and glorious martyr of Chriſt, according to the order that then was in the church of England, called him to take the degree of a deacon. Which order, becauſe it was not without ſome ſuch abuſe, as to which Mr. Bradford would not conſent, and the biſhop perceiving that he was willing to enter into the miniſtry, was content to order him deacon without any abuſe, even as he deſired. This being done, he obtained for him a licence to preach, and gave him a prebend in his cathedral church of St. Paul's.

In this preaching office Mr. Bradford diligently laboured for the ſpace of three years. Sharply he opened and reproved ſin, ſweetly he preached Chriſt crucified, pithily he diſproved hereſies and errors, earneſtly he perſuaded to godly life. After the death of bleſſed king Edward the ſixth, when queen Mary had gotten the crown, Mr. Bradford ſtill continued diligent in preaching, till he was unjuſtly deprived both of his office and liberty by the queen and her council. To the doing whereof, becauſe they had no juſt cauſe, they took occaſion to do this injury for ſuch an act, as among Turks and Infidels would have been rewarded with thankfulneſs, neſs, and with great favour accepted, as indeed it did no leſs deſerve.

The fact was this: The 13th of Auguſt, in the firſt year of the reign of queen Mary, Mr. Bourne, then biſhop of Bath, made a ſeditious ſermon at Paul's Croſs in London, as partly is declared before, [See pag. 5.] to ſet popery abroad in ſuch ſort, that it moved the people to great indignation, being almoſt ready to pull him out of the pulpit. Neither could the reverence of the place, or the preſence of biſhop Bonner, who then was his maſter, nor yet the command of the mayor of London, whom the people ought to have obeyed, ſtay their rage: but the more they ſpake, the more the people were incenſed. At length Mr. Bourne ſeeing the people in ſuch a mood, and himſelf in ſuch peril (whereof he was ſufficiently warned by the hurling of a drawn dagger at him as he ſtood in the pulpit), and that he was hindered from ending his ſermon, fearing leſt (againſt his will) he ſhould there end his wretched life, deſired Mr. Bradford, who ſtood in the pulpit behind him, to come forth, and to ſtand in his place and ſpeak to the people. Good Bradford at his requeſt was content, and there ſpake to the people of godly and quiet obedience. Whom as ſoon as the people ſaw to begin to ſpeak unto them, ſo glad they were to hear him, that they cried with a great ſhout; Bradford, Bradford, God ſave thy life, Bradford: well declaring not only what affection they bare unto him, but alſo what regard they gave unto his words. For after he had entered a little to preach unto them, and to exhort them to quiet and patience, the tumult ſoon ceaſed, and in the end each man departed quietly to his houſe. Yet in the mean ſeaſon (for it was a long time before ſo great a multitude could all depart) Mr. Bourne thought, and truly, himſelf not yet full ſure of his life till he were ſafely houſed, notwithſtanding that the mayor and ſheriffs of London were there at hand to help him: wherefore he deſired Mr. Bradford not to depart from him till he were in ſafety: which Mr. Bradford according to his promiſe performed. For while the mayor and ſheriffs did lead Mr. Bourne to the ſchool-maſter's houſe, which is next to the pulpit, Mr. Bradford went at his back, ſhadowing him from the people with his gown, and ſo ſet him ſafe.

Let the reader now conſider the peril of Mr. Bourne, the charity of Mr. Bradford, and the headineſs of the multitude, and alſo the grudging minds of ſome, who yet ſtill there remained behind, greatly grieved in their minds, to ſee that ſo good a man ſhould ſave the life of ſuch a popiſh prieſt, ſo impudently and openly railing againſt king Edward. Among whom one gentleman ſaid theſe words: "Ah Bradford, Bradford, thou ſaveſt him that will burn thee. I give thee his life: if it were not for thee, I would, I aſſure thee, run him through with my ſword." Thus Bourne for that time, through Bradford's means, eſcaped bodily death; but God hath his judgment to be ſhewed in the time appointed.

The ſame Sunday in the afternoon Mr. Bradford preached at Bow church in Cheapſide, and reproved the people ſharply for their ſeditious miſdemeanor. After this he abode ſtill in London with an innocent conſcience, to try what would come of his juſt doing.

Within three days after he was ſent for to the Tower of London, where the queen then was, to appear before the council. There was he charged with this act of ſaving of Bourne, which act they there called ſeditious, and alſo objected againſt him for preaching, and ſo by them he was committed firſt to the Tower, then unto other priſons, out of which neither his innocency, piety, nor charitable dealing could purchaſe to him liberty of body, till by death (which he ſuffered for Chriſt's cauſe) he obtained the heavenly liberty, of which neither pope nor papiſt ſhall ever deprive him. From the Tower he came to the King's Bench in Southwark; and after his condemnation, he was ſent to the Compter in the Poultry in London: in which two places, for the time he did remain priſoner, he preached twice a day continually, unleſs ſickneſs hindered him; where alſo the ſacrament was often adminiſtered; and through his means (the keepers ſo well did bear with him) ſuch reſort of good folks were daily at his lecture, and the adminiſtration of the ſacrament, that commonly his chamber was well nigh filled therewith. Preaching, reading, and praying was all his whole life. He did not eat above one meal a day, which was but very little when he took it; and his continual ſtudy was upon his knees. In the midſt of dinner he uſed often to muſe with himſelf, having his hat over his eyes, from whence came commonly plenty of tears. Very gentle he was to man and child, and in ſo good credit with his keeper, that at his deſire in an evening (being priſoner in the King's Bench in Southwark) he had licence, upon his promiſe to return again that night, to go into London without any keeper, to viſit one that was ſick, lying by the Still-yard. Neither did he fail his promiſe, but returned to his priſon again, rather preventing his hour, than breaking his fidelity; ſo conſtant was he in word and in deed.

Of perſonage he was ſomewhat tall and ſlender, ſpare of body, of a faint ſanguine colour, with a dark brown beard. He ſlept not commonly above four hours in the night; and in his bed, till ſleep came, his book went not out of his hand. His chief recreation was in no gaming or other paſtime, but only in honeſt company, and comely talk, wherein he would ſpend a little time after dinner at the table, and ſo to prayer and his book again. He counted that hour not well ſpent, wherein he did not ſome good, either with his pen, ſtudy, or in exhorting of others, &c. He was no niggard of his purſe, but would liberally participate that he had to his fellow-priſoners. And commonly once a week he viſited the thieves, pick-purſes, and ſuch others that were with him in priſon where he lay on the other ſide, unto whom he would give pious exhortation, to learn the amendment of their lives by their trouble, and after that ſo done, diſtribute among them ſome portion of money to their comfort.

By the way, this I thought not to conceal. While he was in the King's Bench, and Mr. Saunders in the Marſhalſea, both priſoners, on the backſide of thoſe two priſons they met many times, and conferred together when they would; ſo mercifully did the Lord work for them, even in the midſt of their trouble: and the ſaid Bradford was ſo truſted by his keeper, and had ſuch liberty in the backſide, that there was no day, but that he might have eaſily eſcaped away, if he would, but that the Lord had another work to do for him. In the ſummer time, while he was in the ſaid King's Bench, he had liberty of his keeper to ride into Oxfordſhire, to a merchant's houſe of his acquaintance, and horſe and all things prepared for him for that journey, and the party in readineſs that ſhould ride with him; but God prevented him by ſickneſs that he went not at all.

One of his old friends and acquaintance came unto him whilſt he was priſoner, and aſked him, if he ſued to get him out, what then he would do, or whither he would go? Unto whom he made anſwer, as not caring whether he went out or no; but if he did, he ſaid he would marry, and abide ſtill in England ſecretly, teaching the people as the time would ſuffer him, and occupy himſelf that way. He was had in ſo great reverence and admiration with all good men, that a multitude, which never knew him but by fame, greatly lamented his death: yea, and a number alſo of the papiſts themſelves wiſhed heartily his life. There were few days in which he was thought not to ſpend ſome tears before he went to bed, neither was there ever any priſoner with him, but he greatly profited by his company, as all they will yet witneſs, and have confeſſed of him no leſs, to the glory of God, whoſe ſociety he frequented, as among many, one ſpecial thing I thought to note, which is this:

Biſhop

Biſhop Farrar being priſoner in the King's Bench, as before you have heard, was perſuaded by the papiſts in the end of Lent, to receive the ſacrament at Eaſter in one kind, who after much perſuaſion yielded to them, and promiſed ſo to do. Then (ſo it happened by God's providence) the Eaſter-Eve, the day before he ſhould have done it, Mr. Bradford was brought priſoner to the King's Bench, where the Lord making him his inſtrument, Mr. Bradford only was the means that the ſaid biſhop Farrar revoked his promiſe and word, and would never after yield to be ſpotted with that papiſtical pitch; ſo effectually the Lord wrought by this worthy ſervant of his.

The night before he was had to Newgate, which was the Saturday night, he was ſore troubled divers times in his ſleep by dreams, how the chain for his burning was brought to the Compter gate, and how the next day being Sunday he ſhould be had to Newgate, and on the Monday after burned in Smithfield, as indeed came to paſs accordingly, as ſhall hereafter be ſhewed. Now he being vexed oftentimes in this ſort with theſe dreams, about three of the clock in the morning he awaked him that lay with him, and told him his unquiet ſleep, and what he was troubled withal. Then after a little talk, Mr. Bradford roſe out of the bed, and gave himſelf to his old exerciſe of reading and prayer, as always he had uſed before: and at dinner according to his accuſtomed manner he did eat his meat, and was very merry, nobody being with him from morning till night but he that lay with him, with whom he had many times on that day communication of death, of the kingdom of heaven, and of the ripeneſs of ſin in that time.

In the afternoon they two walking together in the keeper's chamber, ſuddenly the keeper's wife came up, as one half amazed, and ſeeming much troubled, being almoſt out of breath, ſaid, Oh Mr. Bradford, I come to bring you heavy news. What is that, ſaid he? Marry, quoth ſhe, to-morrow you muſt be burned; and your chain is now a buying, and you muſt ſoon go to Newgate. With that Mr. Bradford put off his cap, and lifting up his eyes to heaven, ſaid, I thank God for it; I have looked for the ſame a long time, and therefore it cometh not now to me ſuddenly, but as a thing waited for every day and hour, the Lord make me worthy thereof. And ſo thanking her for her gentleneſs, departed up into his chamber, and called his friend with him, who when he came thither, he went ſecretly himſelf alone a long time, and prayed; which done, he came again to him that was in the chamber, and took divers writings and papers, and ſhewed him his mind in thoſe things what he would have done; and after they had thus ſpent the afternoon, at night half a dozen of his friends came to him, with whom he ſpent all the evening in prayer and other good exerciſes.

A little before he went out of the Compter, he made a notable prayer of his farewel, with ſuch plenty of tears, and abundant ſpirit of prayer, that it raviſhed the minds of the hearers. Alſo when he ſhifted himſelf with a clean ſhirt that was made for his burning (by Mr. Walter Marlar's wife, who was a good nurſe to him, and his very good friend), he made ſuch a prayer of the wedding-garment, that ſome of thoſe that were preſent were in ſuch great admiration, that their eyes were as throughly occupied in looking on him, as their ears gave place to hear his prayer. At his departing out of his chamber, he made likewiſe a prayer, and gave money to every ſervant and officer in the houſe, with exhortation to them to fear and ſerve God, continually labouring to eſchew all manner of evil. Then being beneath in the court, all the priſoners cried out to him and bade him farewel, as the reſt of the houſe had done before with weeping tears.

The time they carried him to Newgate was about 11 or 12 a-clock in the night, when it was thought none would be ſtirring abroad; and yet contrary to their expectation, there was in Cheapſide and other places (between the Compter and Newgate) a great multitude of people that came to ſee him, who moſt gently bade him farewel, praying for him with moſt lamentable and pitiful tears; and he again as gently bade them farewel, praying moſt heartily for them and their welfare. Now whether it were a command from the queen and her council, or from Bonner and his adherents, or whether it were merely deviſed by the lord mayor, aldermen, and ſheriffs of London, or no, I cannot tell; but a great noiſe there was over-night about the city by ſeveral, that Mr. Bradford ſhould be burnt the next day in Smithfield, by four of the clock in the morning, before it ſhould be greatly known to any. In which rumour many heads had divers minds; ſome thinking the fear of the people to be the cauſe thereof; others thought, that it was becauſe the papiſts judged his death would convert many to the truth, and give a great overthrow to their kingdom. So ſome thought one thing, and ſome another, that no juſt conjecture of the cauſe could be known that ever I heard yet. But this was certain, the people prevented the device ſuſpected; for the next day, at the ſaid hour of four o'clock in the morning, there was in Smithfield ſuch a multitude of men and women, that many being in admiration thereat, thought it was not poſſible that they could have notice of his death, being ſo great a number in ſuch ſhort time, unleſs it were by the ſingular providence of Almighty God.

Well, this took not effect as the people thought, for it was nine o'clock in the morning before Mr. Bradford was brought into Smithfield; who in going through Newgate thitherward, eſpied a friend of his whom he loved, ſtanding on one ſide the way, unto whom he reached his hand over the people, and plucked him to him, and delivered to him from his head his velvet night-cap, and alſo his handkerchief, with other things. And after a little private talk with him, they parted, when immediately came to him a brother-in-law of his, called Roger Beſwick, who as ſoon as he had taken the ſaid Mr. Bradford by the hand, one of the ſheriffs of London, Mr. Woodroſe, came with his ſtaff and brake the ſaid Roger Beſwick's head, that the blood ran about his ſhoulders. Which ſight Mr. Bradford beholding with grief, bade his brother farewel, deſiring him to commend him to his mother, and the reſt of his friends, and ſpeedily to go to ſome ſurgeon; ſo they parting, had little or no talk together. Then was he led forth to Smithfield, with a great company of armed men to guard him thither, as the like was not ſeen at any man's burning: for in every corner of Smithfield there were ſome, beſides thoſe that ſtood about the ſtake. Mr. Bradford being come to the place, fell flat to the ground, ſecretly making his prayers to Almighty God. Then riſing again, and putting off his cloaths unto his ſhirt, he went to the ſtake, and there ſuffered with a young man of twenty years of age, joyfully and conſtantly, whoſe name was John Leaf. Concerning the manner and order of whoſe burning, more ſhall be ſaid (God willing) hereafter. In the mean time we will ſhew forth the ſundry examinations, conflicts, and conferences between him and his adverſaries during the time of his impriſonment, which was in all two years lacking one month and a half. Which examinations here follow.

It was a little above declared, that John Bradford, within three days after the ſermon of Mr. Bourne, was by order of the council committed to the Tower, where he remained from the month of Auguſt 1553, to the 22d of January 1555, upon which day he was called out to examination before Stephen biſhop of Wincheſter and other commiſſioners. The effect of which examination and communication which paſſed between him and them, proceeded in manner as followeth.

After the lord chancellor, and the reſt of the queen's council in commiſſion with him, had ended their talk with Mr. Farrar late biſhop of St. David's, the undermarſhal of the King's Bench was commanded to bring in John Bradford: who being come into the preſence of the council ſitting at a table, kneeled down on his knee, but the lord chancellor immediately commanded him to ſtand up, and ſo he did.

When he was riſen, the lord chancellor ſpake thus to him in effect; That he had been a long ti ne juſtly impriſoned for his ſeditious behaviour at Paul's Croſs, the 13th of Auguſt, in the year 1553. for his falſe preaching and arrogancy, taking upon him to preach without authority. But now, quoth he, the time of mercy is come, and therefore the queen's highneſs, minding to offer unto you mercy, hath by us ſent for you, to declare and give the ſame, if ſo be ye will with us return: and if you will do as we have done, you ſhall find as we have found, I warrant you. This was the ſum of his words, and in manner the ſame words which he ſpake.

To theſe words John Bradford ſpake (after reverent obeiſance made) in this manner: My lord and lords all, I confeſs that I have been long impriſoned, and (with humble reverence be it ſpoken) unjuſtly, for that I did nothing ſeditiouſly, falſely, or arrogantly, in word or fact, by preaching or otherwiſe, but rather ſought truth, peace, and all godly quietneſs, as an obedient and faithful ſubject, both in going about to ſave the biſhop of Bath now, then Mr. Bourne, the preacher at the croſs, and in preaching for quietneſs accordingly.

At theſe words, or rather before he had fully finiſhed, the ſaid lord chancellor ſomething ſnuffed, and ſpake with an admiration, that there was a loud lye: for, ſaid he, the fact was ſeditious, as you my lord of London can bear witneſs.

Bonner. You ſay true, my lord; I ſaw him with mine own eyes, when he took upon him to rule and lead the people impudently, thereby declaring that he was the author of the ſedition.

Brad. My lords, notwithſtanding my lord biſhop's ſeeing and ſaying, yet the truth I have told, as one day my Lord God Almighty ſhall reveal to all the world, when we ſhall all come and appear before him: in the mean ſeaſon, becauſe I cannot be believed by you, I muſt and am ready to ſuffer, as now your ſayings be, whatſoever God ſhall licence you to do unto me.

Lord Chan. I know thou haſt a glorious tongue, and goodly ſhews thou makeſt; but all is lyes thou ſpeakeſt. And again, I have not forgot how ſtubborn thou waſt when thou waſt before us in the Tower, whereupon thou waſt committed to priſon concerning religion: I have not forgotten thy behaviour and talk, for which cauſe thou haſt been kept in priſon, as one that would have done more hurt than I will ſpeak of.

Brad. My lord, as I ſaid I ſay again, that I ſtand as before you, ſo before God, and one day we ſhall all ſtand before him: the truth then will be the truth, though now ye will not ſo take it. Yea, my lord, I dare ſay, that my lord of Bath, Mr. Bourne, will witneſs with me, that I ſought his ſafeguard with the peril of mine own life, I thank God therefore.

Bonner. This is not true: for I myſelf did ſee thee take upon thee too much.

Brad. No, I took nothing upon me undeſired, and that of Mr. Bourne himſelf, as, if he were here preſent, I dare ſay he would affirm. For he deſired me both to help him, to pacify the people, and alſo not to leave him till he was in ſafety. And as for my behaviour in the Tower, and talk before your honours, if I did or ſaid any thing that did not beſeem me, if your lordſhips would tell me wherein it was, I ſhould and would ſhortly make you anſwer.

Lord Chan. Well, to leave this matter: how ſay'ſt thou now? wilt thou return again, and do as we have done, and thou ſhalt receive the queen's mercy and pardon?

Brad. My lord, I deſire mercy with God's mercy, but mercy with God's wrath, God keep me from; although (I thank God therefore) my conſcience doth not accuſe me, that I did ſpeak any thing why I ſhould need to receive the queen's mercy or pardon. For all that ever I did or ſpake, was both agreeable to God's laws, and the laws of the realm at that preſent, and did make much to quietneſs.

Lord Chan. Well, if thou make this babbling rolling in thy eloquent tongue, and yet being altogether ignorant and vain-glorious, and wilt not receive mercy, offered to thee, know for truth, that the queen is minded to make a purgation of all ſuch as thou art.

Brad. The Lord before whom I ſtand, at well as before you, knoweth what vain-glory I have ſought, and ſeek in this behalf: his mercy I deſire, and alſo would be glad of the queen's favour, to live as a ſubject without a clog of conſcience. Bur otherwiſe the Lord's mercy is better to me than life. And I know to whom I have committed my life, even into his hands which will keep it, ſo that no man may take it away before it be his pleaſure. There are twelve hours in the day, and as long as they laſt, ſo long ſhall no man have power thereon. Therefore his good will be done; life in his diſpleaſure is worſe than death, and death with his true favour, is true life.

Lord Chan. I know well enough, that we ſhall have glorious talk enough of thee; be ſure, that as thou haſt deceived the people with falſe and deviliſh doctrine, ſo ſhalt thou receive.

Brad. I have not deceived the people, nor taught any other doctrine, than by God's grace I am, and hope ſhall be ready to confirm with my life. And as for the deviliſhneſs and falſeneſs in the doctrine, I would be ſorry you could ſo prove it.

Durham. Why, tell me, what ſay you by the miniſtration of the communion, as now you know it is?

Brad. My lord, here I muſt deſire of your lordſhip and of all your honours a queſtion, before I dare make you an anſwer to any interrogatory or queſtion, wherewith you now begin. I have been ſix times ſworn that I ſhall in no caſe conſent to the practiſing of any juriſdiction, or any authority on the biſhop of Rome's behalf within this realm of England. Now, before God, I humbly pray your honours to tell me whether you aſk me this queſtion by his authority, or no? If you do, I dare not, nor may anſwer you any thing in his authority, which you ſhall demand of me, except I would be forſworn, which God forbid.

Secretary Bourne. Haſt thou been ſworn ſix times? what office haſt thou borne?

Brad. Forſooth! was thrice ſworn in Cambridge, when I was admitted Maſter of arts, when I was admitted fellow of Pembroke-hall, and when I was there, the viſitors came thither, and ſware the univerſity. Again, I was ſworn when I entered into the miniſtry, when I had a prebend given me, and when I was ſworn to ſerve the king a little before his death.

Lord Chan. Tuſh, Herod's oaths a man ſhould make no conſcience at.

Brad. But my lord, theſe were no Herod's oaths, no unlawful oaths, but oaths according to God's word, as you yourſelf have well affirmed in your book De vera obedientia.

Mr. Roch. My lords (ſaid another of the council that ſtood by the table, Mr. Rocheſter I think), I never knew wherefore this man was in priſon before now: but I ſee well that it had not been good that this man had been abroad: what the cauſe was that he was put in priſon, I know not; but I now well know that not without a cauſe he was, and is to be kept in priſon.

Sec. Bourne. Yea, it was reported this parliament-time by the earl of Derby, that he hath done more hurt by letters, and exhorting thoſe that have come to him in religion, than ever he did when he was abroad by preaching. In his letters he curſeth all that teach any falſe doctrine (for ſo he calleth that which is not according to that he taught), and moſt heartily exhorteth them to whom he writeth to continue ſtill in that they have received by him, and ſuch like as he is. All which words ſeveral of the council affirmed. Whereunto the ſaid Mr. Bourne added, ſaying, How ſay you, Sir, have you not thus ſeditiouſly written and exhorted the people?

Brad. I have not written, nor ſpoken any thing ſeditiouſly, neither (I thank God therefore) have I admitted any ſeditious thought, nor I truſt ever ſhall do.

Sec. Bourne. Yea, thou haſt written letters.

Lord Chan. Why ſpeakeſt thou not? Haſt thou not written as he ſaith?

Brad. That I have written, I have written.

Southwell. Lord God, what an arrogant and ſtubborn boy is this, that thus ſtoutly and dallyingly behaveth himſelf before the queen's council? Whereat one looked upon another with diſdainful countenances.

Brad. My lords and maſters, the Lord God which is, and will be judge to us all, knoweth, that as I am certain I ſtand now before his Majeſty: ſo with reverence in his ſight I ſtand before you, and unto you accordingly in words and geſture I deſire to behave myſelf. If you otherwiſe take it, I doubt not but God in his time will reveal it: in the mean ſeaſon, I ſhall ſuffer with all due obedience your ſayings and doings too, I hope.

Lord Chan. Theſe be gay and glorious works of reverence, but as in all other things, ſo herein alſo thou doeſt nothing but lye.

Brad. Well, I would God the author of truth, and abhorrer of lyes, would pull my tongue out of my head before you all, and ſhew a terrible judgment on me here preſent, if I have purpoſed, or do purpoſe to lye before you, whatſoever you ſhall aſk me.

Lord Chan. Why then doeſt thou not anſwer? Haſt thou written ſuch letters as here is objected againſt thee?

Brad. As I ſaid, my lord, that I have written, I have written; I ſtand now before you, which either can lay my letters to my charge, or no: if you lay any thing to my charge that I have written, if I deny it, I am then a lyar.

Lord Chan. We ſhall never have done with thee, I perceive now: be ſhort, be ſhort, wilt thou have mercy?

Brad. I pray God give me his mercy, and if therewith you will extend yours, I will not refuſe it, but otherwiſe I will have none.

Here now was much ado, one ſpeaking this, and another that of his arrogancy, in refuſing the queen's pardon, which ſhe ſo lovingly did offer unto him; whereto Mr. Bradford anſwered thus:

My lords, if I may live as a quiet ſubject without clog of conſcience, I ſhall heartily thank you for your pardon; if otherwiſe I behave myſelf, then I am in danger of the law: in the mean ſeaſon I aſk no more than the benefit of a ſubject till I be convinced of tranſgreſſion. If I cannot have this, as hitherto I have not had, God's good will be done.

Upon theſe words my lord chancellor began a long proceſs of the falſe doctrine wherewith the people were deceived in the days of king Edward, and ſo turned the end of his talk to Bradford, ſaying: How ſay'ſt thou?

Brad. My lord, the doctrine taught in king Edward's days was God's pure religion: which as I then believed, ſo do I now more believe it than ever I did, and therein I am more confirmed, and ready to declare it by God's grace even as he will, to the world, than I was when I firſt came into priſon.

Durham. What religion mean you in king Edward's days? What year of his reign?

Brad. Forſooth even the ſame year, my lord, that the king died, and I was a preacher. Here wrote ſecretary Bourne I know not what.

Now after a little pauſing, my lord chancellor beginneth again to declare, that the doctrine taught in king Edward's days was hereſy, uſing for probation and demonſtration thereof, no ſcripture nor reaſon, but this; that it ended with treaſon and rebellion, ſo that (ſaid he) the very end were enough to prove that doctrine to be naught.

Brad. Ah my lord, that you could enter in God's ſanctuary, and mark the end of this preſent doctrine that you now ſo magnify.

Lord Chan. What meaneſt thou by that? I am of opinion we ſhall have a ſnatch of rebellion even now.

Brad. My lord, I mean no ſuch end as you would gather: I mean an end which no man ſeeth, but ſuch as enter into God's ſanctuary. If a man look on preſent things, he will ſoon deceive himſelf.

Here my lord chancellor again offered mercy, and Bradford anſwered as before: Mercy with God's mercy ſhould be welcome, but otherwiſe he would have none. Whereupon the lord chancellor rang a little bell, belike to call in ſomebody: for there were few preſent beſides thoſe before named, and the biſhop of Worceſter. Now when one was come in; It is beſt, ſaid Mr. Secretary Bourne, that you give the keeper a charge of this fellow. So the under-marſhal was called in.

Lord Chan. Ye ſhall take this man to you, and keep him cloſe without conference with any man, but by your knowledge, and ſuffer him not to write any letters, &c. for he is of another manner of charge to you now than he was before. And ſo they departed, Bradford looking as chearfully as any man could do, declaring thereby even a deſire to give his life for the confirmation of his faith and doctrine.

The ſecond Examination of John Bradford in St. Mary Overie's Church, before the Lord Chancellor and other Biſhops, January 29. 1555.

AFTER the excommunication of John Rogers, John Bradford was called in, and ſtanding before the lord chancellor and other biſhops ſet with him, the ſaid lord chancellor ſpake thus in effect.

Lord Chan. Whereas before the 22d of January the ſaid Bradford was called before them (ſaid he), and they offered unto him the queen's pardon, although he had contemned the ſame; and further ſaid, that he would ſtiffly and ſtoutly maintain and defend the erroneous doctrine taught in the days of king Edward VI. yet in conſideration that the queen's highneſs was wonderful merciful, they thought good to offer the ſame mercy again, before it was too late: therefore adviſe you well, ſaid he, there is yet ſpace and grace before we ſo proceed, that you be committed to the ſecular power, as we muſt and will do, if you will not follow the example of Mr. Barlow and Mr. Cardmaker, whom he there commended, adding many arguments to move the ſaid Bradford to yield to the religion then ſet forth.

After the lord chancellor's long talk, Mr. Bradford began to ſpeak on this ſort: My lord and my lords all, as now I ſtand in your ſight before you, ſo I humbly beſeech your honours to conſider, that you ſit in the ſeat of the Lord, who (as David doth witneſs) is in the congregation of judges, and ſitteth in the midſt of them judging: and as you would have your place to be by us taken as God's place, ſo demonſtrate yourſelves to follow him in your ſitting, that is, ſeek no guiltleſs blood, nor hunt not by queſtions to bring into the ſnare them which are out of the ſame. At this preſent I ſtand before you guilty or guiltleſs, then proceed and give ſentence accordingly: if guiltleſs, then give me the benefit of a ſubject, which hitherto I could not have.

Here the lord chancellor replied, and ſaid, that the ſaid Bradford began with a true ſentence, Deus ſtetit in ſynagoga, &c. But, ſaid he, this and all thy geſture declareth but hypocriſy and vain-glory. And further he endeavoured to clear himſelf, that he ſought not guiltleſs blood; and ſo began a long proceſs how that Bradford's fact at Paul's Croſs was preſumptuous, arrogant,

gant, and declared a taking upon him to lead the people, which could not but turn to much diſquietneſs, in that thou (ſpeaking to Bradford) waſt ſo refractory and ſtout in religion at that preſent. For which, as thou wert then committed to priſon, ſo hitherto thou haſt been kept in priſon, where thou haſt written letters to the great hurt of the queen's ſubjects, as was credibly declared by the earl of Derby in the parliament-houſe. And to this he added, that the ſaid Bradford did ſtubbornly behave himſelf the laſt time he was before them: and therefore not for any other thing now I demand of thee, ſaid he, but of and for thy doctrine and religion.

Brad. My lord, where you accuſe me of hypocriſy and vain-glory, I muſt and will leave it to the Lord's declaration, who will one day open yours and my truth and hearty meanings: in the mean ſeaſon, I will content myſelf with the teſtimony of mine own conſcience, which if it yield to hypocriſy, could not but have God to be my foe alſo; and ſo both God and man were againſt me. And as for my fact at Paul's Croſs, and behaviour before you at the Tower, I doubt not but God will reveal it to my comfort. For if ever I did any thing which God uſed to public benefit, I think that my deed was one, and yet for it I have been and am kept a long time in priſon. And as for letters and religion, I anſwer as I did the laſt time I was before you.

Lord Chan. There didſt thou ſay ſtubbornly and ſaucily, that thou wouldſt manly maintain the erroneous doctrine in king Edward's days.

Brad. My lord, I ſaid the laſt time I was before you, that I had ſix times taken an oath, that I ſhould never conſent to the practiſing of any juriſdiction on the biſhop of Rome's behalf, and therefore durſt I not anſwer to any thing that ſhould be ſo demanded, leſt I ſhould be forſworn, which God forbid. Howbeit, ſaving mine oath, I ſaid that I was more confirmed in the doctrine ſet forth publicly in the days of king Edward, than ever I was before I was put in priſon: and ſo I thought I ſhould be, and think yet ſtill I ſhall be found more ready to give my life as God will, for the confirmation of the ſame

Lord Chan. I remember well that thou madeſt much ado about needleſs matter, as though the oath againſt the biſhop of Rome were ſo great a matter. So others have done before thee, but yet not in ſuch ſort as thou haſt done: for thou pretendeſt a conſcience in it, which is nothing elſe but mere hypocriſy.

Brad. My conſcience is known to the Lord: and whether I deal herein hypocritically or no, he knoweth. As I ſaid therefore then, my lord, ſo I ſay again now: Thus for fear leſt I ſhould be perjured, I dare not make anſwer to any thing you ſhall demand of me, if my anſwering ſhould conſent to the confirming or practiſing of any juriſdiction for the biſhop of Rome here in England.

Lord Chan. Why didſt thou begin to tell that we are gods, and ſit in God's place, and now wilt thou not make us an anſwer?

Brad. My lord, I ſaid, you would have your place taken of us now as God's place: and therefore I brought forth that piece of ſcripture, that ye might the more be admoniſhed to follow God and his ways at this preſent, who ſeeth us all, and well perceiveth whether of conſcience I pretend this matter of the oath, or not.

Lord Chan. No, all men may well ſee thine hypocriſy: for if for thine oath's ſake thou didſt not anſwer, then wouldeſt thou not have ſpoke as thou didſt, and have anſwered me at the firſt: but now men well perceive, that this is but a ſtarting-hole to hide thyſelf in, becauſe thou dareſt not anſwer, and ſo wouldeſt eſcape, blinding the ſimple people's eyes, as though of conſcience you did all you do.

Brad. That which I ſpake at the firſt was not a replication or an anſwer to that you ſpake to me: and therefore I needed not to lay for me mine oath. For I thought you would have more weighed what I did ſpeak, than you did: but when I perceived you did not conſider it, but came to aſk matter, whereto by anſwering I ſhould conſent to the practiſing of juriſdiction on the biſhop of Rome's behalf here in England, and ſo be forſworn; then of conſcience and ſimplicity I ſpake as I do yet again ſpeak, that I dare not for conſcience ſake anſwer you. And therefore I ſeek no ſtarting-holes, nor go about to blind the people, as God knoweth. For if you of your honours ſhall tell me, that you do not aſk me any thing, whereby mine anſwering ſhould conſent to the practiſing of the biſhop of Rome's juriſdiction, aſk me wherein you will, and you ſhall hear that I will anſwer you as flatly as ever any did that came before you. I am not afraid of death, I thank God; for I look, and have looked for nothing elſe at your hands a long time: but I am afraid, when death cometh, I ſhould have matter to trouble my conſcience by the guiltineſs of perjury, and therefore do I anſwer as I do.

Lord Chan. Theſe be gay glorious words, full of hypocriſy and vain glory, and yet doſt thou not know that I ſit here as biſhop of Wincheſter in mine own dioceſe, and therefore may do this which I do, and more too?

Brad. My lord, give me leave to aſk you this queſtion, that my conſcience may be out of doubt in this matter. Tell me here before God, all this audience being witneſs, that you demand of me nothing whereby mine anſwering ſhould conſent to and confirm the practice of juriſdiction for the biſhop of Rome here in England, and yet your honour ſhall hear me give you as flat and as plain anſwers briefly, to whatſoever you ſhall demand me, as ever any did.

Here the lord chancellor was greatly offended, and ſpake much how the biſhop of Rome's authority needed no confirmation of Bradford's anſwering, nor no ſuch as he was; and turned his diſcourſe to the people, how that Bradford followed crafty covetous merchants, which becauſe they would lend no money to their neighbours when they were in need, would ſay that they had often ſworn, that they would never lend any more money, becauſe their debtors had ſo often deceived them. Even ſo thou, ſaid he to Bradford, doſt at this preſent, to caſt a miſt in the people's eyes, to blear them with an hereſy (which is greater and more hurtful to the commonwealth than the other is), pretend thine oath, whereby the people might make a conſcience, whereas they ſhould not. Why ſpeakeſt thou not?

Brad. My lord, as I ſaid, I ſay again, I dare not anſwer you for fear of perjury, from which God defend me, or elſe I could tell you there is a difference between oaths. Some be according to faith and charity, as the oath againſt the biſhop of Rome; ſome be againſt faith and charity; as this, to deny by oath my help to my brother in his need.

Here my lord chancellor again was much offended, ſtill ſaying that Bradford durſt not anſwer, and further endeavoured to prove, that the oath againſt the biſhop of Rome was againſt charity.

But Bradford anſwered, that howſoever his honour took him, yet he was aſſured of his meaning, that no fear but the fear of perjury made him unwilling to anſwer: for as for death, my lord, ſaid he, as I know there are twelve hours in the day, ſo with the Lord my time is appointed. And when it ſhall be his good time, then I ſhall depart hence: but in the mean ſeaſon I am ſafe enough, though all the people had ſworn my death. Into his hands have I committed it, and do, his good will be done. And ſaving mine oath, I will anſwer you in this behalf, that the oath againſt the biſhop of Rome was not, nor is againſt charity.

Lord Chan. How prove you that?

Brad. Forſooth I prove it thus:

Nothing is againſt charity, which is with God's word, and not againſt it.

The oath againſt the biſhop of Rome's authority in England, is with God's word, and is not againſt it.

Ergo, The oath againſt the biſhop of Rome's authority in England, is not againſt charity.

Lord Chan. Is it againſt God's word, that a man ſhould take a king to be ſupreme head of the church in this realm?

Brad. No, ſaving ſtill mine oath, it is not againſt God's word, but with it, being taken in ſuch ſenſe as it may well be taken: that is, attributing to the king's power, the ſovereignty in all his dominion.

Lord Chan. I pray you where find you that?

Brad. I find it in many places, but eſpecially in the 13th of the Romans, where St. Paul writeth, "Every ſoul to be ſubject to the higher powers;" but what power? "The power verily which beareth the ſword;" which is not the ſpiritual, but the temporal power. As Chryſoſtom full well noteth upon the ſame place, which your honour knoweth better than I. He (Chryſoſtom I mean) there plainly ſheweth that biſhops, prophets, and apoſtles, are obedient to the temporal magiſtrates.

Here the lord chancellor was angered yet more, and ſaid, how that Bradford went about to deny all obedience to the queen for his oath: and ſo, ſaid he, this man would make God's word a warrant of diſobedience: for he will anſwer the queen on this ſort, that when ſhe ſaith, Now ſwear to the biſhop of Rome, or obey his authority: No (will he ſay), for I ſhould be forſworn, and ſo he makes the queen no queen.

Brad. No, I go not about to deny all obedience to the queen's highneſs, but denying obedience in this part, if ſhe ſhould demand it. For I was ſworn to king Edward, not ſimply, that is, not only concerning his own perſon, but alſo concerning his ſucceſſors, and therefore in denying to the queen's requeſt herein, I deny not her authority, nor become diſobedient.

Lord Chan. Yes, that thou doſt; and ſo he began to tell a long tale, how if a man ſhould make an oath to pay to me an hundred pounds by ſuch a day, and the man to whom it was due would forget the debt, the debtor ſhould ſay, No, you cannot do it; for I am forſworn then.

Here Bradford deſired my lord chancellor not to trifle it, ſaying, that he wondered his honour would make ſolemn oaths made to God trifles in that ſort; and make ſo great a matter concerning vows (as they call it) made to the biſhop for marriage of prieſts.

At theſe words the lord chancellor was much offended, and ſaid, he did not trifle: but, quoth he, thou goeſt about to deny obedience to the queen, which now requireth obedience to the biſhop of Rome.

Brad. No, my lord, I do not deny obedience to the queen, if you would diſcern between Genus and Species. Becauſe I may not obey in this, Ergo, I may not obey in the other, is no good reaſon. As if a man let or ſell a piece of his inheritance, yet this notwithſtanding, all his inheritance is not let or ſold: and ſo in this caſe, all obedience I deny not, becauſe I deny obedience in this branch.

Lord Chan. I will none of theſe ſimilitudes.

Brad. I would not uſe them, if that you went not about to perſuade the people, that I meant that which I never meant: for I myſelf not only mean obedience, but will give enſample of all moſt humble obedience to the queen's highneſs, ſo long as ſhe requireth not obedience againſt God.

Lord Chan. No, no, all men may ſee your meaning well enough. There is no man, though he be ſworn to the king, that doth therefore break his oath, if he afterwards be ſworn to the French king and to the emperor.

Brad. It is true, my lord, but the caſes be not like. For here is an exception; Thou ſhalt not ſwear to the biſhop of Rome at any time. If we in like manner were ſworn; Thou ſhalt not ſerve the emperor, &c. you ſee there were ſome alteration and more doubt. But I beſeech your honour remember what ye yourſelf have written, anſwering the objections hereagainſt in your book, De vera obedientia. "Let God's word, and the reaſon thereof, bear the bell away."

Here the lord chancellor was greatly moved, and ſaid ſtill, how that Bradford had written ſeditious letters, and perverted the people thereby, and did ſtoutly ſtand, as though he would defend the erroneous doctrine in king Edward's time, againſt all men: and now, quoth he, he ſaith he dare not anſwer.

Brad. I have written no ſeditious letters, I have not perverted the people: but that which I have written and ſpoken, that will I never deny, by God's grace. And where your lordſhip ſaith, that I dare not anſwer you: that all men may know that I am not afraid, ſave mine oath, aſk me what you will, and I will plainly make you anſwer, by God's grace, although I now ſee my life lieth thereon. But, O Lord, into thy hands I commit it, come what will: only ſanctify thy name in me, as in an inſtrument of thy grace, Amen. Now aſk what you will, and you ſhall ſee I am not afraid, by God's grace, flatly to anſwer.

Lord Chan. Well then, how ſay you to the bleſſed ſacrament? Do you not believe there Chriſt to be preſent concerning his natural body?

Brad. My lord, I do believe that Chriſt is corporally preſent at and in the due adminiſtration of the ſacrament. By this word (corporally) I mean that Chriſt is there preſent corporally unto faith.

Lord Chan. Unto faith: we muſt have many more words to make it plain.

Brad. You ſhall ſo: but firſt give me leave to ſpeak two words.

Lord Chan. Speak on.

Brad. I have been now a year and almoſt three quarters in priſon, and in all this time you never queſtioned with me hereabout, when I might have ſpoken my conſcience frankly without peril: but now have you a law to hang up and put to death, if a man anſwer freely, and not to your appetite, and ſo now you come to demand this queſtion. Ah my lord, Chriſt uſed not this way to bring men to faith. No more did the prophets or apoſtles. Remember what Bernard writeth to Eugenius the pope; "I read, that the apoſtles ſtood to be judged, but I read not, that they ſate to judge. This ſhall be, that was," &c.

Here the lord chancellor was appalled, as it ſeemed, and ſaid moſt gently, that he uſed not this means. It was not my doing, ſaid he, although ſome there be that think this to be the beſt way: for I, for my part, have been challenged for being too gentle oftentimes: which thing the biſhop of London confirmed, and ſo did almoſt all the audience, that he had been too mild and too gentle.

At which words Bradford ſpake thus: My lord, I pray you ſtretch out your gentleneſs, that I may feel it, for hitherto I never felt it.

As ſoon as ever he had ſpoke thus; the lord chancellor belike thinking that Bradford would have had mercy and pardon, ſaid that with all his heart, not only he, but the queen's highneſs would ſtretch out mercy, if with them he would return.

Brad. Return, my lord? God ſave me from that going back: I mean it not ſo, but I mean, that I was three quarters of a year in the Tower: you forbad me paper, pen, and ink, and never in all that time, nor ſince, did I feel any gentleneſs from you. I have rather hitherto found, as I looked for, extremity. And I thank God that I perceive now ye have kept me in priſon thus long, not for any matter ye had, but for matter ye would have; God's good will be done.

Here now divers telling my lord it was dinner-time. And ſo he roſe up, leaving Mr. Bradford ſpeaking, ſaying, ing, that in the afternoon they would ſpeak more with him. And he was had into the veſtry, and was there all that day till night, and then was carried to priſon again.

In the mean time, about four of the clock in the afternoon, a gentleman called Mr. Thomas Huſſey of Lincolnſhire, who was once an officer in the duke of Norfolk's houſe, came into the veſtry to inquire for one Stoning; and when it was anſwered him by the under-marſhal's officers of the King's Bench, that there was none ſuch, he entered into the houſe, and took acquaintance with John Bradford, ſaying, that he would commune and ſpeak with him the next morning for old acquaintance.

The next morning about ſeven of the clock, this gentleman came into the chamber wherein John Bradford did lie, and being with him, he began a long oration, how that of love and acquaintance he came to him to ſpeak that which he would further utter. You did (ſaid he) ſo wonderfully behave yourſelf before the lord chancellor, and other biſhops yeſterday, that even the greateſt enemies you have, did ſee that they have no matter againſt you: and therefore I adviſe you (ſpeaking as though it came of his own good will, without making any other man privy, or any other procuring him, as he ſaid) this day, for anon you ſhall be called before them again, to deſire a time, and men to confer withal, ſo ſhall all men think a wonderful wiſdom, gravity, and piety in you: and by this means you ſhall eſcape preſent danger, which elſe is nearer than you are aware of. To this John Bradford anſwered, I neither can nor will make ſuch requeſt. For then ſhall I give occaſion to the people and to all others to think that I doubt of the doctrine which I confeſs, which thing I do not, for thereof I am moſt aſſured, and therefore I will give no ſuch offence.

As they were thus talking, the chamber door was unlocked, and Dr. Seton came in, whom when Mr. Bradford ſaw, he ſpake thus in his heart to God, What, Sir, goeth the matter thus? This man told me, no man knew of his coming: Lord, give me grace to remember thy leſſon, "Beware of thoſe men, &c. Caſt not your pearls before dogs:" for I ſee theſe men be come to hunt for matter, that the one may bear witneſs with the other.

Dr. Seton, after ſome by-talk of Mr. Bradford's age, of his country, and ſuch like, began a gay and long diſcourſe of my lord of Canterbury, Mr. Latimer, and Mr. Ridley, and how they at Oxford were not able to anſwer any thing at all; and that therefore my lord of Canterbury deſired to confer with the biſhop of Durham and others: all which talk tended to this end, that John Bradford ſhould make the like ſuit, being in nothing to be compared in learning to my lord of Canterbury.

To this John Bradford briefly anſwered as he did before to Mr. Huſſey.

With this anſwer neither the Doctor nor gentleman being contented, after many perſuaſions, Mr. doctor ſaid, I have heard much good talk of you, and even yeſternight a gentleman made report of you at the lord chancellor's table, that ye were able to perſuade as much as any that he knew. And I (though I never heard you preach, and to my knowledge did never ſee you before yeſterday), yet methought your modeſty was ſuch, your behaviour and talk ſo without malice and impatience, that I would be ſorry you ſhould do worſe than myſelf. And I tell you further, I do perceive my lord chancellor hath a favour towards you: wherefore be not ſo obſtinate, but deſire reſpite and ſome learned man to confer withal, &c.

But John Bradford kept ſtill one anſwer: I cannot, nor I will not ſo offend the people. I doubt not, but I am moſt certain of the doctrine I have taught.

Here Mr. Doctor waxed hot, and called Mr. Bradford arrogant, proud, and vain-glorious.

But Bradford anſwered, Beware of judging, leſt you condemn yourſelf. But ſtill Dr. Seton urged him, ſhewing him how merciful my lord chancellor was, and how charitably they entertained him.

Brad. I never ſaw any juſtice, much leſs love, I ſpeak for my part, quoth Bradford, in my lord chancellor. Long have I been unjuſtly impriſoned, and handled in the ſame uncharitably: and now my lord hath no juſt matter againſt me.

This talk ſerved not the doctor's purpoſe: wherefore he went from matter to matter, from this point to that point. Bradford ſtill gave him the hearing, and anſwered not: for he perceived that they both did come but to fiſh for ſome things which might make a ſhew that my lord chancellor had juſtly kept him in priſon.

When all their diſcourſe took no ſuch effect as they expected, Mr. Huſſey aſked Mr. Bradford, Will ye not admit conference, if my lord chancellor ſhould offer it publicly?

Brad. Conference, if it had been offered before the law had been made, or if it were offered ſo that I might be at liberty to confer, and as ſure as he with whom I ſhould confer, then it were ſomething: but elſe I ſee not to what other purpoſe conference ſhould be offered, but to defer that which at length will come, and the lingering may give more offence than do good. Howbeit, if my lord ſhall make ſuch an offer of his own motion, I will not refuſe to confer with whomſoever he ſhall appoint.

Mr. Doctor hearing this, called Bradford arrogant, proud, and whatſoever it pleaſed him.

Then Bradford perceiving by them that he ſhould ſhortly be called for, beſought them both to give him leave to talk with God, and to beg wiſdom and grace of him; for, ſaid he, otherwiſe I am helpleſs: and ſo they with much ado departed. Then Mr. Bradford went and made his prayers to God, which the Lord of his goodneſs did graciouſly accept in his need, praiſed therefore be his holy name. Shortly after they were gone, Mr. Bradford was led to the aforeſaid church, and there tarried uncalled for till eleven of the clock, that is, till Mr. Saunders was excommunicated.

The laſt Examination of Mr. Bradford, in the Church of St. Mary Overy's.

AFTER the excommunication of Laurence Saunders, John Bradford was called in, and being brought in before the lord chancellor and other biſhops there ſitting, the lord chancellor began to ſpeak thus in effect: That if Bradford, being now come before them, would anſwer with modeſty and humility, and conform himſelf to the catholic church with them, he yet might find mercy, becauſe they would be loth to uſe extremity. Therefore he concluded with an exhortation, that Bradford would recant his doctrine.

After the lord chancellor had ended his long oration. Mr. Bradford began to ſpeak thus: As yeſterday I beſought your honours to ſet in your ſight the majeſty and preſence of God to follow him, who ſeeketh not to ſubvert the ſimple by ſubtle queſtions: ſo I humbly beſeech every one of you to do this day; for you know well enough, that guiltleſs blood will cry for vengeance. And this I pray not your lordſhips to do, as one that taketh upon me to condemn you utterly herein, but that ye might be more admoniſhed to do that, which none doth ſo much as he ſhould do: for our nature is ſo much corrupt, that we are very forgetful of God. Again, as yeſterday I pretended mine oath and oaths againſt the biſhop of Rome, that I ſhould never conſent to the practiſing of any juriſdiction for him, or on his behalf in the realm of England: ſo do I again at this day, leſt I ſhould be perjured. And laſt of all, as yeſterday the anſwers I made were by proteſtation and ſaving mine oath, ſo I would your honours ſhould know that mine anſwers ſhall be this day: and this I do, that when death (which I look for at your hands) ſhall come, I may not be troubled with the guilt of perjury.

At which words the lord chancellor was wroth, and ſaid, that they had given him reſpite to deliberate till this day, whether he would recant his errors of the bleſſed ſacrament, which yeſterday, ſaid he, before us you uttered.

Brad. My lord, you gave me no time for any ſuch deliberation, neither did I ſpeak any thing of the ſacrament which you do diſallow. For when I had declared a preſence of Chriſt to be there to faith, you went from that matter, to clear yourſelf that you were not cruel, and ſo went to dinner.

Lord Chan. What? I perceive we muſt begin all again with thee. Did I not yeſterday tell thee plainly, that thou madeſt a conſcience where none ſhould be? Did I not make it plain, that the oath againſt the biſhop of Rome was an unlawful oath?

Brad. No indeed, my lord: you ſaid ſo, but you proved it not yet, nor ever can do.

Lord Chan. O Lord God, what a fellow art thou! Thou wouldeſt go about to bring into the people's heads, that we, all the lords of the parliament-houſe, the knights and burgeſſes, and all the whole realm, be perjured. O what an heretic is this! here, good people, you may ſee what a ſenſeleſs heretic this fellow is. If I ſhould make an oath I would never help my brother, nor lend him money in his need; were this a good anſwer to tell my neighbour deſiring my help, that I had made an oath to the contrary? or that I could not do it?

Brad. O my lord, diſcern betwixt oaths that be againſt charity and faith, and oaths that be according to faith and charity, as this is againſt the biſhop of Rome.

Here the lord chancellor made much ado, and a long time was ſpent about oaths, which were good and which were evil, he captiouſly aſking often of Bradford a direct anſwer concerning oaths: which Bradford would not give ſimply, but with a diſtinction. Whereat the chancellor was much offended: but Bradford ſtill kept him at the bay, that the oath againſt the biſhop of Rome was a lawful oath, uſing thereto the lord chancellor's own book, De vera obedientia, for confirmation.

At length they came to this iſſue, who ſhould be judge of the lawfulneſs of the oath? and Bradford ſaid, the word of God, according to Chriſt's word, John 12. My word ſhall judge; and according to the teſtimony of Iſaiah and Micah, That God's word coming out of Jeruſalem, ſhall give ſentence among the Gentiles. By this Word, quoth Bradford, my lord, I will prove the oath againſt the biſhop of Rome's authority, to be a good, a godly, and a lawful oath. So that the lord chancellor left his hold, and as the other day he pretended a denial of the queen's authority and obedience to her highneſs, ſo did he now.

But Bradford, as the day before, proved, that obedience in this point to the queen's highneſs, if ſhe ſhould demand an oath to the biſhop of Rome, being denied, was not a general denial of her authority, and of obedience to her; no more, ſaid he, than the ſale, gift, or leaſe of a piece of a man's inheritance, proveth it a ſale, gift, or leaſe of the whole inheritance.

And thus much ado was made about this matter: the lord chancellor talking much, and uſing many examples of debt, of going out of town to-morrow by oath, and yet tarrying till Friday, and ſuch like. Which trifling talk Bradford did touch, ſaying, That it was a wonder his honour weighed conſcience no more in this, and would be ſo earneſt in vows of prieſts marriages made to biſhops, and be careleſs for ſolemn oaths made to God and to princes. Summa, this was the end. The lord chancellor ſaid, The queen might diſpenſe with it, and did ſo to all the whole realm. But Bradford ſaid, That the queen's highneſs could do no more but remit her right; as for the oath made to God, ſhe could never remit, foraſmuch as it was made unto God.

At which words the lord chancellor chafed wonderfully, and ſaid, That in plain ſenſe I ſlandered the realm with perjury; and therefore, quoth he to the people, you may ſee how this fellow taketh upon him to have more knowledge and conſcience than all the wiſe men of England, and yet he hath no conſcience at all.

Brad. Well, my lord, let all the ſtanders-by ſee who hath conſcience: I have been a year and a half in priſon: now before all this people, declare wherefore I was impriſoned, or what cauſe you had to puniſh me. You ſaid the other day in your own houſe, my lord of London witneſſing with you, that I took upon me to ſpeak to the people undeſired. There he ſitteth by you, I mean my lord of Bath, who deſired me himſelf, for the paſſion of Chriſt, I would ſpeak to the people. Upon whoſe words I coming into the pulpit, had like to have been ſlain with a dagger (which was hurled at him, I think), for it touched my ſleeve. He then prayed me I would not leave him; and I promiſed him, as long as I lived, I would take hurt before him that day, and ſo went out of the pulpit and intreated with the people, and at length brought him myſelf into an houſe.

Beſides this, in the afternoon I preached at Bow-church, and there going up into the pulpit, one deſired me not to reprove the people; for, ſaid he, you will never come down alive, if you do it. And yet notwithſtanding I did in that ſermon reprove their fact, and called it ſedition at leaſt twenty times. For all which my doing, I have received this recompence, impriſonment for a year and a half and more, and death now, which you go about. Let all men be judge where conſcience is.

They endeavoured to interrupt him while he was ſpeaking theſe words, but Mr. Bradford ſtill ſpake on, and gave no place till he had made an end. And then the lord chancellor ſaid, That for all that fair tale, his fact at the Croſs was naught.

Brad. No, my fact was good, as you yourſelf did bear me witneſs. For when I was at firſt before you in the Tower, you yourſelf did ſay, that my fact was good, but, quoth you, thy mind was evil. Well, quoth I, then my lord, in that you allow the fact, and condemn my mind; for ſo much as otherwiſe I cannot declare my mind to man but by ſaying and doing. God one day, I truſt, will open it to my comfort, what my mind was, and yours is.

Here the lord chancellor was offended, and ſaid, that he never ſaid ſo. I, quoth he, had not ſo little wit, as not to diſcern betwixt meaning and doing: and ſo brought forth many examples little to the purpoſe, to prove that men conſtrue things by the meaning of men, and not by their doings. But when this would not ſerve, then cometh he to another matter, and ſaid, That Bradford was put in priſon at firſt becauſe he would not yield, nor be conformable to the queen's religion.

Brad. Why, my lord, your honour knoweth that you would not reaſon with me in religion, but ſaid a time ſhould afterwards be found out, when I ſhould be talked withal. But if it were as your lordſhip ſaith, that I was put in priſon for religion, in that my religion was then authorized by public laws of the realm, could conſcience puniſh, or caſt me in priſon therefore? Wherefore let all men be judges, in whom conſcience is wanting.

Here came forth Mr. Chamberlain of Woodſtock, and told my lord chancellor, that Bradford had been a ſerving-man, and was with Mr. Harrington.

Lord Chan. True, and did deceive his maſter of ſeven-ſcore pounds, and becauſe of this, he went to be a goſpeller and a preacher, good people, and yet you ſee how he pretendeth conſcience.

Brad. My lord, I ſet my foot by his, whoſoever he be, that can come forth and juſtly vouch to my face, that ever I deceived my maſter. And as you are chief juſticer by office in England, I deſire juſtice upon them that ſo ſlander me, becauſe they cannot prove it.

Here my lord chancellor and Mr. Chamberlain were ſmitten blank, and ſaid they heard it. But, quoth my lord chancellor, we have another manner of matter than this againſt you: for you are an heretic.

Yea, quoth the biſhop of London, he did write letters to Mr. Pendleton, which knoweth his hand as well as his own; your honour did ſee the letters.

Brad. This is not true, I never did write to Pendleton ſince I came to priſon, and therefore I am not juſtly ſpoken of.

Lond. Yea, but you indited it.

Brad. I did not, nor know not what you mean, and this I offer to prove.

Then came in another, I believe they call him Mr. Allen, one of the clerks of the council, putting the lord chancellor in remembrance of letters written into Lancaſhire.

Lord Chan. You ſay true: for we have his hand to ſhew.

Brad. I deny that you have my hand to ſhew of letters ſent into Lancaſhire, otherwiſe than before you all I will ſtand to, and prove them to be good and lawful.

Here was all anſwered, and then the lord chancellor began a new matter. Sir, quoth he, in my houſe the other day you did moſt contemptuouſly contemn the queen's mercy, and further ſaid, that you would maintain the erroneous doctrine in king Edward's days againſt all men, and this you do moſt ſtoutly.

Brad. Well, I am glad that all men ſee now you have had no matter to impriſon me before that day juſtly. Now ſay I, that I did not contemptuouſly contemn the queen's mercy, but would have had it (though if juſtice might take place, I need it not) ſo that I might have had it with God's mercy, that is, without doing or ſaying any thing againſt God and his truth. And as for maintenance of doctrine, becauſe I cannot tell how you will ſtretch this word maintenance, I will repeat again that which I ſpake. I ſaid I was more confirmed in the religion ſet forth in king Edward's days, than ever I was: and if God ſo would, I truſt I ſhould declare it by giving my life for the confirmation and teſtification thereof. So I ſaid then, and ſo I ſay now. As for otherwiſe to maintain it, than pertaining to private perſon by confeſſion, I thought not, nor think not.

Lord Chan. Well, yeſterday thou didſt maintain falſe hereſy concerning the bleſſed ſacrament, and therefore we gave thee reſpite till this day to deliberate.

Brad. My lord, as I ſaid at the firſt, I ſpake nothing of the ſacrament, but that which you allowed, and therefore reproved it not, nor gave me any thing to deliberate.

Lord Chan. Why? didſt thou not deny Chriſt's preſence in the ſacrament?

Brad. No, I never denied nor taught, but that to faith, whole Chriſt, body and blood, was as preſent as the bread and wine to the due receiver.

Lord Chan. Yea, but doſt thou not believe that Chriſt's body naturally and really is there, under the forms of bread and wine?

Brad. My lord, I believe Chriſt is preſent there to the faith of the due receiver: as for tranſubſtantiation, I plainly and flatly tell you, I believe it not.

Here was Bradford called Diabolus, a ſlanderer: for we aſk no queſtion, quoth my lord chancellor, of tranſubſtantiation, but of Chriſt's preſence.

Brad. I deny not his preſence to the faith of the receiver, but deny that he is included in the bread, or that the bread was tranſubſtantiate.

Worceſt. If he be not included, how is he then preſent?

Brad. Forſooth, though my faith can tell how, yet my tongue cannot expreſs it, nor you otherwiſe than by faith hear it, or underſtand it.

Here was much ado, now one doctor ſtanding up and ſpeaking thus, and others ſpeaking that, and the lord chancellor talking much of Luther, Zuinglius, Oecolampadius; but ſtill Bradford kept him at that point, that Chriſt is preſent to faith; and that there is no tranſubſtantiation nor including of Chriſt in the bread: but all this would not ſerve them.

Therefore another biſhop aſked this queſtion, Whether the wicked man received Chriſt's very body or no? And Bradford anſwered plainly, No. Whereat the lord chancellor made a long oration, how that it could not be that Chriſt was preſent, except the evil man received it. But Bradford put away all his oration in few words, that grace was at that time offered to his lordſhip, although he received it not: ſo that, ſaid he, the receiving maketh not the preſence, as your lordſhip would infer; but God's grace, truth, and power is the cauſe of the preſence, which grace, the wicked that lack faith cannot receive. And here Bradford prayed my lord, not to divorce that which God had coupled together. He hath coupled all theſe together; "Take, eat, this is my body:" He ſaith not, See, peep, this is my body; but, Take, eat. So that it appeareth this is a promiſe depending upon condition, if we take and eat.

Here the lord chancellor and other biſhops made a great ado, that Bradford had found out a toy that no man elſe ever did, of the condition, and the lord chancellor made many words to the people thereabout.

But Bradford ſaid thus, My lord, are not theſe words, Take, eat, a commandment? And are not theſe words, This is my body, a promiſe? If you will challenge the promiſe, and do not the commandment, may you not deceive yourſelf?

Here the lord chancellor denied Chriſt to have commanded the ſacrament, and the uſe of it.

Brad. Why, my lord, I pray you tell the people what mood Accipite, Manducate, is; Is it not plain to children, that Chriſt in ſo ſaying, commandeth?

At theſe words the lord chancellor made a great toying and trifling at the Imperative mood, and fell to parſing or examining, as he ſhould teach a child, and ſo concluded that it was no commandment, but ſuch a phraſe as this, I pray you give me drink, which, ſaid he, is no commandment, I think.

But Bradford prayed him to leave toying and trifling, and ſaid thus; My lord, if it be not a commandment of Chriſt to take and eat the ſacrament, why dare any take upon them to command and make that of neceſſity, which God leaveth free; as you do in making it a neceſſary commandment, once a year for all that be of diſcretion to receive the ſacrament?

Here the lord chancellor called him again Diabolus or Calumniator, and began out of theſe words, "Let a man prove himſelf, and ſo eat of the bread (yea bread, quoth Bradford) and drink of the cup," to prove that it was no commandment to receive the ſacrament: for then (ſaid he) if it were a commandment, it ſhould bind all men, in all places, and at all times.

Brad. O my lord, diſcern between commandments: ſome be general, as the ten commandments, that they bind always, in all places, and all perſons: ſome be not ſo general, as this of the ſupper, the ſacrament of baptiſm, of the thrice appearing before the Lord yearly at Jeruſalem, of Abraham offering of Iſaac, &c.

Here my lord chancellor denied the cup to be commanded by Chriſt: for then, ſaid he, we ſhould have eleven commandments.

Brad. Indeed I believe you think as you ſpeak: for elſe you would not take the cup from the people, in that Chriſt ſaith, "Drink ye all of it." But how ſay you, my lords? Chriſt ſaith to you biſhops eſpecially, "Go and preach the goſpel: feed Chriſt's flock, &c." Is this a commandment, or no?

Here was my lord chancellor in a chafe, and ſaid as pleaſed him.

Then

Then the biſhop of Durham aſked Bradford, when Chriſt began to be preſent in the ſacrament? whether before the receiver received it, or no?

Mr. Bradford anſwered, that the queſtion was curious, and not neceſſary; and further ſaid, that as the cup was the New Teſtament, ſo the bread was Chriſt's body to him that received it duly, but yet ſo that the bread is bread. For, ſaid he, in all the ſcripture ye ſhall not find this propoſition, There is no bread. And ſo he brought forth Chryſoſtom, Si in corpore eſſemus, Hom. in 83. Mat. 34. Summa. Much ado was here, they calling Bradford heretic, and he deſiring them to proceed on in God's name, he looked for that which God appointed for them to do.

Lord Chan. This fellow is now in another hereſy of fatal neceſſity, as though all things were ſo tied together, that of mere neceſſity all muſt come to paſs.

But Mr. Bradford deſired him to take things as they be ſpoken, and not wreſt them to a contrary ſenſe. Your lordſhip, ſaid he, doth diſcern betwixt God and man. Things are not by fortune to God at any time, though to man they ſeem ſo ſometimes. I ſpeak but as the apoſtles did, "Lord (ſaid they) ſee how Herod and Pontius Pilate, with the prelates, are gathered together againſt thy Chriſt, to do that which thy hand and counſel hath before ordained for them to do."

Here the lord chancellor began to read the excommunication. And in the excommunication, when he came to the name of John Bradford, lay man: Why (quoth he) art thou no prieſt?

Brad. No, nor never was either prieſt, either beneficed, either married, either any preacher, before public authority had eſtabliſhed religion, or preacher after public authority had altered religion, and yet I am thus handled at your hand: but God, I doubt not, will give his bleſſing where you curſe. And ſo he fell down on his knees, and heartily thanked God that he counted him worthy to ſuffer for his name ſake; and prayed to God to give him repentance and a good mind. After the excommunication was read, he was delivered to the ſheriff of London, and ſo had to the Clink, and afterwards to the Compter in the Poultry, in the city of London, this being purpoſed by his murderers, that he ſhould be delivered from thence to the earl of Derby, to be conveyed into Lancaſhire, and there to be burned in the town of Mancheſter, where he was born: but their purpoſe concerning the place was afterward altered, for he ſuffered in London.

After the condemnation of Mr. Bradford, which was the laſt day of January, Mr. Bradford being ſent to priſon, remained there till the firſt of July, during which time he ſuſtained divers other conferences and conflicts with ſundry adverſaries, who repaired to him in the priſon. Of whom firſt biſhop Bonner, coming to the Compter to degrade Dr. Taylor, the fourth day of February, began to diſcourſe with the ſaid Mr. Bradford; the effect whereof here enſueth.

On the fourth of February, the ſame day Mr. Rogers was burned, Bonner biſhop of London came to the Compter in the Poultry, to degrade Dr. Taylor, about one of the clock in the afternoon. But before he ſpake to Dr. Taylor, he called for John Bradford who was priſoner there, whom when he ſaw he put off his cap, and gave him his hand, ſaying, Becauſe I perceive that ye are deſirous to confer with ſome learned men, therefore I have brought Mr. archdeacon Harpsfield to you. And I tell you, you do like a wiſe man. But I pray go roundly to work, for the time is but ſhort.

Brad. My lord, as roundly as I can I will go to work with you: I never deſired to confer with any man, nor yet do. Howbeit, if ye will have one to talk with me, I am ready.

Bonner. What! (ſaid the biſhop in a fume to the keeper) did you not tell me that this man deſired conference?

Keeper. No, my lord, I told you that he would not refuſe to confer with any; but I did not ſay that it was his deſire.

Bonner. Well, Mr. Bradford, you are well beloved, I pray you conſider yourſelf, and refuſe not charity when it is offered.

Brad. Indeed, my lord, this is ſmall charity, to condemn a man as you have condemned me, who never brake your laws. In Turky a man may have charity, but in England I could not yet find it. I was condemned for my faith as ſoon as I uttered it at your requeſts, before I had committed any thing againſt the laws. And as for conference, I am not afraid to talk with whom ye will. But to ſay that I deſire to confer, that do I not.

Bonner. Well, well. And ſo he called for Dr. Taylor, and Bradford went his way.

Upon another day in February, Mr. Willerton, chaplain to the biſhop of London, came to confer with Mr. Bradford; but when he perceived that Mr. Bradford deſired not his company, and therefore rather wiſhed for his departing than his ſtay: Well, Mr. Bradford, ſaid he, I pray you let us confer a little, perchance you may do me good, if I can do you none. Upon which words Mr. Bradford was content, and ſo they began to talk. Willerton ſpake much of the doctors, of the fathers, of the bread in the ſixth of St. John, &c. labouring to prove tranſubſtantiation, and that wicked men do receive Chriſt.

But Bradford on the contrary improved his authorities, ſo that they came to this iſſue, that Willerton ſhould draw his reaſons out of the ſcriptures and doctors, and Bradford would peruſe them; and if he could not anſwer them, then he would give place. Likewiſe alſo Mr. Bradford ſhould draw his reaſons out of the ſcriptures and doctors, to which Willerton ſhould anſwer if he could: and ſo they departed for that day.

The next morning Mr. Willerton ſent half a ſheet of paper written on both ſides, containing no reaſons how he gathered his doctrine, but only bare ſentences; "The bread which I will give is my fleſh:" and the places in the 26th of St. Matthew, the 14th of Mark, the 22d of Luke, and the 10th and 11th to the Corinthians, with ſome ſentences of the doctors, all which made as much againſt him as for him.

In the afternoon he came himſelf, and there they had a long talk to little effect. At length Willerton began to talk of the church, ſaying, that Bradford ſwerved from the church.

Brad. No, that I do not, but ye do. For the church is Chriſt's ſpouſe, and Chriſt's obedient ſpouſe, which your church is not, which robbeth the people of the Lord's cup, and of ſervice in the Engliſh tongue.

Willer. Why? It is not profitable to have the ſervice in Engliſh; for it is written, "The lips of the prieſt ſhould keep the law, and out of his mouth man muſt look for knowledge."

Brad. Should not the people then have the ſcriptures? Wherefore ſerveth this ſaying of Chriſt, "Search the ſcriptures?"

Willer. This was not ſpoke to the people, but to the ſcribes and learned men.

Brad. Then the people muſt not have the ſcriptures?

Willer. No, for it is written, "They ſhall be all taught of God."

Brad. And muſt we learn all from the prieſts?

Willer. Yea.

Brad. Then I ſee you would bring the people to hang up Chriſt, and let Barabbas go, as the prieſts did then perſuade the people. At which words Mr. Willerton was ſo offended, that he had no deſire to talk any more. In the end Mr. Bradford gave him the reaſons which he had had gathered againſt tranſubſtantiation, and deſired him to frame his into the form of reaſons, and then, quoth Bradford, I will anſwer them.

Willer. Well, I will do ſo. But firſt I will anſwer yours. Which he never performed.

On the 12th of February one of the earl of Derby's ſervants came to Mr. Bradford, ſaying, My lord hath ſent me to you, he deſireth you to tender yourſelf, and he will be a good lord to you.

Brad. I thank his lordſhip for his good will towards me: but in this caſe I cannot tender myſelf more than God's honour will allow.

Servant. Ah Mr. Bradford, conſider your mother, ſiſters, friends, kinsfolk, and country, what a great diſcomfort will it be unto them to ſee you die as an heretic?

Brad. I have learned to forſake father, mother, brother, ſiſter, friends, and all that ever I have, yea, even mine ownſelf, for elſe I cannot be Chriſt's diſciple.

Serv. If my lord ſhould obtain for you that ye might depart the realm, would ye not be content to be at the queen's appointment, where ſhe would appoint you beyond the ſea?

Brad. No, I had rather be burned in England, than be burned beyond the ſeas. For I know that if ſhe ſhould ſend me to Paris, Lovain, or ſome ſuch place, forthwith they would burn me.

Upon the fourteenth of February, Percival Creſwell, an old acquaintance of Mr. Bradford's, came to him, bringing with him a kinſman of Mr. Fecknam's, who, after many words, ſaid; Creſ. I pray you let me intercede for you.

Brad. You may do what ye will.

Creſ. But tell me what ſuit I ſhall make for you.

Brad. Forſooth what you pleaſe, do it not at my requeſt, for I deſire nothing at your hands. If the queen will give me life, I will thank her. If ſhe will baniſh me, I will thank her. If ſhe will burn me, I will thank her. If ſhe will condemn me to perpetual impriſonment, I will thank her.

Hereupon Creſwell went away, and about eleven of the clock he and the other man came again, and brought a book wrote by one More, deſiring Mr. Bradford to read it over.

Bradford taking the book, ſaid, Good Percival, I am immovably ſettled in this article.

Creſ. Oh, if ever ye loved me, do one thing for me.

Brad. What is that?

Creſ. Deſire and name what learned man or men ye will have to come unto you. My lord of York, my lord of Lincoln, my lord of Bath, and others will gladly come unto you.

Brad. No, never will I deſire them, or any other, to come to confer with me; for I am as certain of my doctrine as I am of any thing. But for your pleaſure, and alſo that all men may know I am not aſhamed to have my faith ſifted and tried, bring whom ye will, and I will talk with them. So they went their way.

About three of the clock in the afternoon, Dr. Harding, who was then the biſhop of Lincoln's chaplain, came to Mr. Bradford, and after a great and ſolemn proteſtation, declaring that he had prayed to God before he came, to turn his talk to Bradford's good, he began to tell the good opinion he had of Bradford, and ſpent the time in ſuch tattling, ſo that their talk was to little purpoſe; ſave that Bradford prayed him to conſider from whence he was fallen, and not follow the world, nor to love it: for the love of God is not where the world is.

But Harding counted Bradford in a damnable ſtate, as one being out of the church, and therefore deſired him to take heed of his ſoul, and not to die in ſuch an opinion.

What? Mr. Harding, ſaid Bradford; I have heard you with theſe ears maintain this what I now ſtand in.

Harding. I grant that I have taught that the doctrine of tranſubſtantiation was a ſubtle doctrine, but otherwiſe I never taught it. And ſo he inveighing againſt marriages of prieſts, and namely againſt Peter Martyr, Martin Bucer, Luther, and ſuch, who for breaking their vows were juſtly given up into hereſies (as he ſaid); Mr. Bradford ſeeing him altogether given up to popery, after admoniſhing him thereof, bade him farewel.

Upon the 25th of February, Percival Creſwell came with Mr. Harpsfield archdeacon of London, and a ſervant waiting upon him. After formal ſalutations, he made a long oration, of which this is a ſhort ſum; That all men, even the Infidels, Turks, Jews, Anabaptiſts, and Libertines, deſire felicity as well as the chriſtians, and that every one thinketh they ſhall attain to it by their religion. To which Bradford anſwered briefly, that he ſpake not far amiſs.

Then ſaid Harpsfield, But the way thither is not all alike; for the Infidels by Jupiter, Juno, &c. the Turk by his Alcoran, the Jew by his Talmud, do believe to come to heaven. For ſo may I ſpeak of ſuch as believe the immortality of the ſoul.

Brad. You ſpeak truly.

Harpſ. Well, then here is the matter, to know the way to this heaven.

Brad. We are not to invent ways. There is but one way, and that is Jeſus Chriſt, as he himſelf doth witneſs; I am the way.

Harpſ. What you ſay is true, and alſo falſe. I ſuppoſe what you mean by Chriſt, is believing in Chriſt.

Brad. I have learned to diſcern betwixt faith and Chriſt. Albeit I confeſs, that whoſo believeth in Chriſt, the ſame ſhall be ſaved.

Harpſ. No, not all that believe in Chriſt; for ſome ſhall ſay, "Lord, Lord, have we not caſt out devils? &c." But Chriſt will anſwer in the day of judgment to theſe, "Depart from me, I know you not."

Brad. You muſt make a difference betwixt believing, and ſaying I believe: as for example, If one ſhould ſay and ſwear he loveth you, for all his ſaying and ſwearing ye will not believe him, when you ſee he goeth about to utter and do all the evil againſt you that he can.

Harpſ. Well, this is not much material. There is but one way, Chriſt. How come we to know him? where ſhall we ſeek to find him?

Brad. Forſooth, we muſt ſeek him by his word, and in his word, and after his word.

Harpſ. Very good: but tell me now how firſt we came into the company of them that could tell us this, but by baptiſm?

Brad. Baptiſm is the ſacrament, by which outwardly we are ingrafted into Chriſt: I ſay outwardly, becauſe I dare not exclude from Chriſt all that die without baptiſm. I will not tie God, where he is not bound. Some infants die, whoſe parents deſire baptiſm for them, and cannot have it.

Harpſ. To theſe we may think perchance that God will ſhew mercy.

Brad. Yea, the children whoſe parents do condemn baptiſm, will not I condemn, becauſe the child ſhall not bear the father's offence.

Harpſ. Well, we agree, that by baptiſm then we are brought and (as a man would ſay) begotten to Chriſt. For Chriſt is our father, and the church his ſpouſe is our mother. As all men naturally have Adam for their father, and Eve for their mother; ſo all ſpiritual men have Chriſt for their father, and the church for their mother: and as Eve was taken out of Adam's ſide, ſo was the church taken out of Chriſt's ſide, whereout flowed blood for the ſatisfaction and purgation of our ſins.

Brad. All this is truly ſpoken.

Harpſ. Now then tell me whether this church of Chriſt hath not been always?

Brad. Yea, ſince the creation of man, and ſhall be for ever.

Harpſ. Very good. But yet tell me whether this church is a viſible church, or no?

Brad. It is no otherwiſe viſible, than Chriſt was here on earth; that is, by no exterior pomp or ſhew that ſetteth her forth commonly; and therefore to ſee her we muſt put on ſuch eyes, as good men put on to ſee and know Chriſt when he walked here on earth: for as Eve was of the ſame ſubſtance that Adam was of, ſo was the church of the ſame ſubſtance that Chriſt was of, "Fleſh of his fleſh, and bone of his bones;" as St. Paul ſaith, Epheſ. 5. Look therefore how Chriſt was viſibly known to be Chriſt when he was on earth, that is, by conſidering him after the word of God, ſo is the church known.

Harpſ. I do not come to reaſon at this preſent, and therefore I will go on forward. Is not this church a multitude?

Brad. Yes, that it is. Howbeit, Latet anguis in herba, as the proverb is. For in your queſtion is a ſubtilty. What viſible multitude was there in Elijah's time, or when Moſes was on the mount, Aaron and all Iſrael worſhipping the calf?

Harpſ. Ye divert from the matter.

Brad. No, nothing at all. For I do prevent you, knowing well whereabout you go. And therefore fewer words might very well ſerve.

Harpſ. Well, I perceive you have knowledge, and by a little perceive I the more. Tell me yet further, whether this multitude have not the miniſtry or preaching of God's word?

Brad. Sir, you go about the buſh. If ye underſtand preaching for the confeſſing of the goſpel, I will go with you: for elſe, if you will, you may know that perſecution often hindereth preaching.

Harpſ. Well, I mean it ſo. Tell me yet more: hath it not the ſacraments adminiſtered?

Brad. It hath the ſacraments, howbeit the adminiſtration of them is often hindered. But I will put you from your purpoſe, becauſe I ſee whereabout you go. If heretics have baptiſm, and do baptize, as they did in St. Cyprian's time, you know this baptiſm is baptiſm, and not to be reiterated. This Bradford ſpake, that the ſtanders by might obſerve, that tho' the Popiſh church hath baptiſm which we have received of them, yet notwithſtanding it is not the true church, neither need we be baptized again.

Harpſ. You go far from the matter, and I perceive you have more errors than one.

Brad. So you ſay, but that is not enough till you prove it.

Harpſ. Well, this church is a multitude. Hath it not the preaching of the goſpel, and the adminiſtration of the ſacraments? And yet more, hath it not the power of juriſdiction?

Brad. What juriſdiction is exerciſed in perſecution and affliction?

Harpſ. I mean by juriſdiction, admoniſhing one another, and ſo forth.

Brad. Well, go to, what then?

Harpſ. It hath alſo ſucceſſion of biſhops. And here he made much ado to prove that this was an eſſential point.

Brad. You ſay as you would have it; for if this part fail you, all the church that you go about to ſet up will fall down. You ſhall not find in all the ſcripture, this your eſſential part of ſucceſſion of biſhops. In Chriſt's church Antichriſt will ſit. And Peter telleth us, as it went in the old church before Chriſt's coming, ſo it will be in the new church ſince Chriſt's coming: that is, as there were falſe prophets, and ſuch as bare rule were adverſaries to the true prophets; ſo ſhall there be (ſaith he) falſe teachers, even of ſuch as are biſhops, and bear rule among the people.

Harpſ. You go always out of the matter: but I will prove further the ſucceſſion of biſhops.

Brad. Do ſo.

Harpſ. Tell me, were not the apoſtles biſhops?

Brad. No, except you will make a new definition of a biſhop; that is, give him no certain place.

Harpſ. Indeed, the apoſtle's office was not the biſhop's office: for it was univerſal, but yet Chriſt inſtituted biſhops in his church, as St. Paul ſaith, he hath given paſtors, prophets, &c. So that I think it may be proved by the ſcriptures, that the ſucceſſion of biſhops is an eſſential point.

Brad. The miniſtry of God's word and miniſters, be an eſſential point. But to tranſlate this to the biſhops and their ſucceſſion, is a plain ſubtilty: and therefore that it may be plain, I will aſk you a queſtion. Tell me, whether the ſcripture knew any difference between biſhops and miniſters, which ye call prieſts?

Harpſ. No.

Brad. Well, then go on forwards, and let us ſee what ye ſhall get now by the ſucceſſion of biſhops: that is, of miniſters which can be underſtood of ſuch biſhops as miniſter not, but lord it.

Harpſ. I perceive that you are far out of the way. By your doctrine you can never ſhew in your church, a multitude which miniſtereth God's word and his ſacraments, which hath juriſdiction and ſucceſſion of biſhops, which hath from time to time believed as you believe, beginning now, and ſo going upwards, as I will do of your doctrine, and therefore are ye out of the church, and ſo cannot be ſaved. Perchance you will bring me downwards a ſhew to blear people's eyes; but to go upwards, that you can never do, and this is the true trial.

Brad. Ye muſt and will, I am aſſured, give me leave to follow the ſcriptures and examples of good men.

Harpſ. Yea.

Brad. Well then, Stephen was accuſed and condemned as I am, that he had taught a new and falſe doctrine, before the fathers of the church then as they were taken. Stephen for his purgation improveth their accuſation. But how? doth he it by going upwards? no, but by coming downwards, beginning at Abraham, and continuing ſtill till Iſaiah's time, and the people's captivity. From whence he maketh a great leap until the time he was in, which was (I think) about 400 years, and called them by their right names, hell-hounds, rather than heaven-hounds. In this manner will I prove my faith, and that you can never do yours.

Harpſ. Yea, Sir, if we knew that you had the Holy Ghoſt, then could we believe you. Here Bradford would have anſwered, that Stephen's enemies would not believe he had the Holy Ghoſt, therefore they did as they did: but as he was ſpeaking, Mr. Harpsfield roſe up, and the keeper and others that ſtood by began to talk gently, praying Bradford to take heed to what Mr. Archdeacon ſpake, who ſtill ſaid that Bradford was out of the church.

Brad. Sir, I am moſt certain that I am in Chriſt's church, and I can ſhew a demonſtration of my religion from time to time continually.

"God our Father, for the name and blood of his Chriſt be merciful unto us, and unto all his people, and deliver them from falſe teachers, and blind guides, thro' whom (alas) I fear, much hurt will come to this realm of England. God our Father bleſs us, and keep us in his truth and poor church for ever. Amen."

Then the archdeacon departed, ſaying, that he would come again the next morning.

Upon the 16th of February in the morning, the archdeacon and the other two with him, came again, and after a few by-words ſpoken, they ſat down.

Mr. Archdeacon began a very long oration, firſt repeating what they had ſaid, and how far they had gone overnight, and therewith began to prove upwards ſucceſſion of biſhops here in England for 800 years: in France at Lyons for 1200 years: at Spain in Hiſpalen for 800 years: in Italy at Milan for 1200 years, labouring ing by this to prove his church. He uſed all his ſucceſſion of biſhops in the Eaſt church for the more confirmation of his words, and ſo concluded with an exhortation and interrogation: the exhortation was, that Bradford would obey this church; the interrogation, whether Bradford could ſhew any ſuch ſucceſſion, for the demonſtration of his church (for ſo he called it) which followed?

Unto this his long oration, Bradford made this ſhort anſwer; My memory is evil, ſo that I cannot particularly anſwer your oration. Therefore I will do it generally, becauſe your oration is rather to perſuade than to prove, and therefore a ſmall anſwer will ſerve. If Chriſt or his apoſtles, being here on earth, had been required by the prelates of the church then, to have made a demonſtration of that church by ſucceſſion of ſuch high prieſts as had approved the doctrine which he taught, I think that Chriſt would have done as I do: that is, have alledged that which upholdeth the church, even the verity, the word of God, taught and believed, not by the high prieſts, which of long time had perſecuted it, but by the prophets and other good ſimple men, which perchance were counted heretics of the church: which church was not tied to ſucceſſion, but to the word of God. And thus to think, St. Peter giveth me occaſion when he ſaith, that as it went in the church before Chriſt's coming, ſo ſhall it go in the church after his coming: but then the pillars of the church were perſecutors of the church: therefore the like we muſt look for now.

Harpſ. I can gather and prove ſucceſſion in Jeruſalem of the high prieſts from Aaron's time.

Brad. I grant, but not ſuch ſucceſſion as allowed the truth.

Harpſ. Why, did they not allow Moſes's law?

Brad. Yes, and keep it, as touching the books thereof, as you do the bible, and holy ſcriptures. But the true interpretation and meaning of it they did corrupt, as you have done and do; and therefore the perſecution which they ſtirred up againſt the prophets and Chriſt, was not for the law, but for the interpretation of it. For they taught as you do now, that we muſt fetch the interpretation of the ſcriptures at your hand. But to make an end, death I look for daily, yea hourly, and I think my time is but very ſhort; therefore I had need to ſpend as much time with God as I can whilſt I have it, for his help and comfort, and therefore I pray you bear with me, that I do not now particularly and in more words anſwer your long talk. If I ſaw death not ſo near me as it is, I would then weigh every piece of your oration, if you would give me the ſum of it, and I would anſwer accordingly: but becauſe I dare not, nor I will not leave off looking and preparing for that which is at hand, I ſhall deſire you to hold me excuſed, though I do as I do, and I heartily thank you for your gentle good will: I ſhall heartily pray God our Father to give you the ſame light and life I do wiſh to myſelf. And ſo Bradford began to riſe up.

But then Mr. Archdeacon began to tell him he was in a very perilous caſe, and that he was ſorry to ſee him ſo ſettled. As for death, whether it be nigh or far off, I know not, neither matters it, ſo you die well.

Brad. I doubt not in this caſe but that I ſhall die well: for as I hope and am certain my death ſhall pleaſe the Lord, ſo I truſt I ſhall die chearfully to the comfort of his children.

Harpſ. But what if you be deceived?

Brad. What if you ſhould ſay the ſun doth not now ſhine? (The ſun ſhone through the window where they ſat.)

Harpſ. Well, I am ſorry to ſee you ſo ſecure and careleſs.

Brad. Indeed I am more carnally ſecure and careleſs than I ſhould be: God make me more vigilant. But in this caſe I cannot be ſo ſecure, for I am moſt aſſured I am in the truth.

Harpſ. That ye are not; for you are out of the catholic church.

Brad. No, though you have excommunicated me out of your church, yet I am in the catholic church of Chriſt, and am, and by God's grace ſhall be a child, and an obedient child of it for ever. I hope Chriſt will have no leſs care for me, than he had for the blind man excommunicated out of the ſynagogue: and further, I am ſure that the neceſſary articles of the faith, I mean the twelve articles of the creed, I confeſs and believe with that you call the holy church, ſo that even your church hath taken too much upon her to excommunicate me for that, which by the teſtimony of my lord of Durham, in the book of the ſacrament lately put forth, was free many an hundred years after Chriſt, to believe or not believe.

Harpſ. What is that?

Brad. Tranſubſtantiation.

Harpſ. Why: ye are not condemned only for that.

Brad. For that, and becauſe I deny that wicked men do receive Chriſt's body.

Harpſ. You agree not with us in the preſence, nor in any thing elſe.

Brad. How you believe, you know: for my part, I confeſs a preſence of whole Chriſt, God and man, to the faith of the receiver.

Harpſ. Nay, you muſt believe a real preſence in the ſacrament.

Brad. In the ſacrament? Nay, I will not ſhut him in, nor tie him to it otherwiſe than faith ſeeth and perceiveth. If I ſhould include Chriſt really preſent in the ſacrament, or tie him to it otherwiſe than to the faith of the receiver; then the wicked men ſhould receive him, which I do not believe, and by God's grace never will.

Harpſ. More pity: but a man may eaſily perceive, you make no preſence at all, and therefore you agree not therein with us.

Brad. I confeſs a preſence, and a true preſence, but to the faith of the receiver.

What (quoth one that ſtood by) of Chriſt's very body which died for us?

Brad. Yea, even of whole Chriſt, God and man, to feed the faith of him that receiveth it.

Harpſ. Why; this is nothing elſe but to exclude the omnipotency of God, and all kind of miracle in the ſacrament.

Brad. I do not exclude his omnipotency, but you do it rather: for I believe that Chriſt can accompliſh his promiſe, the ſubſtance of bread and wine being there, as well as the accidents, which you believe not. When we come to the ſacrament, we come not to feed our bodies, and therefore we have but a little piece of bread; but we come to feed our ſouls with Chriſt by faith, which the wicked do want, and therefore they receive nothing but Panem Domini, as Judas did, and not Panem Dominum, as the other apoſtles did.

Harpſ. The wicked do receive the very body of Chriſt, but not the grace of his body.

Brad. They receive not the body. For Chriſt's body is no dead carcaſe: he that receiveth it, receiveth the Spirit, which is not without grace.

Harpſ. Well, you have many errors. You count the maſs for abomination, and yet St. Ambroſe ſaid maſs. And ſo he read out of a written book a ſentence of St. Ambroſe to prove it.

Brad. Why, Sir, the maſs, as it is now, was nothing ſo in St. Ambroſe's time. Was not the moſt part of the canon made ſince by Gregory and Scholaſticus?

Harpſ. Indeed a great piece of it was made (as ye ſay) by Gregory: but Scholaſticus was before St. Ambroſe's time.

Brad. I think not: however I will not contend. St. Gregory ſaith, that the apoſtles ſaid maſs without the canon, only with the Lord's prayer.

Harpſ. You ſay true: for the canon is not the greateſt part of the maſs, the greateſt part is the ſacrifice, elevation, tranſubſtantiation, and adoration.

Brad. I can away with none of thoſe.

Harpſ. No, I think the ſame: but yet Hoc facite telleth plainly the ſacrifice of the church.

Brad. You confound ſacrifices, not diſcerning betwixt the ſacrifice of the church, and for the church. The ſacrifice of the church is no propitiatory ſacrifice, but a gratulatory ſacrifice. And as for Hoc facite, it is not referred to any ſacrificing, but to the whole action of taking, eating, &c.

Harpſ. You ſpeak not learnedly now: for Chriſt made his ſupper only to the twelve apoſtles, not admitting his mother or any of the ſeventy diſciples to it. Now the apoſtles do ſignify the prieſts.

Brad. I think that you ſpeak as you would men ſhould underſtand it: for elſe you would not keep the cup away from the laity. We have great cauſe to thank you, that you will give us of your bread. For I perceive you order the matter ſo, as though Chriſt had not commanded it to his whole church.

Then Harpsfield would have proved elevation by a place of Baſilius.

Brad. I have read the place, which ſeemeth to make nothing for elevation: but be it as it is, this is no time for me to ſcan the doubtful places of the doctors with you. I have been in priſon long without books and all neceſſaries for ſtudy, and now death draweth nigh, and by your leave I muſt now leave off, to prepare for it.

Harpſ. If I could do you good, I would be right glad, either in ſoul or body. For you are in a perilous caſe both ways.

Brad. Sir, I thank you for your good will. My caſe is as it is. I thank God it was never ſo well with me; for death to me ſhall be life.

Creſwell. It were beſt for you to deſire Mr. Archdeacon that he would make ſuit for you, that you might have a time to confer.

Harpſ. I will do the beſt I can: for I pity his caſe.

Brad. I will not deſire any body to ſue for time for me. I am not wavering, neither would I that any body ſhould think I were ſo. But if you have the charity and love you pretend towards me, and do think that I am in an error, I think the ſame ſhould move you to do as you would be done to. As ye think of me, ſo do I of you, that you are far out of the way, and I do not only think it, but alſo am thereof moſt aſſured. And in this and ſuch like gentle talk they departed.

On the 23d of the ſame month, the archbiſhop of York, and the biſhop of Chicheſter came to the Compter to ſpeak with Mr. Bradford. When he was come before them, they both, and eſpecially the biſhop of York, uſed him very gently: they would have him to ſit down, and becauſe he would not, they alſo would not ſit. So they all ſtood, and whether he would or not, they would needs have him put on, not only his night-cap, but his upper cap alſo, ſaying unto him, That obedience was better than ſacrifice.

While they were thus ſtanding together, my lord of York began to tell Mr. Bradford, that they came to him out of pure love and charity, without being ſent: and himſelf alſo for the acquaintance which he had with Mr. Bradford, more than the biſhop of Chicheſter had: and after commending Bradford's godly life, he concluded with this queſtion, How he was certain of ſalvation and of his religion?

After thanks for their good wili, Bradford anſwered, By the word of God, even by the ſcriptures, I am certain of ſalvation and religion.

York. Very well ſaid; but how do ye know the word of God and the ſcriptures, but by the church?

Brad. Indeed, my lord, the church was and is a means to bring a man more ſpeedily to know the ſcriptures and the word of God, as the woman of Samaria was the means by which the Samaritans knew Chriſt: but when they had heard him ſpeak, they ſaid, Now we know that he is Chriſt, not becauſe of thy words, but becauſe we ourſelves have heard him; ſo after we come to the hearing and reading of the ſcriptures ſhewed unto us, and diſcerned by the church, we do believe them, and know them as Chriſt's ſheep, not becauſe the church ſaith they are the ſcriptures, but becauſe they be ſo, being aſſured thereof by the ſame Spirit which wrote and ſpake them.

York. You know in the apoſtles time at firſt the word was not written.

Brad. True, if you mean it for ſome books of the New Teſtament: but elſe for the Old Teſtament St. Peter telleth us, "We have a more ſure word of prophecy:" not that it is ſimply ſo, but in reſpect of the apoſtles, which being alive and compaſſed with infirmity, attributed to the word written more weight, as wherewith no fault could be found, whereas for the infirmity of their perſons men perchance might have found ſome fault at their preaching; albeit in very deed no leſs obedience and faith ought to have been given to the one, than to the other; for all proceedeth from one Spirit of truth.

York. That place of St. Peter is not ſo to be underſtood of the word written.

Brad. Yea, Sir, that it is, and of none other.

Chicheſter. Yea, indeed Mr. Bradford doth tell you truly in that point.

York. Well, you know that Irenæus and others do magnify much, and alledge the church againſt the heretics, and not the ſcripture.

Brad. True, for they had to do with ſuch heretics as did deny the ſcriptures, and yet did magnify the apoſtles, ſo that they were enforced to uſe the authority of thoſe churches wherein the apoſtles had taught, and which had ſtill retained the ſame doctrine.

Chich. You ſpeak the very truth: for the heretics did refuſe all ſcriptures, except it were a piece of St. Luke's goſpel.

Brad. Then the alledging of the church cannot be principally uſed againſt me, which am ſo far from denying of the ſcriptures, that I appeal unto them utterly, as to the only judge.

York. A pretty matter, that you will take upon you to judge the church. I pray you where hath your church been hitherto? For the church of Chriſt is catholic and viſible hitherto.

Brad. My lord, I do not judge the church, when I diſcern it from that congregation, and thoſe which be not the church; and I never denied the church to be catholic and viſible, although at ſome times it is more viſible than at other times.

Chich. I pray you tell me where the church which allowed your doctrine, was theſe 400 years.

Brad. I will tell you, my lord, or rather you ſhall tell yourſelf, if you will tell me this one thing, where the church was in Elijah's time, when Elijah ſaid that he was left alone.

Chich. That is no anſwer.

Brad. I am ſorry that you ſay ſo: but this will I tell your lordſhip, that if you had the ſame eyes wherewith a man might have eſpied the church then, you would not ſay it were no anſwer. The fault why the church is not ſeen by you, is not becauſe the church is not viſible, but becauſe your eyes are not clear enough to ſee it.

Chich. You are much deceived in making this collation betwixt the church then and now.

York. Very well ſpoken, my lord: for Chriſt ſaid, "I will build my church;" and not I do, or have built it: but I will build it.

Brad. My lords, St. Peter teacheth me to make this collation, ſaying; as in the people "there were falſe prophets, which were moſt in eſtimation before Chriſt's coming, ſo ſhall there be falſe teachers amongſt the people after ter Chriſt's coming, and very many ſhall follow them." And as for your future tenſe, I hope your grace will not thereby conclude Chriſt's church not to have been before, but rather that there is no building in the church but by Chriſt's work only: for Paul and Apollos be but waterers.

Chich. In good faith, I am ſorry to ſee you ſo light in judging the church.

York. He taketh upon him, as they all do, to judge the church. A man ſhall never come to certainty that doth as they do.

Brad. My lords, I ſpeak ſimply what I think, and deſire reaſon to anſwer my objections. Your affections and ſorrows cannot be my rules. If you conſider the order and caſe of my condemnation, I cannot think but that it ſhould ſomething move your honours. You know it well enough (for you heard it), no matter was laid againſt me, but what was gathered upon my own confeſſion. Becauſe I denied tranſubſtantiation, and the wicked to receive Chriſt's body in the ſacrament, therefore I was condemned and excommunicated, but not by the church, although the pillars of the church (as they be taken) did it.

Chich. No, I heard ſay the cauſe of your impriſonment was, for that you exhorted the people to take the ſword in one hand, and the mattock in the other.

Brad. My lord, I never meant any ſuch thing, nor ſpake any thing in that matter.

York. Yea, and you behaved yourſelf before the council ſo ſtoutly at firſt, that you would defend the religion then; and therefore worthily were you impriſoned.

Brad. Your grace heard me anſwer my lord chancellor to that point. But ſuppoſe I had been ſo ſtout as they and your grace make it, were not the laws of the realm then on my ſide? wherefore unjuſtly was I impriſoned; only that which my lord chancellor propounded, was my confeſſion of Chriſt's truth againſt tranſubſtantiation, and of that which the wicked do receive, as I ſaid.

York. You deny the preſence.

Brad. I do not, to the faith of the worthy receivers.

York. Why? what is that to ſay other, than that Chriſt lieth not on the altar?

Brad. My lord, I believe no ſuch preſence.

Chich. It ſeemeth you have not read St. Chryſoſtom: for he proveth it.

Brad. Hitherto I have been kept well enough without books: howbeit this I do remember of Chryſoſtom, that he ſaith that Chriſt lieth upon the altar, as the ſeraphims with their tongs touch our lips with the coals of the altar in heaven; which is an hyperbolical locution, of which you know Chryſoſtom is full.

York. It is evident that you are too far gone: but let us come then to the church, out of which ye are excommunicate.

Brad. I am not excommunicate out of Chriſt's church, my lord, although they which ſeem to be in the church, and of the church, have excommunicated me, as the poor blind man was, John 9. I am ſure Chriſt receiveth me.

Here, after much talk of excommunication, at length Mr. Bradford ſaid, Aſſuredly, as I think you did well to depart from the Romiſh church, ſo I think ye have done wickedly to couple yourſelves to it again; for you can never prove that, which you call the mother church, to be Chriſt's church.

Chich. Ah Mr. Bradford, you were but a child when this matter began. I was a young man, and then coming from the univerſity, I went with the world, but I tell you it was always againſt my conſcience.

Brad. I was but a child then, howbeit as I told you, I think you have done evil. For ye are come, and have brought others to that wicked man which ſitteth in the temple of God, that is, in the church: for it cannot be underſtood of Mahomet, or any out of the church, but of ſuch as bear rule in the church.

York. See how you build your faith upon ſuch places of ſcripture as are moſt obſcure, to deceive yourſelf, as though you were in the church where you are not.

Brad. Well, my lord, though I might by fruits judge of you and others, yet will I not utterly exclude you out of the church. And if I were in your caſe, I would not condemn him utterly that is of my faith in the ſacrament, knowing as you know, that at leaſt 800 years after Chriſt, as my lord of Durham writeth, it was free to believe or not to believe tranſubſtantiation.

York. This is a toy that you have found out of your own brain; as though a man not believing as the church doth, that is, tranſubſtantiation, were of the church.

Chich. He is an heretic, and ſo none of the church, that doth hold any doctrine againſt the definition of the church, as a man to hold againſt tranſubſtantiation. Cyprian was no heretic, though he believed re-baptizing of them who were baptized by heretics, becauſe he held it before the church had defined it, whereby if he had held it after, then had he been an heretic.

Brad. Oh my lord, will ye condemn to the devil any man that believeth truly the 12 articles of the faith (wherein I take the unity of Chriſt's church to conſiſt), although in ſome points he believe not the definition of that which ye call the church? I doubt not but that he which holdeth firmly the articles of our belief, though in other things he diſſent from your definitions, yet he ſhall be ſaved.

York. Chich. Yea, ſaid both the biſhops, this is your divinity.

Brad. No, it is St. Paul's; who ſaith, that if they hold the foundation, Chriſt, though they build upon him ſtraw and ſtubble, yet they ſhall be ſaved.

York. Lord God! how you delight to lean to ſo hard and dark places of the ſcriptures.

Chich. I will ſhew you that Luther did excommunicate Zuinglius for this matter. And ſo he read a place of Luther making for his purpoſe.

Brad. My lord, what Luther writeth, as you mind it not, no more do I in this caſe. My faith is not built on Luther, Zuinglius, or Oecolampadius, in this point: and indeed to tell you truly, I never read any of their works in this matter. As for them, I do think aſſuredly, that they were God's children, and are ſaints with him.

York. Well, you are out of the communion of the church.

Brad. I am not, for it conſiſteth and is in faith.

York. Lo, how you make your church inviſible; for you would have the communion of it conſiſt in faith.

Brad. For to have communion with the church, needeth no viſibleneſs of it; for communion conſiſteth, as I ſaid, in faith, and not in exterior ceremonies, as appeareth both by St. Paul, who would have one faith, and by Irenæus to Victor, for the obſervation of Eaſter, ſaying, that diſagreeing about faſting ſhould not break the agreement of faith.

Chich. The ſame place hath often even wounded my conſcience, becauſe we ſeparated ourſelves from the ſee of Rome.

Brad. Well, God forgive you; for you have done evil in bringing England thither again.

Here my lord of York took a paper-book of common places, and read a piece of St. Auguſtine, how that there were many things that held St. Auguſtine in the boſom of the church; conſent of people and nations, authority confirmed with miracles, nouriſhed with hope, increaſed with charity, eſtabliſhed with antiquity: beſides this, there holdeth me in the church, ſaid St. Auguſtine, the ſucceſſion of prieſts from Peter's ſeat until this preſent biſhop. Laſt of all, the very name of catholic did hold me, &c. Lo (quoth he) how ſay you to this of St. Auguſtine? Paint me out your church thus.

Brad. My lord, these words of St. Augustine make as much for me as for you: although I might answer, that all this, if they had been so firm as you make them, might have been alledged against Christ and his apostles. For there was the law and the ceremonies consented to by the whole people, confirmed with miracles, antiquity, and continual succession of bishops from Aaron's time until that present.

Chich. In good faith, Mr. Bradford, you make too much of the state of the church before Christ's coming.

Brad. Therein I do but as Peter teacheth, 2 Pet. 2. and St. Paul very often. You would gladly have your church here very glorious, like a most pleasant lady. But Christ saith, and so may his church say, "Blessed are they that are not offended at me."

York. Yea, you think that none is of the church, but such as suffer persecution.

Brad. What I think, God knoweth: I pray your grace to judge me by my words, and mark what St. Paul saith, "All that will live godly in Christ Jesus must suffer persecution." Sometimes Christ's church hath rest here; but commonly it is not so, and especially towards the end her form will be more unseemly.

York. But what say you to St. Augustine? where is your church that hath the consent of the people and nations?

Brad. Even all people and nations that be God's people have consented with me, and I with them in the doctrine of faith.

York. Lo, ye go about to shift off all things.

Brad. No, my lord; I mean simply, and God knoweth I so speak.

York. St. Augustine doth here talk of succession, even from St. Peter's seat.

Brad. Yea, that seat then was not so much corrupt as it is now.

York. Well, you always judge the church.

Brad. No, my lord, Christ's sheep discern Christ's voice, but they judge it not: so they discern the church, but judge her not.

York. Yes, that they do.

Brad. No, and it please your grace; and yet full well may one not only doubt, but judge also of the Romish church; for she obeyeth not Christ's voice, as Christ's true church doth.

York. Wherein?

Brad. In Latin service, and robbing the laity of Christ's cup in the sacrament, and in many other things, in which it committeth most horrible sacrilege.

Chich. Why? Latin service was in England when the pope was gone.

Brad. True; the time was in England when the pope was away, but not all popery; as in king Henry's days.

York. Latin service was appointed to be sung and had in the quire, where only were Clerici, that is, such as understood Latin, the people sitting in the body of the church praying their own private prayers; and this may well be yet seen by making of the chancel and quire, so as the people could not come in, or hear them.

Brad. Yea, but in St. Chrysostom's time, and also in the Latin church in St. Jerom's time, all the church, said he, answereth again mightily, Amen. Whereby we may see that the prayers were made so, that both the people heard them and understood them.

Chich. Ye are to blame, to say that the church robbeth the people of the cup.

Brad. Well, my lord, term it as you please: all men know that the laity hath none of it.

Chich. Indeed I wish the church would define again, that they might have it, for my part.

Brad. If God make it free, who can define to make it bond?

York. Well, Mr. Bradford, we lose our labour; for you seek to put away all things which are told you for your good: your church no man can know.

Brad. Yes, that ye well may.

York. I pray you whereby?

Brad. Forsooth Chrysostom saith, only by the scriptures; and this you well know he speaketh very often.

York. Indeed that of Chrysostom is in Opere imperfecto, which may be doubted of. The church is best known by succession of bishops.

Brad. No, my lord, Lyra upon Matthew writeth full well, that "The church consisteth not in men by reason either of secular or temporal power, but in men endued with true knowledge, and confession of faith, and of verity."

And in Hilary's time, you know he writeth to Auxentius, that the church was hidden rather in caves and holes, than did glister and shine in thrones of pre-eminence.

Then came one of the servants and told them, that my lord of Durham tarried for them at the archbishop of York's house; and this was after that they had tarried three hours with Mr. Bradford. And after that their man was come they put up their written books of common places, and said that they lamented his case: they desired him to read over a book which did Dr. Crome good; and so wishing him good in words, they went their way, and poor Bradford to his prison.

After this communication with the bishops was ended, within two days following came into the Compter two Spanish friers to talk with Mr. Bradford, sent (as they said) by the earl of Derby; of whom one was the king's confessor, the other was Alphonsus, who had before written a popish book against heresies: the effect of which their reasoning here likewise followeth.

Upon the 25th day of February, about eight of the clock in the morning, two Spanish friers came to the Compter where Mr. Bradford was prisoner; to whom Bradford was called. Then one frier, who was the king's confessor, asked in Latin (for all their discourse was in Latin), of Bradford, whether he had seen or heard of one Alphonsus that had written against heresies?

Brad. I do not know him.

Confes. Well, this man (pointing to Alphonsus), is he. We are come to you of love and charity, by the means of the earl of Derby, because you desired to confer with us.

Brad. I never desired your coming, nor to confer with you, or any other. But seeing you are come out of charity, as you say, I cannot but thank you: and as concerning conference, though I desire it not, yet I will not refuse to talk with you if you will.

Alphonsus. It were requisite that you did pray to God, that ye might follow the direction of God's Spirit, that he would inspire you, so that ye be not addicted to your own self-will or wit.

Whereupon Mr. Bradford made a prayer, and besought God to direct all their wills, words, and works, as the will, words, and works of his children for ever.

Alph. Yea, you must pray with your heart. For if you speak but with tongue only, God will not give you his grace.

Brad. Sir, do not judge, lest ye be judged. You have heard my words, now charity would have you leave the judgment of the heart to God.

Alph. You must be as it were a Neuter, and not wedded to yourself, but as one standing in doubt: pray and be ready to receive what God shall inspire; for in vain laboureth our tongue to speak else.

Brad. Sir, my sentence, if you mean it for religion, must not be in a doubting or uncertain, as I thank God I am certain in that for which I am condemned; I have no cause to doubt of it, but rather to be more certain of it; and therefore I pray God to confirm me more in it.

For it is his truth, and becauſe it is ſo certain and true that it may abide the light, I dare be bold to have it looked on, and confer it with you, or any man; in reſpect whereof I am both glad of your coming, and thank you for it.

Alph. What is the matter whereof you were condemned? we know not.

Brad. Sir, I have been in priſon almoſt two years: I never tranſgreſſed any of their laws for which I might juſtly be impriſoned; and now I am condemned, only becauſe I frankly confeſſed, whereof I repent not, my faith concerning the ſacrament, when I was demanded in theſe two points; one, that there is no tranſubſtantiation; the other, that the wicked do not receive Chriſt's body.

Alph. Let us look a little on the firſt. Do you not believe that Chriſt is preſent really and corporally in the form of bread?

Brad. No, I do believe that Chriſt is preſent to the faith of the worthy receiver, as there is preſent bread and wine to the ſenſes and outward man: as for any ſuch preſence of including and placing Chriſt, I believe not, nor dare I believe.

Alph. I am ſure you believe Chriſt's natural body is circumſcriptible. And here he made much ado of the two natures of Chriſt, how that the one is every where, and the other is in his proper place, demanding ſuch queſtions as no wiſe man would have ſpent any time about. At length, becauſe the frier had forgot to conclude, Mr. Bradford put him in mind of it, and thus then at length he concluded: How that becauſe Chriſt's body was circumſcriptible, concerning the human nature in heaven, therefore it was ſo in the bread.

Brad. How hangeth this together? Even as if you ſhould ſay; becauſe you are here, Ergo, it muſt needs follow that you are at Rome. For thus you reaſon; becauſe Chriſt's body is in heaven: Ergo, it is in the ſacrament under the form of bread: which no wiſe man will grant.

Alph. Why? will you believe nothing but that which is expreſly ſpoken in the ſcriptures?

Brad. Yes, Sir, I will believe whatſoever you ſhall by demonſtration out of the ſcriptures declare unto me.

He is obſtinate, quoth Alphonſus to his fellow: and then turning to Bradford, ſaid, Is not God able to do it?

Brad. Yes; but here the queſtion is of God's will, and not of his power.

Alph. Why? doth he not ſay plainly, This is my body?

Brad. Yes, and I deny not but that it is ſo, to the faith of the worthy receiver.

Alph. To the faith; how is that?

Brad. Forſooth, Sir, as I have no tongue to expreſs it: ſo I know ye have no ears to hear and underſtand it. For faith is more than man can utter.

Alph. But I can tell all that I believe.

Brad. You believe not much then. For if you believe the joys of heaven, and believe no more thereof than you can tell, you will not yet deſire to come thither. For as the mind is more capable and receivable than the mouth, ſo it conceiveth more than tongue can expreſs.

Alph. Chriſt ſaith it is his body.

Brad. And ſo ſay I, after a certain manner.

Alph. After a certain manner; that is, after another manner that it is in heaven.

Brad. St. Auguſtine telleth it more plainly, that it is Chriſt's body after the ſame manner as circumciſion was the covenant of God, and the ſacrament of faith is faith; or, to make it more plain, as baptiſm and the water of baptiſm is regeneration.

Alph. Very well ſaid, baptiſm, and the water thereof, is a ſacrament of God's grace and Spirit in the water cleanſing the baptized.

Brad. No, Sir, away with your incloſing: but this I grant, that after the ſame ſort Chriſt's body is in the bread, on which ſort the grace and Spirit of God is in the water.

Alph. God's grace is in water by ſignification.

Brad. So is the body in the bread in the ſacrament.

Alph. You are much deceived, in that you make no difference between the ſacraments that be ſtanders, and the ſacraments that are tranſitory and paſſers by. As for example, the ſacrament of orders, which you deny, tho' St. Auguſtine affirmeth it, it is a ſtander, although the ceremony be paſt. But in baptiſm, ſo ſoon as the body is waſhed, the water ceaſeth to be a ſacrament.

Brad. Very good, and ſo it is in the ſupper of the Lord; no longer than it is in uſe, is it Chriſt's ſacrament.

Here the frier was in a wonderful rage, and ſpake ſo loud (as he had often done before), that the whole houſe rang again. This frier had the character of being a very learned man, but ſurely by his behaviour here he had very little patience, for if Bradford had been any thing hot, one houſe could not have held them. At length they came to this point, That Bradford could not find in ſcripture that baptiſm and the Lord's ſupper bare any ſimilitude together. And here he triumphed before the conqueſt, ſaying, that theſe men would have nothing but ſcripture, and yet are able to prove nothing by the ſcripture.

Brad. Be patient, and you ſhall ſee that by the ſcripture I will find baptiſm and the Lord's ſupper coupled together.

Alph. No, that thou canſt never do. Let me ſee a text of it.

Brad. St. Paul ſaith, "That as we are baptized into one body, ſo were we Potati in uno ſpiritu, i. e. we have drank of one Spirit," meaning the cup in the Lord's ſupper.

Alph. St. Paul hath no ſuch words.

Brad. Yes, that he hath.

Confef. I think he hath not.

Brad. Give me a Teſtament, and I will ſhew you.

So a prieſt that ſate by them gave him his Teſtament, and he ſhewed them the plain text. Then they looked one upon another. In fine, the frier found this ſimple ſhift, that St. Paul ſpake not of the ſacrament.

Brad. Well, the text is plain enough, and there are many of the fathers which do ſo underſtand the place: for Chryſoſtom doth expound it ſo.

Alphonſus which had the Teſtament in his hand, deſirous to ſuppreſs this foil, turned the leaves of the book from leaf to leaf, till he came to the place, 1 Cor. 11. and there he read how that he was guilty, which made no difference of the Lord's body.

Brad. Yea, but therewith he ſaith, "He that eateth of the bread:" calling it bread ſtill: and that after conſecration (as ye call it) as in the tenth of the Corinthians he ſaith; "The bread which we break, &c."

Alph. Oh how ignorant are ye, who know not that things after converſion do retain the ſame names which they had before, as Moſes's rod: and calling for a Bible, after he had found the place, he began to triumph: but Bradford cooled him quickly, ſaying;

Sir, There is mention made of the converſion, as well as that the ſame appeared to the ſenſe. But here ye cannot find it ſo. Find me one word how the bread is converted, and I will then ſay, ye bring ſome matter that maketh for you.

At theſe words Alphonſus was troubled, and at length he ſaid, That Bradford hanged on his own ſenſe.

Brad. No, that I do not; for I will bring you the fathers of the church eight hundred years after Chriſt, to confirm what I ſpeak.

Alph. No, you have the church againſt you.

Brad. I have not Chriſt's church againſt me.

Alph. Yes that you have. What is the church?

Brad. Chriſt's wife, the chair and ſeat of truth.

Alph

Alph. Is ſhe viſible?

Brad. Yea, that ſhe is to them that will put on the ſpectacles of God's word to look on her.

Alph. This church hath defined the contrary, and that I will prove by all the good fathers from Chriſt's aſcenſion, even for 800 years at leaſt continually.

Brad. What will you ſo prove? Tranſubſtantiation?

Alph. Yea, that the bread is turned into Chriſt's body.

Brad. You ſpeak more than you can do.

Alph. That do I not.

Brad. Then will I give place.

Alph. Will you believe?

Brad. Belief is God's gift; therefore I cannot promiſe: but I tell you that I will give place; and I hope I ſhall believe his truth always, ſo good is he to me in Chriſt my Saviour.

Here the frier found a great fault with Bradford, that he made no difference betwixt Habitus and Actus; as though Actus, which he called credulity, had been in our power. But this he let paſs, and came again, aſking Bradford, if he could prove it as he ſaid, whether he would give place?

Brad. Yea, that I will. Then called he for paper, pen, and ink, to write; and then ſaid I, Suppoſe that I prove by the teſtimony of the fathers, that continually for 800 years after Chriſt, at leaſt, they did believe that the ſubſtance of bread doth remain in the ſacrament; what will ye do?

Alph. I will give place.

Brad. Then write you here that you will give place if I ſo prove, and I will write that I will give place if you ſo prove: becauſe ye are the ancient, ye ſhall have the pre-eminency.

Here the frier fumed marvelloufly, and ſaid; I came not to learn from thee; are not here witneſſes? (meaning the prieſts) be not they ſufficient? But the man was ſo angry, that if Mr. Bradford had not paſſed over this matter of writing, the frier would have gone to plain ſcolding.

At length the king's confeſſor aſked Bradford what the ſecond queſtion was?

Brad. That wicked men receive not Chriſt's body in the ſacrament, as St. Auguſtine ſpeaketh of Judas, that he received Panem Domini, but not Panem Dominum.

Alph. St. Auguſtine ſaith not ſo.

Brad. Yes, that doth he. So they aroſe and talked no more of the matter. Thus went they away, without bidding Bradford farewel.

After they were gone, one of the prieſts came, and deſired Bradford not to be ſo obſtinate.

Brad. Sir, be not you ſo wavering; in all the ſcriptures cannot you find me, Non eſt Panis.

Prieſt. Yes, that I can in five places.

Brad. Then I will eat your book. So the book was opened, but no place found; and he went his way ſmiling. God help us.

It followed after this, upon the twenty firſt of March, that by means of one of the earl of Derby's men, there came to the Compter to dinner one Mr. Collier, once warden of Mancheſter, and the ſaid ſervant of the earl of Derby, of whom Mr. Bradford learned, that Dr. Weſton dean of Weſtminſter would be with him in the afternoon about two of the clock. At dinner time, when the ſaid warden diſcommended king Edward, and went about to ſet forth the authority of the pope, which Bradford withſtood, defending the king's faith, that it was catholic, and that the authority of the biſhop of Rome's ſupremacy was uſurped, bringing forth the teſtimony of Gregory, which affirmeth the name of ſupreme head, to be a title of the forerunner to Antichriſt; a woman priſoner was brought in, whereupon the ſaid Bradford took occaſion to riſe from the table, and ſo went to his priſon chamber to pray to God for his grace and aſſiſtance therein, continuing there till he was called down to ſpeak with Dr. Weſton, who was then come in.

Mr. Bradford then being called down, ſo ſoon as he was entered into the hall, Dr. Weſton very gently took him by the hand, and aſked how he did, with ſuch other talk. At length he deſired them to go out of the chamber: ſo they all went out, ſave Dr. Weſton himſelf, Mr. Collier, the earl of Derby's ſervant, the ſubdean of Weſtminſter, the keeper, Mr. Clayden, and the parſon of the church near the Compter.

Now when he began with Mr. Bradford, to tell how that he was often minded to have come unto him, being deſired by the earl of Derby; and (quoth he) after I perceived by this man, that you could be contented rather to ſpeak with me, than any other; I could not but come to do you all the good I can: for you may be ſure I will never hurt you.

Sir, quoth Mr. Bradford, when I perceived by the report of my lord's ſervant, that you did bear me good will: more (as he ſaid) than any other of your ſort, I told him then, that I could be better content and more willing to talk with you, if you ſhould come unto me. This did I ſay, quoth he, otherwiſe I deſired not your coming.

Weſt. Well, quoth he, now I am come to talk with you: but before we ſhall enter into any talk, certain principles we muſt agree upon, which ſhall be this day's work.

Firſt, quoth he, I ſhall deſire you to put away all vain-glory, and not hold any thing for the praiſe of the world.

Brad. Sir, St. Auguſtine maketh that indeed a piece of the definition of an heretic; which if I cannot put away clean (for I think there will a ſpice of it remain in us, as long as this fleſh liveth), yet I promiſe you by the grace of God, that I purpoſe not to yield to it. God I hope will never ſuffer it to bear rule in them that ſtrive againſt it, and deſire all the dregs of it utterly to be driven out of us.

Weſt. I am glad to hear you ſay ſo, although indeed I think you do not ſo much eſteem it as others do.

Secondly, I would deſire you that you will put away ſingularity in your judgment and opinions.

Brad. Sir, God forbid that I ſhould ſtick to my ſingularity or private judgment in God's religion. Hitherto I have not deſired it, neither do, nor mind at any time to hold any other doctrine than is public and catholic, underſtanding catholic as good men do, according to God's word.

Weſt. Very well, this is a good day's work, I hope to do you good: and therefore now, thirdly, I ſhall pray you to write me the heads of thoſe things whereupon you ſtand in the ſacrament, and to ſend them to me betwixt this and Wedneſday next: until which time, yea, until I come to you again, be aſſured that you are without all peril of death. Of my fidelity, I warrant you, therefore away with all dubitations, &c.

Brad. Sir, I will write to you the grounds I lean to in this matter. As for death, if it come, welcome be it; this which you require of me, ſhall be no great hindrance to me therein.

Weſt. You know that St. Auguſtine was a Manichean, yet was he converted at length; ſo have I good hope of you.

Brad. Sir, becauſe I will not flatter you, I would you ſhould flatly know, that I am even ſettled in that religion for which I am condemned.

Weſt. Yea, but if it be not the truth, and you ſee evident matter to the contrary, will you not then give place?

Brad. God forbid, but that I ſhould always give place to the truth.

Weſt. I would have you ſo to pray.

Brad. So I do, and that he will more and more confirm me in it, as I thank God he hath done and doth.

Weſt. Yea, but pray with a condition, if you be in it.

Brad. No, Sir, I cannot pray ſo, becauſe I am ſettled and aſſured of his truth.

Well, quoth Weſton, as the learned biſhop anſwered St. Auguſtine's mother, that though he was obſtinate, yet the tears of ſuch a mother could not but win her ſon: ſo, quoth he, I hope your prayers (for then Bradford's eyes did ſhew that he had wept in prayer) cannot but be heard by God, though not as you would, yet as beſt ſhall pleaſe him. Do ye not, quoth he, remember the hiſtory thereof?

Yea, Sir, quoth Bradford, I think it be of St. Ambroſe.

Weſt. No, that it is not. And here Weſton would have laid a wager, and began to triumph, ſaying to Bradford; As you are overſeen herein, ſo are you in other things.

Brad. Well, Sir, I will not contend with you for the name. This (I remember) St. Auguſtine writeth in his confeſſions.

After this talk, Dr. Weſton began to tell Mr. Bradford, that the people were perſuaded by him to withſtand the queen.

Whereunto Bradford anſwering again, bade him hang him up as a traitor and a thief, if ever he encouraged any to rebellion: his keeper and the prieſts that were there affirmed the ſame. At that time there was much talk to little purpoſe. Dr. Weſton declared moreover how he had ſaved men going in the cart to be hanged, and ſuch like.

The end was this, that Bradford ſhould ſend unto him the heads of the doctrine of the ſupper, and after Wedneſday he would come unto him again; and thus he departed, after he had drank to him in beer and wine. I omit here talk of Oxford, of books of Germany writers, of the fear of death, and ſuch other talk, which are to no purpoſe.

In the mean time, when Mr. Bradford had written his reaſons and arguments, and had ſent them to Dr. Weſton, ſoon after, about the 28th of March, there came to the Compter Dr. Pendleton, and with him the aforeſaid Mr. Collier, ſometime warden of Mancheſter, and Stephen Bech. After ſalutations, Dr. Pendleton began to ſpeak to Mr. Bradford, that he was ſorry for his trouble. And further, ſaid he, after that I knew you could be content to talk with me, I made the more ſpeed, being as ready to do you good, and pleaſure you what I can, as ye would wiſh.

Brad. Sir, the manner how I was content to ſpeak with you was on this ſort: Mr. Bech often aſked me whom he could bring unto me, and named you amongſt others: and I ſaid, that I had rather ſpeak with you than with any other. Now the cauſe why I ſo would, I will briefly tell you. I remember that once you were (as far as a man might judge) of the religion that I am of at this preſent, and I remember that you have earneſtly ſet forth the ſame. Gladly therefore would I learn of you what thing it was that moved your conſcience to alter; and gladly would I ſee what thing it is that you have ſeen ſince which you ſaw not before.

Pendleton. I do not know for what you are condemned.

Brad. Tranſubſtantiation is the cauſe for which I am condemned, and becauſe I deny that wicked men do receive Chriſt's body: wherein I would deſire you to ſhew me what reaſons, which before you knew not, did move your conſcience now to alter. For once (as I ſaid) you were as I am in religion.

Here Mr. Pendleton, half amazed, began to excuſe himſelf, as though he had not fully denied tranſubſtantiation indeed, although I ſaid, quoth he, that the word was not in ſcripture; and ſo he made an endleſs tale of the thing that moved him to alter: but (ſaid he) I will gather to you the places which moved me, and ſend you them. And here he deſired Mr. Bradford that he might have a copy of that which he had ſent to Dr. Weſton; which Mr. Bradford promiſed him.

Some reaſoning alſo they had, whether evil men did receive Chriſt's body, Bradford denying, and Pendleton affirming. Bradford ſaid, that they received not the Spirit: Ergo, not the body: for it is no dead carcaſe. Hereto Bradford brought alſo St. Auguſtine, how Judas received Panem Domini, and not Panem Dominum, and that he muſt be in Chriſt's body which muſt receive the body of Chriſt. But Pendleton went about to put it away with Idem, and not Ad idem, and how that In Corpore Chriſti was to be underſtood of all that be in the viſible church with God's elect. Bradford denied this to be St. Auguſtine's meaning, and ſaid alſo that the allegation of Idem, and not Ad idem, could not make for that purpoſe. They talked more of tranſubſtantiation, Pendleton bringing forth Cyprian, Panis natura mutatur, &c. And Bradford ſaid, that in that place Natura did not ſignify Subſtance. As the nature of an herb is not the ſubſtance of it; ſo the bread changed in nature is not to be taken for changed in ſubſtance; for now it is ordained not for the food of the body ſimply, but rather for the ſoul. Here alſo Bradford alledged the ſentence of Gelaſius. Pendleton ſaid, that he was a pope. Yea, ſaid Bradford, but his faith is my faith in the ſacrament, if ye would receive it.

They reaſoned alſo whether Accidentia were Res, or no. If they be properly Res, ſaid Bradford, then are they ſubſtances; and if they be ſubſtances, they are earthly, and then there are earthly ſubſtances in the ſacrament, as Irenæus ſaith, which muſt needs be bread. But Pendleton ſaid, that the colour was the earthly thing, and called it an accidental ſubſtance.

I omit the talk they had of my lord of Canterbury, of Peter Martyr's Book, of Pendleton's letter laid to Bradford's charge when he was condemned, with other talk about the church; whether Dic Eccleſiæ was ſpoken of the univerſal church, or of a particular church (at length Mr. Pendleton granted that it was ſpoken of a particular church); alſo of vain-glory, which he deſired Bradford to beware of, and ſuch-like talk. A little before his departing, Mr. Bradford ſaid thus; Maſter Doctor, as I ſaid to Dr. Weſton before, ſo ſay I to you now, that I am the ſame man in religion againſt tranſubſtantiation ſtill, as I was when I came into priſon; for hitherto I have ſeen nothing in any one point to convince me of the contrary. At which words Mr. Pendleton was ſomething moved, and ſaid that it was no catholic doctrine. Yes, quoth Mr. Bradford, and that I will prove even by the teſtimony of the catholic fathers until the council of Lateran, or thereabout. Then Pendleton went his way, ſaying that he would often come to Mr. Bradford.

God our Father be with us all, and give us the Spirit of his truth for ever. Amen.

The ſame day in the afternoon, about five of the clock, Dr. Weſton came to Bradford, and after gentle ſalutations, he deſired the company every man to depart, and ſo they two ſat down. And after he had thanked Bradford for his writing to him, he pulled out of his boſom the ſame writing which Bradford had ſent him. The writing is this that followeth.

Certain Reaſons againſt Tranſubſtantiation, gathered by John Bradford, and given to Dr. Weſton and others.

THAT which is former (ſaith Tertullian) is true; that which is latter, is falſe. But the doctrine of tranſubſtantiation is a late doctrine: for it was not defined generally before the council of Lateran, about 1215 years after Chriſt's coming, under pope Innocent III. of that name. For before that time it was free for all men to believe it, as the biſhop of Durham doth witneſs in his book of the preſence of Chriſt in his ſupper, lately put forth: Ergo, The doctrine of tranſubſtantiation is falſe.

2 That the words of Chriſt's ſupper be figurative, the circumſtances of the ſcripture, the analogy or proportion of the ſacraments, and the ſentences of all the holy fathers which were wrote for the ſpace of one thouſand years after Chriſt's aſcenſion, do teach: whereupon it followeth, that there was no tranſubſtantiation.

3. That the Lord gave to his diſciples bread, and called it his body, the ſcriptures do witneſs. For he gave that, and called it his body, which he took in his hand, whereupon he gave thanks, which alſo he brake, and gave to his diſciples, that is to ſay, bread, as the fathers Irenæus, Tertullian, Origen, Cyprian, Epiphanius, Auguſtine, and all the reſidue which are of antiquity, do affirm: but inaſmuch as the ſubſtance of bread and wine is another thing than the ſubſtance of the body and blood of Chriſt, it plainly appeareth that there is no tranſubſtantiation.

4. The bread is no more tranſubſtantiate than the wine: but that the wine is not tranſubſtantiate, St. Matthew and St. Mark do teach us: for they witneſs, that Chriſt ſaid that he would drink no more of the fruit of the vine, which was not blood, but wine: and therefore it followeth, that there is no tranſubſtantiation. Chryſoſtom upon St. Matthew, and Cyprian, do affirm this reaſon.

5. As the bread in the Lord's ſupper is Chriſt's natural body, ſo it is his myſtical body: for the ſame ſpirit that ſpake of it, This is my body, did ſay alſo, For we many are but one bread, one body, &c. but now it is not the myſtical body by tranſubſtantiation, and therefore it is not his natural body by tranſubſtantiation.

6. The words ſpoken over the cup in St. Luke and St. Paul, are not ſo mighty and effectual, as to tranſubſtantiate it: for then the cup, or that which is in it, ſhould be tranſubſtantiated into the New Teſtament: therefore the words ſpoken over the bread, are not ſo mighty as to make tranſubſtantiation.

7. All that doctrine which agreeth with thoſe churches which be apoſtolical mother churches, or original churches, is to be counted for truth, in that it holdeth that which theſe churches received of the apoſtles, the apoſtles of Chriſt, Chriſt of God. But it is manifeſt, that the doctrine taught at this preſent by the church of Rome, concerning tranſubſtantiation, doth not agree with the apoſtolical and mother churches in Greece, of Corinthus, of Philippos, Coloſſia, Theſſalonica, and Epheſus, which never taught tranſubſtantiation; yea, it agreeth not with the doctrine of the church of Rome, as it was taught in times paſt. For Gelaſius the pope, ſetting forth the doctrine which that ſee then held, doth manifeſtly confute the error of tranſubſtantiation, and reproveth them for ſacrilege, who divided the myſtery, and kept the cup from the laity: therefore the doctrine of tranſubſtantiation agreeth not with the truth.

This was the writing which Weſton pulled out of his boſom; and yet before he began to read it, he told Mr. Bradford that he had enquired of his converſation at Cambridge ſince his laſt being with him; and, ſaid he, becauſe you are a man not given to the glory of the world, I will ſpeak it before your face. Your life I have learned was always ſuch there, as all men, even the greateſt enemies you have, cannot but praiſe it, and therefore I love you much better than ever I did: but now I will read over your arguments, and ſo we will confer them. They are ſuch that a man may well perceive you ſtand on conſcience, and therefore I am the more ready and glad to pity you. So he began to read the firſt; to which he ſaid, that tho' the word tranſubſtantiation began but lately, yet the thing always was, and hath been ſince Chriſt's inſtitution.

Brad. I do not contend, or inſiſt upon the word only, but upon the thing, which is as new as the word.

Then Dr. Weſton went to the ſecond, and there brought out St. Auguſtine, how that if any evil man going to the devil, did make his will, his ſon and heir would not ſay his father did lye in it, or ſpeak tropically: much more Chriſt, going to God, did never lye, or uſe any figurative ſpeech in his laſt will and teſtament. Do you not remember this place of St. Auguſtine? ſaid he.

Brad. Yea, Sir, but I do not remember that St. Auguſtine has thoſe words tropically, or figuratively, as you rehearſe them: for any man may ſpeak a thing figuratively, and not lye: and ſo Chriſt did in his laſt ſupper.

After this Dr. Weſton went to the third, and brought forth Cyprian, how that the nature of bread is turned into fleſh. Here, ſaith he, my lord of Canterbury expoundeth Nature for Quality, by Gelaſius. Which interpretation ſerveth for the anſwer of your argument, that Chriſt called bread his body: that is, the quality, form, and appearance of bread. And further, the ſcripture is wont to call things by the ſame names which they had before, as Simon the leper; he was not ſo at that time, but becauſe he had been ſo.

Brad. Cyprian wrote before Gelaſius: therefore Cyprian muſt not expound Gelaſius, but Gelaſius Cyprian: and ſo they both teach, that bread remaineth ſtill. As for things having ſtill the names they had, is no anſwer, except you could ſhew that this now were not bread, as eaſily as a man might have known and ſeen then Simon to have been healed and clear from his leproſy.

After this Dr. Weſton went to the fourth, of the cup, which he did not fully read, but digreſſed into a long talk of Cyprian's epiſtle De Aquatiis: alſo of St. Auguſtine, expounding the breaking of the bread by Chriſt to his two diſciples going to Emmaus, to be the ſacrament; with ſuch other talk to no certain purpoſe: and therefore Mr. Bradford prayed him, that inaſmuch as he had written the reaſons that eſtabliſhed his faith againſt tranſubſtantiation, ſo he would likewiſe do to him, that is, anſwer him by writing, and ſhew him more reaſons in writing to confirm tranſubſtantiation. Which Dr. Weſton promiſed to do, and ſaid that he would ſend or bring it to Mr. Bradford again within three days.

Thus when he had read over the arguments, and here and there ſpoke little to the purpoſe for the avoiding of them, and Bradford had prayed him to give him his anſwers in writing: then he began to tell Mr. Bradford how and what he had done for Mr. Grimoald, and that Bradford needed not to fear any reproach or ſlander he ſhould ſuffer, meaning belike to have Bradford ſecretly to come to them as Grimoald did: for he ſubſcribed.

Brad. Mr. Dean, I would not have you conceive that I mind the ſhame of men in this matter: I would rather have you think as the very truth is, that hitherto as I have not heard or ſeen any thing to weaken my faith againſt tranſubſtantiation, ſo I am no leſs ſettled in it than I was at my firſt coming hither. I love to be plain with you, and to tell you at firſt as you ſhall find at the laſt.

Weſt. In good faith, Mr. Bradford, I love you the better for your plainneſs; and do not think otherwiſe of me, but that you ſhall find me plain in all my talk with you.

Here Weſton began to aſk Bradford of his impriſonment and condemnation; and Bradford told him altogether how he had been handled. Whereat Weſton ſeemed to wonder. yea, in plain words he ſaid, that Bradford had been handled otherwiſe than he had given cauſe; and ſo ſhewed him, that my lord of Bath reported that he had deſerved a benefit at the queen's hand, and at all the council's.

In this kind of talk they ſpent almoſt an hour, and Mr. Bradford, being weary, roſe up, and Weſton called the keeper, and before him he bade Bradford be of good comfort, and told him he was in no danger of death.

Sir, quoth the keeper, but it is in every man's mouth, that he ſhall die to-morrow.

Whereat Weſton ſeemed half amazed, and ſaid, he would go ſay even-ſong before the queen, and ſpeak to her in his behalf. But it is to be thought that the queen had had almoſt ſupped at that preſent: for it was paſt ſix of the clock.

Before the keeper, Bradford told Weſton again, that ſtill he was one man, and even as he was at the firſt; and till he ſhould ſee matter to teach his conſcience the contrary, he ſaid he muſt needs ſo continue.

The keeper deſired Bradford to hearken to Mr. Doctor's counſel, and prayed Mr. Doctor to be good unto him: and ſo after they had drank together, Mr. Doctor with moſt gentle words took his leave for three days.

Now when he was gone, the keeper told Bradford, that Mr. Doctor ſpake openly, that he ſaw no cauſe why they ſhould burn him. Which ſentence, for the ambiguity of the meaning, made him ſomewhat ſorry, leſt he had behaved himſelf in any thing, wherein he had gathered any conformableneſs to them in their doctrine, which God knoweth, ſaid Bradford, I never as yet did. God our Father bleſs us, and his children, and keep us from all evil for ever. Amen.

Upon the 5th day of April Dr. Weſton came to the Compter about two of the clock in the afternoon, who excuſed himſelf for being ſo long abſent; partly by ſickneſs, partly for that Dr. Pendleton told him that he would come unto him; and partly for that, ſaid he, I withſtood certain monks which would have come again into Weſtminſter; telling him moreover, that the pope was dead, and alſo declared unto him, that he had ſpoken to the queen in his behalf, and that death was not near to him. Laſt of all he excuſed himſelf for not anſwering his arguments againſt tranſubſtantiation; becauſe my coming to-day, ſaid he, was more by fortune, than of purpoſe.

Brad. I would gladly, Mr. Doctor, if it pleaſe you, ſee your anſwers to my arguments.

Weſt. Why? you have remembered ſomething that I ſpake to you, when I was laſt with you.

Brad. No, Sir, I never called them in manner to mind, ſince that time, as well becauſe I hoped you would have written them, as alſo for that they ſeemed not to be ſo material.

Weſt. In good faith I cannot ſee any other or better way for you, than to ſubmit yourſelf to the judgment of the church.

Brad. Marry ſo will I, Sir, if ſo be by the church you underſtand Chriſt's church.

Weſt. Lo, you take upon you to judge the church.

Brad. No, Sir, that do I not; in taking upon me to diſcern, I do not judge the church.

Weſt. Yea, that you do; and make it inviſible.

Brad. I do neither.

Weſt. Why, who can ſee your church?

Brad. Thoſe Sir, that have ſpiritual eyes, wherewith they might have diſcerned Chriſt's viſible converſation here upon earth.

Weſt. Nay, Chriſt's church hath three tokens, that all men may look upon: namely, unity, antiquity, and conſent.

Brad. Theſe three may be as well in evil as in good, as well in virtue as in vice, as well in the devil's church, as in God's church. As for an example, idolatry amongſt the Iſraelites had all thoſe three. Chryſoſtom telleth plainly, as you well know, that the church is well known only by the ſcriptures.

Weſt. In good faith, you make your church inviſible, when you would have it known only by the ſcriptures.

Brad. No, Sir, the ſcriptures do plainly ſet forth to us the church, that all men may well enough know her thereby, if they pleaſe to look.

Weſt. The church is like a tower or town, that all men may ſee.

Brad. True, Sir, all men that be not blind. Viſible enough is the church, but men's blindneſs is great. Impute not therefore to the church, that which is to be imputed to men's blindneſs.

Weſt. Where was your church 40 years ago? Or where is it now, except in a corner of Germany?

Brad. Forſooth, Sir, the church of God is diſperſed, and not tied to this or that place, but to the word of God: ſo that where it is, there is God's church, if it be truly taught.

Weſt. Lo, is not this to make the church inviſible? point me out a realm 100 years paſt, which maintained your doctrine.

Brad. Sir, if you will, or would well mark the ſtate of the church before Chriſt's coming, with it now (as St. Peter and Paul willeth us), I think you would not look for ſuch ſhews of the church to be made, as to point it by realms. You know that in Elijah's time, both in Iſrael and elſewhere, God's church was not pointable; and therefore he cried out that he was left alone.

Weſt. No marry, did not God ſay, that there were 7000 which had not bowed their knees to Baal? Lo then 7000, ſhew me 7000 a hundred years ago of your religion?

Brad. Sir, Theſe 7000 were not known to men: for then Elijah would not have ſaid, that he had been left alone. And this is plain enough by the text, namely, that God ſaith "I have reſerved to me ſeven thouſand." Mark that it ſaith, God hath reſerved to himſelf, to his own knowledge; as I doubt not but 100 years ago God had his 7000 in his proper places, tho' men knew not thereof.

Weſt. Well, Mr. Bradford, I will not make your caſe worſe, than for tranſubſtantiation: altho' I know that we agree not in other matters. And I pray you make it not worſe yourſelf. If I can do you good, I will: hurt you I will not. I am no prince, and therefore I cannot promiſe you life, except you will ſubmit yourſelf to the definition of the church.

Brad. Sir, If you will define your church, and bring no falſe church into that definition, you ſhall ſoon ſee that I will be at a point with you.

Weſt. In good faith, Mr. Bradford, I ſee no good will be done; and therefore I wiſh you as much good as I can; and perhaps I may come or ſend to you again: and ſo he departed, and went for Mr. Weal.

After his departure, the keeper, Mr. Claydon, and Stephen Bech, came to Mr. Bradford, and ſpake to him in ſuch a manner as if they had been his utter enemies, notwithſtanding the friendſhip they hitherto pretended. If God be with us, it matters not who is againſt us.

Divers came to Mr. Bradford in priſon, ſome to diſpute, ſome to confer, ſome to give counſel, ſome to take comfort, and be confirmed in their faith, and others came to viſit him. There was a certain gentlewoman's ſervant, which gentlewoman had been cruelly afflicted, and miſerably handled by her father and mother, and all her kindred in her father's houſe, for not coming to maſs, and ſhe had been put to death, had not the providence of God delivered her from her father's houſe, altho' at the loſs of all ſhe had.

This gentlewoman's ſervant therefore coming to Mr. Bradford, and taking him by the hand, ſaid, God be thanked for you. How do you?

Mr. Bradford anſwered, Well, I thank God. For as men in ſailing, which be near to the ſhore or haven where they would be, would be nearer; even ſo the nearer I am to God, the nearer I would be.

Serv. Sir, I have never ſeen you ſo ſtrong and healthful in body, as methink you be now, God be thanked for it.

Why, ſaid Bradford, I have given over all care and ſtudy, and only do I covet to be talking with him, whom I have always ſtudied to be withal.

Serv. Well, God hath done much for you ſince the time that I firſt knew you, and hath wrought wonderouſly in you to his glory.

Brad. Truth it is, for he hath dealt favourably with me, in that he hath not puniſhed me according to my ſins, but hath ſuffered me to live, that I might ſeek repentance.

Serv. Truly, we hear ſay, there is a rod made ſo grievous, out of which I think no man ſhall pluck his head.

Brad. Well, let all that be of Chriſt's flock, arm themſelves to ſuffer: for I think verily, God will not have one of his to eſcape untouched, if he love him, let them ſeek what means or ways they can.

Serv. Well, Sir, there is a diſcourſe of a frier that preached before the king, who told him, that he ſhould be guilty of the innocent blood that hath been ſhed of late.

Verily, quoth Bradford, I had a book within theſe two days of his writing, and therein he ſaith, that it is not meet nor convenient that the heretics ſhould live: and therefore I do marvel how that talk ſhould ariſe: for I have heard of it alſo; and I have alſo talked with this frier (he is named frier Fonſo) and with divers others, and I praiſe God they have confirmed me: for they have nothing to ſay but that which is moſt vain.

Ser. Sir, father Cardmaker commendeth himſelf unto you.

Brad. How doth he? how doth he?

Serv. Well, God be thanked.

Brad. I am very glad thereof: for indeed my lord chancellor did caſt him in my teeth: but, as David ſaith, God hath diſappointed him.

Serv. Forſooth, God's name be praiſed, he is very ſtrong.

Brad. And I truſt, ſo are we. What elſe? our quarrel is moſt juſt: therefore let us not be afraid.

Serv. My miſtreſs commendeth herſelf unto you.

Brad. How doth ſhe?

Serv. Well, God be praiſed; but ſhe hath been ſorer afflicted with her own father and mother, than ever you were with your impriſonment; and yet God hath preſerved her, I truſt, to his glory.

Brad. I pray you tell her, I read this day a godly hiſtory, written by Baſilius Magnus, of a virtuous woman which was a widow, and was named Juleddo. She had great lands and many children, and nigh her dwelled a cormorant, who, for her virtue and pious living, had great indignation againſt her, and of very malice he took away her lands, ſo that ſhe was conſtrained to go to law with him: and in concluſion, the matter came to a trial before the judge, who demanded of this tyrant why he wrongfully with-held theſe lands from this woman? He made anſwer and ſaid, he might ſo do: for (ſaid he) this woman is diſobedient to the king's proceedings; for ſhe will in no wiſe worſhip his gods, nor offer ſacrifice unto them. Then the judge hearing that, ſaid unto her, Woman, if this be true, thou art not only like to loſe thy land, but alſo thy life, unleſs that thou worſhip our gods, and do ſacrifice unto them. This good woman hearing that, ſtept forth to the judge, and ſaid, Is there no remedy but either to worſhip your falſe gods, or elſe to loſe my lands and life? Then farewel ſuit, farewel lands, farewel children, farewel friends, yea, and farewel life too: and in reſpect of the true honour of the everliving God, farewel all. And with that ſaying the judge committed her to priſon, and afterward ſhe ſuffered moſt cruel death: and being brought to the place of execution, ſhe exhorted all women to be ſtrong and conſtant. For, ſaith ſhe, ye were redeemed with as dear a price as men. For altho' ye were made of the rib of the man, yet be you all of his fleſh: ſo that alſo, in the caſe and trial of your faith towards God, ye ought to be as ſtrong. And thus died ſhe conſtantly, not fearing death. I pray you tell your miſtreſs of this hiſtory.

Serv. That I ſhall, Sir, by God's grace: for ſhe told me that ſhe was with you and Mr. Saunders, and received your gentle counſel.

Brad. We never gave her other counſel but the truth, and in witneſs thereof, we have and will ſeal it with our blood. For I thought this night that I had been ſent for, becauſe at eleven of the clock there was ſuch rapping at the door.

Then anſwered a maid, and ſaid, Why then I perceive you were afraid.

Brad. Ye ſhall hear how fearful I was. For I conſidered that I had not ſlept, and I thought to take a nap before I went: and after I was aſleep, theſe men came into the next chamber, and ſang, as it was told me, and yet for all my fearfulneſs, I heard them not: therefore belike I was not afraid that ſlept ſo faſt.

Serv. Do you lack any thing towards your neceſſity?

Brad. Nothing but your prayers, and I truſt I have them, and you mine.

Serv. I ſaw a prieſt come to you to-day in the morning.

Brad. Yea, he brought me a letter from a frier, and I am writing an anſwer.

Serv. Then we hinder you, therefore the living God be with you.

Brad. And with you alſo, and bleſs you.

Serv. Amen, ſaid he, and gave him thanks and departed.

Mr. Bradford continued ſtill in priſon, until the month of July, in ſuch labours and ſufferings as he always before had ſuſtained in priſon: but when the time of his determined death was come, he was ſuddenly conveyed out of the Compter where he was priſoner, in the night ſeaſon to Newgate, as is declared before (p. 204), and from thence he was carried the next morning to Smithfield, where he conſtantly abiding in the ſame truth of God, which before he had confeſſed, earneſtly exhorting the people to repent, and to return to Chriſt, and ſweetly comforting the pious young man of 19 or 20 years of age, who ſuffered with him, chearfully he ended his painful life to live with Chriſt.

With whom was burnt John Leaf, apprentice to Humphry Gawdy, tallow-chandler, of the pariſh of Chriſt-church in London, born at Kirkly Moreſide in the county of York; who upon the Friday before Palm-Sunday was committed to the Compter in Bread-ſtreet, by an alderman of the ward where the ſaid John Leaf dwelt. Afterwards he coming to examination before biſhop Bonner, gave a firm and chriſtian teſtimony of his doctrine and profeſſion, anſwering to ſuch articles as were objected to him by the ſaid biſhop.

1ſt. As touching his belief and faith in the ſaid ſacrament of the altar, he anſwered, that after the words of conſecration ſpoke by the prieſt over the bread and wine, there was not the very true and natural body and blood of Chriſt in ſubſtance; and further did hold and believe, that the ſaid ſacrament of the altar, as it is now called, uſed, and believed in this realm of England, is idolatrous and abominable; and alſo ſaid further, that he believed, that after the words of conſecration ſpoke by the prieſt over the material bread and wine, there is not the ſelf-ſame ſubſtance of Chriſt's body and blood there contained; but bread and wine as it was before. And further ſaid, that he believed, that when the prieſt delivereth the ſaid material bread and wine to the communicants, he delivereth but only material bread and wine; and the communicants do receive the ſame in remembrance of Chriſt's death and paſſion, and ſpiritually in faith they receive Chriſt's body and blood, but not under the forms of bread and wine; and alſo affirmed, that he believed auricular confeſſion not neceſſary to be made unto a prieſt: for it is no point of ſoul health: neither that the prieſt hath any authority given him by the ſcripture to abſolve and remit any ſin.

Upon theſe his anſwers, and teſtimony of his faith, he was at that time diſmiſſed, ordering him to appear again on the next Monday, June 10, in the ſaid place, there and then to hear the ſentence of his condemnation. At which time the aforeſaid biſhop propounded the ſaid articles again to him as before, endeavouring by all manner of ways to bring him to renounce his religion; but notwithſtanding all his perſuaſions, threats, and promiſes, ſes, found him the ſame man ſtill, ſo planted upon the ſure rock of truth, that no words or deeds of men could remove him.

Then the biſhop, after many words to and fro, at laſt aſk'd him, if he had been Mr. Rogers's ſcholar? To whom the aforeſaid John Leaf anſwered again, granting it ſo to be; and that he believed in the doctrine of the ſaid Rogers, and in the doctrine of biſhop Hooper, Cardmaker, and others of their opinion, who were lately burned for the teſtimony of Chriſt, and that he would die in that doctrine that they died for: and after other replications again by the biſhop, moving him to return to the unity of the church, he anſwered again in theſe words: My lord, ſaid he, you call mine opinion hereſy, it is the true light of the word of God: And again repeating the ſame, he profeſſed that he would never forſake his ſtayed and well grounded opinion, while the breath ſhould be in his body. Whereupon the biſhop being too weak, either to refute his ſentence, or to remove his conſtancy, proceeded conſequently to read the popiſh ſentence of condemnation; whereby this pious and conſtant young man being committed to the ſecular power of the ſheriffs there preſent, was then adjudged, and not long after ſuffered, the ſame day with Mr. Bradford, confirming with his death that which he had ſpoken and profeſſed in his life.

It is reported of the ſaid John Leaf, by one that was in the Compter at the ſame time, and ſaw the thing, that after his examinations before the biſhop, when two bills were ſent unto him in the Compter in Bread-ſtreet, the one containing a recantation, the other his confeſſions, to know to which of them he would put his hand, firſt hearing the bill of recantation read unto him (becauſe he could not read nor write himſelf) which he refuſed. And when the bill of his confeſſions was read unto him, inſtead of a pen he took a pin, and pricking his hand, ſprinkled the blood upon the ſaid bill, deſiring the reader thereof to ſhew the biſhop, that he had ſealed the ſame bill with his blood already.

The Behaviour of Mr. Bradford and John Leaf at their Martyrdom.

FIRST, when they came to the ſtake in Smithfield to be burned, Mr. Bradford lying proſtrate on one ſide the ſtake, and the young man John Leaf on the other ſide, they lay flat on their faces, praying to themſelves the ſpace of a minute. Then one of the ſheriffs ſaid to Mr. Bradford, Ariſe, and make an end; for the preſs of the people is great.

At that word they ſtood up, and Mr. Bradford took a faggot in his hand and kiſſed it, and likewiſe the ſtake. And when he had ſo done, he deſired of the ſheriffs, that his ſervant might have his raiment. For (ſaid he) I have nothing elſe to give him: and beſides that, he is a poor man. And the ſheriff ſaid he ſhould have it. And then Mr. Bradford immediately took off his raiment, and went to the ſtake: and holding up his hands, and caſting his eyes towards heaven, he ſaid thus, "O England, England, repent of thy ſins, repent of thy ſins; beware of idolatry; beware of Antichriſt; take heed they do not deceive you." And as he was ſpeaking theſe words, the ſheriff ordered his hands to be tied if he would not be quiet: O maſter ſheriff, ſaid he, I am quiet; God forgive you this, maſter ſheriff. And one of the officers who was to make the fire, hearing Mr. Bradford ſo ſpeaking to the ſheriff, ſaid, If you have no better learning than this, you are but a fool, and you had beſt hold your peace. To which Mr. Bradford gave no anſwer; but aſked all the world forgiveneſs, and forgave all the world, and deſired the people to pray for him: then he turned his head to the young man that ſuffered with him, and ſaid, Be of good comfort, brother; for we ſhall have a merry ſupper with the Lord this night: and then embracing the reeds, he ſaid thus: "Strait is the gate and narrow is the way that leadeth to eternal ſalvation, and few there be that find it."*

And thus they both ended this mortal life, like two lambs, without any alteration of their countenance, being void of all fear, hoping to obtain the prize that they had long run for; to which I beſeech Almighty God happily to conduct us, through the merits of Jeſus Chriſt our Lord and Saviour, Amen.

Mention was made a little above how churliſhly Mr. Woodrofe the ſheriff anſwered Mr. Bradford at the ſtake, not ſuffering him to ſpeak, but commanding his hands to be tied, &c. The like extremity, or worſe, he uſed alſo before to Mr. Rogers, whereof ye have heard before, [page 102.]

The ſaid Woodrofe was ſheriff along with Sir William Cheſter, in the year 1555, who was a much better man, both in temper and religion; he behaved himſelf with great mildneſs towards thoſe pious martyrs, who ſuffered for their conſcience, and was very ſorry to ſee them at any time miſuſed; and this I ſpeak to the honour of that worthy gentleman, although I never had the happineſs of being much acquainted with him. But Woodrofe was ſo churliſh and ill-natured, that he was wont to beat and abuſe the friends of thoſe who were going to die; he would not ſo much as let them ſhake hands with their departing friends; a privilege never denied to malefactors, and the vileſt criminals under proteſtant government.

But now, by the way, let us take notice of the ſevere puniſhment which God inflicted on this cruel perſecutor Mr. Woodrofe: it is ſaid, that within half a year after the burning of this bleſſed martyr, the ſaid ſheriff was ſo ſtruck on the right ſide with a palſy (or ſtroke of God's hand, whatſoever it was) that for the ſpace of eight years after (till his dying day) he was not able to turn himſelf in his bed, but as two men with a ſheet were fain to move him; and withal ſuch an inſatiable devouring came upon him, that was monſtrous to behold. And thus he continued for eight years together.

On the Death of John Bradford.

LET no diſciple 'bove his maſter be;
God's ſervants are not from affliction free.
God, whom he loves, chaſtiſes every ſon:
Strait is the way to the celeſtial throne.
Theſe words whilſt, Bradford, thou doſt ruminate:
No human threats, no fears, no diſmal ſtate
Can ſhock thy ſteady ſoul; no fiery dart
Of Satan's malice wound thy conſtant heart:
But thou doſt freely (arm'd with grace divine)
Thy body to the flaming pile reſign.

Mr. Bradford during the time of his impriſonment wrote ſeveral comfortable treatiſes, and many pious letters, of which, ſome he wrote to the city of London, Cambridge, Welden, to Lancaſhire and Cheſhire, and divers to his other private friends. By which letters, to the intent it may appear how well this good man occupied his time in priſon, what ſpecial zeal he bare to the ſtate of Chriſt's church, what care he had to perform his office, how earneſtly he admoniſhed all men, how tenderly he comforted the heavy-hearted, how faithfully he confirmed them whom he had taught, I thought good here to place the ſame. All the letters that he wrote cannot be here exhibited, being ſo many in number that they alone would make a large volume; however the beſt of them ſhall be here inſerted, and the reader may find the reſt in a book called, The book of letters of the martyrs.

It has been mentioned before [p. 229.] how the earl of Derby complained in the parliament-houſe, of certain letters written by John Bradford out of priſon, to Lancaſhire; and he was likewiſe charged by the biſhop of Wincheſter, and Mr. Allen, with ſome other letters. Now to the intent that the reader may more perfectly underſtand what ſort of letters theſe were, which he wrote to his mother, brethren and ſiſters, out of the Tower, before his condemnation, we will here produce the copy and contents as followeth.

A comfortable Letter from Mr. Bradford to his Mother, a pious Matron, dwelling in Manchester, and to his Brethren and Siſters, and other Friends there.

OUR dear and ſweet Saviour Jeſus Chriſt, whoſe priſoner at this preſent (praiſed be his name) I am, preſerve and keep you, my good mother, with my brothers and ſiſters, my father John Traves, Thomas Sorrocold, Laurence and James Bradſhaw, with their wives and families, &c. now and for ever, Amen.

I am now in priſon, ſecure enough from ſtarting, to confirm what I have preached unto you, as I am ready (I thank God) to ſeal the ſame with my life and blood, if God ſhall vouchſafe to make me worthy of that honour. For, good mother and brethren, it is a moſt ſpecial benefit from God, to ſuffer for his name's ſake and goſpel, as now I do: I heartily thank God for it, and am ſure that with him I ſhall be partaker of his glory, as St. Paul ſaith, "If we ſuffer with him, we ſhall reign with him." Therefore be not faint-hearted, but rather rejoice, at leaſt for my ſake, who am now in the right and high-way to heaven: for by many afflictions we muſt enter into the kingdom of heaven. Now will God make known his children. When the wind doth not blow, a man cannot know the wheat from the chaff; but when the blaſt cometh, then the chaff flieth away, but the wheat remaineth, and is ſo far from being hurt, that by the wind it is more cleanſed from the chaff, and known to be wheat. Gold, when it is caſt in the fire, is the more precious; ſo are God's children by the croſs of affliction. God always beginneth his judgment at his houſe. Chriſt and the apoſtles were in moſt miſery in the land of Jewry, but yet the whole land ſmarted for it after: ſo now the children of God are firſt chaſtiſed in this world, that they ſhould not be damned with the world: for ſurely the great plagues of God hang over this realm.

Ye all know there was never more knowledge of God, and leſs godly living, and true ſerving of God. It was counted a fooliſh thing to ſerve God truly; and earneſt prayer was not minded. Preaching was but a paſtime. The communion was counted too common. Faſting to ſubdue the fleſh was quite out of uſe. Alms was almoſt nothing. Malice, covetouſneſs, and uncleanneſs, was common every where, with ſwearing, drunkenneſs, and idleneſs. God therefore now is come, and you have heard me preach, and becauſe he will not damn us with the world, he beginneth to puniſh us: as me for carnal living. For, as for my doctrine, I am very certain that it is and was God's truth, and by his grace I reſolve to give my life for it: but becauſe I loved not the goſpel as ſincerely as I ought, therefore doth he thus puniſh me; nay, in puniſhing, he rather bleſſeth me. Indeed I thank him more for this priſon, than for any parlour, yea, than for any pleaſure that ever I had; for in it I always find God my ſweeteſt and greateſt good. The fleſh is now puniſhed to admoniſh us heartily to live as we profeſs; and to certify the wicked of their juſt damnation, if they repent not.

Perhaps you are weakened in that which I have preached, becauſe God doth not defend it, as you think, but ſuffereth the popiſh doctrine to come again and prevail: but you muſt know, good mother, that God by this doth prove and try his children and people, whether they will unfeignedly and ſimply ſtand ſtedfaſt to him and his word. He did ſo with the Iſraelites, bringing them into a deſart, after their coming out of Egypt, where (I mean in the wilderneſs) was want of all things, in compariſon of that which they had in Egypt. Chriſt, when he came into this world, brought no worldly wealth, nor quietneſs with him, but rather war: "The world (ſaith he) ſhall rejoice, but ye ſhall mourn and weep, but your weeping ſhall be turned into joy: and therefore happy are they that mourn and weep, for they ſhall be comforted." They are marked then with God's mark in their foreheads, and not with the beaſt's mark, I mean the pope's ſhaven crown, who now with his ſhavelings rejoice: but woe unto them, for they ſhall be caſt down, they ſhall weep and mourn. The rich glutton had here his joy, and Lazarus ſorrow, but afterwards the caſe was changed. The end of carnal joy is ſorrow. Now let the whoremonger joy with the drunkard, ſwearer, covetous, malicious, and blind buzzard Sir John: for the maſs will not bite them, nor make them bluſh as preaching doth. Now they may do what they will, come devils to church, and go devils home again, for no man muſt ſpeak againſt it. They are glad of all this; now they have their heart's deſire, as the Sodomites had when Lot was gone; but what followed? forſooth, when they cried peace, all ſhall be well, then came God's vengeance, fire and brimſtone from heaven, and burnt up every mother's child; even ſo (dear mother) will it be to our papiſts.

Wherefore fear God; ſtick to his word, though all the world ſwerve from it. Die you muſt once, and when and how, you cannot tell. Die therefore with Chriſt, ſuffer for ſerving him truly, according to his word: for we may be ſure, that of all deaths it ought to be our greateſt deſire to die for the cauſe of God. This is the ſafeſt way of dying; we need not doubt but that we ſhall go to heaven, if we die for his name's ſake. And that you ſhall ſo die, the word of God will warrant you, if you ſtick to that which God by me hath taught you. You ſhall ſee that I ſpeak as I think; for by God's grace I will drink before you of this cup, if it be put to me.

I doubt not but God will give me grace and ſtrength to undergo what I purpoſe: pray for me, that I may be immoveable in the fiery trial. I am ready whenever God ſhall be pleaſed to call me. Death nor life, priſon nor pleaſure, I truſt in God, ſhall be able to ſeparate me from my Lord God and his goſpel. In peace, when no perſecution was, then were ye content and glad to hear me, then you believed me, and will you not do ſo now, ſeeing I ſpeak nothing but that which by God's grace I will verify with my life? Good mother, I write to you before God, as before him I have preached.

I have taught the pure word of God: it is the ſame infallible truth whereof he ſaid, "Heaven and earth ſhall paſs, but my word ſhall not paſs." The maſs, and ſuch baggage as the falſe worſhippers of God, and the enemies of Chriſt's croſs (the papiſts) have brought in again, to poiſon the church of God, highly diſpleaſeth him, and is abominable in his ſight. Happy may he be who for conſcience-ſake will ſuffer the loſs of life or goods, in contending againſt it. Come not near it. If God be God, follow him: if the maſs be God, let who will ſee it, hear, or be preſent at it, go to the devil with it. What is there which God ordained? His ſupper was ordained to be received by us as a memorial of his death, for the confirmation of our faith, that his body was broken for us, and his blood ſhed for the pardon of our ſins; but in the maſs there is no receiving, but the prieſt alone keepeth all to himſelf. Chriſt ſaith, Take, eat: No, ſaith the prieſt, Gape, peep. Here (in the maſs) is a ſacrificing, yea, crucifying Chriſt again as much as they can. Here is idolatry in worſhipping the outward ſign of bread and wine; here is all in Latin, you cannot tell what is ſaid. In ſhort, here is nothing as God ordained. Wherefore (my good mother) come not near it.

I preſume ſome will ſay, that it will be worſe for you, if you refuſe to go to maſs, and do as others do. But be assured, that God will assist and protect you, as you shall one day find: he hath promised to them who suffer for his cause, his great blessing in this world, and in the world to come life everlasting.

You shall be counted an heretic: but they are the heretics that so call you, whose praise is a scandal.

You are not able to reason against the priests, but God will, that they shall not be able to withstand you. I doubt not but father Traves, and others of my brothers and sisters, will comfort and assist you by their counsel and pious examples: but if they do not, I your son in God, by his grace, will so do, and go before you: pray that I may be constant: rejoice in my sufferings, for it is for your sakes, that thereby I may confirm the truth I have taught. Beware that this letter come not abroad, but only into father Traves his hands: for if it should be known that I have pen and ink in prison, it would be much worse for me. Therefore keep it to yourselves, and commend me to God's mercy through Jesus Christ, and pray that he would make me worthy to give my life for the sake of his church and gospel. From the Tower of London, October 26. 1553.

My name I write not, you know the reason well enough: like the letter never the worse. Commend me to all our good brethren and sisters in the Lord. Howsoever you do, be obedient to the higher powers, that is, in no point either in hand or tongue rebel, but rather if they command that which with good conscience you cannot obey, lay your head on the block, and suffer whatsoever they shall do or say. By patience possess your souls.

After the time that Mr. Bradford was condemned, and sent to the Compter, his adversaries purposed (as ye heard before) to send him to Manchester to be burned. Whereupon he writeth to the city of London, thinking to take his last farewel of them in this letter.

To the City of London.

TO all that profess the gospel and true doctrine of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ in the city of London, John Bradford a most unworthy servant of the Lord, now not only in prison, but also excommunicated and condemned to be burned for the same true doctrine, wisheth mercy, grace and peace, with increase of all godly knowledge and piety from God the Father of mercy, through the merits of our alone and all-sufficient Redeemer Jesus Christ, by the operation of the Holy Spirit for ever, Amen.

My dearly beloved brethren in our Saviour Christ, although the time I have to live is very little (for I hourly look when I shall be had hence to be conveyed into Lancashire there to be burned, and to render my life, by the providence of God, where I received it), and although there is great charge given to keep me from all things whereby I might signify any thing to the world of my estate: yet having, as I now have, pen and ink, through God's working, in spite of Satan and his soldiers, I thought good to write a short confession of my faith, and join thereto a little exhortation to you all to live according to your profession.

First, For my faith, I do confess and pray all the whole congregation of Christ to bear witness with me of the same, that I believe constantly, through the gift and goodness of God (for faith is God's only gift), all the twelve articles of the symbol and creed, commonly attributed to the collection of the apostles. This my faith I would gladly particularly declare and expound to the confirmation and comfort of the simple; but alas! by starts and stealth I write in manner that I write, and therefore I shall desire you all to take this brevity in good part. And this faith I hold, not because of the creed itself, but because of the word of God, which teacheth and confirmeth every article accordingly. This word of God written by the prophets and apostles, left and contained in the canonical books of the whole Bible, I do believe to contain plentifully all things necessary to salvation, so that nothing (as necessary to salvation) ought to be added thereto, and therefore the church of Christ, nor none of his congregation, ought to be burdened with any other doctrine, than what hath its foundation and ground from thence. In testimony of this faith, I render and give my life, being condemned as well for not acknowledging the Antichrist of Rome to be Christ's vicar general and supreme head of his catholic and universal church here or elsewhere upon earth; as for denying the horrible and idolatrous doctrine of transubstantiation, and Christ's real, corporal, and carnal presence in his supper, under the forms and accidents of bread and wine.

To believe Christ our Saviour to be the head of his church, and kings in their realms to be the supreme powers, to whom every soul oweth obedience, and to believe that in the supper of Christ (which the sacrament of the altar, as the papists call it and use it, doth utterly overthrow) is a true and very presence of whole Christ, God and Man, to the faith of the receiver, but not to the stander by, and looker upon, as it is a true and very presence of bread and wine to the senses of men: to believe this, I say, will not serve, and therefore as an heretic I am condemned, and shall be burned; whereof I heartily ask God mercy that I do no more rejoice than I do, having so great cause, as to be an instrument wherein it may please my dear Lord God and Saviour to suffer.

For albeit my manifold sins, even since I came into prison, have deserved at the hands of God, not only this temporal, but also eternal fire in hell, much more than my former sinful life, which the Lord pardon for Christ's sake, as I know he of his mercy hath done, and will never lay mine iniquities to my charge to condemnation, so great is his goodness (praised therefore be his holy name), although, I say, my late manifold and grievous sins have most justly deserved all the tyranny that man or devil can do unto me; and therefore I confess that the Lord is just, his judgments be true, and I have deserved them: yet the bishops and prelates, instead of persecuting them in me, do persecute Christ himself, his word, his truth, and his religion. And therefore I have great cause to rejoice that ever I was born, and hitherto preserved by the Lord; that by my death, which I deserve for my sins, it pleaseth him to glorify his name, to testify and confirm his truth, and to repugn his adversaries. O good God and merciful Father, forgive my great unthankfulness, especially herein.

And you, my dearly beloved, for the Lord Jesus Christ's sake, I humbly and heartily in his bowels and blood do now, for my last farewel in this present life, beseech you and every one of you, that you will consider this work of the Lord accordingly. By me be admonished to beware of hypocrisy and carnal security; profess not the gospel with tongue and lips only, but in heart and in truth; frame your lives accordingly; beware God's name be not evil spoken of, and the gospel less regarded by your conversation. God forgive me that I have not so heartily professed it as I should have done, but have sought myself, and too much consulted my own ease therein. The gospel is a new doctrine to the old man; it is new wine, and therefore cannot be put into old bottles, without greater harm than good to those bottles, If we will talk with the Lord, we must put off our shoes and carnal affections; if we will hear the voice of the Lord, we must wash our garments and be holy; if we will be Christ's disciples, we must deny ourselves, take up our cross, and follow him; we cannot serve two masters. If we seek Christ's kingdom, we must seek the righteousness thereof. To this petition, Thy kingdom come, we must join, Thy will be done, done on earth as it is in heaven. If we will not be doers of the word, but hearers only, we miserably deceive ourselves. If we hear the gospel, pel, and love it not, we declare ourſelves to be but fools, and builders upon the ſand. Deceitfulneſs the Lord abhorreth; if we come to him, we muſt beware that we come not with a double heart; for then God will anſwer us according to our own folly; and we ſhall deceive ourſelves and others.

To faith ſee that we join a good conſcience, leſt we make a ſhip-wreck. To the Lord we muſt come with fear and reverence. If we will be goſpellers, we muſt be Chriſt's; if we be Chriſt's, we muſt crucify our fleſh with the luſts and concupiſcences thereof; if we will be under grace, ſin muſt not bear rule in us. We may not come to the Lord, and draw nigh to him with our lips, and leave our hearts elſewhere, leſt the Lord's wrath wax hot, and he take from us the good remaining. In no caſe can the kingdom of Chriſt approach to them that repent not. Therefore, my dearly beloved, let us repent, and be heartily ſorry that we have ſo carnally, ſo hypocritically, ſo covetouſly, ſo vain-glorioufly profeſſed the goſpel. For all theſe I confeſs myſelf to the glory of God, that he may cover mine offences in the day of judgment. Let the anger of God, moſt juſtly fallen upon us, be applied to every one of our deſerts, that from the bottom of our hearts we may ſay, It is I, Lord, that have ſinned againſt thee: it is my hypocriſy, my vain-glory, my covetouſneſs, uncleanneſs, carnality, ſecurity, idleneſs, unthankfulneſs, ſelf-love, and ſuch like, which have deſerved the taking away of our good king, of thy word and true religion, of thy good miniſters by exile, impriſonment and death; it is my wickedneſs that cauſeth ſucceſs and increaſe of authority and peace to thine enemies. Oh be merciful, be merciful unto us. Turn to us again, O Lord of hoſts, and turn us unto thee; correct us, but not in thy fury, leſt we be conſumed in thine anger: chaſtiſe us not in thy wrathful diſpleaſure; reprove us not, but in the midſt of thine anger remember thy mercy. For if thou mark what is done amiſs, who ſhall be able to abide it? But with thee is mercifulneſs, that thou mighteſt be worſhipped. Oh then be merciful unto us, that we might truly worſhip thee. Help us, for the glory of thy name: be merciful unto our ſins, for they are great: O heal us, and help us for thine honour. Let not the wicked people ſay, Where is their God, &c.

On this ſort, my right dearly beloved, let us heartily bewail our ſins, repent us of our former evil life, heartily and earneſtly purpoſe to amend our lives in all things, continually watch in prayer, diligently and reverently attend, hear, and read the holy ſcriptures, labour after our vocation to amend our brethren. Let us reprove the works of darkneſs. Let us fly from all idolatry. Let us abhor the antichriſtian and Romiſh rotten ſervice, deteſt the Popiſh maſs, renounce their Romiſh god, prepare ourſelves to the croſs, be obedient to all that are in authority, in all things that be not againſt God and his word; for then anſwer with the apoſtles, "It is more meet to obey God than man." Howbeit never for any thing reſiſt, or riſe againſt the magiſtrates. Avenge not yourſelves, but commit your cauſe to the Lord, to whom vengeance belongeth, and he in his time will reward it. If you feel in yourſelves an hope and truſt in God, that he will never tempt you above that he will make you able to bear, be aſſured the Lord will be true to you, and you ſhall be able to bear all brunts. But if you want this hope, fly and get you hence, rather than by your tarrying God's name ſhould be diſhonoured.

In ſum, caſt your care on the Lord, knowing for moſt certain, that he is careful for you: with him all the hairs of your head are numbered, ſo that not one of them ſhall periſh without his good pleaſure: much more then nothing ſhall happen to our bodies, which ſhall not be profitable, howſoever for a time it ſeem otherwiſe to your ſenſes. Depend on the providence of God, not only when you have means to help you, but alſo when you have no means, yea, when all means be againſt you. Give him this honour, which of all other things he moſt chiefly requireth at your hands: namely, believe that you are his children through Chriſt, that he is your Father and God through him, that he loveth you, pardoneth you all your offences, that he is with you in trouble, and will be with you for ever. When you fall, he will put under his hand, you ſhall not lie ſtill: before you call upon him, he heareth you, out of the evil he will finally deliver you, and bring you to his eternal joy. Doubt not herein, my dearly beloved, doubt not (I ſay) this God your Father will do for you, not in reſpect of yourſelves, but in reſpect of Chriſt your captain, your paſtor, your keeper, out of whoſe hands none ſhall be able to catch you, in him be quiet, and often conſider your dignity: namely, how that ye be God's children, the ſaints of God, citizens of heaven, temples of the Holy Ghoſt, the thrones of God, members of Chriſt, and lords over all.

Therefore be aſhamed to think, ſpeak, or do any thing that ſhould be unſeemly for God's children, God's ſaints, Chriſt's members, &c. Marvel not though the devil and the world hate you, though ye be perſecuted here, for the ſervant is not above his maſter. Covet not earthly riches, fear not the power of man, love not this world, nor things that be in this world; but long for the Lord Jeſus his coming, at which time your bodies ſhall be made like unto his glorious body; when he appeareth you ſhall be like unto him, when your life ſhall thus be revealed, then ſhall ye appear with him in glory.

In the mean time live in hope thereof. Let the life you lead be in the faith of the Son of God. "For the juſt do live by faith:" which faith flieth from all evil, and followeth the word of God as a lanthorn to her feet, and a light to her ſteps; her eyes be above where Chriſt is, ſhe beholdeth not the things preſent, but rather things to come; ſhe glorieth in affliction; ſhe knoweth that the afflictions of this life are not like to be compared to the glory which God will reveal to us and in us. Of this glory God grant us here a lively taſte, then ſhall we run after the ſcent it ſendeth forth. It will make us valiant men to take to us the kingdom of God; whither the Lord of mercy bring us in his good time through Chriſt our Lord, to whom with the Father and the Holy Ghoſt, three Perſons and one God, be all honour and glory, world without end, Amen.

My dearly beloved, I would gladly have given here my body to have been burned for the confirmation of the true doctrine I have taught here unto you. But that my country muſt have. Therefore I pray you take in good part this ſignification of my good will towards all of you. Impute the want herein to time and trouble. Pardon me mine offenſive and negligent behaviour when I was amongſt you. With me repent, and labour to amend. Continue in the truth which I have truly taught unto you, by preaching in all places where I have come; God's name therefore be praiſed. Confeſs Chriſt when you be called, whatſoever cometh thereof, and the God of peace be with us all, Amen. February 11. 1555.

Your brother in bonds for the Lord's ſake,

John Bradford.

To the Univerſity of Cambridge.

TO all that love the Lord Jeſus and his true doctrine, being in the univerſity and town of Cambridge, John Bradford a moſt unworthy ſervant of the Lord, now not only impriſoned, but alſo condemned for the ſame true doctrine, wiſheth grace, peace, and mercy, with increaſe of all godlineſs from God the father of all mercy, through the bloody paſſion of our Saviour Jeſus Chriſt, by the lively working of the Holy Spirit for ever, Amen.

Although I look hourly when I ſhould be had to the ſtake (my right dearly beloved in the Lord), and although the charge over me is great and ſtrict, yet having by the providence providence of God ſecretly pen and ink, I could not but ſignify unto you my ſolicitude which I have for all of you in the Lord, though not as I would, yet as I may. You have often and openly heard the truth (eſpecially in this matter wherein I am condemned) diſputed and preached, that it is needleſs to do any more but only to put you in remembrance of the ſame: but hitherto you have not heard it confirmed, and as it were ſealed up, as now you do and ſhall hear by me, that is, by my death and burning. For albeit I have deſerved (through my uncleanneſs, hypocriſy, avarice, vain-glory, idleneſs, unthankfulneſs and carnality, whereof I accuſe myſelf, to my confuſion before the world, that before God through Chriſt I might, as my aſſured hope is I ſhall, find mercy) eternal death and hell-fire, much more than this affliction and fire prepared for me: yet, my dearly beloved, it is not theſe, or any of theſe things, for which the prelates do perſecute me, but God's verity and truth; yea, even Chriſt himſelf is the only cauſe for which I am now condemned, and ſhall be burned as an heretic, becauſe I will not grant the Antichriſt of Rome to be Chriſt's vicar general and ſupreme head of his church here, and every where upon earth, by God's ordinance, and becauſe I will not grant ſuch corporal, real, and carnal preſence of Chriſt's body and blood in the ſacrament, as doth tranſubſtantiate the ſubſtance of bread and wine, and is received by the wicked, yea by dogs and mice. Alſo I am excommunicated and accounted as a dead member of Chriſt's church, as a rotten branch, and therefore ſhall be caſt into the fire.

Therefore ye ought heartily to rejoice with me, and to give thanks for me, that God the eternal Father hath vouchſafed our mother to bring up any child in whom it would pleaſe him to magnify his holy name as he doth, and I hope for his mercy and truth's ſake, will do in me and by me. Oh, what ſuch benefit upon earth can it be, as that I who deſerved death by reaſon of my ſins, ſhould be delivered to a demonſtration, a teſtification and confirmation of God's verity and truth! Thou my mother the univerſity haſt not only had the truth of God's word plainly manifeſted unto thee by reading, diſputing, and preaching publicly and privately; but now to make thee altogether excuſeleſs, and, as it were, almoſt to ſin againſt the Holy Ghoſt, if thou put to thy helping hand with the Romiſh rout to ſuppreſs the verity, thou haſt my life and blood as a ſeal to confirm thee, if thou wilt be confirmed, or elſe to confound thee, and bear witneſs againſt thee, if thou wilt take part with the prelates and clergy, which now fill up the meaſure of their fathers which ſlew the prophets and apoſtles, that all the righteous blood from Abel to Bradford, ſhed upon earth, may be required at their hands.

Of this therefore I thought good before my death, as time and liberty would ſuffer me (for the love and duty I bear unto thee), to admoniſh thee, good mother, and my ſiſter the town, that you would call to mind from whence you are fallen, and ſtudy to do the firſt works. You know (if you will) theſe matters of the Romiſh ſupremacy, and the antichriſtian tranſubſtantiation, whereby Chriſt's ſupper is overthrown, his prieſthood evacuated, his ſacrifice fruſtrated, the miniſtry of his word unplaced, repentance repelled, faith fainted, piety extinguiſhed, the maſs maintained, idolatry ſupported, and all impiety cheriſhed: you know, I ſay (if you will), that theſe opinions are not only beſides God's word, but even directly againſt it; and therefore to take part with them, is to take part againſt God, againſt whom you cannot prevail.

Therefore for the tender mercy of Chriſt, in his bowels and blood, I beſeech you to take Chriſt's eye-ſalve to anoint your eyes, that you may ſee what you do, and have done, in admitting (as I hear you have admitted, yea, alas, authorized, and by conſent confirmed) the Romiſh rotten rags, which once you utterly expelled. O be not Canis reverſus ad vomitum. Be not Sus lota reverſa ad volutabrum cœni. Beware leſt Satan enter in with ſeven other ſpirits, and then the laſt ſhall be worſe than the firſt. It had been better ye had never known the truth, than after knowledge to run from it. Ah, woe to this world and the things therein, which hath now ſo wrought with you. Oh that ever this dirt of the devil ſhould daub up the eye of the realm. For thou, O mother, art as the eye of the realm. If thou be light and ſhine, all the body ſhall fare the better: but if thou the light be darkneſs, alas, how great will the darkneſs be! What is man whoſe breath is in his noſtrils, that thou ſhould'ſt thus be afraid of him?

Oh what is honour and life here? Bubbles. What is glory in this world, but ſhame? Why art thou afraid to carry Chriſt's croſs? Wilt thou come into his kingdom, and not drink of his cup? Doſt thou not know Rome to be Babylon? Doſt thou not know, that as the old Babylon had the children of Judah in captivity, ſo hath this Rome the true Judah, that is, the confeſſors of Chriſt? Doſt thou not know, that as deſtruction happened unto it, ſo ſhall it do unto this? And thinkeſt thou that God will not deliver his people now when the time is come, as he did then? Hath not God commanded his people to come out from her? And wilt thou give example to the whole realm to run unto her? Haſt thou forgotten the woe that Chriſt threateneth to offence-givers? Wilt thou not remember, that it were better that a mill-ſtone were hanged about thy neck, and thou thrown into the ſea, than that thou ſhouldeſt offend the little ones?

And alas, how haſt thou offended! Yea, and how doſt thou ſtill offend? Wilt thou conſider things according the outward ſhew? Was not the ſynagogue more ſeemly and like to be the true church, than the ſimple flock of Chriſt's diſciples? Hath not the whore of Babylon more coſtly array, and rich apparel, externally to ſet forth herſelf, than the homely houſewife of Chriſt? Where is the beauty of the king's daughter the church of Chriſt? Without or within? Doth not David ſay, within? O remember that as they are happy which are not offended at Chriſt, ſo are they happy which are not offended at his poor church. Can the pope and his prelates mean honeſtly, which make ſo much of the wife, and ſo little of the huſband? The church they magnify, but Chriſt they contemn. If this church were an honeſt woman (that is, Chriſt's wife), except they would make much of her huſband, Chriſt and his word, ſhe would not be made much of by them.

When Chriſt and his apoſtles were upon earth, who was moſt like to be the true church, they or the prelates, biſhops, and ſynagogue? If we ought to have followed cuſtom, unity, antiquity, or the greater part, ſhould not Chriſt and his company have been caſt out of doors? therefore Chriſt ſaith, Search the ſcriptures. Good mother, ſhall the ſervant be above his maſter? Shall we look for better entertainment at the hands of the world, than Chriſt and his dear diſciples found? In Noah's time, who was taken for the church, poor Noah and his family, or all the others that were deſtroyed by the flood? Who was taken for God's church in Sodom, righteous Lot, or the others? And doth not Chriſt ſay, "As it was then, ſo ſhall it go now towards the coming of the Son of man?" What meaneth Chriſt when he ſaith, Iniquity ſhall have the upper hand? Doth not he likewiſe ſay, that Charity ſhall wax cold? And we plainly ſee the greateſt ſcarcity of it in thoſe, who would now be taken for Chriſt's true catholic church. All that fear God in this realm can tell more of this than I can write.

Therefore, dear mother, receive ſome admonition of one of thy poor children, now going to be burnt to aſhes for the teſtimony of Jeſus. Come again to God's truth; come out of Babylon; confeſs Chriſt and his true doctrine; repent of what is paſt; make amends by declaring thy repentance by the fruits. Remember the reading and preaching of God's prophet the true preacher, Martin Bucer. Call to mind the threatenings of God againſt impenitent ſinners. Let the exile of Leaver, Pilkington, Grindal, Haddon, Horn, Scory, Ponet, &c. awake and ſtrengthen thee. Let the impriſonment of thy dear ſons, Cranmer, Ridley, and Latimer move thee. Conſider the martyrdom of thy intimate friends, Rogers, Saunders, and Taylor. And now caſt not away the poor admonition of me that am now going to be burnt, and to receive the like crown of glory with my fellows. Take to heart God's calling by us. Be not as Pharaoh was, that it may not happen unto thee as it did unto him. What is that? hardneſs of heart. And what then? deſtruction eternally both of body and ſoul. Ah therefore, good mother, awake, awake, repent, repent, and make haſte to turn to the Lord. For otherwiſe it ſhall be more eaſy for Sodom and Gomorrah in the day of judgment than for thee. O harden not your hearts; O ſtop not your ears to-day in hearing God's voice, though it be by a moſt unworthy meſſenger. O fear the Lord, for his anger is begun to kindle. Even now the ax is laid to the root of the tree.

You know I propheſy'd truly before the Sweat came, what would come, if you repented not your carnal preaching. And now I tell you before I depart hence, that the ears of men will tingle to hear the vengeance of God that will fall upon you all, both town and univerſity, if you repent not, if you leave not your idolatry, if you turn not ſpeedily to the Lord, if you ſtill be aſhamed of Chriſt's truth which you know.

O Perne, repent; O Thompſon, repent; O doctors, bachelors, and maſters, repent; O mayor, aldermen, and town-dwellers, repent, repent, repent, that you may eſcape the approaching vengeance of the Lord. Rent your hearts, and make haſte to come unto the Lord. Let us all ſay, We have ſinned, we have done wickedly, we have not hearkened to thy voice, O Lord. Deal not with us after our deſerts, but be merciful to our iniquities, for they are great. O pardon our offences. In thine anger remember thy mercy. Turn us unto thee, O Lord God of hoſts, for the glory of thy name's ſake. Spare us, and be merciful unto us. Let not the wicked people ſay, Where is now their God? O for thine own ſake, for thy name's ſake, deal mercifully with us. Turn thyſelf unto us, and us unto thee, and we ſhall praiſe thy name for ever.

If in this ſort, my dearly beloved, in heart and mouth we come unto our Father, and proſtrate ourſelves before the throne of his grace, then ſurely we ſhall find mercy. Then ſhall the Lord look merrily upon us, for his mercy ſake in Chriſt: then ſhall we hear him ſpeak peace unto his people. For he is gracious and merciful, of great pity and compaſſion: he cannot be chiding for ever: his anger cannot laſt long to the penitent. Though we weep in the morning, yet at night we ſhall have our ſorrow to ceaſe. For he is merciful, and hath no pleaſure in the death of a ſinner: he would rather have him turn from his wickedneſs and live.

Oh turn ye now and repent yet once again, I humbly beſeech you, and then the kingdom of heaven ſhall draw nigh. The eye hath not ſeen, the ear hath not heard, nor the heart of man is able to conceive the joys prepared for us if we repent, amend our lives, and heartily turn to the Lord. But if ye repent not, but be as ye were, and go forwards with the wicked, following the faſhion of the world, the Lord will lead you on with wicked doers, you ſhall periſh in your wickedneſs, your blood will be upon your own heads, your parts ſhall be with hypocrites, where ſhall be weeping and gnaſhing of teeth; ye ſhall be caſt from the face of the Lord, for ever and ever: eternal ſhame, ſorrow, woe, and miſery, ſhall be both in body and ſoul to you world without end. Oh therefore, right dear to me in the Lord, turn you, turn you, repent you, repent you, amend, amend your lives, depart from evil, do good, follow peace and purſue it. Come out from Babylon, caſt off the works of darkneſs, put on Chriſt, confeſs his truth, be not aſhamed of his goſpel, prepare yourſelves for the croſs, drink of God's cup before it come to the dregs, and then ſhall I with you and for you, rejoice in the day of judgment, which is at hand; and therefore prepare yourſelves thereto, I heartily beſeech you. And thus I take my farewel for ever, with you in this preſent life, mine own dear hearts in the Lord. The Lord of mercy be with us all, and give us a joyful and ſure meeting in his kingdom, Amen, Amen.

Out of priſon, February 11. 1555.

Your own in the Lord for ever,

John Bradford.

To Lancaſhire and Cheſhire.

TO all thoſe that profeſs the name and true religion of our Saviour Chriſt in Lancaſhire and Cheſhire, and eſpecially abiding in Mancheſter and thereabouts, John Bradford, a moſt unworthy ſervant of the Lord, now not only in bonds, but alſo condemned for the ſame true religion, wiſheth mercy and grace, peace and increaſe of all godlineſs from God the Father of all pity, through the deſerts of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, by the working of the moſt mighty and lively Spirit the Comforter for ever, Amen.

I heard it credibly reported, my dearly beloved in the Lord, that my heavenly Father hath thought it good to provide, that as I have preached his true doctrine and goſpel amongſt you by word, ſo I ſhall teſtify and confirm the ſame by deed, that is, I ſhall leave my life with you, which by his providence I firſt received there (for in Mancheſter I was born) for a ſeal to the doctrine I have taught with you and amongſt you; ſo that if from henceforth you waver in the ſame, you have no excuſe at all. I know the enemies of Chriſt which exerciſe this cruelty upon me (I ſpeak in reſpect of mine offence which is none to themward) think by killing of me amongſt you, to hinder you and others, leſt they ſhould attempt to teach Chriſt truly, or believe his doctrine hereafter. But I doubt not but my heavenly Father will by my death more confirm you in his truth. And therefore I greatly rejoice to ſee ſatan and his ſoldiers ſupplanted in their own wiſdom, which is plain fooliſhneſs amongſt the wiſe indeed, that is, amongſt ſuch as have heard God's word, and do follow it: for they only are counted wiſe of the wiſdom of God our Saviour.

Indeed if I ſhould ſimply conſider my life with that which it ought to have been, and as God in his law requireth, then could I not but cry as I do, Righteous art thou, O Lord, and all thy judgments are true. For I have much grieved thee, and tranſgreſſed thy holy precepts, not only before my profeſſing the goſpel, but ſince alſo: yea, ſince my coming into priſon I do not excuſe myſelf before God and all his church, that I have grievouſly offended my Lord God, I have not loved his goſpel as I ſhould have done, I have ſought myſelf, and not his glory only and my brethren's good, I have been too unthankful, ſecure, carnal, hypocritical, vain-glorious, &c. All which my evils, the Lord of mercy pardon me for his Chriſt's ſake, as I hope and certainly believe he hath done for his great mercy in Chriſt our Redeemer.

But when I conſider the cauſe of my condemnation, I cannot but lament, that I do no more rejoice than I do: for it is God's verity and truth. So that the condemnation is not a condemnation of Bradford ſimply, but rather a condemnation of Chriſt and his truth. Bradford is nothing elſe but an inſtrument in whom Chriſt and his doctrine is condemned. And therefore, my dearly beloved, rejoice and give thanks with me and for me, that ever God did vouchſafe ſo great a benefit to our country, as to chooſe the moſt unworthy (I mean myſelf) to be one, in whom it would pleaſe him to ſuffer any kind of affliction: much more this violent kind of death, which I perceive is prepared for me with you for his ſake. All glory and praiſe be given unto God our Father, for his great and exceeding mercy towards me through Jesus Christ our Lord, Amen.

But perchance you will say unto me, What is the cause for which you are condemned? We hear say, that ye deny all presence of Christ in his holy supper, and so make it a bare sign and common bread, and nothing else. My dearly beloved, what is said, and what will be said of me I cannot tell. It is told me, that Dr. Pendleton is gone down to preach with you, not as he once recanted (for you all know he hath preached contrary to that he was wont to preach before I came amongst you), but to recant that which he hath recanted. How he will speak of me, and report before I come, when I am come, and when I am burned, I mind not: for he that is so uncertain, and will speak so often against himself, I cannot think he will speak well of me, except it make for his purpose and profit: but of this enough.

Indeed the chief thing which I am condemned for, as an heretic, is, because I deny in the sacrament of the altar (which is not Christ's supper, but a plain perverting of it, being used as the Papists now use it) to be a real, natural, and corporal presence of Christ's body and blood, under the forms and accidents of bread and wine, that is, because I deny transubstantiation, which is the darling of the devil, and daughter and heir to Antichrist's religion, whereby the mass is maintained, Christ's supper perverted, his sacrifice and cross imperfected, his priesthood destroyed, the ministry taken away, repentance repelled, and all true godliness abandoned. In the supper of our Lord, or sacrament of Christ's body and blood, I confess and believe that there is a true and very presence of the whole Christ, God and man, to the faith of the receiver (but not of the stander by or looker on), as there is a very true presence of bread and wine to the senses of him that is partaker thereof. This faith, this doctrine, which consenteth with the word of God, and with the true testimony of Christ's church (which the popish church doth persecute), will I not forsake, and therefore I am condemned as an heretic, and as such I shall be burned. But, my dearly beloved, this truth (for which I lay down my life) I hope in God shall never be burnt, bound, nor overcome; but shall gloriously triumph, have victory, and be at liberty, in spite of the teeth of God's adversaries. For there is no counsel against the Lord, nor can any device of man be able to defeat the truth in any other than such as be children of unbelief, who have no love to the truth, and therefore are given up to believe lyes. From which plague the Lord of mercy deliver you, my dear hearts in the Lord, and all the realm, I humbly beseech his mercy, Amen.

And that you may be delivered from this plague, I shall for my farewel with you for ever in this present life, heartily desire you all in the bowels and blood of our most merciful Saviour Jesus Christ, to attend unto these things which I am now going to write unto you out of the holy scriptures.

You know the heavy plagues of God are fallen upon us, in taking away our king, and true religion, God's true prophets and ministers, &c. and setting over us such as seek not the Lord after knowledge: whose endeavours God prospereth wonderfully to the trial of many, that his people may both better know themselves, and be known. Now the cause hereof is our iniquities and grievous sins. We knew not the time of our visitation; we were unthankful to God; we contemned and carnally abused the gospel, to serve our hypocrisy, vain-glory, viciousness, avarice, idleness, security, &c. Long did the Lord linger, and tarry to have shewed mercy unto us, but we were ever the less deserving. Therefore God dealeth with us most justly, and even now he tempereth his justice with great mercy, by which we are preserved from utter destruction. If the Lord should deal with us according to our deserts, alas, who could bear it? Seeing in his anger he remembereth mercy, undeserved (nay, even undesired by us), let us take occasion the more readily to meet him (not with force of arms, for we are not able to withstand him, much less to prevail against him); and beseech him to be merciful unto us, and according to his wonted mercy to deal with us.

Let us arise with David, and say, "Enter not into judgment with thy servant, O Lord, for in thy sight no man living shall be justified." Let us send ambassadors with the centurion, and say, "Lord, we are not worthy to come ourselves unto thee; speak the word, and we shall have peace." Let us patiently with the publican look down on the earth, knock our hard hearts to burst them, and cry out, "O God, be merciful unto us wretched sinners." Let us with the lost son return, and say, "O Father, we have sinned against heaven and earth, and before thee, we are unworthy to be called thy children." Let us, I say, heartily repent of our former evil life, and turn to God with our whole hearts, hoping in his great mercy through Christ, and heartily calling upon his holy name, and then undoubtedly we shall find and feel otherwise than yet we have felt, both inwardly and outwardly. Inwardly we shall feel peace of conscience between God and us, which peace passeth all understanding; and we shall find that the outward troubles and miseries of this life will be much mitigated, if not quite taken away.

Therefore my dearly beloved in the Lord, I your poorest brother now departing to the Lord, for my eternal farewel in this present life, pray you, beseech you, and even from the very bottom of my heart, by all the mercies of God shewed to you in Christ, most earnestly beg and entreat you out of prison (as I have often done out of your pulpits) that you will repent, and leave your wicked lives, be sorry for your offences, and turn to the Lord, whose arms are wide open to receive and embrace you. For he is the Lord of mercy, and God of all comfort, he desireth not the death of a sinner, but rather that he should repent, and amend. He hath no pleasure in the destruction of men; his long-suffering should draw you to repentance before the time of vengeance, and the day of wrath, which is at hand, doth come.

Now is the ax laid to the root of the tree, utterly to destroy the impenitent. Now is the fire gone out before the face of the Lord, and who is able to quench it? O therefore repent, repent. It is enough to have lived as we have done. It is enough to have played the wanton gospellers, the proud protestants, hypocritical and false christians, as, alas, we have done. Now the Lord speaketh to us in mercy and grace; O turn, before he speaketh in wrath. Yet is there mercy with the Lord, and plenteous redemption: yet he hath not forgotten to shew mercy to those that call upon him. O then call upon him while he may be found. For he is rich in mercy, and plentiful to all them that call upon him. So that he that calleth upon the name of the Lord, shall be saved. If your sins be as red as scarlet, the Lord saith, he will make them as white as snow. He hath sworn, and never will repent him thereof, that he will never remember our iniquities: but as he is good, faithful and true, so will he be our God, and we shall be his people: his law will he write in our hearts, and graft in our minds, and never will he have in mind our unrighteousness.

Therefore, my dear hearts in the Lord, turn you, turn you to the Lord your Father, to the Lord your Saviour, to the Lord your Comforter. Oh why do you stop your ears, and harden your hearts to-day, when you hear his voice by me your poorest brother? O forget not how that the Lord hath shewed himself true, and me his true preacher, by bringing to pass these plagues which at my mouth you often heard before they came to pass, especially when I treated of Noah's flood, and when I preached on the twenty-second chapter of St. Matthew's gospel, on St. Stephen's day, the last time that I was with you. And now by me the Lord sendeth you word, dear countrymen, that if you will go forward in your impenitence, carnality, hypocrisy, idolatry, covetousness, swearing, ſwearing, gluttony, drunkenneſs, whoredom, &c. (wherewith, alas, alas, our country floweth:) if, I ſay, you will not turn and leave off, ſeeing me now burned, amongſt you, to aſſure you on all ſides, how God ſeeketh you, and is ſorry to do you hurt, to plague you, to deſtroy you, to take vengeance upon you. O your blood will be upon your own heads: you have been warned, and warned again, by me in preaching, by me in burning.

As I ſaid therefore, I ſay again, my dear hearts in the Lord, turn you, turn you, repent you, ceaſe from doing evil, ſtudy to do well, away with idolatry, fly the Romiſh god and ſervice, leave off from ſwearing, cut off carnality, abandon avarice, drive away drunkenneſs, fly from fornication and flattery, murder and malice, deſtroy deceitfulneſs, and caſt away all the works of darkneſs. Put on mercy and piety, ſerve God after his word, and not after cuſtom, uſe your tongues to glorify God by prayer, thankſgiving, and confeſſion of his truth, &c. be ſpiritual, and by the Spirit mortify carnal affections; be ſober, holy, true, loving, gentle, merciful, then the Lord's wrath will ceaſe, not for this our doings ſake, but for his mercy's ſake. Go to therefore, good countrymen, take this counſel of the Lord, by me now ſent unto you, as the Lord's counſel, and not as mine, that in the day of judgment I may rejoice with you and for you; which thing I heartily deſire, and not to be a witneſs againſt you. My blood will cry for vengeance, as againſt the Papiſts, God's enemies (whom I beſeech God, if it be his will, heartily to forgive, yea, even them which put me to death and are the cauſers thereof, for they know not what they do), ſo will my blood cry for vengeance againſt you (my dearly beloved in the Lord) if ye repent not, amend not, and turn unto the Lord.

Turn unto the Lord yet once more, I heartily beſeech thee, thou Mancheſter, thou Aſhton-under-line, thou Bolton, Bury, Wigan, Liverpool, Winſley, Eccles, Middleton, and thou city of Weſtcheſter, &c. where I have truly taught and preached the word of God. Turn, I ſay unto you all, and to all the inhabitants thereabouts, unto the Lord our God, and he will turn unto you; he will ſay unto his angel, It is enough, put up the ſword. Which that he may do, I humbly beſeech his goodneſs, for the precious blood ſake of his dear Son our Saviour Jeſus Chriſt. Ah good brethren, take in good part theſe my laſt words unto every one of you. Pardon me mine offences and negligences in behaviour amongſt you. The Lord of mercy pardon us all our offences for our Saviour Jeſus Chriſt his ſake, Amen. Out of priſon, ready to come to you, the eleventh of February 1555.

To the Town of Walden.

TO the faithful, and ſuch as profeſs the true doctrine of our Saviour Jeſus Chriſt, dwelling at Walden and thereabouts, John Bradford, a moſt unworthy ſervant of the Lord, now in bonds and condemned for the ſame true doctrine, wiſheth grace, mercy and peace, with the increaſe of all godlineſs in knowledge and living, from God the Father of all comfort, through the merits of our only Redeemer Jeſus Chriſt, by the mighty working of the moſt Holy Spirit the Comforter for ever, Amen.

When I remember, how that by the providence and grace of God I have been a man by whom it hath pleaſed him, through my miniſtry, to call you to repentance and amendment of life, ſomething effectually, as it ſeemed, and to ſow amongſt you his true doctrine and religion, leſt that by my affliction, and ſtorms now ariſen to try the faithful, and to conform them to the image of the Son of God, into whoſe company we are called, you might be faint-hearted; I could not but out of priſon ſecretly (for my keepers may not know that I have pen and ink) write unto you a ſignification of the deſire I have, that you ſhould be more confirmed in the doctrine I have taught you, which I am aſſured is the plain and infallible truth of God, and alſo that you be warned to govern your lives and converſation agreeable thereto. Dearly beloved in the Lord, had I taught you fables, tales, or lyes, inſtead of this truth, I ſhould not ſo willingly ſeal it with my blood.

Indeed, to confeſs the truth to you and all the church of Chriſt, I do think of myſelf that I have not only moſt juſtly deſerved this kind of death, but alſo all kinds of death, and that eternally, for mine hypocriſy, vain-glory, uncleanneſs, ſelf-love, covetouſneſs, idleneſs, unthankfulneſs, and carnal profeſſing of God's holy goſpel, living therein not ſo purely and induſtriouſly as I ſhould have done: may the God of all mercy pardon me thro' the merits of Chriſt's blood, as I hope, yea, I certainly believe he hath done. My dearly beloved, you and all the world well know, and may plainly perceive, that the prelates perſecute Chriſt in me: they do not trouble me for the evil I have done, but for the good I endeavour to do, in ſtanding up for the honour of God and his goſpel; and becauſe I cannot, dare not, nor will not confeſs tranſubſtantiation, and that wicked men, yea mice and dogs, eating the ſacrament of the altar, as they term it (whereby they utterly overthrow Chriſt's holy ſupper), do eat the natural and real body of Chriſt which was born of the virgin Mary: I ſay, becauſe I will not come into theſe abſurd notions, I am deemed an heretic unworthy to live.

To believe and confeſs as God's word teacheth, the primitive church believed, and all the catholic and good holy fathers taught 500 years at leaſt after Chriſt, that in the ſupper of the Lord (which the maſs overthroweth, as it doth Chriſt's prieſthood, ſacrifice, death and paſſion, the miniſtry of his word, true faith, repentance, and all godlineſs) whole Chriſt, God and man, is preſent by grace to the faith of the receivers, but not of the ſtanders by and lookers on, as bread and wine is to their ſenſes, will not ſerve: and therefore I am condemned, and ſhall be burned out of hand as an heretic. Wherefore I heartily thank my Lord God, that will and doth vouchſafe me worthy to be an inſtrument, in whom he himſelf doth ſuffer. For you ſee my affliction is not ſimply, becauſe I have deſerved no leſs, but much more at his hands and juſtice: but rather becauſe I confeſs his verity and truth, and by his grace, I am not afraid ſo to do, that you alſo might be confirmed in his truth. Therefore, my dearly beloved, I do heartily deſire you, and all that ſincerely love me in God, to give hearty thanks with me and for me to our heavenly Father, through our ſweet Saviour Jeſus Chriſt; for this is his exceeding great mercy towards me and you alſo, that your faith waver not from the doctrine I have taught, and ye have received. For what can ye deſire more, to aſſure your conſciences of the verity taught by your preachers, than their own lives?

Therefore, my dear friends, waver not in Chriſt's religion truly taught you, and ſet forth in the days of king Edward. Never ſhall the enemies be able to burn, impriſon, or keep it in bonds. They may bind and burn us as they pleaſe, ſo long as God ſhall give them leave; but our cauſe, religion, and doctrine which we profeſs, they ſhall never be able to vanquiſh and put away. Their idolatry and popiſh religion ſhall never be built in the conſciences of men that love God's truth. As for thoſe that love not his goſpel, that have no pleaſure in his ways, over thoſe the devil ſhall prevail: for God will give them up to ſtrong deluſions that they may believe lyes. Therefore, dear brethren, I humbly beſeech you in the blood of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, as I am now going to death for the teſtimony of Jeſus, and as I have often preſſed you from the pulpit, that you love the Lord's truth; ſo love it, that you frame your lives according to it. Alas, you know the cauſe of all theſe plagues now falling upon us, and of the ſucceſs which God's enemies daily triumph in, that it is for our not loving God's word as we ought to do.

You know that we were goſpellers in lips and not in life. We were glutted with, and tired of the word of God: yea, we loathed it, as the children of Iſrael did the manna in the wilderneſs; and therefore as the Lord's wrath waxed hot with them, ſo it doth with us. So that there is no other remedy, but that (for it is better late to turn, than never to turn) we confeſs our faults even from the bottom of our hearts, and with hearty repentance (which God grant to us all) we run unto the Lord our God, who is exorable, merciful, and ſorry for the evil poured out upon us; and cry out unto him with Daniel, ſaying, We have ſinned, we have grievouſly ſinned, O Lord God, againſt thy majeſty; we have heaped iniquity upon iniquity; the meaſure of our tranſgreſſions floweth over, ſo that thy vengeance and wrath is juſtly fallen upon us. For we are very miſerable, we have contemned thy long-ſuffering, we have not hearkened to thy voice. When thou haſt called us by preachers, we hardened our hearts, and therefore now we juſtly deſerve to have our hearts hardened like Pharoah, to have eyes and ſee not, ears and hear not, hearts and underſtand not, leſt we ſhould turn and be ſaved. O be merciful unto us; ſpare us, good Lord, and all thy people whom thou haſt dearly bought. Let not thine enemies triumph altogether and always againſt thee, for then will they be puffed up. Look down and behold the pitiful complaint of the poor; let the ſorrowful ſighing of the ſimple come in thy ſight, and be not angry with us for ever. Turn us, O Lord God of Hoſts, unto thee, and turn thou unto us, that thou may'ſt be juſtified in thy ſweet ſentences, and overcome when thou art judged, as now thou art by our adverſaries. For they ſay, Where is their God? Can God deliver them now? Can their goſpel ſerve them? O Lord, how long? for the glory of thy name, and for thy honour's ſake, in the bowels and blood of Jeſus Chriſt, we humbly beſeech thee come and help us, for we are very miſerable.

In this manner let us publicly and privately bewail our ſins; and at the ſame time endeavour to avoid them as much as poſſible, eſpecially all wilful and habitual ſins; for if we nouriſh it in our heart, the Lord will not hear us, for the prayer of the wicked is abominable in the ſight of God, ſaith the prophet. And in St. John it is written, The impenitent ſinners God heareth not: and they are impenitent who purpoſe not to amend their lives. Thoſe who, for fear or favour of men, worſhip God in a falſe manner, and, contrary to their own conſciences, conſent to the Romiſh rags, and reſort to the rotten religion, communicating in ſervice and ceremonies with the papiſts, thereby declaring, in effect, that they love the world more than God, and fear men more than Chriſt, and dread the loſs of temporal things more than ſpiritual; I ſay, ſuch men do ſin as preſumptuouſly as thoſe who are wilfully guilty of the greateſt immorality; for it is evident that the love of God abideth not in them. He that loveth the world, hath not God's word abiding in them, ſaith St. John: therefore, my dear brethren in the Lord, remember what you have profeſſed, Chriſt's name and religion, and the renouncing the devil, ſin, and the world.

Remember, that before you learned A B C, your leſſon was Chriſt's croſs. Forget not that Chriſt will have no diſciples, but ſuch as will promiſe to deny themſelves, and take up their croſs (mark, take it up) and follow him, and not the multitude, cuſtom, &c. Conſider, for God's ſake, that if we gather not with Chriſt, we ſcatter abroad. What ſhould it profit a man to gain the whole world, and loſe his own ſoul? We muſt not forget that this life is a wilderneſs, and not a paradiſe: here is not our home; we are now in warfare: we muſt needs fight, or elſe be taken priſoners. Of all the things we have in this life, we ſhall carry nothing with us. If Chriſt be our captain, we muſt follow him. If we keep company with him in affliction, we ſhall be ſure of his ſociety in glory everlaſting. If we forſake not him, he will never forſake us. If we confeſs him, he will confeſs us; but if we deny him, he will deny us. If we be aſhamed of him, he will be aſhamed of us. Wherefore, as he forſook his Father and heaven, and all the glory thereof, to come to us, to ſuffer poverty, torments and death for our ſakes, ſurely the leaſt that we can do, is to forſake all the trifles here below, and go to him, eſpecially when by ſo doing we make ſure our eternal intereſt. Whatſoever you loſe for the Lord's ſake, ſhall be reſtored three-fold to your children: and you ſhall find peace of conſcience and friendſhip with God, which is infinitely more worth than all the kingdoms of this world and the glory thereof.

My dearly beloved, therefore for the Lord's ſake conſider theſe things which I now write unto you of love, for my farewel, and laſt farewel for ever in this preſent life. Turn to the Lord, repent of your evil and unthankful life, declare repentance by the fruits, take time while ye have it, come to the Lord while he calleth you, run into his lap while his arms be open to embrace you, ſeek him while he may be found, call upon him while time is convenient, forſake and fly from all evil, both in religion and in the reſt of your life and converſation. Let your light ſo ſhine before men, that they may ſee your good works, and praiſe God in the day of his viſitation. Oh come again, come again, you ſtrange children, and I will receive you, ſaith the Lord. Repent and turn to me, and I will turn to you. Why will ye needs periſh? As ſure as I live (ſaith the Lord) I deſire not your death, turn therefore unto me. Can a woman forget the child of her womb? If ſhe ſhould, yet will I not forget you, ſaith the Lord your God. I am he, I am he which put away your ſins for mine own ſake.

O then, dear friends, turn, I ſay, unto your deareſt Father. Caſt not theſe ſweet and loving words to the ground; for the Lord watcheth on his word to perform it: which is in two ſorts; to them that lay it up in their hearts, and believe it, will he pay all, and eternal joy and comfort. But to them that caſt it at their backs, and will forget it, to them, I ſay, will he pour out indignation and eternal ſhame. Wherefore I heartily yet once more beſeech and pray you, and every of you, not to contemn this poor and ſimple exhortation, which now out of priſon I make unto you, or rather the Lord by me. I am unwilling to be a witneſs againſt you in the laſt day; as of truth I muſt if ye repent not, if ye love not God's goſpel, yea, if ye love it not.

Therefore, to conclude, repent, love God's goſpel, live in it all your converſation, ſo ſhall God's name be praiſed, his plagues be mitigated, his people comforted, and his enemies aſhamed. Grant all this, thou gracious Lord God, to every one of us, for thy dear Son's ſake, our Saviour Jeſus Chriſt; to whom with thee and the Holy Ghoſt, be eternal glory for ever and ever, Amen.
February 12. 1555.

By the bondman of our Lord,
and your afflicted poor brother,
John Bradford.

To my loving Brethren, B. C. &c. their Wives and whole Families.

I Beſeech the ever-living God to grant you all, my good brethren and ſiſters, the comfort of the Holy Spirit, and the continual ſenſe of his mercy in Chriſt our Lord, now and for ever, Amen.

The world, my brethren, ſeemeth to have the upper hand, iniquity overfloweth, the truth and verity ſeemeth to be oppreſſed, and they which take part therewith are unjuſtly intreated; as they which love the truth, lament to ſee and hear as they do. The cauſe of all this is God's anger and mercy: his anger, becauſe we have grievouſly ſinned againſt him; his mercy, becauſe he here puniſheth us, and as a father nurtureth us. We have been unthankful for his word; we have contemned his kindneſs; we have been negligent in prayer; we have been ſo carnal, covetous, licentious, &c. we have not haſtened to heaven-ward, but rather to hell-ward. We were fallen almoſt into an open contempt of God, and all his good ordinances; ſo that of his juſtice he could no longer forbear, but make us feel his anger as now he hath done, in taking his word and true ſervice from us, and permitting Satan to ſerve us with antichriſtian religion; and that in ſuch ſort, that if we will not yield to it, and ſeem to allow it in deed and outward fact, our bodies are like to be laid in priſon, and our goods given we cannot tell to whom.

We ſhould look upon this as a ſign of God's anger procured by our ſins; which, my good brethren, every one of us ſhould often call to our memories, as particularly as we can, that we might heartily lament them, repent them, hate them, earneſtly aſk mercy for them, and ſubmit ourſelves to bear in this life any kind of puniſhment which God will lay upon us for them. This ſhould we do in conſideration of God's anger in this time. Now his mercy in this time of wrath is ſeen, and ſhould be ſeen in us, my dearly beloved, in this, that God doth vouchſafe to puniſh us in this preſent life. If he ſhould not have puniſhed us, do not you think that we would have continued in the evils we were in? Yes verily, we ſhould have been worſe, and have gone forwards in hardening our hearts by impenitence, and negligence of God and true godlineſs. And then if death had come, ſhould not we have periſhed both ſoul and body in eternal fire in perdition? Alas, what miſery we ſhould have fallen into, if God ſhould have ſuffered us to have gone forward in our evils? There is no greater ſign of damnation, than to lie in evil and ſin unpuniſhed by God, as now the papiſts (my dearly beloved) are caſt into Jezebel's bed of ſecurity, which of all plagues is the moſt grievous that can be. They are baſtards and not ſons, they are not under God's rod of correction.

A great mercy it is therefore that God doth puniſh us: for if he loved us not, he would not puniſh us. Now doth he chaſtiſe us, that we ſhould not be damned with the world. Now doth he nurture us, becauſe he favoureth us. Now may we think ourſelves God's houſe and children, becauſe he beginneth his chaſtizing with us. Now he calleth us to remember our ſins paſt. Wherefore? That we might repent and aſk mercy. And why? That he might forgive us, pardon us, juſtify us, and make us his children, and ſo begin to make us like unto Chriſt here, that we might be like unto him elſewhere, even in heaven, where already we are ſet by faith with Chriſt; and at his coming in very deed we ſhall then moſt joyfully enjoy, when our ſinful and vile bodies ſhall be made like to Chriſt's glorious body, according to the power whereby he is able to make all things ſubject to himſelf.

Therefore, my brethren, let us in reſpect hereof not lament, but praiſe God; not be ſorry, but be merry; not weep, but rejoice and be glad, that God doth vouchſafe to offer us his croſs, thereby to come to him to endleſs joys and comforts. For if we ſuffer, we ſhall reign; if we confeſs him before men, he will confeſs us before his Father in heaven; if we be not aſhamed of his goſpel now, he will not be aſhamed of us in the laſt day, but will be glorified in us, crowning us with crowns of glory and endleſs felicity: For, "Bleſſed are they that ſuffer perſecution for righteouſneſs ſake, for theirs is the kingdom of heaven." Be glad (ſaith Peter), for the Spirit of God reſteth upon you. After that you are a little afflicted, God will comfort, ſtrengthen and confirm you. And therefore, my good brethren, be not diſcouraged for croſs, for priſon, or loſs of goods, for confeſſion of Chriſt's goſpel and truth which ye have believed, and was lively taught amongſt you in the days of our late good king and moſt holy prince, king Edward. This is moſt certain, if you loſe any thing for Chriſt's ſake, and for contemning the antichriſtian ſervice, ſet up again amongſt us; as you for your parts even in priſon ſhall find God's great and rich mercy, far paſſing all worldly wealth; ſo ſhall your wives and children in this preſent life find and feel God's providence, more plentifully than tongue can tell. For he will ſhew merciful kindneſs on thouſands of them that love him. The good man's ſeed ſhall not go begging his bread. You are good men, ſo many as ſuffer for Chriſt's ſake.

I truſt you all, my dearly beloved, will conſider this with yourſelves, and in the croſs ſee God's mercy, which is more ſweet than life itſelf, much more than any pelf of this world. This mercy of God ſhould make you merry and chearful; for the afflictions of this life are not to be compared with the joys of the life prepared for you. You know that the way to heaven is not the wide way of the world, which winneth to the devil; but the way to heaven is ſtrait, which few people walk in. For few live godly in Chriſt Jeſus; few regard the life to come; few remember the day of judgment; few remember how Chriſt will deny them before his Father, that do deny him here; few conſider that Chriſt will be aſhamed of them in the laſt day, who are aſhamed of his truth and true ſervice; few imagine how their accounts will ſtand at the day of vengeance; few regard the condemnation of their own conſciences, in doing that which inwardly they diſallow; and few love God better than their goods.

I truſt you are of this few, my dearly beloved, I hope you be of that little flock, who ſhall inherit the kingdom of heaven; I hope you are thoſe mourners and lamenters, who ſhall be comforted with ſuch comfort as ſhall never be taken from you. Repent of your former evils: ſtrive againſt thoſe evil inclinations that are in you: continue to call upon God: defile not your bodies with the idolatrous ſervice of the Antichriſtian church of Rome: moleſt not the good Spirit of God, which is given you as a pledge of your eternal redemption, a counſellor and guide to lead you to his eternal truth; which good Spirit I beſeech the Father of mercy to give to us all, for the ſake of his dear Son Jeſus Chriſt our Lord; to whom I commend you all, and to the word of his grace, which is able to help you all, and ſave all that believe it, and lead their lives according to it.

Of this you may be very certain, that all the hairs of your heads are numbered, ſo that not one of them ſhall periſh, neither ſhall any man or devil be able to hurt, or even attempt to hurt any of you, without the permiſſion of our heavenly Father, who tenderly loveth you; and when he hath given them leave, they ſhall go no farther than he will, nor keep you in trouble any longer than he pleaſes. Therefore caſt your care on him, for he careth for you. Only ſtudy to pleaſe him, and to keep your conſciences clean, and your bodies pure from the idolatrous ſervice, which now every where is uſed, and God will marvellouſly and mercifully defend and comfort you, for the ſake of his holy name in Jeſus Chriſt our Lord. Amen.

Mr. Bradford's Letter to Erkinalde Rawlins, and his Wife.

GOD our dear and moſt merciful Father, through Jeſus Chriſt, be with you, my good brother and ſiſter, as with his children for ever, and in all things ſo guide you with his Holy Spirit, the leader of his people, as may be to his glory, and your own everlaſting joy and comfort in him, Amen.

As you have often relieved my neceſſities (for which I beſeech God to make me thankful, and to recompence you both here and hereafter), I cannot but endeavour (as I am am in gratitude bound) to write ſomething for your ſpiritual comfort.

My dearly beloved, look not upon theſe days, and the afflictions which they bring, as diſmal days, and days only of God's vengeance, but rather as good days, or days of God's Fatherly kindneſs towards you, and ſuch as you be, that is, towards ſuch as repent of their paſt ſins, and earneſtly purpoſe to amend their lives, walking not after the way of the world, and the greateſt part of men, for the preſervation of their pelf, which, will they nill they, they ſhall leave ſooner or later, and to whom, and how it ſhall be uſed, they know not. Indeed to ſuch as walk in their wickedneſs, and wind on with the world, this time is a time of wrath and vengeance, and their beginning of ſorrow is but now, becauſe they contemn the phyſic of their Father, which by this purging time and cleanſing days would work for their health, if they did but conſider it: and becauſe they will not have God's bleſſing, which hath been offered to them both by proſperity and adverſity, therefore it ſhall be kept far enough from them. As when the ſick man will receive no kind of phyſic from the hands of the phyſician, he is left alone, and ſo the malady increaſeth, and at length deſtroyeth him. To ſuch men, indeed theſe days are, and ſhould be doleful days, and days of woe and weeping, becauſe their damnation draweth nigh.

But unto ſuch as be penitent, and are deſirous to live after the Lord's will (among whom I do not only count you, but, as far as a man may judge, I know ye are), unto ſuch, I ſay, this time is, and ſhould be comfortable. For now our Father chaſtiſeth us for our ſins: if he had had a mind to deſtroy us, he would have left us to ourſelves, to ſeek our own ways, and work our own ruin; let us patiently embrace his fatherly viſitation, for he chaſtiſeth us in this world, leſt with the world we ſhould periſh. Therefore, dear friends, call to mind and lament your ſins; pray for mercy and forgiveneſs, and undoubtingly believe that God will hear you: he doth not puniſh twice for one thing.

So that, I ſay, we have cauſe to rejoice for theſe days, becauſe our Father ſuffereth us not to lie in Jezebel's bed, ſleeping in our own ſins and ſecurity, but, as mindful of us, doth correct us as his own children; whereby we may be certain that we are no baſtards, but ſons, for he correcteth every ſon whom he receiveth. So that they who are not partakers of his chaſtiſement, or that contemn it, declare themſelves to be baſtards and not ſons, as I know you are, who, being chaſtiſed, improve it accordingly. And therefore, my dear friends, be glad, knowing certainly even by theſe viſitations of the Lord, that ye are his dear and choſen children, whoſe faults your Father doth viſit with the rod of correction, but his mercy will he never take away from us, Amen.

You have cauſe to rejoice for theſe days, becauſe they are days of trial, wherein you yourſelves, and all the world ſhall know that you belong not to it, but are God's darlings. Before theſe days came, Lord God, how many thought themſelves in God's boſom, and ſo were taken, and would be taken by the world? But now we ſee whoſe they are. For whom we obey, his ſervants we be. If we obey the world (which God forbid, and hitherto ye have not done it), then are we the world's; but if we obey God, then are we God's. Which thing (I mean, that ye are God's), theſe days have declared both to you, to me, and to all others that know you, better than ever we knew it. Therefore you have no cauſe to be ſorry, but rather to rejoice at this aſſurance of being the Lord's children, and as you are ſo accounted by all good people.

What though the world repine thereat? what though he kick? what though he ſeek to trouble and moleſt you? he doth but according to his nature: he cannot love the Lord, who liveth not in the Lord: he cannot brook the child, that hateth the Father: he that careth not for the maſter, will not mind the ſervant. If ye were of the world, the world would love you, ye ſhould live quietly, there would be no grief, no moleſtation. If the devil dwelt in you (which God forbid), he would not ſtir up his knights to beſiege your houſe, or ſuffer his fiends to enter into your ſwine: But becauſe Chriſt dwelleth in you (as he doth by faith), therefore the devil ſtirreth up his firſt-begotten ſon, the world, to ſeek how to diſquiet you, to rob you, to ſpoil you, and to dedroy you: and perchance your dear Father, to try, and to make known to you and to the world, that ye are intended for a better habitation than can be found here upon earth, even an houſe not made with hands, eternal in the heavens; hath given, or will give power to Satan, and to the world, to take from you the things which he hath lent you, and by taking them away, to try your fidelity, obedience, and love towards him (for ye muſt not love them above him), as by giving that ye have, and keeping it, he hath declared his love towards you.

Satan, it may be, telleth God (as he did of Job) that ye love God for the ſake of your goods. What then, if the Lord, to try you with Job, ſhould give him power over your goods and body, would ye be diſmayed? would ye deſpair? would ye be faint-hearted? or would ye not rather rejoice, as the apoſtles did, that they were worthy to ſuffer any thing for the Lord's ſake? O forget not the end that happened to Job: for as it happened to him, ſo ſhall it happen unto you. For God is the ſame God, and cannot long forget to ſhew mercy to them that look and long for it, as ye do, and I pray you ſtill ſo to do: for the Lord loveth you, and never can nor will forget to ſhew and pour out his mercy upon you. After he hath afflicted and tried you a little while (ſaith St. Peter), he will viſit, comfort, and confirm you; as he did to Jacob wreſtling with the angel: when at length morning came, and the ſun aroſe; ſo, doubtleſs, it will happen unto you. However, do ye as Job and Jacob did, that is, order and diſpoſe the things that God hath lent you, as well as you can whilſt you have time: who knoweth but God hath given you power thus long, for that end?

Go therefore, diſpoſe of your goods, prepare yourſelves to trial, that ye may either ſtand to it like God's champions; or elſe if you feel ſuch infirmity in yourſelves that ye be not able, give place to violence, and go where you may ſerve the Lord with a free and ſafe conſcience. Think not this counſel to come by chance or fortune, but from the Lord. Other oracles we may not look for now. As God told Joſeph in a dream by an angel, that he ſhould fly, ſo if you feel ſuch infirmity in yourſelves, as ſhould turn to God's diſhonour and your own deſtruction withal, know that at this preſent I am as God's angel, to admoniſh you to take time while ye have it, and to ſee that God's name might not be diſhonoured by you. Joſeph might have objected the omiſſion of his vocation, as perchance ye will do. But (dear hearts) let vocations and all things elſe give place to God's name, and the ſanctifying thereof.

This I ſpeak, not as though I would not have you rather to tarry, and to ſtand to it: but I ſpeak it in reſpect of your infirmity, which if you feel to be ſo great in you, that you are not certain of this hope, that God will never tempt you above your ability; fly and get you hence, and know that thereby God will have you tried to yourſelves and to others. For by it you ſhall know how to take this world, and that your home here is no home, but that ye look for another, and ſo give occaſion to others leſs to love this world, and perchance to ſome to doubt of their religion. Wherein though they be earneſt, yet would they not loſe ſo much as ye do for your religion, which ye do confirm to me and others, by our giving place to violence.

Laſt of all, ye have cauſe to rejoice over theſe our days, becauſe they be the days of confirmation, in which and by which, God our heavenly Father maketh us like to Chriſt's image here, that we may be like unto him elſe-

where. For if we ſuffer with him, then ſhall we alſo reign with him; if we be buried with him, then ſhall we riſe with him again; if we accompany with him in all troubles and afflictions, then ſhall we rejoice with him in glory; if we now ſow with him in tears, we ſhall reap with him in gladneſs: if we confeſs him before men, he will confeſs us before his Father in heaven; if we take his part, he will take ours; if we loſe aught for his name ſake, he will give us all things for his truth ſake. So that we ought to rejoice and be glad, for it is not given to every one to ſuffer loſs of country, life, goods, houſe, &c. for the Lord's ſake. What can God the Father do more unto us, than to call us into the camp with his Son? What may Chriſt our Saviour do more for us, than to make us his warriors? What can the Holy Ghoſt do to us above this, to mark us with the cognizance of the Lord of Hoſts?

This cognizance of the Lord ſtandeth not in forked caps, tippets, ſhaven crowns, or ſuch other baggage and anti-chriſtian pelf, but in ſuffering for the Lord's ſake. "The world ſhall hate you," ſaith Chriſt. Lo, there is the cognizance and badge of God's children; The world ſhall hate you. Rejoice therefore (my dearly beloved) rejoice, that God doth thus vouchſafe to begin to conform you, and to make you like to Chriſt. By the trial of theſe days ye are occaſioned more to repent, more to pray, more to contemn this world, more to deſire life everlaſting, more to be holy (for holy is the end for which God doth afflict us), and ſo to come to God's company. Which thing becauſe we cannot do as long as this body is as it is, therefore by the door of death we muſt enter with Chriſt into eternal life, and immortality of ſoul and body; which God of his mercy ſend ſhortly for our Saviour Jeſus Chriſt his ſake, Amen.

To Mrs. A. Warcup.

THE everlaſting peace of Chriſt be more and more lively felt in our hearts, by the operation of the Holy Ghoſt, now and for ever, Amen.

Although I know it to be more than needleſs to write any thing unto you, good ſiſter, being, as I doubt not but you be, diligently exerciſed in reading of the ſcriptures, in meditating of the ſame, and in hearty prayer to God for the help of his Holy Spirit, to have the ſenſe and feeling, eſpecially of the comforts you read in God's word: yet having ſuch opportunity, and not knowing whether hereafter I ſhall ever have the like (as this meſſenger can declare), I thought good in few words to take my farewel in writing, becauſe otherwiſe I cannot. And now methinks I have done it. For what elſe can I, or ſhould I ſay unto you, my dearly beloved in the Lord, but farewel? Farewel, dear ſiſter, farewel; howbeit in the Lord, our Lord (I ſay) farewel. In him ſhall you fare well, and ſo much the better, by how much in yourſelf you fare evil, and ſhall fare evil.

When I ſpeak of yourſelf, I mean alſo this world, this life, and all things properly pertaining to this life. In them as you look not for your welfare, ſo be not diſmayed when accordingly you ſhall not feel it. To the Lord our God, to the Lamb our Chriſt, which hath borne our ſins on his back, and is our Mediator for ever, do I ſend you. In him look for welfare, and that without wavering, becauſe of his own goodneſs and truth, which our wickedneſs cannot take away: not that I would have you flatter yourſelf in any evil or unbelief, but that I may comfort you, that they ſhould not diſmay you. Yours is our Chriſt wholly, yours, I ſay, he is, with all that ever he hath: is not this welfare, think you? Mountains ſhall move, and the earth ſhall fall, before you find it otherwiſe, ſay that lyar Satan what he liſt.

Therefore, good ſiſter, farewel, and be merry in the Lord, be merry, I ſay, for you have good cauſe. If your welfare, joy, and ſalvation, hanged upon any other thing than God's mercy and truth, then you might well be ſad, heavy, and ſtand in doubt: but inaſmuch as it hangeth only upon theſe two (I mean God's mercy and truth), tell Satan he lyeth when he would perſuade you to ſtand heſitating, by cauſing you to caſt your eyes (which only in this caſe ſhould be ſet on Chriſt our ſweet Saviour), on yourſelf. In ſome part, indeed, look on yourſelf, on your faith, on your love, obedience, &c. to awaken you from ſecurity, to ſtir you up to diligence, in doing the things appertaining to your vocation: but when you would be at peace with God, and have true conſolation in your conſcience, altogether look upon the goodneſs of God in Chriſt. Think on this commandment which precedeth all other, That you muſt have no other gods but the Lord Jehovah, which is your Lord God: which he could not be, if he did not pardon your ſins in very deed. Remember that Chriſt commandeth you to call him Father for the ſame intent. And here call to mind all the benefits of God hitherto ſhewed upon you: and ſo ſhall you feel in very deed, that which I wiſh unto you now, and pray you to wiſh unto me. Farewel, or welfare in the Lord Jeſus, with whom he grant us ſhortly to meet us as his children, for his name and mercy ſake, to our eternal welfare, Amen.

To Mr. Laurence Saunders, Priſoner in the Marſhalſea.

MY good brother, I beſeech our good and gracious Father always to continue his gracious favour and love towards us and by us, as by inſtruments of his grace, to work his glory and the confuſion of his adverſaries. "Out of the mouth of infants and babes he will ſhew forth his praiſe, to deſtroy the enemy, &c."

I have peruſed your letters to myſelf, and have read them to others. For anſwer whereof, if I ſhould write what Dr. Taylor and Mr. Philpot do think, then muſt I ſay, that they think the ſalt ſent unto us by your friend is unſeaſonable. And I think they both will declare it heartily, if they ſhould come before men. As for me, if you would know what I think (my good and moſt dear brother), becauſe I am ſo ſinful and ſo defiled (the Lord knoweth that I lye not) with many grievous ſins, which I hope are waſhed away with the blood of Chriſt, I neither can nor would be conſulted withal, but as a cypher in Agrime. Howbeit, to tell you how and what I mind, take this for a ſum: I pray God in no caſe I may ſeek myſelf; and indeed, I thank God for it, I purpoſe it not.

That which remaineth I commit to my Lord God; and I truſt in him, that he will do according to this; Caſt thy care on the Lord, &c. Caſt all your care upon him, &c. Reveal unto the Lord thy way, and truſt, &c. Whoſoever truſteth in the Lord, mercy ſhall compaſs him about. For the Lord is faithful: he will in temptation make a way, that ye may be able to bear it. The Lord knoweth how to rid out of temptation the godly, &c. O would God I were godly, &c. The Lord knoweth how to deliver out of temptation ſuch as truſt in him, &c. I cannot think that they will offer any kind of indifferent or mean conditions: for if we will not Adorare Beſtiam, we never ſhall be delivered, but againſt their will, think I. God our Father and gracious Lord make perfect the good work he hath begun in us.

He will do it, my brother, my dear brother, whom I have in my inward bowels to live and die with. O that I were with you. Pray for me, my own heart root in the Lord.

For ever your own,
John Bradford.

Another Letter to Mr. Saunders.

GOD's ſweet peace in Chriſt be with you, my good brother in the Lord Jeſus, and with all your fellow-captives, Amen.

I was hindered this morning from muſing on that which I purpoſed to have thought on by reaſon of you, againſt whom I ſaw myſelf guilty of negligence, even in this point that I would not write, I ſhould ſay, that I had not written unto you as yet: therefore I prepared myſelf out of hand to clear myſelf hereof, not that I will go about to excuſe my fault (for that were more to load me), but by aſking God and you pardon, to get it no more laid to my charge. Now when I was thus purpoſing, and partly doing, there cometh one with a letter from you: for which as I have cauſe to thank God and you, ſo I ſee myſelf more blame-worthy for thus long holding my peace. Howbeit, good brother, in this I have given a demonſtration to you, to behold my negligence in all other things, and eſpecially in praying for you, and for the church of God, which for my ſins and hypocriſy (hypocriſy indeed even in this writing, God deliver me from it), have deſerved to be puniſhed. God is juſt, for we have deſerved all kinds of plagues at his hands; but yet merciful is he that will on this wiſe chaſtiſe us in this world, that we ſhould not be condemned with the world. He might otherwiſe have puniſhed us, I mean, he might have caſt us in priſon for other cauſes, me eſpecially, than for his goſpel and word ſake. Praiſed therefore be his name, who vouchſafeth us worthy of this honour. Ah good God, forgive us our ſins, and work by this thy fatherly correction on us, on me eſpecially, effectually to love thee and thy Chriſt; and with joyfulneſs carry thy croſs to the end.

Ah good brother, if I could always have God, his majeſty, mercy, heaven, hell, &c. before mine eyes, then ſhould I endure, as St. Paul writeth of Moſes, Heb. 11. "He endured, as he that ſaw him which is inviſible." Pray for me, as I know you do, and give thanks alſo: for, "In the Lord I truſt, I ſhall not waver. If I walk by the valley of the ſhadow of death, I will not fear, for thou art with me, O Lord." I think we ſhall be ſhortly called forth; for now Legem habent, & ſecundum legem, &c. otherwiſe will they not reaſon with us: and I their ſhoot-anchor will be, to have us to ſubſcribe. Which thing if we do, though with this condition (ſo far as the thing ſubſcribed to is not againſt God's word) yet this will be offenſive. Therefore let us all confeſs that we are no changelings, but the ſame as we were in religion, and therefore cannot ſubſcribe, except we will diſſemble both with God, ourſelves, and the world. Theſe things I write to you, dear brother in the Lord. Now I will read your epiſtle. Ah brother, I had the practical underſtanding with you in that vine which you deſcribe: pray the Lord that I may think ſo indeed. God make me thankful for you. All our fellow-priſoners ſalute you, and give thanks to God for you. The ſame do you for us, and pray that, &c.

Your brother in the Lord Jeſus, to live and die with you,
J. Bradford.

To my dear Fathers, Dr. Cranmer, Dr. Ridley, and Dr. Latimer.

JESUS Immanuel. My dear fathers in the Lord, I beſeech God our ſweet Father through Chriſt, to make perfect the good he hath begun in us all, Amen.

I had thought that every one of your ſtaves had ſtood next the door, but now it is otherwiſe perceived. Our dear brother Rogers hath broken the ice valiantly; as this day, I think, or to-morrow at the uttermoſt, hearty Hooper, ſincere Saunders, and truſty Taylor end their courſe, and receive their crown. The next am I, which hourly look for the porter to open me the gates after them, to enter into the deſired reſt. God forgive me mine unthankfulneſs for this exceeding great mercy, that amongſt ſo many thouſands it pleaſeth his mercy to chuſe me to be one, in whom he will ſuffer. For although it be moſt true, that I juſtly ſuffer (for I have been a great hypocrite, and a grievous ſinner, the Lord pardon me, yea, he hath done it, he hath done it indeed), yet what evil hath he done? Chriſt, whom the prelates perſecute, his verity which they hate in me, hath done no evil, nor deſerved death. Therefore ought I moſt heartily to rejoice of this tender kindneſs of the Lord towards me, which uſeth remedy, for my ſin as a teſtimonial of his teſtament, to his glory, to my everlaſting comfort, to the edifying of his church, and to the overthrowing of Antichriſt and his kingdom. Oh what am I, Lord, that thou ſhouldſt thus magnify me ſo vile a man and miſer, as always I have been? Is this thy cuſtom, to ſend for ſuch a wretch and hypocrite as I have been, in a fiery chariot, as thou didſt for Elijah? O dear fathers, be thankful for me, that I ſtill might be found worthy in whom the Lord would ſanctify his holy name. And for your part, make you ready: for we are but your gentlemen-uſhers. The marriage of the Lamb is prepared, come unto the marriage. I now go to leave my fleſh there where I received it. I ſhall be conveyed thither, as Ignatius was at Rome, Leopardis; by whoſe evil I hope to be made better. God grant, if it be his will that I aſk, it may make them better by me, Amen.

For my farewel, therefore, I write and ſend this unto you, truſting ſhortly to ſee you where we ſhall never be ſeparated. In the mean ſeaſon I will not ceaſe, as I have done, to commend you to our Father of heaven, and that you would ſo do by me, I moſt heartily pray every one of you: you know now I have moſt need. "Faithful is God, who will not ſuffer us to be tempted above our ſtrength." He never did it hitherto, and I am aſſured he never will, Amen. "He is on my right hand, therefore I ſhall not fall. Wherefore my heart ſhall rejoice, for he ſhall not leave my ſoul in hell, neither ſhall ſuffer me his holy one, by his grace in Chriſt, to ſee corruption."

Out of priſon in haſte, looking for the tormenter, February 8. 1555.

John Bradford.

To the Right Honourable the Lord Ruſſel, now Earl of Bedford, being then in Trouble for the Cauſe of Religion.

THE everlaſting and moſt gracious God and Father of our Saviour Jeſus Chriſt, bleſs your good lordſhip with all manner of heavenly bleſſings in the ſame Chriſt our only comfort and hope, Amen.

Praiſed be God our Father, who hath thought you worthy of faith in his Chriſt, and of his croſs for the ſame. Magnified be his holy name, who, as he hath delivered you from one croſs, ſo he hath made you willing (I hope) and ready to bear another when he ſhall ſee his time to lay it upon you: for theſe are the moſt ſingular gifts of God, given as to few, ſo to none elſe but to thoſe who are moſt dear in his ſight. Faith is reckoned, and worthily, among the greateſt gifts of God, yea, it is the greateſt that we can enjoy. For by it, as we be juſtified and made God's children, ſo are we temples and poſſeſſors of the Holy Spirit, yea, of Chriſt alſo, (Eph. 4.) And of the Father himſelf (John 14.) By faith we drive the devil away (1 Pet. 5.) We overcome the world (1 John 5.) And are already citizens of heaven, and fellows with God's dear ſaints. But who is able to reckon the riches that this faith bringeth with her unto the ſoul ſhe ſitteth upon? No man nor angel. And therefore (as I ſaid) of all God's gifts, ſhe may be placed at the head, and have the higheſt ſeat. Which if men would rightly conſider (in that it cometh only from God's mercy-ſeat, not of hearing maſſes, mattins, diriges, or ſuch droſs, but by hearing the word of God in ſuch a tongue as we may underſtand it), as they would be diligent and take great heed for doing or ſeeing any thing which might caſt her down (for then they fall alſo), ſo would they with no leſs care read and hear God's holy word, joining thereto moſt earneſt and hearty prayer, as well for the better underſtanding, as for the loving, living and confeſſing the ſame, in ſpite of the devil, the world, the fleſh, reaſon, goods, poſſeſſions, carnal friends, wife, children, and very life here; if they ſhould pull us back to hearken to their voice and counſel, for more quiet, ſure, and longer uſe of them.

Now notwithſtanding this excellency of faith, in that we read the apoſtle to match therewith, yea (as it were) to prefer ſuffering perſecution for Chriſt's ſake, I ſuppoſe no man will be ſo weak as to think otherwiſe, but that I and all God's children have cauſe to glorify and praiſe him, who hath made you worthy of ſo great a bleſſing. For though the reaſon or the wiſdom of the world think of the croſs according to their reach, and according to their preſent ſenſe, and therefore they fly from it, as from the greateſt ignominy and ſhame: yet thoſe who have been brought up in the ſchool of Chriſt have learned to think otherwiſe of his croſs, that it is the frame-houſe in which God frameth his children like to his Son Chriſt; the furnace that fineth God's gold; the highway to heaven; the livery wherewith God's ſervants are ſerved; the earneſt and beginning of all conſolation and glory. For they (I mean God's ſcholars, as your lordſhip, I hope, is) do enter into God's ſanctuary, leſt their feet ſlip. They look not, as beaſts do, on things preſent only, but on things to come, whereby they have the day of judgment and the glorious coming of Chriſt, as preſent to their faith, as the wicked have now their worldly wealth before their eyes, wherein they wallow, and will wallow till they tumble into hell, into miſeries inexpreſſible, into torments everlaſting. Now they follow the fiend as the bear doth the train of honey, and the ſow the ſwillings, till they be brought into the ſlaughter-houſe, and then they ſhall know (but too late) that their proſperity hath brought them to eternal perdition. Then ſhall they cry, Woe, woe, woe, we went the wrong way: we counted theſe men (I mean ſuch as you be, that ſuffer for God's ſake, loſs of goods, friends and life, whom they ſhall ſee cloathed with rich robes of righteouſneſs, crowns of moſt pure precious gold, and palms of conqueſt in the glorious palace of the Lamb, where is eternal joy and felicity); we counted (they will then ſay) theſe men but fools and mad men, we took their conditions to be but curioſity. But then the time will be turned, laughing ſhall be turned into weeping, and weeping into rejoicing. Read Wiſdom 2, 3, 4 and 5.

Therefore (as before I have ſaid) great cauſe have I to thank God, who hath vouchſafed to make you worthy of his moſt bountiful bleſſing: much more cauſe then have you, my good lord, to be thankful. For look upon your vocation, I pray you, tell me how many noblemen, earls ſons, lords, knights, and men of eſteem, hath God thus dealt with in this realm of England? I dare ſay, you think not that you have deſerved this. Only God's mercy in Chriſt hath wrought this on you, as he did in Jeremiah's time on Abimelech, in Ahab's time on Abdias, in Chriſt's time on Joſeph of Arimathea, in the apoſtles time on Sergius Paulus, and the queen of Candace's chamberlain. Only now be thankful, and continue, continue, my good lord, continue to confeſs Chriſt. Be not aſhamed of him before men, and then he will not be aſhamed of you. Now will he try you; ſtick faſt unto him, and he will ſtick faſt by you; he will be with you in trouble, and deliver you. But then you muſt cry unto him; for ſo it proceedeth, "He cried unto me, and I heard him, I will be with him in trouble, I will deliver him, and honour him."

Remember Lot's wife, who looked back. Remember Francis Spira. Remember that none is crowned but he that ſtriveth lawfully. Remember that all you have is at Chriſt's command. Remember he loſt more for you than you can loſe for him. Remember you loſe not that which is loſt for his ſake; for you ſhall find much more here and hereafter. Remember you ſhall die, and when, where, and how, ye cannot tell. Remember that the death of ſinners is moſt terrible. Remember the death of God's ſaints is moſt precious in his ſight. Remember the multitude goeth the wide way that leadeth to deſtruction. Remember that the ſtrait gate which leadeth to glory, hath but few travellers. Remember Chriſt biddeth you to ſtrive to enter in thereat. Remember he that truſteth in the Lord, ſhall receive ſtrength to ſtand againſt all the aſſaults of his enemies. Be certain that all the hairs of your head are numbered. Be certain that your good Father hath appointed bounds, over which the devil dare not look. Commit yourſelf to him; he is, hath been, and will be your keeper. Caſt your care on him, and he will care for you. Let Chriſt be your ſcope and mark to aim at: let him be your pattern to work by; let him be your enſample to follow: give unto him your heart and hand, mind and tongue, faith and feet, and let his word be your candle, to go before you in all matters of religion. Bleſſed is he that walketh not to theſe popiſh prayers, nor ſitteth nor ſtandeth at them; glorify God both in ſoul and body. He that gathereth not with Chriſt, ſcattereth abroad. Uſe prayer; look for God's help, which is at hand aſſuredly to them that unfeignedly aſk and deſire it. In which prayers I heartily deſire your lordſhip to remember us, who are (God be praiſed) gladly going with you; but if we go before you, we hope that you (if it be God's pleaſure) will follow after, according to your daily prayer, "Thy will be done on earth, as it is in heaven." The good Spirit of God always guide your lordſhip unto the end, Amen.

Your Lordſhip's own for ever,
John Bradford.

To Mr. Warcup and his Wife, Mrs. Wilkinſon, and other Friends.

THE ſame peace our Saviour Chriſt left with his people, which is not without war with the world, Almighty God work plentifully in your hearts now and for ever, Amen.

I perceive the time is come wherein the Lord's ground will be known, I mean, it will now ſhortly appear who have received God's goſpel into their hearts indeed, to the taking of good root therein: for ſuch will not wither for a little heat or ſun-burning, but ſtiffly will ſtand and grow on, in ſpite of the malice of all burning ſhowers and tempeſts. And foraſmuch as (my beloved in the Lord) I am perſuaded of you, that ye be the children of God, God's good ground, which groweth and will grow on, by God's grace, bringing forth fruit to God's glory after your vocations, as occaſion ſhall be offered, therefore I cannot but ſo ſignify unto you, and heartily pray you and every one of you, accordingly to go forwards after your maſter Chriſt, not ſticking at the foul way and ſtormy weather which you are to come into, and are like ſo to do: being moſt certain of this, that the end of your journey ſhall be pleaſant and joyful in ſuch a perpetual reſt and bliſsfulneſs, as cannot but ſwallow up the ſhowers that ye now feel and are immerged in, if ye often ſet it before your eyes, after St. Paul's counſel in the latter end of the fourth, and beginning of the fifth chapter of the ſecond epiſtle to the Corinthians. Read it, I pray you, and remember it often as a reſtorative to refreſh you, leſt ye faint in the way.

And beſides this, ſet before you alſo, that though the weather be foul, and ſtorms grow apace, yet ye go not alone, but others your brothers and ſiſters tread the ſame path, as St. Peter telleth us: and therefore company ſhould cauſe you to be the more courageous and chearful. But if you had no company at all to go preſently with you, I pray you tell me, if even from the beginning, the beſt of God's friends have found any fairer weather and way to the place whither ye are going (I mean heaven), than ye now find, and are like to do; except ye will with the worldlings, which have their portion in this life, tarry ſtill by the way till the ſtorms are overpaſt, and then either night will ſo approach that ye cannot travel, or the doors will be locked before ye come, and ſo ye then lodge without in evil lodgings. Read Revelations 22. Begin at Abel, and come from him to Noah, Abraham, Iſaac, Jacob, Joſeph, the patriarchs, Moſes, David, Daniel, and all the ſaints of the Old Teſtament, and tell me whether any of them ever found any fairer way than ye now find.

If the Old Teſtament will not ſerve, I pray you come to the New, and begin with Mary and Joſeph, and come from them to Zachary and Elizabeth, John Baptiſt, and every one of the apoſtles and evangeliſts, and ſearch whether they all found any other way into the city we travel towards, than by many tribulations.

Beſides theſe, if ye ſhould call to remembrance the primitive church, Lord God, ye ſhould ſee ſo many to have given chearfully their bodies to moſt grievous torments, rather than they would be ſtopped in their journey, that there is no day in the year, but (I dare ſay) a thouſand was the feweſt that with great joy loſt their homes here, but in the city they went unto, have found other manner of home than man's mind is able to conceive. But if none of theſe were, if ye had no company now to go with you, as you have me your poor brother and bondman of the Lord, with many others, I truſt in God, if you had none of the fathers, patriarchs, kings, prophets, apoſtles, evangeliſts, martyrs, and other holy ſaints and children of God, that in their journey to heaven-ward found as ye now find, and are like to find if ye go forward, as I truſt ye will, yet ye have your maſter and captain Jeſus Chriſt, the only begotten and beloved Son of God, in whom was all the Father's pleaſure, joy and delight, ye have him to go before you, no fairer way, but much fouler, into this our city of Jeruſalem. I need not (I truſt) to rehearſe what manner of way he found. Begin at his birth, and till ye come at his burial, ye will find that every foot of his journey was no better, but much worſe than yours is now.

Wherefore (my dearly beloved in the Lord) be not ſo dainty, as to look for that at God's hands, your dear Father, which the patriarchs, prophets, apoſtles, evangeliſts, martyrs, ſaints, and his own Son Jeſus Chriſt did not find. Hitherto we have had a fair way (I think) and fair weather alſo: now becauſe we have loitered by the way, and not made the ſpeed we ſhould have done, our loving Lord and ſweet Father hath overcaſt the weather, and ſtirred up the ſtorms and tempeſts, that we might with more haſte run our race before night come, and the doors be locked. The devil ſtandeth now at every inn-door in his city and country of this world, crying unto us to tarry and lodge in this or that place till the ſtorms be overpaſt; not that he would not have us wet to the ſkin, but that the time might overpaſs us to our utter deſtruction. Therefore beware of his enticements. Caſt not your eyes on things that be preſent, how this man doth, and how that man doth; but caſt your eyes on the mark ye run at, or elſe ye will loſe the game. Ye know that he which runneth at the game, doth not look on others that ſtand by, and go this way or that way, but altogether he looketh on the mark, and on them that run with him, that thoſe which be behind overtake him not, and that he may overtake them which be before: even ſo ſhould we do, leave off looking on thoſe which will not run the race to heaven's bliſs by the path of perſecution with us, and caſt our eyes on the end of our race, and on them that go before us, that we may overtake them, and on them which come after us, that we may encourage them the faſter to follow.

He that ſhooteth at a mark, will not caſt his eyes on thoſe that ſtand by, but will rather take care of his aim, otherwiſe, he might ſhoot the wrong way: even ſo, my dearly beloved, let your eye and your heart be fixed on the mark you aim at, even Chriſt Jeſus, who for the joy ſet before him, did joyfully carry his croſs, contemning the ſhame, and therefore he now ſitteth at the right hand of the throne of God. Let us follow him; for this he did that we ſhould not be faint-hearted. For we may be aſſured, that if we ſuffer with him, we ſhall undoubtedly reign with him: but if we deny him, he will ſurely deny us: for "He that is aſhamed of me (ſaith Chriſt) and of my goſpel, in this faithleſs generation, I will be aſhamed of him before the angels of God in heaven." O how heavy a ſentence is this to all ſuch as know the maſs to be an abominable idol, full of idolatry, blaſphemy, and ſacrilege againſt God and his Chriſt (as undoubtedly it is), and yet for fear of men, for loſs of life and goods, yea, ſome for advantage and gain, will honour it with their preſence, diſſembling both with God and man, as their own heart and conſcience doth accuſe them. Better it were that ſuch had never known the truth, than thus wittingly, and for fear or favour of man, whoſe breath is in his noſtrils, to diſſemble it, or rather (as indeed he doth) deny it. The end of ſuch is like to be worſe than their beginning. Such had need to take heed of the two terrible places to the Hebrews in the 6th and 10th chapters, leſt by ſo doing they fall therein. Let them beware they do not craftily beguile themſelves, as ſome do I fear, who go to maſs, and becauſe they worſhip not, kneel not, or knock not as others do, but ſit ſtill in their pews, therefore they think they rather do good to others than hurt.

But, alas, if theſe men would look into their own conſciences, there ſhould they ſee that they are very diſſemblers, and in ſeeking to deceive others (for by this means the magiſtrates think them of their ſort), they deceive themſelves. They think at the time of elevation, that the eyes of all men are fixed upon them, to obſerve how they do. They think others, hearing of ſuch men going to maſs, do ſee, or enquire of their behaviour there. O if there were in thoſe men that are ſo preſent at the maſs, either love to God, or to their brethren, they would for the one, or both, openly take God's part, and admoniſh the people of their idolatry. They fear men more than Him who hath power to caſt both ſoul and body into hell fire: they haſten on both knees: they ſerve two maſters. God have mercy upon ſuch, and open their eyes with his eye-ſalve, that they may ſee that they who take no part with God, are againſt him; and that they who gather not with Chriſt, do ſcatter abroad. O that they would read what St. John ſaith will be done to the fearful. The advice given to the church of Laodicea, is good counſel for ſuch.

But to return to you again (dearly beloved) be not aſhamed of God's goſpel: it is the power of God unto ſalvation to all thoſe that do believe it. Be therefore partakers of the afflictions, as God ſhall make you able, knowing for certain that he will never tempt you farther than he will make you able to bear: and think it no ſmall favour from God to ſuffer for his truth: for the Spirit of God reſteth upon you, and ye are happy, as one day ye ſhall ſee. Read 2 Theſſalonians 1. Hebrews 12. As the fire hurteth not gold, but makeh it finer, ſo ſhall ye be more pure by ſuffering with Chriſt, 1 Pet. 1. The flail and the wind hurteth not the wheat, but cleanſeth it from the chaff. And ye (my beloved) are God's wheat; fear not therefore the flail; fear not the fanning wind; fear not the mill-ſtone; fear not the oven: for all theſe make you more meet for the Lord's own tooth.

Soap,

Soap, though it blacken, yet it foileth not the cloth, but rather at length maketh it more clean: so doth the black croſs help us to more whiteneſs, if God ſtrike with his battledore. Becauſe ye are God's ſheep, prepare yourſelves to the ſlaughter, always knowing that in the ſight of the Lord our death ſhall be precious. The ſouls under the altar look for us to fill up their number: happy are we if God hath ſo appointed us. Howſoever it be, dearly beloved, caſt your eyes wholly upon the Lord, with whom all the hairs of your heads are numbered, ſo that not one of them ſhall periſh. Will we, nill we, we muſt drink God's cup if he hath appointed it for us. Drink it willingly, and at the firſt when it is full, leſt peradventure if we linger, we ſhall, with the wicked, drink the dregs thereof, if at the beginning we refuſe to drink with his children: for with them his judgment beginneth, and when he hath wrought his will on mount Sion, then will he viſit the nations round about.

Submit yourſelves therefore under the mighty hand of the Lord. No man ſhall touch you without his knowledge; and whenever they moleſt you, know that it is for your good. God will thereby work to make you like unto Chriſt here, that ye may be like unto him hereafter. Acknowledge your unthankfulneſs and your ſin, and bleſs God that correcteth you in the world, becauſe you ſhall not be damned with the world. He might correct us otherwiſe than in making us to ſuffer for righteouſneſs ſake; but this he doth becauſe we are not of the world. Call upon his name through Chriſt, for his help, as he commandeth us. Believe that he is merciful to you, heareth you, and helpeth you: I am with him in trouble, and will deliver him, ſaith he. Know that God hath appointed bounds, over which the devil and all the world ſhall not paſs. If all things ſeem to be againſt us, let us ſay with holy Job, "If he kill me, I will hope in him." Read the ninety-firſt Pſalm, and pray for me your poor brother and fellow-ſufferer for God's goſpel ſake; his name therefore be praiſed; and may he through his infinite mercy and goodneſs make me and you worthy to ſuffer with good conſcience for the ſame. Die once we muſt, and when we know not: happy are they to whom God giveth to pay nature's debt, I mean, to die for his ſake.

Here is not our home; therefore let us accordingly conſider things, always having before our eyes the heavenly Jeruſalem, Heb. 12. Rev. 21. 22. the way thither to be by perſecutions; the dear friends of God, how they have gone it after the example of our Saviour Jeſus Chriſt, whoſe footſteps let us follow, even to the gallows, if it pleaſe God, not doubting but that as he within three days roſe again immortal, even ſo we ſhall do in our time, that is, when the trump ſhall blow, and the angel ſhall ſhout, and the Son of man ſhall appear in the clouds with innumerable ſaints and angels, in majeſty and great glory: then ſhall the dead ariſe, and we ſhall be caught up into the clouds to meet the Lord, and ſo be always with him. Comfort yourſelves with theſe words, and pray for me for God's ſake. Out of priſon, Nov. 19, 1553.

J. Bradford.

To Sir James Hales Knight, then Priſoner in the Compter.

THE God of mercy, and Father of all comfort, plentifully pour out upon you and in you his mercy, and with his conſolations comfort and ſtrengthen you to the end, for his and our Chriſt's ſake.

Although, right worſhipful Sir, many cauſes might move me to be content with crying for you to your God and my God, that he would give you grace to perſevere well, as he hath right notably begun, to the great glory of his name, and comfort of all ſuch as fear him; as lack of learning, familiarity, yea, acquaintance (for I think I am unknown to you both by face and name), and other ſuch like things; yet I cannot content myſelf, but preſume to ſcribble ſomething unto you; not that I think my ſcribbling can do you any good, but that I might declare my ſympathy and compaſſion, love and affection I bear towards you, who are contented, yea, deſirous with us poor miſers, to confeſs Chriſt's goſpel in theſe perilous times and days of trial. O Lord God, how good art thou, which doſt thus glean out grapes, I mean children for thyſelf, and brethren for Chriſt? Look, good maſter Hales, on your vocation; not many judges, not many knights, not many landed men, not many rich men, and wealthy to live as you are, hath God choſe to ſuffer for his ſake, as he hath now done you. Certainly I dare ſay you think not ſo of yourſelf, as though God were bound to prefer you, or had need of you, but rather attribute this as all good things unto his free mercy in Chriſt. Again, I dare ſay that you being a wiſe man do judge of things wiſely, that is, concerning this your croſs, you judge of it not after the world and people, which is the great maſter of error; not after the judgment of reaſon and worldly wiſdom, which is fooliſhneſs to faith; not after the preſent ſenſe, to which it ſeemeth not to be joyous but grievous, as St. Paul writeth: but after the word of God, which teacheth your croſs to be, in reſpect of yourſelf between God and you, God's chaſtiſing, and your Father's correction, nurture, ſchool, trial, path-way to heaven, glory and felicity, and the furnace to conſume the droſs, and mortify the relics of old Adam, which yet remain, yea, even the frame-houſe to faſhion you like to the deareſt ſaints of God here, yea to Chriſt the Son of God, that elſewhere you might be like unto him.

Now concerning your croſs in reſpect of the world, between the world and you, God's word teacheth it to be a teſtimonial of God's truth, of his providence, of his power, of his juſtice, of his wiſdom, of his anger againſt ſin, of his goodneſs, of his judgment, of your faith and religion, ſo that by it you are to the world a witneſs of God, that he is true, he ruleth all things, he is juſt, wiſe, and at length will judge the world, and caſt the wicked into perdition, but the godly he will take and receive into his eternal habitation. I know you judge of things after faith's fetch, and the effects or ends of things, and ſo you ſee an eternal weight of glory which this croſs ſhall bring unto you, while ye look not on things which are ſeen, but on the things which are not ſeen. Let the worldlings weigh things, and look upon the affairs of men with their worldly and corporal eyes, as many did in the ſubſcription of the king's laſt will; and therefore they did that, for which they afterwards repented. But let us look on things after another manner, as God be praiſed you did, in not doing that which you were deſired; you then beheld things not as a man, but as a man of God; and ſo you do now in religion, at leaſt hitherto you have done, and that you might do ſo ſtill, I humbly beſeech and pray you ſay with David, "Mine eyes fail for thy word, ſaying, when wilt thou comfort me? Though you be like a bottle in the ſmoke (for I hear you want health) yet do not forget the ſtatutes of the Lord: but cry out, How many are the days of thy ſervant? When wilt thou execute judgment on them that perſecute me?" And be certain, "The Lord will ſurely come, and not ſtay; though he tarry, wait for him: for he is but a while in his anger, but in his favour is life: weeping may abide at evening, but joy cometh in the morning." Follow therefore Iſaiah's counſel, Hide thyſelf for a very little while until his indignation paſs over, which is not indignation indeed, but to our ſenſe: and therefore in the ſix and twentieth chapter of Iſaiah, God ſaith of his church and people, that as he keepeth night and day: ſo there is no anger in me, ſaith he.

The mother ſometime beateth the child, but yet her heart melteth upon it, even in the very beating: and, therefore therefore ſhe caſteth the rod into the fire, and calleth the child, giveth it an apple, and dandleth it moſt motherly. And to ſay the truth, the love of mothers to their children, is but a trace to train us to behold the love of God towards us: and therefore, ſaith he, Can a mother forget the child of her womb? As who ſhould ſay, No? but if ſhe ſhould ſo do, yet will I not forget thee, ſaith the Lord of hoſts. Ah comfortable ſaying! I will not forget thee, ſaith the Lord. Indeed the children of God think oftentimes that God had forgotten them, and therefore they cry, Hide not thy face from me, &c. Forſake me not, O Lord. Whereas in very truth it is not ſo, but only to their preſent ſenſe: and therefore, ſaith David, I ſaid in mine agony, I was clean caſt away from thy face. But was it ſo? No verily. Read his Pſalms, and you ſhall ſee. So he writeth alſo in other places very often, eſpecially in the perſon of Chriſt: as when he ſaith, My God, my God, why haſt thou forſaken me? he ſaith not, Why doſt thou forſake me? or, Why wilt thou forſake me? but, Why haſt thou forſaken me? whereas, indeed, God had not left him, but that it was ſo to his ſenſe, and that this Pſalm telleth us full well; which I pray you ſometimes to read; it is the twenty-ſecond pſalm, and thereto join the thirtieth, and the hundred and ſixteenth, with divers others. Much the ſame we read in the fortieth chapter of the prophet Iſaiah, where he reproveth Iſrael for ſaying, God had forgotten them, in theſe words, "Haſt thou not known? haſt thou not heard? &c.—They that truſt in the Lord ſhall renew their ſtrength." In his fifty-fourth chapter read the following comfortable words; "Fear not, for a little while I have forſaken thee, but with great compaſſion will I gather thee. For a moment in mine anger I hide my face from thee, for a little ſeaſon: but in everlaſting mercy have I had compaſſion on thee, ſaith the Lord thy Redeemer. For this is unto me as the waters of Noah: for as I have ſworn that the waters of Noah ſhould no more go over the earth, ſo have I ſworn that I would not be angry with thee nor rebuke thee. For the mountains ſhall move, and the hills ſhall fall down, but my mercy ſhall not depart from thee, neither ſhall the covenant of my peace fall away, ſaith the Lord that hath compaſſion on thee."

But the ſcriptures are full of ſuch ſweet places to them that will bear the wrath of the Lord, and wait for his health and help. As of all temptations, this is the greateſt, that God hath forgotten, or will not help us through the pikes, as they ſay: ſo of all the ſervice of God, nothing is more pleaſing to him, than aſſuredly to hope and truſt in him, whoſe help is always ready; for he is an helper in tribulations, and doth more glorioufly ſhew his power by ſuch as be weak, and feel themſelves ſo. The weaker we are, the more ſtrong we are in him. Thus the eyes of the Lord be on them that fear and tremble. He will accompliſh their deſire; he is with them in their trouble; he will deliver them. Before they cry, he heareth them, as all the ſcriptures teach us. To the reading whereof, and hearty prayer, I heartily commend you, beſeeching Almighty God, that of his eternal mercy he would make perfect the good he hath begun in you, and ſtrengthen you to the end, that you might have no leſs hope, but much more of his help to your comfort now againſt your enemies, than already he hath given you againſt N. for not ſubſcribing to the king's will.

Be certain, be certain, good maſter Hales, that all the hairs of your head, your dear Father hath numbered, ſo that one of them ſhall not periſh: your name is written in the book of life. Therefore caſt all your care upon God, who will comfort you with his eternal conſolations, and make you able to go through the fire (if need be) which is nothing to be compared to the fire wherein our enemies ſhall fall, and lie for ever; from which the Lord deliver us, though it be through temporal fire, which muſt be conſtrued according to the end and profit that cometh after it; it ſhall not then much terrify us to ſuffer for Chriſt our maſter's cauſe, which the Lord grant us for his mercies ſake, Amen.

From the King's Bench,
Your humble, John Bradford.

To Dr. Hill, Phyſician.

THE God of mercy, and Father of all comfort, at this preſent and for ever ingraft in your heart the ſenſe of his mercy in Chriſt, and the continuance of his conſolation, which cannot but enable you to carry with joy whatſoever croſs he ſhall lay upon you, Amen.

Hitherto I could not have the liberty to write unto you, as I ſuppoſe you know: but now through God's providence I have now no ſuch reſtraint, and therefore I ſhall write ſomething to clear myſelf of the ſuſpicion of unthankfulneſs towards you, as alſo to ſignify my carefulneſs for you in theſe dangerous days, leſt you ſhould wax cold in God's cauſe (which God forbid), or ſuffer the light of the Lord, once kindled in your heart, to be quenched, and ſo become as you were befote, after the example of the world, and of many others who would have been counted otherwiſe in our days, and yet ſtill beguile themſelves, ſtill would be ſo accounted, although by their outward life they declare the contrary, as if they thought they could keep the heart pure, while the outward man doth curry favour.

In which doings, as they deny God to be jealous, and therefore requireth the whole man as well body as ſoul, being both created for immortality and ſociety with him, and redeemed by the blood of Jeſus Chriſt, and now ſanctified by the Holy Spirit to be the temple of God, and member of his Son (I ſay) by their parting ſtakes to give God the heart and the world the body, they deny God to be jealous (for elſe they would give him both, as the wife would do to her huſband, whether he be jealous or no, if ſhe be honeſt), ſo they play the diſſemblers with the church of God by their fact, offending the godly, whom either they provoke to fall with them, or make them more careleſs and conſcienceleſs if they be fallen, and occaſioning the wicked and obſtinate to triumph againſt God, and the more vehemently to proſecute their malice againſt ſuch as will not defile themſelves in body or ſoul with the Romiſh rags now received amongſt us. Becauſe of this, I mean, leſt you my dear maſter and brother in the Lord, ſhould do as too many of our goſpellers have done for fear of man, whoſe breath is in his noſtrils, and hath power but of the body, not fearing the Lord, who hath power both of ſoul and body, and not only temporally, but alſo eternally: I could not but write ſomething unto you, as well becauſe gratitude requireth it (for many benefits I have received of God by your hands, for which may he reward you, for I cannot), as alſo becauſe charity and love compelleth me; not that I think you have need (for as I may rather learn of you, ſo I doubt not but you have hitherto kept yourſelf upright from halting), but that I might both quiet my conſcience, calling upon me hereabout, and ſignify unto you by ſomething, my carefulneſs for your ſoul, as painfully and often you have done for my body.

Therefore I pray you call to mind, that there be but two maſters, two kinds of people, two ways, and two manſion places. The maſters be Chriſt and Satan, the people be ſervitors to either of theſe, the ways be ſtrait and wide, the manſions be heaven and hell. Again, conſider that this world is the place of trial of God's people, and the devil's ſervants: for as the one will follow his maſter whatſoever cometh of it, ſo will the other. For a time it is hard to diſcern who pertaineth to God, and who to the devil: as in the calm and peace, who is a good ſhipman and warrior, and who is not. But as when the ſtorm ariſeth, the expert mariner is known; and as in war the good ſoldier is ſeen, ſo in affliction and the croſs, God's children are eaſily known from Satan's ſervants; for then as the good ſervant will follow his maſter, ſo will the godly follow their captain, come what will; whereas the wicked and hypocrites will bid adieu, and deſire leſs of Chriſt's acquaintance. For which cauſe the croſs is called a probation and trial, becauſe it trieth who will go with God, and who will forſake him. And now in England we ſee how ſmall a company Chriſt hath in compariſon of Satan's ſoldiers. Let no man deceive himſelf: for he that gathereth not with Chriſt, ſcattereth abroad. No man can ſerve two maſters; the Lord abhorreth double hearts, the lukewarm, that is, ſuch as are both hot and cold, he ſpitteth out of his mouth. None that halt on both knees, doth God take for his ſervants. The way of Chriſt is the ſtrait way, and ſo ſtrait, that as a few find it, and few walk in it, ſo no man can halt in it, but muſt needs go upright: for as the ſtraitneſs will ſuffer no reeling to this ſide or that ſide; ſo if any halt, he is like to fall off the bridge into the pit of eternal perdition.

Strive therefore, good Mr. Doctor, now you have found it, to enter into it: and if you ſhall be called or pulled back, look not on this ſide or that ſide, or behind you, as Lot's wife did, but ſtraightforwards is the end which is ſet before you (though it be to come), as even now preſent: like as you order your patients to do in purgations, and other your miniſtrations, to conſider the effect that will enſue; whereby the bitterneſs and loathſomeneſs of the purgation is ſo overcome, and the painfulneſs in abiding the working of what is miniſtered, is ſo eaſed, that it maketh the patient willingly and joyfully to receive what is to be received, be it never ſo unpleaſant: ſo, I ſay, ſet before you the end of this ſtrait way, and then doubtleſs, as St. Paul ſaith, it ſhall bring with it an eternal weight of glory, whilſt we look not on the thing which is ſeen, for that is temporal, but on the thing which is not ſeen, which is eternal. So doth the huſbandman in plowing and tilling ſet before him the harveſt-time; ſo doth the fiſher conſider the draught of his net, rather than the caſting in; ſo doth the merchant the return of his merchandize; and ſo ſhould we in theſe ſtormy days ſet before us, not the loſs of our goods, liberty, and very life; but the reaping time, the coming of our Saviour Chriſt to judgment, the fire that ſhall burn the wicked and diſobedient to God's goſpel, the blaſt of the trump, the exceeding glory prepared for us in heaven eternally, ſuch as the eye hath not ſeen, the ear hath not heard, nor the heart of man can conceive. The more we loſe here, the greater joy ſhall we have there. The more we ſuffer, the greater triumph. For corruptible droſs, we ſhall find incorruptible treaſures: for gold, glory; for ſilver, joy without end; for riches, royal robes; for earthly houſes, eternal palaces; mirth without meaſure, pleaſure without pain, felicity endleſs: in fine, we ſhall have God the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghoſt.

O happy place! O that this day would come! Then ſhall the end of the wicked be lamentable; then ſhall they receive the juſt reward of God's vengeance; then ſhall they cry, Woe, woe, that ever they did as they have done. Read Wiſd. 2, 3, 4, 5. Read Matt. 25. Read 1 Cor. 15. 2 Cor. 5. And by faith (which God increaſe in us), conſider the things there ſet forth. And for your further comfort read Hebrews 11. to ſee what faith hath done, always conſidering the way to heaven to be through many tribulations, and that all they who live godly in Chriſt Jeſus muſt ſuffer perſecution. You know this is your alphabet; He that will be my diſciple, ſaith Chriſt, muſt deny himſelf, and take up his croſs and follow me; not this biſhop, nor that doctor; not this emperor, nor that king; but Me, ſaith Chriſt: For he that loveth father, mother, wife, children, or even life, better than me, is not worthy of me. Remember, that the ſame Lord ſaith; He that will ſave his life ſhall loſe it. Comfort yourſelf with this, that as the devils had no power over the ſwine, or over Job's goods, without God's leave, ſo ſhall they have none over you. Remember alſo that all the hairs of your head are numbered with God. The devil may make a man believe he will drown him, as the ſea in its ſurges threateneth the land: but as the Lord hath appointed bounds for the one, over which it cannot paſs, ſo he doth for the other.

On God therefore caſt your care, love him, ſerve him after his word, fear him, truſt in him, hope at his hand for all help, and always pray, looking for the croſs, and whenſoever it cometh, be aſſured, that the Lord, as he is faithful, ſo he will never tempt you further than he will make you able to bear, but in the midſt of the temptation will make ſuch an evaſion as will be moſt for his glory and your eternal comfort. God for his mercy in Chriſt, with his Holy Spirit endue you, comfort you, under the wings of his mercy ſhadow you, and as his dear child guide you for evermore. To whoſe merciful tuition, as I do with my hearty prayers commit you; ſo I doubt not but you pray for me, and ſo I beſeech you ſtill to do. My brother P. telleth me, you would have the laſt part of St. Jerome's works, to have the uſe thereof for a fortnight. I cannot well ſpare them theſe three days, but on Thurſday next I will ſend them to you, if God preventeth me not. Uſe me and all that I have as your own. The Lord of his mercy in Chriſt direct our ways to his glory.

Out of priſon by yours to command,

John Bradford.
